The business community, both small and large, looks at this budget and the long-term debt financing of this government, the projection to double, perhaps more than double, the total debt in this province, the projection to take the debt service, which was at nine cents out of every $1 under our administration, up to as high as 20 cents, approximating the federal problem, which is now, we all know, totally out of control at 35 or 36 cents, the business community, notwithstanding all the accolades we are hearing from the predetermined deputants here this morning—with all due respect, I appreciate your coming—well, you can wave if you like, but it is pretty obvious when you look at the list here in every town we are going to that this is just a cooked deal going on. That is fine. I think the government is smart for doing it, actually.

But how does the business community, at such odds to what we are hearing here this morning, such total disagreement to what we are hearing here this morning—surely to goodness there has to be some kind of middle ground that says this government is not the latest, greatest saviour of the economy in Ontario. Why are people so afraid of this budget and where are your men and women going to work in the next five years when the debt chokes the life out of the province?

Mr Lorenowich: I do not know how you can say that when James Frank from the Conference Board of Canada says this budget is a confidence builder.

Mr Mahoney: Do you want a list of the guys who are apoplectic over this problem?

Mr Lorenowich: A University of Toronto economist says there is nothing wrong with this budget.

Mr Mahoney: Where are your men going to work, sir? That is my question. Where the hell are they going to work when the sawmills are being shut down? They are going to be on government assistance, for God's sake.

Mr Lorenowich: The sawmills are not being shut down by this budget. The sawmills are being shut down by that 15% tax of the previous government.

Mr Mahoney: This budget stops it, right?

Mr Lorenowich: It has not been stopped as yet.

Mr Mahoney: Open your eyes, sir. With due respect, open your eyes and stop letting the NDP dogma close your thinking on this budget. It is an absolute disaster.

Interjections.

Mr Mahoney: If there is a little pain over there hearing this stuff, then squirm in your seats, guys.

Mrs Sullivan: Mr Lorenowich, you have indicated that the wage protection fund has already assisted some of your workers. To my knowledge, that wage protection fund is not up and running. The legislation has not passed. Indeed, there has already been an announcement from the minister that changes the provisions of the wage protection fund that were announced in the budget. I would like to know how in fact you believe the wage protection fund has assisted your workers.

Mr Lorenowich: I did not say it has assisted them. At the present time, I said we appreciate that being used to protect employees who lose jobs.

Mrs Sullivan: Do you understand how the provisions of that have changed?

Mr Lorenowich: No, I do not. If there has been a recent change, I do not.

Mrs Sullivan: I think you will find it is less helpful than you thought it was going to be.

Mr Lorenowich: It appeared to be very helpful when it first came out. If there have been some changes, we are not aware of them.

Mr McLean: There was 28% being exported from the province. We are now down to 23%. You indicate we are depleting our forests more quickly than they are being regenerated at the 23%. We would have been depleting them a lot faster at 28%, so therefore the forest industry would have come to a standstill closer, years down the road, to an end. Basically, we had an environmentalist here this morning who indicated, with regard to the chlorine the mills are producing—have our environmental policies had any detrimental effect or caused any closing of the mills?

Mr Lorenowich: They have not, as far as I am aware, actually closed strictly because of that issue, no.

Mr McLean: But he indicated this morning they are really going to make this happen, they are going to make the mills take that chlorine—I guess it is coming from the forest before it goes in the front door. What do you say to that comment?

Mr Lorenowich: That is in the paper mill itself. The use of chlorine in the process, right in the paper mill. That has nothing to do with the woods itself.

Mr McLean: But it comes out into the stream, does it not?

Mr Lorenowich: I guess it is discharged into the lake or streams or wherever they discharge it.

Mr McLean: But if he gets his way and tries to stop that from happening, what do you put in place of it? I do not know, I am just asking.

Mr Lorenowich: Apparently there is a new system. I do not know if there is anyone here who represents paper who is going to appear before you, but there is a new duct at the experimental stage right now that will get rid of the chlorine. They will not have to use it. It is only used for bleaching of the paper, I believe, for the bleaching process.

Mr McLean: Is the other method a lot more expensive?

Mr Lorenowich: It probably is. Initially, they all are.

Mr B. Murdoch: From your brief I am led to believe you agree with this budget, so you must agree with deficit funding.

Mr Lorenowich: Short term.

Mr B. Murdoch: How long do you think your mills could operate in the same sort of manner and stay alive?

Mr Lorenowich: In the short term they can. You can do it over the long haul, and hopefully this government will not have budgets like this over the long haul.

Mrs Sullivan: They have already said they will.

Mr Sutherland: Short term.

Mr B. Murdoch: Unfortunately, they sit for the next four years. They have already presented it, so if you agree with this budget, they also present at the same time that their long-term goals for the next four years would be to double it.

Mr Lorenowich: Four years is not long term.

Mr B. Murdoch: So you think your mills could probably run on for four years deficit funding and stay alive?

Mr Lorenowich: Yes, sure. They have up to this point, ones that are plainly losing money. If you look at the mills, they claim they have been losing money for 20 years and yet they have just been hauling it out of the country apparently.

Mr B. Murdoch: In the meantime you say they have been laying people off, so that is okay, too, I guess; deficit spending and lay people off.

Mr Lorenowich: Our people are getting laid off through technological change. They are still producing the same amount of wood.

Mr B. Murdoch: Not because the companies are losing money, then?

Mr Lorenowich: No.

Mr McLean: I appreciate your comments this morning. The first job I ever had was working in the bush and I can tell you it was not with a power saw.

Mr Christopherson: Mr Lorenowich, I want to thank you very much for your presentation. Unfortunately, we are seeing a little bit of what we saw in Toronto. I thought we were coming out of that, badgering witnesses and trying to discredit them, either saying their political support for one party or another is motivating them to be here and therefore negates anything they might have to say, or trying to portray witnesses as having no idea of real economics and not understanding the issues.

I think it is important to understand that there is a balanced debate taking place in this province about whether we went down the right road. There is not only the Conference Board of Canada, which you have talked about correctly, but there are 59 other economists who signed a statement that started these hearings, saying they supported where we were going. Michael McCracken of Informetrica, who is a very well respected economist in this province, has also supported the direction in which we are going. It is really not a question of any kind of whacko economics, which is how some of the opposition members would like to portray it, but rather a real, decent philosophical debate on what is important for the people of Ontario and what direction we want to go in.

Having said that, I would just like to correct the record that, to the best of my knowledge, there is nothing in the budget statement that talks about a 20-cent servicing cost on the debt. We are talking about it rising to 12.4 cents, which is quite a bit different from the 34 cents we are now seeing with the federal government.

In light of the two directions that are available, the Mulroney approach to economics and the Ontario NDP approach to economics, there has been some talk here about long-term benefit. What about the long-term foundation and infrastructure of Ontario's economy? I would like to ask you, on behalf of your members, which long-term approach you think is going to serve your members in the final analysis?

Mr Lorenowich: As you are aware by my presentation, we are in favour of the budget. People who are on welfare do not pay taxes. It is as simple as that. If they are out of work, they are not going to pay taxes, and what is the government going to do then? That is the way we see it.

The Chair: Thank you for presenting your brief to the committee.

NORTHWESTERN ONTARIO WOMEN'S DECADE COUNCIL

The Chair: I would like to call on the Northwestern Ontario Women's Decade Council. Please identify yourselves for Hansard. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget hearing. You have one half-hour. The time left over after your presentation, up to a half an hour, will be question and answer period from the three parties.

Ms Untinen: Good morning. I am Leni Untinen, coordinator of the Northwestern Ontario Women's Decade Council, and this is Brenda Cryderman, our chairperson.

The Northwestern Ontario Women's Decade Council is a non-partisan, volunteer-based organization, composed of members of district women's groups as well as individuals. Its main goal is to improve the quality of life of women in northwestern Ontario in all spheres, economic, social and political. For the past 15 years we have worked on issues and concerns of northern women.

The state of Ontario's economy and the April 29, 1991 budget which addresses the economy is a major concern to area women. For our definition of economy, we would like to quote from a publication called Getting Started on Social Analysis in Canada. It is attributed to the United Church of Canada. It reads:

"The economy is something we share in common. It is the way we put together human and natural resources for the good of the common life. It is a vast collective enterprise and is the domain of no particular subgroup in society. It must be marked by justice, participation and sustainability.

It summons us in the time of our stewardship to be good gardeners and partners.

"There is no doubt that we are in a changing world, no longer in a manufacturing age. The information and services sector is growing in size and dominance. Natural resources, once taken for granted and abundant, have now become scarce and are recognized to be finite. Global competitors are making strong inroads into once-secure markets. Small business development is now seen as the panacea for local economic problems and the federal and provincial governments are offering a multitude of programs to train and finance individuals wishing to establish small business. Entrepreneurship, diversification and long-range planning are the key words in current economic development jargon. The emphasis is now at the local level. Communities are encouraged to take local responsibility in addressing their own concerns. Large-scale foreign investors are no longer considered the answer to local economic woes and recognition, access and use of local resources are being encouraged. In such a framework the voice, participation and involvement of women may be given greater credence and attention."

It is with the voice of women that we speak to you today. In order to understand the present status of women living in northwestern Ontario resource-based communities, we offer the following 1989 statistics, based on our research with 956 women from 16 communities throughout the area. Sixty-one per cent of the women were in the labour force full- and part-time; 90% of the employed women work in the traditional female occupation sectors of sales, services, health and education; more than half were high school graduates, with 28% having earned a post-secondary degree, certificate or diploma.

In the previous year, 40% had taken a course related to employment or further education; 56% of the employed women earned less than $20,000 per year, with only 17% earning more than $30,000. Eighty per cent of the women were married, with 67% of their partners employed in the community's primary industry, and 84% have children. The traditional picture of the family in northwestern Ontario, as in Canada, is changing. The husband-wife family with only the husband working accounts for only 27% of domestic relationships. The husband-wife family with both spouses working now makes up more than 50% of all families. The single-parent family, 82% of which are female-headed, make up 13% of Canadian families. In the 1990s, one marriage in two will likely end in divorce. Four tenths of families headed by women are poor, compared to one tenth of the families headed by men, and over 72% of the elderly poor are women. Well over a million of Canada's children live below the poverty line.

As the above statistics indicate, many women already live in poverty and many more are only a circumstance away. Economic planning must take into account the changing reality of families in the 1990s, and not be based on the assumption of the traditional family of past generations. Employment and Immigration Canada's report, the Ontario Labour Market, November 17, 1990, states that "Ontario's seasonally-adjusted unemployment rate was 2.1% higher than in November 1989. Since November 1989, nine out of 10 jobs lost were accounted for by men, reflecting the severe downturn in the male-dominated manufacturing and construction industries." These figures may be viewed as a trend.

This is substantiated by Employment and Immigration Canada and the Ontario Ministry of Skills Development, both of which project that, while the labour force is growing at only half the rate it was during the 1970s, women's participation will increase and account for half of the workforce within the next 10 years. There are severe consequences to this trend, bearing in mind that women earn an average of 65% of male earnings, and 61% of women with at least one child under six participate in the labour force and face costs of up to $6,000 per year for licensed child care. The shift in male and female workforce participation rates, the disparity in earnings and subsequent disparity in taxable and disposable incomes, and the fact that more women will become the primary income earners, have serious financial and systemic implications for women; for both traditional and non-traditional families for the community; for the region; and for this province.

Despite many concerns from across the country, the federal government entered into the Canada/US free trade agreement. Its intent was to improve the economies of both countries, to strive for full employment and improve living standards, and to strengthen both countries in the international marketplace, with both countries' ability to take measures to safeguard public welfare fully preserved.

The agreement appears to be falling short of its goal. Canadians were promised jobs, jobs, jobs, and the benefit adjustment programs in the world which, to date, have been undelivered. Ontario's unemployment rate continues to creep higher. The unemployment insurance legislation, Bill C-21, has resulted in replacing insurance protection with the welfare system. In Thunder Bay this past winter welfare payments were up 53% and the case load up 46%. This is consistent with increases in district communities.

Outshopping has become a new Canadian word. The Pigeon River border crossing, which serves the relative small portion of Ontario residents in northwestern Ontario, reported that $19 million in declared goods were brought across the border in a one-year study period ending July 1989, and it continues to increase. Manufacturers and retailers press for additional concessions in their attempts to compete. Canadian and Ontario companies attempt to negotiate salary and benefit freezes or reductions.

In the meantime, northwestern Ontario women and their families are forced to live with the impact of Ottawa's present economic policies, such as: decreased disposable incomes; the decline in the softwood and pulp and paper markets and subsequent downsizing of the male labour force through layoffs and closures, resulting in the loss of primary income; the necessity for more women to seek employment, and their subsequent transition to the role of primary breadwinners, often on under $20,000 per year; the social ramifications of the stress of economic crisis in terms of violence, alcoholism, and barriers to participation in community activities due to costs; and the shift in the tax burden from the federal level to the provincial level.

further to the municipal level, coming at a time when commercial and industrial tax base is declining and is resulting in cutbacks to community-based support services. We submit to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs hearing that northwestern Ontario women are very aware of present realities, policies and practices.

Families among the rising welfare recipients, families who with recent business and industry downsizing and closures are experiencing having to rely on the very public assistance system they have for years criticized, know the severity of the recession. Families who are faced with women necessarily becoming the primary breadwinners are beginning to understand that this is not a temporary crisis but a restructuring of our economy along with a restructuring of their family unit. Families where women face barriers to re-entering the workforce due to the high cost or unavailability of child care know the frustration of the recession. Families where the primary male income has been replaced by a primary female income averaging 60 cents on the male dollar know the harshness of recession reality and are now understanding the necessity for pay equity. Middle-income families know the decrease in disposable income that comes with a 42% tax bite out of every additional dollar earned, and a further 8% to 15% added to most goods and services purchased. Families who are forced by necessity to leave the community where they were raised and anticipated remaining, know the pain of the recession.

The Northwestern Ontario Women's Decade Council submits to these hearings that women do not make budget cuts to social spending demands because we do not know, but because we do. Each of us in our daily lives is called upon to balance our incomes and expenditures and to decide for which investments we are prepared to incur debt. We understand the consequences of not adequately budgeting. We also understand, within our family units, which individuals are disadvantaged and dependent and where and why we must share our resources. We are capable, with complete and correct information, of applying that knowledge to society and deciding where we must spend, where we must live, and where we must share.

Women can no longer afford to subsidize the economy through low wages. Pay equity and employment equity are no longer only desired as wage and employment adjustments to ensure women receive equal pay for work of equal value. They are not benefits for what was once considered the secondary labour force, but in fact adequate and just remuneration for the primary labour force.

Pay and employment equity are the cornerstones of Ontario's commitment to equal opportunity and to valuing our labour force. Pay and employment equity are mandatory to the preservation and protection of Ontario workers, Ontario families, and Ontario quality of life.

The Northwestern Ontario Women's Decade Council congratulates the Ontario government for this step, outlined in the recent budget, and it is only a step towards pay and employment equity for all Ontario workers. It comes not at a time when we cannot afford it, but at a time when we cannot afford not to have it in practice.

The people of Ontario spoke to their desire for social assistance reform through the Social Assistance Review Committee's 1988 report Transitions. The report was clearly aimed not only at assisting those who are in need but at ensuring that individuals are able to make the transition from dependence to autonomy and from exclusion on the margins of society to integration within the mainstream of community life.

Recommendations from Transitions offer alternatives to continued crisis management. We have nothing to gain by waiting to institute these initiatives. The present financial burden of social assistance expenditures only demonstrates that the folly was in having waited as long as we did.

It is difficult to associate the situation of the homeless with the picture of Ontario that is portrayed to the world. The Ontario government must continue to set affordable, adequate housing as a priority. The development of 35,000 units of co-operative and non-profit housing is urgently needed to provide Ontario citizens with their basic need for shelter.

A just and humane society cannot condone or ignore the physical and emotional abuse targeted at three quarters of its population: its women and children. Violence against women and children persists because of unchanged historical attitudes, unequal economic status and unequal power relationships. Women and children must be protected. The government of Ontario must allocate resources and call on the expertise of all who are in a position to assist in order to eradicate male violence against women and children in our society.

The time frame to institute pay and employment equity, adequate child care, affordable housing, social assistance reform, and protection of women and children from violence is not negotiable. The time is now. Fortunately the architects of the 1991 provincial budget chose not to ignore the human toll of the recession they were faced with in preparing their economic blueprint.

We wish to state that we did not find the 1991 budget a particularly encouraging document. It is difficult to respond to with enthusiasm. The Northwestern Ontario Women's Decade Council is extremely concerned with the size of the anticipated deficit and with contributing factors. The inherited $3-billion deficit following announcements of a balanced budget scarce months before, along with cutbacks from the federal government, left little room to manoeuvre. We are further concerned by increased taxes, which will finance only a portion of the deficit. We are not unsympathetic to concerns and criticisms made by interest groups, including many individuals, organizations and small business. It is obvious that the entire budget process and the strategies in terms of both income and expenditures are inadequate to respond to the realities of the 1990s.

The Northwestern Ontario Women's Decade Council believes that the provincial budget must reflect the environment in which we want to live. We further believe that the budget must be fair to all Ontario citizens.

Moreover, we are concerned with the time and money that has been allocated to this process of responding to a budget that will proceed despite these hearings. We are convinced that resources allocated to this process of criticism could have been far better used for proactive strategies such as the Fair Tax Commission and to develop a better process of consultation and input for future budgets. Let's get on with it.

Ms M. Ward: Thank you for your brief. It sounds like you have a very interesting organization that does some very good work in terms of research. I do not know of any similar organizations, although there may be some.

I was interested in a comment on page 4, "Families among the rising welfare recipients, families who with recent business and industry downsizing and closures are experiencing having to rely on the very public assistance system they had for years criticized, know the severity of the recession."

Obviously you are talking about people who have never before been in the situation of having to rely on welfare. There is a great deal of criticism of welfare recipients as being lazy and undeserving and so on. That is not the case then?

Ms Untinen: This is true.

Ms M. Ward: And you have seen a lot of that, people who previously had good jobs, possibly?

Ms Untinen: Yes. In the past winter our welfare officers were telling us that people who never, ever dreamed they would be relying on social assistance were showing up. Situations were such that their UIC had now run out, or they were waiting to qualify for UIC, or that there were women coming in saying that they were separated, because there just was not any money. The welfare officers were quite sure that that probably was not the long-term situation, but forced by economics and needing to feed the kids, that is what ordinary, traditional families were reduced to doing in order to survive.

Ms M. Ward: I do not know whether you have had the same thing here or not, but in Toronto, in certain parts of the press, we have had a great deal of welfare-bashing. One particular columnist and two papers down there have published a series of articles claiming that a family of four would have to make $45,000 to get the equivalent of what they would receive on welfare, which was not true, as another newspaper pointed out.

I do not think I have too much time.

The Chair: You have about a minute and a half.

Ms M. Ward: I would like to comment on your closing remarks too, about the resources allocated to this process. To a certain degree I agree with you, but we are hearing people, and it is information that is not going to go to waste. I think the Treasurer has indicated that he is interested in looking at a better budget process—the parliamentary assistant here might want to comment on that if he has time—to make it more open, less secretive.

We did have pre-budget hearings also. We were not travelling at that point—

The Chair: Ms Ward, is that part of the question?

Ms M. Ward: It was not a question. I wanted to comment on that. I am glad to see your support for the Fair Tax Commission, and we certainly hope there are some changes by that.

Mrs Sullivan: Ms Untinen and Mrs Cryderman think this is an excellent brief you have prepared. I am familiar with the work of the council in various areas where you have made presentations to government and committees in the past, and I am very pleased to see this.

One of the things that really struck me in your brief was the indication that there is, probably in this area, a heavier impact because of job loss, which is predominantly male, leaving the income source for the family's female earning lower-level incomes. One of the things that has come up at these hearings—I think you are the first group to raise it—relates to the question of cross-border shopping. We know that out shopping is not a new thing for Fort William, but it has certainly been significantly increased in the past. What we also know is that women tend to be working in the service sector retail operations which are affected by the out shopping issues.

One of the things that we see in this budget are increases in gas, liquor and tobacco taxes that are triggers for cross-border shopping, and I would like some comment from you on where you see action that could and should be taken by the province to deal with the out shopping issues and comments you have in relationship to the effect on women.

Ms Untinen: This is my personal concern about cross-border shopping. I cannot criticize anybody who is going to shop anywhere they are going to get the best bang for the buck. Where I do have a real concern is that people are not paying their provincial tax on those goods they are bringing back, and they are the people who need those services in place, so I think that is one area that is within the provincial jurisdiction where something can be done to adjust that particular problem.

I also think that we need some of kind of resources or impetus to local business people, some kind of assistance to helping them look at whatever sort of unique and different ways they can compete. There certainly are many some cost differences there that cannot be adjusted, but I do not believe that everything everybody picks up in the United States is the bargain they went for. There are a whole lot of other concerns and reasons.

I also think that the free trade agreement was the thing that gave the big publicity to people to go across the border and shop. It was mostly always there anyway, but all of a sudden it was promoted, almost, as some kind of guiding thing for families to do because of the free trade agreement. Whether or not that boils down into the reality of what is happening is another matter, but people got the impetus from saying, "We can run across the border and get all these bargains."

Mr B. Ward: You mean in effect it encouraged it?

Ms Untinen: It is more of a perception of what is out there than reality of what is happening.

Mrs Sullivan: Do you think that the province should in fact draw back on increases on gas, liquor and tobacco tax? Would that be an assistance?

Ms Untinen: It is a tough one. If you have to get the money somewhere, particularly on liquor and tobacco, one of which I pay my tax on, I would rather it was there on something that would particularly hurt people, that were necessity items that were being increased.

Mrs Sullivan: But what if it means that your stores are closing and people are no longer working in them?

The Chair: Excuse me, Mrs Sullivan. We ran out of time, Mr McLean.

Mr McLean: It is a excellent brief and one of the better ones we have had today. I have a couple of questions for it. Do you have a battered women's facility here in South Bay?

Ms Untinen: Yes, we do.

Mr McLean: What would be the average use of it, overnight stay?

Ms Untinen: Overnight stay? There is a maximum use of six weeks' stay if women need to find additional housing. I think the average is around 90%, but often it is over capacity; it just depends.

Mr McLean: What numbers does it hold?

Ms Cryderman: It is licensed for up to 19, and that is including women and children. In the last year it has always had a waiting list, so it has always been at capacity. With change to legislation that they can get priority on housing, we usually have women in and out in six weeks.

Mr McLean: We had some statistics this morning with regard to the use of the soup kitchens and the food banks, and you give us a lot of percentages, but there is none in there which would indicate to me what percentage male or female would be using the food banks. Would it be the single mother? Do you have any idea?

Ms Cryderman: I do not have statistics on food banks, but I do know that many of the women who come to our transition house, until we got them a priority on the housing list—and some of the fund-raising we do, we help them in groceries. We add to their groceries for the last year they are out there.

Mr McLean: But it is mostly females, is it?

Ms Cryderman: It is females with children. There are many male children.

Ms Untinen: That we are seeing. However, I also understand there is a high population of youth and male youth who also use the food banks because there are not jobs for them.

Mr McLean: Would the majority of the soup kitchen be male?

Ms Cryderman: I do not think the majority. I do not know this from Decade, I know this from my work. I used to be a supervisor at family and children's services and we ran the street program. I would say that the soup kitchen and the kids on the street who are getting that thing, still the highest percentage of the people out there are female. I do not see the highest percentage of them being male, but I do not have the statistics and research on that.

Mr McLean: The final question is the increase to the civil servants, some 5.7%, some up to 11% in the budgetary policy, in times such as we are. Do you believe that would be a proper move at this time, for a government to increase salaries of all the civil servants?

Ms Cryderman: I am not going to speak against increasing salaries of civil servants. I am not a civil servant, but I think you have to look at what their salaries were. It is a collective bargaining issue and you negotiate it.

The Chair: Thank you for appearing before our committee. It was quite informative.

Because of the limited time we have this afternoon and our flight to Sault Ste Marie, the best course would probably be for everyone to check out during the lunch hour so that the group is ready to leave without delay when we finish at 3:15. Checkout time is 1 o'clock. The luggage can be stored at the front desk. There is a room up there.

We will dismiss this committee. It resumes at 1 o'clock sharp.

The committee recessed at 1153.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1312.

DOUBLE RAINBOW
EXPLORATION SERVICES INC

The Chair: Please identify yourself for Hansard.

Mr Laws: My name is Greg Laws and I am the president and co-owner of Double Rainbow Exploration Services Inc.

The Chair: Carry on with your presentation. At the end, there will be questions divided equally among the three parties.

Mr Laws: My wife and I are co-owners of Double Rainbow Exploration Services. This small business provides computer-related services including word processing, computer-aided drafting and consulting.

Since we rely on contracts principally from the mining industry, the profit and loss statement did not look too good in 1989-90, our first year of operation. In 1990-91, the statement improved for two reasons: One, we were successful in bidding on the contract for services in Sioux Lookout, Red Lake and Kenora; two, we did not pay ourselves any salary. However, we are looking forward to the 1991-92 fiscal year as we have already paid off our Ontario New Ventures loan and repaid some of our shareholder loan.

I will be speaking today in favour of the budget which has come under fire for one reason, the deficit. I will be speaking from the perspective of the small business co-owner who understands the successful use of deficit financing for growth.

There are three key topics I would like to discuss with you today. The first topic is the content of the budget address, some of its futures and its direction. The second is the setting up of a capital fund as outlined in budget paper D. The third topic will be the content of budget paper E, "Ontario in the 1990s."

To summarize, the budget address was all about fighting the recession, not the deficit. The fiscal policy of the federal government is partly to blame for the deficit situation we face in Ontario. Projections show that federal transfers to Ontario in 1991-92 will be $1.6 billion below previous commitments. The Ontario government had several options to reduce the size of its deficit. Which programs to shut down? How many hospital beds to cut back on? Which shelters to close? By what amount would they have raised corporate or personal income tax? The decision was to maintain the level of services and not to raise corporate or personal income tax.

The provincial government also decided to invest in the future of Ontario, an investment in capital towards infrastructure and assets when other governments in Canada are cutting back.

This decision is similar to that of a contrarian investor. The expectation of a high return in the future motivates the contrarian to invest. I believe this contrarian investment strategy will pay off, that with the co-operation of all the partners involved, the future Ontario economy will be one of the most competitive in Canada.

This budget and its content in style is similar to a business plan. There are two other elements of the plan in addition to long-term fiscal planning. They are setting up a capital fund and goals for the future.

Three parts of the budget address which are of particular interest to me include the incentives announced for northern Ontario, the creation of a Fair Tax Commission and long-term fiscal planning, as I have mentioned.

Budget items important to northern Ontario residents include the allocation to us of 30% of the anti-recession program budget, the intention to sign a new $30-million five-year federal-provincial mineral development agreement and the addition of $3.4 million more to improve health travel grant program.

These items will result in direct and indirect benefits for northern Ontario's small business owners. The allocation of 30% of the anti-recession program spending will have a positive impact on many of the economies in northern Ontario communities.

Similarly, the signing of the new Canadian-Ontario mineral development agreement will benefit the mining industry, which is very important to my future. The discovery of new mineral deposits results in many economic spin-off effects.

Finally, a healthy labour pool is an essential ingredient for the success of all small businesses. Increases to the funding of the travel grant program will provide more of the workforce with access to health care.

The creation of a Fair Tax Commission is an important step in a successful economic and social budget for Ontario. The commission will be undertaking the first major review of Ontario's tax system in 25 years. Co-operation from all partners in the process will be crucial. Of interest to small business owners is the proposed minimum corporate tax for Ontario. In fact, perhaps no other issue is more important to us. I would encourage all business people to participate fully in determining their future and not to let differences of opinion interfere with their input.

Fairer taxation also requires acting to prevent further large-scale property value increases through speculation. An Ontario land speculation tax would be important to thousands of prospective entrepreneurs purchasing and renting property. Action taken in the budget illustrates the social democratic idea of fairer taxation. People at the lower end of the income scale will have their personal income taxes reduced; people at the higher end of the income scale will have their taxes increased through an increase in the personal surtax rate. This should come as no surprise. It is a basic principle for social democrats that those most able to pay do so.

In co-ordination with the budget initiatives come long-term fiscal planning. The key items in the creation of a long-term fiscal plan for Ontario are the setting up of a Treasury Board whose mandate would be to carry out multi-year budgeting; the introduction of an expenditure review and evaluation process; the co-operation of the public and private sector in the creation of the fiscal plan.

the co-operation of the public in the form of consultations such as the one in which we are participating today. All these elements of long-term fiscal planning are familiar to business owners in one form or another. A successful business must have a person responsible for its day-to-day management. This person reviews the expenses; this allows strategic planning to take place. Internal external co-operation, particularly with your banker, is important to a successful business. Finally, consultation with your clients on their concerns is essential if the business is to succeed.

Setting up the Ontario capital fund will provide the Ontario government with a new approach to capital investment planning. Budget paper D outlines two types of capital: physical capital, the investment of dollars to create tangible assets; and human capital, investment by the government in its people, particularly through training and education programs.

Physical capital investments are essential to a healthy provincial economy. This budget proposes to invest almost $1 billion more than the interim budget in physical capital expansion. This investment represents about 16% of the total 1991-92 deficit.

Some of the investment will be targeted for the following industries: Transportation; Colleges and Universities; Health; Environment; Industry, Trade and Technology; Housing; and Energy. What responsible business owner could disagree with the need for these capital investments in Ontario?

There are many examples of how investments such as these benefit Ontario and its businessmen. Investment in transportation allows for more efficient and lower-cost transportation of goods and services. Similarly, the servicing of roads and highways lays the base for more housing and industrial growth.

Finally, public capital spending provides direct stimulus to the private sector. This would include increases in employment within the construction and trade sector, as well as the engineering and services sector.

Human capital investments are more difficult to measure in dollars. However, as outlined in the budget, the key to growth and prosperity is an educated, adaptable, motivated and skilled workforce.

This brings me to some statements on what is probably the most important section of the budget, the Ontario government's goals for the future, as outlined in budget paper E. This document outlines the path by which the Ontario government will achieve fiscal and economic success in the 1990s.

The budget paper outlines two approaches to structural change. The federal government approach to change includes privatization, deregulation, tax reform, such as the GST, and a free trade agreement. According to the budget paper, this path is leading to neither higher incomes, nor to an enhanced capacity to adapt. The provincial government approach, as outlined, will be to play the role of a facilitator of structural change. Further, it will promote development of high-value-added, high-wage jobs through strategic partnerships.

The Ontario government believes that increased equity and co-operation are necessary for sustainable prosperity.

The paper identifies the key to competition in the 1990s as gaining strategic advantage. Gaining the advantage involves introducing innovative processes and products. It further identifies the important, long-term competitive challenge for Ontario. This is the province's ability to address the gap in productivity growth between it and its major trading partners.

The paper goes on to outline Ontario's economic strengths, including its economic foundation, its socially progressive attitude and the quality of its workforce. It also outlines its weaknesses in productivity, innovation and technology development. It points out that strong growth in investment will be necessary, especially if Ontario is to keep pace with technological changes and realize the associated productivity gain. The investment by the government of $32 million in the technology fund represents the first step in this process.

It concludes by stating that sustainable prosperity is achievable if we consider the growing interdependence of technological, economic and social change. It states clearly for us that a new economic strategy for Ontario must be based on broad social partnerships, and it emphasizes that the government requires the participation of labour, business and community groups for a successful, co-operative approach.

I have spent the past few minutes outlining the content of budget paper E for two reasons: One, its structure and outline puts to rest any suspicions of a secret agenda to destroy Ontario's economy; two, it is in the back of the budget document and it might have gone unnoticed. Some people may not have read past the words on page 3, which state that the government will have an operating deficit of $9.7 billion. It is these words which have dominated the debate on Ontario's budget for far too long. I urge all Ontarians, and especially all business people, even Conrad Black, to read on past those words on page 3 and take a careful look at the ideas expressed in the various budget papers. Take time to constructively criticize them. Finally, participate in the process which will carry them out. Join in partnership now for a better future.

Finally, I have three recommendations related to small business for your consideration.

Startup incentives for small business operators should be easily available. Special programs and incentives must be available to women, native and disabled entrepreneurs.

Small business loans should be available for startup, operational and expansion purposes. The interest-free period should extend for five years, or until the business is making a profit.

Educational programs must provide managerial and corporate training, in addition to skills training or retraining. Aid in the form of grants or loans to cover the expenses of the educational programs should also be available. Workers, students and unemployed persons who can produce a business plan should be eligible.

As a small business co-owner, I would like to thank the committee for allowing me to appear before it today. Copies of the summary of my brief today and the recommendations presented are available from the clerk.

Mrs McLeod: I will just take a moment, actually, to make two points of record and turn the questions over to my colleague. It is a little bit difficult to know where to begin, and I would be curious to know the source of much of the information which has been presented.

I would like to concur that there should be a focus beyond the $9.7-billion deficit, which is the operating deficit in this year's budget, to look beyond that to recognize, with all of the people who have made presentations today who have said there should be a short-term deficit only, that with the most optimistic projections of the government the operating budget will not be balanced until 1997-98. So I agree with you that we should look beyond the first few pages.

The record I would like to note is that when you refer to the technology fund, which was perhaps the one focus for longer-term economic planning that we can identify in the budget, the technology fund was in fact established by the Liberal government. I happened to be part of the council that established it, and the fund was actually reduced in this budget.

With that, I will turn it over to my colleague for some questions.

Mr Mahoney: First of all, business must be fairly slow for you these days, is it? I have looked through this budget, and it would take an incredible amount of time and knowledge to prepare the government's defence as eloquently as I think you have today. I am quite impressed. If you actually did that on your own, you are a very talented young man.

Mr Laws: Thank you.

Mr Mahoney: God would wish, along with I, that you were right, but I have some reservations about it.

If you were to take your business and over the next four years multiply the debt load and the debt service of your business by two, double the amount of capital that you would borrow, assuming you would be allowed to—because governments, of course, do not need permission from anyone other than the Legislature, and if they have the majority of members, they simply do not need permission from anyone, other than themselves, and that is a reality—but if you were able to double debt principle amount and your debt service, is that something you would find intelligent or something you would do?

Mr Laws: I think it would be something I could use right now. Certainly we need to expand and be able to provide services to a broader group of people. That type of thing would be of use.

Mr Mahoney: Would you have any concerns, though, about the ability to pay it back? The reason I ask the question is that it is obvious if we were to stop at page 3, as you have pointed out, in this budget, it might not be that bad, actually. If we were to say there is going to be a $9.7-billion deficit this year, we fully recognize that there were many items in the recession, in the ongoing difficulties of the overall economy, many of them created by the federal government, and any government would have faced some serious deficit problems in this province.

But to project it for four more years at an annual—it is very interesting that they keep on saying it is a plan to reduce the deficit, and yet after year one they take the $9.7 billion and they pay it off by putting it on top of the debt and the debt goes from $39 billion to $48.7 billion. It is a fascinating way to balance a budget. Then they create a new deficit for the following year, and then at the end of the year they balance that by putting it on top of the debt, and the debt is now up in the $56-billion or $57-billion range, and they keep doing this and they are borrowing to buy the groceries. How could you possibly survive in the business world if you borrowed capital dollars to run operational expenses? How could you? Do you understand that is what they are doing?

Mr Laws: To borrow money to pay for groceries?

Mr Mahoney: They are borrowing money to pay for the deficit. If you run an overdraft in your business or a line of credit in your business—you would understand that as being a businessman—at the end of the year, if you were to go to your banker and said: "I can't afford to pay off this line of credit. Put it on to the capital debt load of my company. Add it to my debt service and give me another line of credit," what do you think your bank would say to you?

Mr Laws: They would probably not accept that.

Mr Mahoney: They would probably not do that. That is the long-term fiscal planning this government is showing you, and as a small business man you support that, I am astounded.

The Chair: Mr Mahoney, time is up on that.

Mr McLean: I just want to ask some questions with regard to your recommendations, sir. It says, "What business owner could disagree with these recommendations?" I do not think there is a business owner who would disagree with those recommendations at all, but I ask you where is the money coming from to pay for them?

Mr Laws: At this point in time I do not see revenue being generated for this type of expense, but I would anticipate that to pay for this type of initiative the government would have to generate more revenue.

Mr McLean: You said startup incentive grants for small business operators should be easily available, and then you go on and you want loans from Ontario New Ventures and five years interest-free. Could you just imagine the number of people who would be jumping to get hold of those loans and grants? The question I have is, this is hundreds of billions of dollars. Where is the money coming from to be able to give this money, the grants and five-year interest, to these entrepreneurs?

Mr Laws: I do not think it would be just handed out to anybody who came off the street. I think they would certainly have to prove themselves in terms of having a viable business plan, having some business background. I do not think it should be a sort of a welfare payment program. It would be a situation where qualified business people with a plan could apply for those types of things.

Mr McLean: I am pleased we got that clarified, because you had indicated that the program should be available to workers, students and unemployed persons who can produce a business plan. You have clarified that by making sure they are qualified and would be able to have some assets, I would propose, to borrow against, or would think that they should be able to get this plan without using assets?

Mr Laws: Certainly not, no. When I came forward to bank with a business plan, I had to produce a statement of assets and liabilities for myself as well as for the home, that sort of thing would be required.

Mr B. Murdoch: Just to carry on with that, I notice it is, "The interest-free period should extend for five years until the business is making a profit." Do you mean you could continue on for ever if you are not making a profit?

Mr Laws: No, I guess it should be and/or in terms of years or until they make a profit. If they are making a profit in the first two years, then that interest-free period could be withdrawn.

Mr B. Murdoch: Okay, and you have no problem with making a profit. That word is okay in your vocabulary?

Mr Laws: Oh, yes.

Mr B. Murdoch: I just wanted to know, because in the vocabularies at Queen's Park the word "profit" is not a swear word.

Mr Sutherland: I wonder whose.

Mr Jamison: A profit is a profit is a profit.

Mr B. Murdoch: I wanted to make sure that was okay with you.

Mr Jamison: I noticed that you participated in the startup of your new business in the New Ventures program. That was initiated under the previous government. I wondered, because it is the area I am very interested in myself, about your experiences in dealing with the New Ventures program. Of course you have gone on with other commendations. Have you any suggestions on how to improve that particular program beyond what you have already said?

Mr Laws: It worked fairly well for us. We only had a small loan from them. The largest portion of the capital was the federal small business loan, but we paid it off, I say, within two years. I think the program works very well. The interest-free period, one year, worked out to just about what was good enough for us in terms of we were taking enough money to pay it back within the first year.

Mr Jamison: As a small business person, an entrepreneur, do you feel the budget we developed was sensitive toward the needs of small business in the way that there really were no direct tax increases levied on business at that level? Do you feel there was a recognition on the part of government that business and small business was coming under heavier and heavier pressure?

Mr Laws: No, not really. I think it addressed a lot of issues, a lot of key issues, perhaps more important issues, but I would hope to see more programs directed directly towards small business in the future.

Mr Jamison: There is a diverse kind of conversation really going on here and one thing in it deals with the budget. Of course, the opposition is saying there are ways that we should not have spent $9.7 billion. Regardless of how we look at it, there was only $1.5 billion of new spending, and that was under the direction of the Treasurer to fight the recession. I have been having difficulty in really getting specifics from the opposition, but are there any particular areas where you feel cuts should have been made that would be specific on figures, like in costs? We have not been able to get that out of the opposition at all when they talk about the budget being at the $9.7-billion level.

Mr Laws: That is the one thing, people pick up on the $9.7-billion number and really it is only $1.5 billion in new spending. No, I do not see within Ontario room to make significant cuts in any of the services. Ontarians have come to expect a certain level of health care and those sorts of things, so I do not think there was much room.

The Chair: Mr Laws, I would like to thank you for appearing before this committee. Time has run out and we are a little bit behind as it is. Your presentation was very informative and thanks for attending this committee.

LAKEHEAD UNIVERSITY STUDENT UNION

The Chair: Could we have the Lakehead University Student Union? Welcome to the committee. Would you inform Hansard who you are, please?

Mr Middleton: My name is Ian Middleton. I am the president of the Lakehead University Student Union. I represent both full- and part-time students at Lakehead University and we have approximately, next year, 4,800 full-time and just over 2,500 part-time students. We are also affiliated with the Ontario Federation of Students and we are Local 32 of the Canadian Federation of Students.

First off, I would like to say that it is good to see a past president of a student union sitting on the committee. It gives me some encouragement that there is life after student politics.

Mr Mahoney: We will give you a second opinion on that.

Mr Middleton: I am sure.

The primary focus of my presentation will be on the post-secondary educational system in Ontario, in general across the province and specifically at Lakehead University. There are a few areas of concern. The first is underfunding of the colleges and university system and the second is the increase in tuition fees.

The university system in Ontario has been grossly underfunded for a number of years through successive governments. Enrolment has been increasing; we can look at the levels in 1978 and then at present. In 1978 there were 185,500 full-time equivalent students. This year there are over 250,000. If you look at the amount of funding each full-time equivalent student receives, it is in real terms $2,273 less than it would be if it had kept up with the rate of inflation. This year the university system, to restore operating grants to their 1978-79 level, would require $613 million in increased funding, and for colleges the amount is $130 million. It amounts to about a 30% gap over that period of time.

This lack of funding has had serious consequences on the university system. Ontario, as one of the wealthiest provinces in Confederation, has one of the worst records for funding on a per-time equivalent basis. As I mentioned previously, this is over $2,000 less. It is $800 less than the national average.

At Lakehead University this has created a legion of problems. There is a freeze on the hiring of new faculty, and to quote an internal university study that is being presented to the president of the university: "You will note that our position on budgeting for our human resources needs this year is status quo. This will not be popular, but with our concern for inadequate funding in 1992, we cannot recommend anything further. Obviously, where a number of academic departments are looking to expand, we must seek offsetting reductions elsewhere."

It should be noted that Lakehead this year is expecting record enrolment for the 1991-92 academic year with a freeze in the hiring of new professors. What does this mean? This means we already have a larger portion of our students being instructed by sessional lecturers as well as graduate students, not by full-time professors.

Buildings on campus are falling apart. Cuts had to be made to renovations this year, for instance, to our health services department at Lakehead University. Classrooms are literally bursting at the seams. We also have students sitting in the aisles and standing in doorways for far too many of our classes being offered. What makes Lakehead University one of the fastest-growing institutions in the province is its reputation for offering a high quality of education in an environment where small class sizes are the rule and the professor-student interaction is high. It is becoming more and more difficult for that reputation to be maintained.

We have heard the media talk lately that university graduates do not meet the needs of businesses today in this hypercompetitive marketplace. How can we when some of the equipment students are using is older than I am, and I am 25? An engineer going out to work in the high-tech marketplace today might well have to go through extensive training because she has not had the equipment at her university on which she needs that training. The Treasurer himself has recognized this fact. To quote the 1991 budget, the Treasurer states that, "Public policy that encourages an organizational culture supportive of technology and innovation in the workplace and in society at large will have a positive impact on the province's economic performance."

This must include universities and colleges both in material as well as in human resources. By the year 1999, OCUFA, which is the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations, and the Ontario Federation of Students estimate that 25% of all faculty will be at retirement age. If things continue as they are now, these staff will not be replaced. This is happening at Lakehead currently. You may not see it, but we are in a crisis situation. The average student may not see it, but when they come into my office and talk about not being able to find the resources in the library they need to do their research, when they talk about equipment that is outdated and outmoded as well as unsafe, then they realize the effects of underfunding on the system.

The second element of the university funding crisis I wish to talk about is tuition fees; in other terms, a user fee. Over the last year, despite New Democratic policy, we have had an 8% increase in tuition. This comes on the heels of above-the-rate-of-inflation increases for numerous years before. For instance, over the last three years, tuition has increased by 24% while the consumer price index increased at a rate of only 16%.

One of the things I, as well as my colleagues across the province, have been calling for is a freeze in tuition fees. The students face a crisis. Students face higher than average inflation for books. We have to rely on public transportation. There are also elements for students in northwestern Ontario that are not faced by other people across the province. People in Geraldton and Ignace cannot attend post-secondary education in their own communities. They must leave. We do have, through the OSAP system, a northern transportation subsidy grant, but it does not meet the real costs, nor does OSAP address the real costs students face in today's world.

It comes down to a level, at least with tuition, that is both philosophical and economic. If you believe universities should not be elitist and only open to the rich, then I think you must support the eventual abolition of user fees.

Education is an investment. It is a long-term investment in the future of this province. We have heard arguments today about who is to pay. If you look at who are the large wage earners in this province, they are the people with post-secondary education. By increasing the pool and increasing the number of people who have those skills, then you increase the tax base of this province. Furthermore, you also increase the ability of this province to compete.

If we continue with user fees we decrease the amount of accessibility for people from lower economic backgrounds, aboriginal students, not to mention people of colour. If we continue, the situation is going to occur where Lakehead University is going to have to refuse qualified applications here in Thunder Bay and also from out of town. I do not want to be the person who has to go to those people and say their son or daughter cannot attend university simply because the university system has not been maintained. It is your duty to do that, and I challenge you to do that.

It is a situation now. It is a crisis. It is pathetic when students come in and have to drop out, go to part-time because they cannot afford to continue. One of the ways, and perhaps the only way, is the eventual abolition of tuition fees.

The New Democratic Party reaffirmed at its last convention its commitment to freezing tuition fees and the eventual abolition. It is you people who will be making those decisions, and I ask you to consider that seriously.

If you look at the situation on my campus where it comes to capital improvements, it has not been able to maintain and keep up with the needed repairs. Ask a disabled student what it is like to get around Lakehead University. They have to use the freight elevator to get to the cafeteria. This is an unacceptable situation. It is barbaric in a society that has reached our level of development.

I congratulate the government for some of the initiatives it has taken. They have addressed some of the needs, but it is not yet enough. Security on campus and other aspects and guaranteed funding for some repairs have been needed and have been appreciated, but much more must be done. We have to look to the future. We have to see that the only way we are to succeed as a society is through the education of our people, and I do not see why it is arbitrarily decided once you reach grade 13, that is the end of your ability to be educated and that you must therefore pay for it. With plant closures across the province, we have an increasing demand for retraining by workers. We have to do it, and yet we are not doing it. If the government and the committee continues with an attitude that students do not have the ability to pay and have the money to pay, then we are going to be doing ourselves a disservice, and in the long run the only people they are going to be hurting are the people in Ontario.

Mr McLean: You did not mention anything about 60% funding, which was to be reinstituted. What are your comments with regard to that? I remember very clearly that one of the things we have to do is to get back to 60% funding for our education.

Mr Middleton: I am not quite sure what you mean by 60% funding.

Mr McLean: It is amazing how that has changed, because one of the people who was put on the Fair Tax Commission, a former board chairman of Metropolitan Toronto, was very clear that they wanted 60% funding. But when I asked the question in committee, what 60% funding was wanted, she did not know what it was all about. I guess nobody really knew what the 60% was all about, because we are unaware of it. Is that right?

Mr Middleton: I know there was a report issued by the Council of Ontario Universities, which is made up of the presidents of the various universities in Ontario, which I called for an increase in tuition fees to 40% of the actual cost of universities.

Mr Sutherland: On a point of order, Mr Chair: I believe Mr McLean is referring to funding for the public secondary education system as a 60-40 between the provincial and municipal, and 60% does not apply in post-secondary education, where it is roughly already 80%.

Mr McLean: I do not think you are quite right, but anyhow I am not about to question you. I am more interested now in dealing with the fees that have gone up 8%. There was a commitment that they would be balanced and over time done away with. That is not happening.

Mr Middleton: No, it has not happened.

Mr McLean: What would you say to somebody who told you they would do that and in turn put on an 8% charge?

Mr Middleton: I have choice words and I have used them in the past. A breach of faith I think is probably the best diplomatic way I can put it. We had a great deal of reason to be delighted in September when the election occurred, but we were quickly disappointed. We realized that words and actions are not always the same thing. There was a great amount of disillusionment among university students with the entire system when we had a very strong commitment in policy in something a party had been trying for a great many years and it did not come out in—

Mr McLean: The other question I have is about young students. What emphasis would you place on our skills training?

Mr Middleton: A very high emphasis.

Mr McLean: Yes, I do too. I know when the colleges were instituted, skills development, skills training, was supposed to be one of their main thrusts. What is taking place in this area with regard to skills training?

Mr Middleton: It has become a very difficult situation for the colleges. For instance, at Confederation College they have had to eliminate some programs in computer skills development, and one program in particular that was extremely difficult to see go was for students with disabilities. That program had to be eliminated. It is impossible for universities and colleges to address the needs of society if they are not able to alter programs and to implement new programs. The only way you can do that is by properly funding the system.

Mr Sutherland: It is good to see you again, Ian. The last time was in Thunder Bay, when Lakehead was hosting the Ontario Federation of Students. I am glad to be back here. I should let you know that actually OFS is meeting with the Premier this afternoon to discuss the issues, and I think your comments about the system being underfunded are very accurate. You are reflecting a view we have heard in other presentations regarding post-secondary education, and we are hearing about a lot of issues. We have made some steps but there is still a lot more that needs to be done.

I think the commitment is there in terms of accessibility which, I think we need to remember, is a lot of issues. It is not only financial issues, it is also, as you mentioned, about disabled students and the barriers in terms of physically being able to get around a campus. It is the question of personal security in terms of women feeling safe walking around a campus at night from night classes. Those issues all come into it. It is in terms of having role models with faculty such as for engineering students.

I wanted to ask you a couple of specific questions. First of all, what percentage of students at Lakehead receive student assistance?

Mr Middleton: The last figure I saw, we had the highest percentage in the province. It is very close between us and Laurentian University in Sudbury, and it is approximately 55%.

Mr Sutherland: Okay. The other thing is, as you may be aware, the minister is currently undertaking a significant review of the assistance program and hopefully we will be able to build on some of the changes we saw previously, such as the removal of the primary residence in the calculation of parental resources and input into those decisions. Can you give us a sense, in your time at Lakehead here, of what the difference has been in class size, its increasing nature and maybe a few more comments on its impact on the quality of education?

Mr Middleton: For instance, it is an extra $131 this year to attend university, just at Lakehead. That is what the 8% means to students. If you look at the job market that we face as students, the jobs are not there. They do not have the ability to go out, work during the summer and save enough money to pay for the rest of their academic year. If you take a full course load it is almost impossible to hold a part-time job, although many do, and what suffers is their academics.

I have seen a change since I have been at Lakehead, and before that at Carleton University. It is becoming much more difficult for them to make ends meet. You have them dropping down to part-time to be able to supplement their incomes so that they are able to attend university. I was extremely pleased to see under the OSAP system that it is no longer available only for full-time students. It is now available for part-time students. That was an absolutely necessary change, but it still needs more work and the OSAP review—the committee has not submitted its report yet, but it is a very encouraging sign that they are looking at and dealing with some of these issues in the OSAP system.

Mr Sutherland: Could you just comment again on the student-teacher ratio and the growing class sizes, what you feel the impact is on the actual quality of education? Are we seeing here, as we are at other colleges, that you do not have essay-type—

Mr Middleton: It has become absolutely fundamental for a professor to be able to test so you must have a multiple-choice-type question. There is a professor here who can attest to that as well. For a first-year sociology course where you have 250 students it is impossible for those people to go through an essay type of question. So you have a standard, rote, multiple choice and the learning experience is diminished.

Mrs Sullivan: How widespread is that?

Mr Middleton: It is quite widespread.

Mrs McLeod: I have a number of questions. We could spend a long time with it, Ian, and of course I am very familiar with the per student funding issues, having struggled with them for some time myself. There is a fundamental question there about the dollars per student and the size of the enrolments. We have experienced very large increases in enrolment without attempting to limit that. I wondered whether or not the OSAP is keeping pace. As I recall, if the OSAP funding was included in the per student funding, Ontario was actually first or second highest. Do you know whether or not that continues to be the case?

Mr Middleton: There was only a 7.6% increase in funding for the OSAP system last year, and an 8% increase in the actual level of tuition. So it is falling behind, and I have statistics to show that it has not kept up with the rate of inflation. For instance, the Ontario Federation of Students has figures showing that for OSAP to meet the actual needs of a student you need to have on a weekly basis $233 as the base funding level and it is much lower than that currently. So it is not funded to the level necessary to sustain students. It has improved slightly, but it is still not there yet.

Mrs McLeod: Let me ask about another part of the access question, whether there is a perceived limitation on the enrolment that is effectively taking place. As I was leaving, a study was going on for a new funding formula for the universities, corridor funding, to use the technical term, and I am wondering whether you see that as having had an effect of limiting enrolments either at Lakehead or other universities.

Mr Middleton: I believe it has fundamentally, because corridor funding creates situations where universities try to juggle their numbers and their BIU. For instance, at Guelph they are actually looking at trying to decrease enrolment by 15%. At Lakehead it was recommended we cap enrolment at 4,500 students, but fortunately we did not cap it at 4,500 students because they want to keep their base income units, the BIUs, at about 8,000. So it creates a situation where universities do compete with another and it also limits access to certain programs because universities receive more funding for more specialized and different types of programs. So if you wish to have a liberal arts education, then universities do not want to see that many liberal arts students come in because they are not counted the same as, say, an engineering student or a graduate student.

Mrs McLeod: I know that OFS will want to watch those per pupil figures very carefully because if there is an effective limitation on enrolments taking place, the per student funding figure will start to look much improved when in fact it is a limitation on accessibility. You raise the issue of part-time students and that many students are having to work part-time and supplement their income.

You could argue the other side of that as being a positive trend for people to be able to access post-secondary education at the same time that they are in the workforce and that this is a positive direction we are going to move more of in the future.

I have had some concerns all along that continuing education students and part-time students are really marginalized in the post-secondary system, so I am encouraged to think there is beginning to be more of that. I am wondering if there is real access for those students in the system as you see it?

Mr Middleton: I think it is still very difficult if you are an individual who wants to come back, say a mature student coming back into the system. The university system was designed not to meet the needs of those people. It was designed to meet the needs of somebody immediately leaving high school, going to school for three years and then getting out.

The realities have changed. The student population has changed. The demographics have changed. People are coming into the system for different things, and because of the structures that are still in place it is very difficult for those people to actually access the type of education that they need.

I would agree that they are being marginalized to a certain extent, although you might think that it is encouraging that people are able to work and go to university at the same time. If you want to get the most out of a university education, then I believe you should treat it like a full-time job because that is the amount of work it demands from you. Actually, it demands more than just eight hours a day. You should be able to do that, and the reality is that some people just are not able.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation.

THUNDER BAY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Chair: I call on the Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce to come forward, please. Would each gentleman identify himself for Hansard. We have a presentation half an hour. After your presentation, there will be a period for the three parties to ask questions. As I noticed you just walked in and to give you an idea, if you talk for 30 minutes there is no time for questions at the end. Come.

Mr Ringius: On behalf of the chamber, we would like to thank you for the opportunity to be here today and to give you some input, some thoughts from the northwestern Ontario business community.

I would like to introduce my associate, Jack Mallon. He is vice-president of finance for the chamber this year. He will be making the bulk of the presentation. If there is anything I can help with, I will be jumping in. Our presentation will not take up the half hour. It will follow generally good business guidelines.

Mr Mallon: Hello, everybody. I always try to thank people that come up to our fair community and take a look to see what we are all about. I know you are all busy people, I know this is a mandated thing, but it is nice that you are here and I hope you get to see what Thunder Bay is all about. We up here in the north are always having to inform, shall we say, the rest of Ontario and the rest of Canada just what we are all about. We are a pretty good community and we are pretty interested and a pretty integral part of the provincial Ontario government. So thank you for taking the time in coming up.

We are going to deal with maybe four or five topics. I must also qualify that David is in the insurance business and he is the president of the chamber, and I am in the advertising business, so finance is not what we do every day except maybe read statements from time to time and hope that they are black and not red in our businesses. As part of our role of going through the executive and part of the training of representing the business community here in Thunder Bay, we take on these roles.

We want to start right off, as we have done consistently with anybody that we have had the opportunity of talking about the finances or this type of topic, that we are part of the 280,000 business members of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce across this country, which at our convention last year in Edmonton adopted a policy that we are against deficits of any size with any form of government, municipal, federal or provincial; therefore, we feel as a chamber that you cannot spend your way out of things and that you have to live within your means.

Therefore, we have a program called the Deficit Diet Plan, and if you have not already received that document I have heard about it, if you will let us know we will make sure that you get a copy of it. It is a complete program that has been endorsed by all the chambers of commerce across the country and all of its members. It has been going on for a year and it is just a crusade to tell people that deficit diets, that deficits, are just not the way to go.

With the current situation in Ontario, I know you all have your cases for it, but we just cannot endorse that and we just ask if you can start to work towards non-deficits, because sooner or later these things have to be paid for and our biggest fear is they are going to be paid for by our children and our grandchildren. It is not fair that we enjoy today and penalize the future generations. We are just totally against that as business people. We ask you emphatically, strongly, any way you want to put it, that you please consider that. Deficits are not the way to go. We have to live in this country and definitely in this province within our means. That goes for all forms of government and for all parties.

David, unless you want to add something. We have a complete kit on it and we would be happy to get it to you. I believe we even have a videotape on it, and it is growing quite well and gaining a lot of recognition across the country.

Just maybe one last point. I like the words "living within our means" and that seems to be the message that we are trying to put out. We have got to learn to live within our means. We cannot be pledging the future debt to our children.

I am sure you have heard this next point which is, I wrote down here, taxes. Obviously, I think we have just about had enough of taxes at all levels from all bodies, from municipal, federal, provincial, God knows who else. We have just about had it with the taxes. We, in the chamber, are a lot of the business.

In Thunder Bay we have a membership of around 900 businesses in a town that has about 4,000 registered businesses, and that includes—I own three businesses, but I only have one of mine joining. We feel about 35% to 40% of the chamber of commerce is made up of the local business community. What we are saying is that the taxes are just getting to the point that when new people come to us they say, "Why should we get into business?"

We believe that small business especially is the future. That is what generates the jobs, and I think the statistics will bear that out, and when they start to understand the taxes and their business plans before they go out and get financing or equity financing or whatever, and they start to understand the employer health tax, what is going to come with the OHIP and what is going to come with the high personal taxes and tourism taxes and gas taxes and liquor taxes and everything else, it is just not being as well received or tolerated, I think, as it used to be.

We up here, especially in Thunder Bay and northwestern Ontario, depend a whole lot on the tourism and convention business. The fact is you are sitting in one of the main properties that benefits from that. These taxes are deterring—we are only 43 miles from Minnesota, which is a market for us of a million to two million people, and we are only 500 miles by car from Milwaukee and Chicago, so tourism is very important to us, and these people, when they all of a sudden cross that border they start paying for our liquor and our gas and our hotel and the taxes that go along with it.

I know there are rebates, but how many of those things are actually utilized? When I sat on the tourism development committee for Tourism Ontario, it was mind-boggling to me how few people sent in for rebates on the provincial sales tax that they paid.

We just ask you to watch the tax situation. We hope that you understand that we are at the limit. David, do you want to add to that?

Mr Ringius: Northwestern Ontario Chambers of Commerce is an association of over 22 chambers in northwestern Ontario, and we meet at least once a year with cabinet. That has been a tradition for close to 50 years. We have met before. Time and time again that point comes forth, the gasoline tax.

In northwestern Ontario, road transportation is our only connection for a number of areas, and that is an area we would certainly like looked at. We were quite surprised after some consultative process that we thought was happening through Northern Ontario Remote Area Communications and Transportation that we have been listened to from that side. That budgetary item that increased the gas tax was certainly a setback to the business community, particularly the tourist industry.

Mr Mallon: Just to add a couple of specifics to that: One of our vice-presidents is involved with transportation and each meeting that we go to, executive meetings and board meetings, it is amazing. Stuff coming from the west to go down to southern Ontario—they are now shipping it right through the States just to avoid the taxes and the high cost of fuel. It is just now happening.

We all know that CP Rail has made a deal in the States and is bypassing Thunder Bay. Transportation is a pretty important part of our situation. Those are facts and we can verify them. That is what is happening with these taxes. The free entrepreneurs, the business people we represent always seem to find a way around this. I think it is awful that they are finding they have to go through the States and avoid spending their money here.

The other thing that I am not sure you are aware of: In the United States, the way we understand it, the transportation committee of our chamber has discovered that when they pay fuel taxes down there, the money actually goes into road improvements and bridges. We do not do that. It goes into the general fund in Canada and in Ontario.

We have been led to believe that along the lower part of Lake Superior—if you have ever heard of the Lake Superior tour—they are now building a super highway from Duluth, Minnesota, right over to Sault Ste Marie, Michigan. So the tourists that we have been enjoying, coming up here from Ohio and Illinois—and they now come from as far away as Florida, to get away from the heat down there—will they come to Thunder Bay? Will they stop at Duluth and take the super highway across? That is something that is starting to happen, and that has us very concerned as a tourism industry. David is going to handle the next part about the PST and the GST.

Mr Ringius: We certainly applaud the attempt by the government to look at collecting the provincial sales tax. Unfortunately, the route we are taking is probably going to be more cumbersome than it is for cost recovery.

We would like to see, and we encourage the government to investigate a way that the PST, when harmonized with GST, could be revenue-neutral. I know the GST touches a much broader base than the PST does, but I believe eventually, if the GST is here to stay, the quicker the provinces get on side and harmonize the quicker the whole issue will be passed. I think there was a political opportunity to implement it some time ago, and now it is going to be most difficult.

To try to collect it by sending bills in the mail I don't think makes a lot of sense, and I tend to agree with the mayors' meeting along that line. But we certainly would like to see the harmonization of the PST. Hopefully it will help level the playing field a little bit on the cross-border shopping issue. That is also an Ontario Chamber of Commerce policy. It was passed at the Peterborough, Ontario, chamber meeting in May of this year. I would think that would be consistent with the Canadian chamber meeting that is coming up in September. We would like to see harmonization of the PST.

Mr Mallon: It has become very obvious, I think, to a majority of Ontarians that GST is a fact of life. It is enough standing at the border. I cannot believe that people are actually—I think they said they were going to hire new people to give the rebates back or collect the GST. Who are we kidding? Let's get the thing blended. It is starting getting into the 1990s. I think that has to happen.

The next item we want to talk about is your credit rating as a province. Obviously, it is a bit of a spinoff, we think from the deficit situation. I hope you people realize, and I am sure that you have heard this before—if you have not you are going to hear it from us now—that when your credit rating gets affected, so does ours; in a big way. Not only is it just the credit rating that we get, whether it is prime plus one, prime plus three quarters, or prime plus one and a half, it makes it more difficult for small business to go to banks to get dollars, especially in northern Ontario.

We get the spinoff. If the confidence is not there in the credit rating of the motherlode, the province, how can we expect it to be there for the business person? So it has an impact on us. I am just reinforcing that deficit thing. We are all in this together, and if we could just demonstrate fiscal responsibility that goes along with running a province, I think we would all be a lot happier. David, do you want to add anything to that credit rating statement?

Mr Ringius: No, I guess it might tie in to the next part of the presentation which is about the consultative process. We were looking forward to some input. I do not believe there was a lot of input from the business community on the budget. As we found out in an all-party justice committee meeting last week, to which we made a presentation, the chamber of commerce was involved, and the fact was mentioned in the act, but we were not even consulted on the issue.

There were some ramifications there that made us a little leery because it put some importance on the chamber and its role in justifying what qualifies as a tourist operation or tourist business that could stay open on Sundays and whether or not we would vote for a member or a non-member. The chamber's policy is that they would vote member only. It would have meant that we would be some difficulty with non-members for not playing fully. So we ask that this consultative process continue until it happens before the fact, and not after the fact.

Mr Mallon: The last item is competitiveness. As business people we understand what competitiveness is all about. We want to compete with each other, we want to compete with our American friends, and we want to compete in the marketplace, wherever that is. With high taxes on all these things that we are talking about, competitiveness is our future. It is what is going to create the jobs, or at least a part of it.

What I think just adds to what David was saying. When we are going to do these kinds of things, if you could let us consult. I do not care if it is the Ontario Chamber of Commerce, or whether you have these kinds of things, but let us know what we have to say. Hear us. We may not be able to win, but we would like to get some input into the competitiveness discussion. The last item we wanted to talk about was the handouts, the grants situation. David, did you want to add into that?

Mr Ringius: Our position is that we think we can live without the grants, or at least have them capped. Luxury is enjoyed becomes a necessity. Once people are used to grants, they do not seem to use some of their own resources to get things rolling. The only type of grants we would like to see are those that are directly related to the creation of permanent jobs. If that can be qualified and analysed, then I think we could accept it. We would certainly like to make sure that any grants are of that nature.

Mr Mallon: We also realize there is another component: There are interest-free loans, or those where you do not pay on the principal, to start up new businesses. I think the Nor'Wester Resort is in that situation. I guess they will be creating 100, 150 jobs out there. It is a loan, but they do not have to make any interest payments for a year or two, they get them up on their feet. That makes sense to us. That is some permanency to it. We think that is the way you should be dealing with your grants or your handouts, rather than just giving money. They should be really thoroughly checked.

The other thing is the process. You really have to be involved with that in our business to appreciate how long it takes to go through the bureaucratic nightmare of trying to get a grant. "Really, if you can't afford it," we tell our clients, "Please, don't even do it, because the process is not there to work with a person."

When I walk into a bank on Monday morning, and I want to talk to them about a program, I give them an outline, and I give them a business plan; I tell them what I am going to do, and what we are going to put in, and what we are going to generate for us. The bank I deal with, which happens to be the Royal Bank—if they went any longer than 48 hours, I would probably go to another bank. I talk with you people, it is letters back and forth, and "He's on holidays," and "I can't get there."

It is the same thing with your licensing when new businesses are trying to open up. It is just incredible how long it takes. Not only are we against giving out money just willy-nilly—I think you should take it more seriously, because you are part of the business community. When you start to work and get involved with businesses and development, you are a part of their business. So rather than have one or two people covering the whole north, why do you not put in some people who are involved—maybe take a page out of the Federal Business Development Bank; they have advisors, retired people who can come in and work.

It is just a suggestion to you. We need each other. We are working together. We will create the jobs, you help us, and I think we will all win.

Mr Ringius: On the recessionary funds that are around to kick-start the economy, I talked with the construction association this morning and their feeling is that the timelines are too restrictive. They have not been receiving any bids for contracts at all because of the time constraints. I asked for the facts on it and they were not able to give me any, but I do not believe recessionary funding is producing the results you wanted from it. I would like you to reassess that, and make sure that those funds are there and that those timelines are not too rigid.

Mr Christopherson: I want to thank you very much, gentlemen, for your presentation. We do not always necessarily agree with chamber of commerce presentations, but we always enjoy the manner and the tone in which they are presented, and the professionalism.

My question is along the lines of the last issue that you touched on: the anti-recession program initiated by the government. As you know, we maintain that any government that took over and wanted to at least maintain the existing levels of programs and support services in this province was in for arguably between $7 billion and $8 billion. Only $1.5 billion of the deficit is actual new spending by our government.

Within that is the $700 million for the anti-recession program. You have already mentioned the time limits and the constraints, and we will follow up on that to see if there are any snags or bureaucratic problems at our end.

In light of the fact that Thunder Bay received a little over $32 million of that recessionary money—and I understand it went for things like the Port Arthur General Hospital which got over $200,000; over $1 million to Old Fort William; almost $400,000 for Algonquin Avenue School; and a number of other major programs—we have maintained that spending that money kick-starts the economy, but it is an investment in the future. It is an investment in the infrastructure we need to survive in the high value added economy that we are going to be fighting in globally down the road.

In light of the fact that you feel deficits should be avoided at all cost, from the Thunder Bay point of view, do you believe we should not have spent that kind of money here and that it would be more important to maintain a balanced budget or have a reduced deficit, as opposed to spending the money in the areas where we have spent it, with the goals we are trying to achieve?

Mr Mallon: That is a no-win answer, is it not?

Mr Christopherson: I tried not to frame it in a way that is unfair, but it really reflects the approach we have taken and I would like to hear how you would respond to that.

Mr Ringius: I guess our philosophy is that if it is being given out, we want our fair share. It is infrastructure that is being put in place, whether it works through transfer payments to the provinces or how it gets there.

Some of these things, particularly on the school side, are important. And Old Fort William, the investment in tourism, is long-term. However, that gets back to my earlier comments on the funds. Are they doing what they were set out to do? Are they being spent? My understanding is that they are not going to meet the guidelines and therefore the money is not going to be there anyway.

Mr Christopherson: I am not sure that is necessarily the case. We will check that, and if you are correct we will do everything we can to correct it. But assuming that is not the problem, philosophically, what is the priority, the $32-million investment in the infrastructure of Thunder Bay or fighting the deficit?

Mr Mallon: Since the number was $700 million, we just got our share at the $32 million. What were you going to give us, nothing? You put the $700 million out on the line; that is our share. There are a thousand things you could have put it into and I do not think it is fair that we name whom you give it to.

The fort happens to be something that I spent a lot of my company and my staff time at. The old fort is an organization that has been looked at by all members of Parliament and all different parties over the years because it generates a lot of jobs. The money that went in there fast-tracked some items. If you really want to look at the old fort, $1 million is just a pimple compared to what it really needs.

I guess really what we are trying to say is, let's not go back on the $700 million that you have spent. Let's just not do it any more. We cannot afford it. Or if you are going to do it, somebody has to pay for it sooner or later. It is a no-win thing for us. Please just do not throw out the dollars. Sure, we need the stuff. We could give you a list here of a thousand things that we need—the other hospitals, our sewage treatment, our blue box, those kinds of things. There are a lot of good, worthy things that need the dollars. We cannot afford them in this province.

Mrs Sullivan: I was very interested in some of the things you talked about in your brief, including the effect of the gas tax not only on freight but on personal travel in the north. I think that is something we have not had too much information about this morning and it was useful to have it on the record.

I am wondering if you see anything in this budget—you talked about competitiveness—that provides incentives for new capital formation or incentives for increasing productivity or incentives for business development or for permanent long-term job creation, and will have a significant effect in this community over the longer term.

Mr Mallon: Can we get back to you on that? David, did you want to add anything?

Mr Ringius: No. I thought I had something circled on that. Primarily we are concerned about the deficit and we are concerned about the effect of the gasoline tax on tourist trade. We thought that was a disincentive. We do not see any capital-intensive program there, and along with the incentives that were given out on the recession funding, that is it. So I do not have a comment on that.

Mrs Sullivan: You talked about the effect of taxes. Are you concerned at all about the government's proposal for a minimum corporate tax?

Mr Mallon: Absolutely.

Mrs Sullivan: Would you like to speak about that?

Mr Mallon: I have a question. This is your livelihood, this is not our livelihood, so we took these five and—

Mrs Sullivan: That is fine.

Mr Mallon: Would the minimum tax be on someone who does not make a profit? If I did $1 million in sales, the minimum tax was 5%, would I get a bill for $50,000? Is that what you are saying to me?

Mrs Sullivan: We do not know.

Mr Mallon: Whether I make money or lose money.

Mrs McLeod: It has not been decided.

Mr Mahoney: But that might be.

Mr Mallon: I think the structure we have is that if you make profits and you do not reinvest them back in or whatever, you should pay taxes on your profits. I think that is a free enterprise system and it has to be sensitive to income.

I am talking as an employer. I just signed a cheque today. I cannot believe how much it has gone up this year and I cannot believe how many cheques I am signing at the levels of government. It is incredible. It really bothers me. I have never noticed that before. I am proud to pay corporation taxes. In the 21 years that I have run a business and I have 15 people—we have not been able to pay taxes every year. I consider it a victory when we can. I would be proud to pay taxes.

Mr Mahoney: Just on that line, the standard Meech Lake rhetoric, both before the election and even now, is that there are corporations that are not paying taxes for various reasons. They do not discuss the reasons: deductions for research and development or any of that kind of stuff. How does your group react to that kind of statement, that they are getting all the money they need out of the corporate sector?

Mr Ringius: Certainly we would not want all of the tax money to come out of corporations, because it is passed down the line to the consumer and the consumer is going to pay anyway. Taxes are part of your cost of doing business and they affect your bottom line. In discussion on the board level in the chamber was that they were totally opposed to having some minimum tax, providing there was a baseline. We do not mind paying a fair share but it certainly would have to be reasonable, and not all the sourcing of new tax revenue—that should be looked at by reducing programs.

Mr McLean: I think what you fellows should do is get a copy of Hansard today, because there are very few people in this area who agree with your philosophy. We had a businessman who has appeared here and wanted grants for small business, he wants new venture loans ts five years with no interest. What percentage of business people do you feel you represent?

Mr Mallon: I said that we have over 900 businesses are registered. Using the economic development corporation's mailing list, there are about 4,300 or 4,400 businesses that are on the tax rolls, but a lot of them are owned by the same person. You may have a business to rent the building and one to own the operating company. We have pegged ourselves at about 35% to 40%. I wonder if that person was a member of the chamber.

Mr McLean: I have no idea.

I want to say that the gas tax is another important item. I had a person here this morning who indicated that he has no problem with raising the gas tax and diesel fuel.

Mr Mallon: Who was that?

Mr McLean: We wanted to indicate to him what he thought about the tourism business and about the transportation business, but he is an environmentalist without worrying about tourism. So there are some real concerns here and I am glad to see the cross-section of delegations we are getting, because it certainly is an eye-opener. That is what the process is all about.

Mr Mallon: Those two people you refer to, do they have the 900 businesses behind them to support what we are telling you today? That is my first question. I would like to get their names so we can go have a talk with them. Maybe we will learn something. We have committees, in the way. What we are giving you is what our transportation committee, what our finance committee, what our environment committee—we have committees with people who are involved on both sides of the tracks, so we would be happy to put those two together.

Mr B. Ward: Do you have an environmentalist group?

Mr Mallon: We have an environment committee.

Mr Ringius: We certainly are sensitive to the environmental issues. There has to be a tying or a correlation between business and environment. After all, we are citizens first. I think every one of us takes the environment seriously, but we also have to stay in business. I can well accept the fact that we as Canadians are probably the highest utilizers of gasoline. If one way to curb that is to drive the price up, I do not know. I think there have to be other developments in transportation that will take the vehicles off the highways. We do not have that infrastructure. Until we have that type of infrastructure in place we have to use automobiles and trucks to get around, and in northwestern Ontario it is trucks.

Mr McLean: It was interesting today. With regard to the increase in gasoline prices that have come along, there has not been one person who has said that the north is being challenged, it is being unfair. I think one person said it should be equalled across the province, but very few people have said anything detrimental with regard to the increased taxation on gas.

Mr Ringius: We have, certainly, through our tourist committee. One of the statistics that we have is that inter-travel in Ontario is down. I believe that has a lot to do with the gasoline tax. People are not travelling because of that.

Mr Jamison: What about right here?

Mr Ringius: Tourism is up at the border slightly, 21%, but you have to understand where it came from. It does not take many more vehicles to bring it up 21%, so that is a highlight. But that is Americans coming here. What we are talking about is the intertravel from Ontarians to Ontario.

The Chair: I am sorry, gentlemen, but time has run out.

Mr Mallon: I am sorry, you can turn this off, but on the tourism component, our city and the MTR have to be given a lot of credit, because we have a very focused plan now for increasing tourism and it is working.

Mr B. Ward: Up 21%, that is great.

The Chair: We appreciate your presentation here. Thank you very much.

CITIZENS OF ATIKOKAN

The Chair: Do we have the Citizens of Atikokan present yet?

Mr Lindsay: Yes, I am from Atikokan. My name is David Lindsay. This is my brother Bill. I want to thank you for having us here and allowing us to speak. I have to apologize, because I am totally unprepared. I did not find out until Thursday that I was supposed to be here on Monday. I worked Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Sunday, about 14 to 16 hours a day. In other words, I am completely and totally unprepared, but I am going to try to say what I have to say.

The reason I am here is because I am very annoyed. If I have a slip of the tongue occasionally and I say a foul word, forgive me, but I have been working on the water for a long time around men who are more concerned with content as opposed to the quality of their speech and it rubs off on me. I really wonder why these committee meetings are being held. What is the problem with this budget? I have never seen a budget in this entire province that has caused as much trouble as this budget seems to have. The media seems to report every time somebody complains about the thing.

I was not ready to come here on Thursday when I found out about it and I was going to pass it up, but the reason I decided to is because there are some things I want to say that I have to say. What I would like to do right now is just ask a simple question to anybody: Why are these hearings being held?

The Chair: I would say that when it comes to question period you can reply to the members in the three parties, unless you want to go right into question period now.

Mr Mahoney: I think it is a good question.

The Chair: Okay, we will have each party give one definition of it then.

Mr D. Lindsay: Would you like to answer it, Mr Mahoney?

Mr Mahoney: I do not have an answer. I think it is a waste of time, a waste of money. I agree with you. I am here doing my job, but I do not think we should be here.

Mr B. Ward: I think what happened is in the Legislature the Conservatives were having a filibuster which was holding up legislation. They were playing by the rules, because it is allowed, but they were holding up legislation and to break that filibuster—and you can correct me if I am wrong, Bill—it was agreed that these hearings would be heard and we would go throughout the province over the month of August to listen to people's views about the budget.

Mr D. Lindsay: This was just to get the Legislature back on track. Forgive me for asking such a rhetorical question, but the truth of the matter is, there are some things that have to be said. For starters, I work damned hard; I work damned near seven days a week, approximately 16 hours a day. I will give you a quick background of me.

I spent nine years in the service of my country. When I got out of the Canadian navy I found out that it was a lot tougher outside the business than it was inside. I ended up going into business for myself and right now I am a businessman, entrepreneur, whatever you want to call it. I am one of my town's few exporters. I produce a good product and I introduced a new industry to northwestern Ontario and I have taken it from there.

I try to keep up with politics; I try to keep an eye on what you people, our representatives, are doing. From what I see of this budget, this budget is probably the only budget I have ever seen that has actually anticipated what is going to occur. It looked at a recession, it realized that there was going to be a lack of income and that the output for social services would have to be increased. They anticipated it.

A couple weeks ago I heard Don Mazankowski complaining that the reason the federal government was looking at a record deficit this year was because it failed to anticipate the lack of income and the extra payouts in social payments. But there was not one person who argued about what he had to say. There was nobody who complained.

This budget came down; it was totally complained about; the Legislature was stopped. How much money did that cost our government? This is the point I am trying to make. There are certain things that have to work here and there is a smooth way they have to be brought about. I feel that the issue of the budget has been totally blown out of proportion. I do not know who is to blame for that. I suppose it is the media for paying so much attention to it. But I have looked at this budget as closely as I can with as much expertise as I have, which I have to admit is not as much as some economists might have.

I was lucky enough a few months ago to read an article by John Kenneth Galbraith in the Globe and Mail. He praised the budget. This is a man who has counselled American presidential administrations on the economy. He is a professor of economics at Harvard. I am sure this fellow knows what he is talking about and he praised this budget. There are a lot of petty complaints occurring because of this budget. This pettiness is being blown out of proportion and it is costing me, a taxpayer, a lot of money.

I see people complaining that there is too much money being spent for social reasons. All I know is that when I was trying to introduce this new technology I deal with in northwestern Ontario, I did not get anywhere. I did not get any help from the Ministry of Northern Development; I did not get any help from the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology; I did not get help from any of these provincial or federal agencies that purport to do that.

I ran into a confrontational system. I beat it, but I did it at a cost to my family. I had to run my family into poverty for over three years to get my business going because I was not going to let go of the damned thing. I had to go on welfare last fall, that is how bad it got, and I ran into a welfare system that was totally confrontational and antagonistic.

I see this budget, and part of the money for this budget is to reform the system. Now how the hell are people supposed to drag ourselves back up on our feet? How do we introduce new business to this place, introduce economic vitality to this area?

Let me tell you about this area, for you guys who are not from the north. This is the Third World up here. If you guys can sit around in Thunder Bay or wherever, and you go out of Thunder Bay 30 or 40 miles and you are in the Third World. You are looking at a Third World economy where big money comes in, extracts our resources, leaves, and leaves nothing behind.

I live in Atikokan. Atikokan has two of the biggest holes in the ground that exist in the entire world as testimony of this. They do not even have a park in that town for women to take their kids to in the summertime. That is what we put up with up here.

I have looked at the different social aspects of this budget, where people have complained that too much money is being spent on social spending, and from what I see, the reform that is going to be made because of this budget and the extra costs that are going to occur because of this budget are to help people like me. I am a Canadian. I believe in this country. I am going to stay here and I am going to fight it out. If not, I would have gone to the United States long ago. I have had offers to go to the States and work, but we have a good country. I seriously believe this budget is in the right direction.

Another point I want to make is that if I were to use an analogy, I would look at all the people of our province as a family, and there are so many mouths to feed. Suddenly the amount of income that you are used to is cut off and slowed down and you have to make some hard decisions. What are your options? First, you have the option to starve feeding certain mouths. With hard, stone-cold people, it tends to be the smallest and the weakest members of the family who are kicked out and told to fend for themselves. Or you could reduce everybody's feeding and share it. Or you could go into a deficit position and just keep feeding everybody and keep them healthy and keep them strong because you know that the family, if it is held together during this rough time, will stay strong and carry on into the future. It is as simple as that.

When I look at this budget, that is what I see happened. The government that is in place right now was chosen to help the people of this province during a rough time in hopes of better times. Whether those better times come or not, I do not know. I have been reading so dark and gloomy things about this recession and it has been carrying on. I have been reading that companies that are shutting down and layoffs that are occurring are not temporary, that these things are really permanent problems and that we are going to have to get used to them.

I am at a standstill here. Give me a moment to refer to my notes. These notes here are not really notes, they are just chicken scratches I threw down on my way here.

The Chair: What we could do is, the three parties can ask questions and you can give the replies of how you feel about different particulars. We will be asking the questions and maybe that will get you on track, because we have five minutes for each party for asking question on all of the budget effects. That was the idea of these hearings when they first came out: How does the budget affect you?

Mr Mahoney: For someone who was not prepared, I think you articulated your concerns and your positions very well. Let me just expand, if I can, on the comments about your first question to us: Why are we here and why are we spending all this money talking about the budget? As a party, we orchestrated our own tour of the province through our own caucus services facilities, went out and talked to people and invited people from all walks of life to come and talk to us. I think we wound up publishing a report which was very substantive and helpful for us to understand the budget and for the people we talked to to express their concerns and/or their support. We actually talked for both and found, in some cases, that there was both. I want to take your analogy of the family a little bit further, though. You say you do not understand what is going on with the budget and you were not prepared until somebody called you on Thursday. Who was that, by the way, who called and asked you to appear?

Mr D. Lindsay: I am trying to think of her name right now. I cannot. She was from Toronto.

Mr Sutherland: Monica Marshall?

Mr D. Lindsay: I think it was a McLean-type name.

Mr Mahoney: Al McLean? Somebody from Queen's who called and asked you. Why would that be?

Mr D. Lindsay: I was at a social gathering a few months ago.

Mr Mahoney: A political gathering?

Mr D. Lindsay: No, it was social. Somebody who I suspect was probably pretty political approached me and started talking about the budget. He pulled this out and said, "If you have something to say, here, sign this and I will send it in for you." That is what occurred. I had kind of put it behind me because I am going through some very difficult times in my business right now.

Mr Mahoney: With that aside, let me ask you then about the family analogy. How long can you carry on with this? One of the real concerns I have is that notwithstanding the fact that I think we could be doing more productive things for the people of Ontario than what we are doing on this tour, notwithstanding that fact, now that we are here, we should try to accomplish something.

One of the big concerns I have about the budget is the fact that if each year you ran your business the way this government is planning its years in office, your business would not be around at the end of that term. Plain and simple, what they are doing is taking the deficit, which is an overdraft, and, at the end of each year, paying that overdraft off by putting it on top of the debt, which is the mortgage, and then they are borrowing some more on an overdraft and doing it again next year. The total debt the provincial coffers face will rise from $39 billion up to a minimum of $76 billion, unless their revenue projections are high, which I think they are, and then it could be $80 billion or $85 billion. You could double the debt in the first term of this government.

Then there is your debt service. You understand. You are a businessman. You have to pay the loans, you have to pay for that debt, so in four or five years you are going to go from carrying a $39-billion mortgage and the payments that takes to carrying an $80-billion mortgage and the payments that takes. It is double.

Mr B. Lindsay: May I say something?

Mr Mahoney: Is that good long-term fiscal planning and is that how you would run your business? I do not mind if one or both answer the question.

Mr B. Lindsay: First of all, an analogy should fall on friendly ears to work. Second, I think we made that clear in that this government's budget has prepared for these things, has prepared for recessionary times, has prepared for a deficit.

The present government in Ottawa and other provincial governments which have jumped on this budget-cutting bandwagon have not prepared and are showing up now with "unforeseen" deficits which have to be taken care of exactly the same way your projected deficits for this province will have to be taken care of. So our question is, which is better?

Mr Mahoney: Oh, I do not use the federal government as an example of fiscal responsibility, believe me.

Mr B. Lindsay: It would be unwise to do so.

Mr Mahoney: I certainly do not, but what you are facing with this is the same kind of mentality, with huge deficits each year being paid off by simply placing them on the capital debt of the province, gentlemen.

Mr B. Murdoch: First of all, I would like to say I do not think it is a waste of time being here and listening to you people and all the other people who have been here today.

You asked a question to start. I felt it was better to answer it when the questions came up than get into a discussion then, but Mr Ward basically explained what happened. Our party did not go along with deficit funding and we felt it was not a good budget. We felt the people of Ontario should have a chance to tell us whether they felt it was a good budget or not, when it was such a drastic change from what we had been used to.

This is the process by which you bring government to the people. That is why we do have committees, and this committee is here to hear the concerns of the people. It is ironic enough that at least five of the presentations we have had, five or more, have all congratulated the government for doing this, so some people do like the idea of this coming here. Whether you do or not, well, that is your business. But that is the reason we are here.

Government costs money. That is understandable. If you are going to have government, you are going to have to pay for it. If you have democracy, democracy is not free either. It costs money to bring committees out to Ontario. Ontario is a big place. That is the reason we are here.

I would like to ask you, though, just to go back to what Mr Mahoney said, could you run your business in a deficit every year? Is that good fiscal responsibility? How would you stay in business? I would like to know, and I am sure this government would like to know also, how you are going to stay in business if you run a deficit every year.

Mr D. Lindsay: I have been running a deficit since I got out of the navy seven years ago. What results is you pay your debts off when you get the chance to pay them off, and the way you end up paying them off is by reducing your spending elsewhere. You start driving an older car instead of a new car. You start driving less far and less extravagantly than you did before. You start eating moose instead of beef. You use firewood instead of oil or natural gas. All of these things contribute to a lower standard of living.

What I have watched in our government is nothing but extravagant spending ever since I became politicized. I never became politicized until I got out of the navy and I wanted to know why the hell I could not get a God-damned job. It was as simple as that. I also wanted to know why there were so many damned poor people in this country. I was wondering why I was becoming one of them very quickly.

Mr B. Murdoch: That is what we wanted them to do, you know, to look at their budget. They bring lots of money into Queen's Park. We are saying they do not have to go into deficit funding and they could have kept up the same programs and maybe looked at what they were doing, exactly like you said. Unfortunately, down our way moose would cost more than beef in Toronto, but other than that, I think we could have done some of the things you are talking about. But they chose not to do that. They chose to put more money into the budget and deficit funding.

Mr D. Lindsay: This still does not detract from one of the original things I said. This is going to be a deficit budget, yes, but they have anticipated that and they are preparing for it. There is not a government in this country that I have seen that has done that, that has come out and said, "We're going to do this." What we have is a federal government that says it is going to GST us and that is going to be used to kill a deficit, but the deficit is increasing at a record rate this year.

In regard to government spending, the example I tried to show you was that if I have to reduce my spending to pay my debts, then I start driving older vehicles and I start doing more manual labour and things like that. That is where we have to cut. We have to become more efficient. What I see in our government, what I have seen, as I said, in the past seven years is the fact that there are a lot of inefficient uses of money in the government.

Mr B. Murdoch: I agree with you.

Mr D. Lindsay: I have talked to people from SA because they were concerned with what I went through because I had one hell of a time with the welfare system. My family was down and out. We tried to get welfare, all they said to us was, "Sure, go ahead and sell your business and we'll let you go on welfare." I had $1500 worth of fish sitting in the water and this is the way I looked at it. The fish were unsellable because they were too small, but that made no difference to them. They were very antagonistic towards me. These are the things that have to be changed.

There are training programs that exist in this province and in this country which are nothing but a façade. They are posters on the wall and they do not go any further than that. I am serious about that. I came out of the navy and was trained to the degree of damned near an engineer and could not tap into any one of those programs to get training. It was as simple as that. I had to revert to minimum wage jobs, working on dangerous sites.

When I look at this budget I see that all these problems I ran into while trying to survive in this country since I left the skirt of the Canadian navy, which had taken care of me all these years—and when I say survive, I mean it; survive—I ran into all those problems—when I look at this budget appears most of these problems are going to be addressed.

If you want to judge the budget, you have to wait around and wait for a few years and judge it then. But for right now, as far as I can see, it is a good budget. As for the deficit, this government seems to be on the right track of reducing the deficit and the cost of government. I am sorry; I should not say reducing the deficit. I should say reducing the cost of government.

The Chair: We have to get down to the last question from the government.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you, gentlemen, for probably one of the most passionate, articulate presentations we have had so far. It is certainly heartfelt, and we thank you for that.

I think it is also important to clearly establish and recognize, in terms of how we got here, that while it is the third party that held up the House to ensure it got the demand that these budget hearings take place, it is interesting to hear the official opposition now take such a strong line on whether they should or should not. At the time I think they were balanced nicely on the fence and were not taking a position.

We make no bones about the fact that an arrangement was made. The Tories had a legitimate legislative right to do what they did, but they have to bear responsibility for that. We then negotiated that a number of other pieces of important legislation would be moved through the system and that we would go into these hearings.

I would say they probably did the right thing for the wrong reason, because in the final analysis, most people coming in are saying they appreciate the chance. I think of us from all the parties will reflect, when we are done er this is something we should do after every budget, er there is an actual return. I think we need to be opened about that and set aside the politics of the issue.

ly question to you, sir, is very direct. The philosophy, usly, that we have followed is what is called Keynesian mics, where you increase spending during rough times d the family, to use your example. The other side of that ion is that once you are through the rough times and is enough income to ensure that the basic needs of food, re met, you begin to cut back on some of those other where you now can do so without hurting people.

your opinion are Ontarians, particularly those from orth and the northwest, prepared to accept, as we start engthen as an economy, that those kinds of cutbacks take place? And do you think they are prepared to ot that from an NDP government?

Mr D. Lindsay: I believe so. The only example I can to right now in this short time is that I come from the ney General's riding, and he had an article in our r mentioning how he had cut back in his own ministry. eve he saved the province about $7 million by cutting free executive lunches and free chauffeur service to eme Court judges. I applaud him on that. We do not that kind of extravagance during these kinds of hard s. I am sure there are a lot of other teak and mahogany es that could use a bit of plywood in them too. It is as le as that. This is where the money has to be saved.

Mr B. Lindsay: There is a lot of chipboard in this riding.

Mr D. Lindsay: I guess that is all there is to say on point.

The Chair: You have two minutes left.

Mr Mahoney: Have you guys got teak and mahogany our office?

Mr Christopherson: No, we have just got too much money.

Ms M. Ward: There is a lot of sound and fury about deficit and you are saying, basically, "What's it all it?" I wonder if you are aware, and you probably are, the Liberal and the Conservative governments ran def-throughout most of the 1980s—1982, 1983, right up 1988 and 1989. Why they are making so much sound fury, as I say, about this now is rather questionable. Do have any comments on that?

Mr D. Lindsay: I think it is just a simple case of trying destroy the character of a government before it even started. Like I said, I was politicized through a very in system. I am serious. There are a lot of people who e gone through what I have gone through. The only erence between me and them, I think, is I am a little bit e resolute and I am a little bit tougher. I think it proba-had something to do with some of the people I had to up with when I was in the service.

I have a lot of farmer friends and I have watched what gone on in places like Saskatchewan. I have watched deficit grow there during a non-recessionary period, en the present government took over from a balanced get. What I do not understand is that the Premier of province stood up in open criticism of the Premier of this province when he brought down his budget. To me that is complete hypocrisy. It is grandstanding and it serves a purpose. I think the only purpose it stands to serve is to set up headlines and to try to misinform a general public that tends to be kind of apathetic about what their politi-cians do. I am very serious about that.

The Chair: Okay, sir. We have run out of time. We appreciate the presentation you have. Even though it was not all written out, you had it all memorized, what you wanted to say.

Mr D. Lindsay: I fumed about these things over and over again, many times.

The Chair: Thank you very much for attending this standing committee.

Mr D. Lindsay: Thank you for having me.

Mr Mahoney: The government would love to have you on its team, guys. You did a great job.

Mr B. Lindsay: Thank you very much. Maybe we should talk later.

DAVID RAMSAY

The Chair: David Ramsay, come forward, please. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economics and the budget hearings. You have 15 minutes.

Mr Ramsay: I will talk fast.

Ontarians face serious economic challenges. With the loss of an estimated 250,000 manufacturing jobs in the last few years and a projected loss of 184,000 manufacturing jobs in this year alone, with over 10,000 business and personal bankruptcies in Ontario in 1990 and huge increases in individual and family need for social assistance—for example, in my community here in Thunder Bay, there has been a 47% increase in welfare recipients from last year—the challenge to know how to best respond must be truly staggering for those of you in government.

I join with others who applaud this all-party committee of Queen's Park for its interest in hearing citizen reaction to the 1991 Ontario budget and their evaluation of how well this blueprint will meet the challenge of providing essential services to the public while at the same time not destroying the means by which the money needed to fund these services is created.

The general malaise experienced by many people who feel they have elected politicians who ignore them once they have gained power is counteracted, I believe, by this precedent-setting action of debating the budget with us, the public. If after this consultation you as politicians demonstrate how this has impacted on your actions, you can be credited for contributing to the restoration of democracy our society currently lacks.

Allow me to put my comments in context. Through a Canada Employment seat purchase, I have been employed by Confederation Community College to provide life skills and job readiness training for the past six years to people in our community who for a variety of causes are unemployed. When I read the 1991 Ontario budget, it was with their interests and their needs in mind, and these provided the criteria by which I evaluated it.

The other influences I am moved by are the imperatives that my Christian faith demands. I concur with the statements issued by the United Church and the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops in recent years regarding the immorality of fighting inflation or deficits by neglecting the basic human needs of those who are poor among us, and all governments' refusal to address economic, structural injustices that create poverty. Not only has the gap between the poor and the rich increased, with those of us who are rich controlling more and more of the nation's income—and I put myself in the category of the rich—but there are still a considerable number of poor people, even with our increased income-producing programs.

The myth that people are poor because of their own mismanagement, just like that of people being unemployed because it is their fault, has been proven false by many social scientists. The National Council on Welfare, a citizens' advisory board to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, has completed many such studies, which I have cited in the appendix to this document. My own experience and contact with over several hundred unemployed people during the course of my work provides me with further evidence that unemployment and poverty are largely results of government policies that place a priority on deficit reduction and budget balancing, rather than on the dignity, health, education and skills development of our most precious resource, that of human beings.

As a province, we cannot run a budget the way a business firm has to. To cut production costs, it has to find a way to reduce its largest expense, which is either a worker's salary or position when the maximum efficiency is achieved. A government that has undertaken to look after the care and feeding of all its citizens, such as I believe Ontario has done, cannot dismiss its workers to have someone else look after them. The government is that someone else.

I judge the budget, then, not by whether it is politically feasible or acceptable, whether it conforms to economic principles or even to my own partisan views, but its contribution to the advancement of human values, dignity, development of human resources and security of both the individual and our communities.

To make the deficit the priority seems logical in that to spend more than is made does not balance the books. It also appears moral in that no one wants to saddle a future generation with debts. However, I ask you, is it moral to deny a family member an education, health care, or income to purchase basic necessities like food and shelter in order to balance our books? Who among us would do this to someone we are responsible for? Is it logical to make balancing the books the first priority when to do so means creating more unemployment, or to not help small businesses avoid bankruptcy due to high interest rates and thus lose revenue raised through taxes?

A report of the 1987 Senate subcommittee on training and employment, a document that I have with me, found after extensive consultation with business, labour, educators in Canada and in West Germany, France, Britain that: "It costs more to keep someone unemployed than to create a job for that person where they produce a needed good and/or service. In 1985 alone, unemployment cost governments in Canada $26.28 billion, or approximately $14,600 for jobless Canadian."

I believe we must remember history in order to repeating fatal mistakes. From 1942 to 1945, Canadian government spending increased to 30% of the gross national product, which is equivalent to approximately $150 billion today. Federal budget deficits averaged 21% of the national product, the equivalent of deficits today of over $100 billion. In 1945, the national debt was four times what it was in 1939, which is equivalent to a national debt today of $800 billion. These deficits, however, reduced unemployment from 22% to nearly zero. The years following this period, 1946 to 1970, if you carefully explore the history books, will prove to be the most prosperous and stable in Canadian history due to low unemployment and higher productivity of goods and services. As a matter of fact, the first Bank of Canada governor, Graham Towers, stated in 1942 to his colleagues, the minister of finance, that government war expenditure on a sufficient scale can produce full employment.

This is not an argument to put the economy on a permanent war footing in order to create employment. I am one in this room who knows me knows I would not argue that. The United States and Soviet economies, which are so structured, are evidence enough to convince us that economic growth, sustenance of basic services or maintenance of employment cannot be obtained in this way. We see the collapse of these economies every day.

Instead, I would concur with the 1987 Senate subcommittee on training and employment when it recommended a program of job creation plus training. I think this is a significant difference from what we have had with the Canadian jobs strategies, to revitalize our economy, to reduce unemployment and create increased needed goods and services. Job creation, plus training, is successful if it results in the development of a clear, useful end product or service, helps workers to produce useful skills. The 1982 Economic Council of Canada report says that job training without the possibility of employment at the end only leads to frustration, cynicism and no increased productivity. The last presentation, I think, made personal reference to his own experience. It must be done in the context of job creation where meaningful, useful work produces needed services and products.

I have a list of examples to give you. We need construction of low-cost housing; we need to restore existing housing stock; we need to restore our infrastructure in cities, our watermains and roads; we need to increase tourist facilities; we need manpower for reforestation, repairing and double-tracking railroads and highways, home care, for eradication of illiteracy, which some of us undoubtedly know is now at 20% of our adult population for provision of day care, for environmental restoration and yes, for training of peacekeeping forces.

In addition to the economic value, a job-creation-plus-training approach not only lowers the unemployment rate without increasing the deficit, increasing inflation or the rate, it prevents the social costs of unemployment as well. The senators' report, after reviewing the available literature, concludes that there is a measurable causal link between unemployment and mortality, suicide, family breakdown olism, violent crime, juvenile delinquency, cardiovascular and mental hospital and prison admissions. My own with the unemployed can also testify to this link.

The Senate committee, certainly no bastion of socialist thought, since I do not believe any socialist has ever been invited to it, the Economic Council of Canada and Intristica tested out this idea in a computer-simulated project. The model assumed created 900,000 new jobs in 1985, dropping the unemployment rate from 8.5% to below 4% in that year. It determined that consumer consumption, less investment and the gross national product would all rise and that there would be no significant inflation as a result of these proposals and importantly, no addition to the deficit since government revenues would increase while government expenses would decrease. I have submitted with my report the appendices from these two institutions indicating the computer model's findings.

This computer model experiment also coincides with the findings of MIT and Harvard economists Blanchard and Summers in their studies of western European economies—that “each 1% point reduction in unemployment in any country would make possible a reduction of 4% in tax rates and use of the reduced need for social welfare expenditure and the enlarged tax base as output expanded.” That finding is also appended.

Improvements to the budget: First of all, I would make myself aware of the famous Pogo dictum that has often been repeated, “I have seen the enemy and it is us.” I apologize to the cartoonist if I have not quite got it right, but I think you will see my drift.

What I mean by this is that I have a responsibility to contribute in creating more revenue for the provincial government to make use of and coincidentally, check those personal choices I make that place more demand for government income or services. It is clear to me that out-amping is devastating my local community tax base, my neighbourhood and eventually the employability of my children. This is something I have in my control, to shop wherever I can for Canadian produced goods and services. My own wage demands can be restricted to fair returns. As a member of OPSEU, the Ontario Public Service Employees Union, I am paid directly from government revenue. Although it is tempting to follow the example of the 1974 federal parliamentarians who voted for themselves a 50% increase—which was passed, by the way, by all parliamentarians saving Stanley Knowles—I will begin to distinguish between my needs and my wants. I have thus written to my provincial union executive proposing that we as a bargaining unit this year reflect on the adequate income and benefits we enjoy and place our demands in the context of the needs of our community.

In my profession we enjoy the highest average income, which is $45,409 in this community, and in my particular workplace over 50% of my fellow faculty members have an average salary several thousand dollars greater than mine. I believe it is time for us to say with all honesty, “We are rich enough,” and that more does not equate to a better quality of life.

Second, I urge the provincial government to redress those structural deficiencies it has constitutional power to do so. By eliminating provincial income tax for those 700 families earning less than $22,500 is one such measure. To shift that cost to those of us who could well afford to make up for the lost revenue is an act of justice.

The Vice-Chair: Mr Ramsay, could you bring your remarks to a close. I am terribly sorry, but we are running out of time.

Mr Ramsay: The government needs to do more. The federal Nielsen task force revealed that in 1984 to 1985 corporations received more from government than they paid in direct taxes on profits. I suggest this has to be redressed. You well know the figures, the corporations and the numbers that have not paid on their profits in this past year.

Third, more rent-geared-to-income housing is urgently needed; 35,000 units do not go far enough in meeting the need. Increasing welfare where people pay 70% for their rent only to have it increased by their landlords reduces their raise to zero. Rent geared to income for single people is critical.

Finally, job creation with training is needed; 70,000 jobs falls 100,000 jobs short of the losses expected this year in manufacturing alone. Do not look to the federal government for help. In a Chronicle Journal report of this year, the chief analyst for Statistics Canada stated that all gains in employment is part-time jobs and in one industry, the lowest-paying industry in the economy, which he called the McJob syndrome.

Thank you for the opportunity to share these thoughts with you.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you, Mr Ramsay. Unfortunately, we do not have any time for questions from the three parties, but again we thank you for your presentation and bringing that information forward.

Ms M. Ward: Mr Chair, could we ask if the presenter has copies of the brief?

Mr Mahoney: Hansard has it.

The Vice-Chair: Yes, Hansard will have copies.

Ms M. Ward: It is usually quite a while before we get Hansard on committee.

Mr Ramsay: I will make copies available tomorrow.

The Vice-Chair: Okay. If we can have a copy left, that would be terrific. Realizing the time of the day, this committee is now adjourned until tomorrow morning.

Mrs McLeod: In terms of the expectation of Mr Ramsay to provide copies, is that not something the committee can do itself?

The Vice-Chair: If he can supply us with one copy, we will take care of it.

Mrs McLeod: All right, with the appended material.

The Vice-Chair: Yes. If we can get the original, the rest is okay. This committee is adjourned until 9 o'clock tomorrow morning in Sault Ste Marie.

The committee adjourned at 1520.

Resuming consideration of the 1991-92 provincial budget.

The Chair: Good morning. We are here for the standing committee on finance and economic affairs to hear submissions into the budget hearings.

ALGOMA DISTRICT MENTAL RETARDATION SERVICE SAULT STE MARIE ASSOCIATION FOR THE MENTALLY RETARDED

The Chair: The first group is the Algoma District Mental Retardation Service and Sault Ste Marie Association for the Mentally Retarded. Gentlemen, would you mind introducing yourselves for Hansard? You have half an hour for presentation. Out of that half-hour, save some time for questions and answers from the three parties. You can begin.

Mr Hibbert: My name is Michael Hibbert. I am the executive administrator of the Algoma District Mental Retardation Service. I am presenting this morning with my counterpart.

Mr Tosello: I am Mario Tosello and I am here on behalf of Barb Jackson, who could not be available this morning. I am from the Sault Ste Marie Association for the Mentally Retarded.

Mr Hibbert: I would like to thank the Chairman and members of this committee for allowing us the time for this presentation. I believe you have copies of the presentation we are going to make in front of you. It is our hope that through this presentation our clients will continue to receive the province's full support through, to and including the budget.

The Sault Ste Marie Association for the Mentally Retarded and Algoma District Mental Retardation Service are presenting jointly due to like concerns arrived at through provision of services. Algoma has an identified client list of 1,100 individuals with the condition of mental retardation who, along with their families, are eligible to receive services.

The provision of service is directly possible by funding programs through the Ministry of Community and Social Services under relevant legislation, such as the Developmental Services Act, Homes for Retarded Persons Act, Child and Family Services Act, Vocational Rehabilitation Services Act, Day Nurseries Act and a number of others, obviously. The MCSS new program directions for people with developmental handicaps are very encouraging. Within the ministry's new framework, there are issues which are not addressed in the provincial budget, however. One of those is pay or wage equity. The principles of pay equity and wage equity are key issues for both agencies. Both organizations agree that it is unfair and unacceptable to undervalue certain occupations and sectors based on systemic discrimination.

One of the major areas requiring the government's attention is that of the impact of government on community and non-profit transfer payment organizations such as ours that rely on 98% of their funding from the government. The impact of changes like the pay equity legislation can be quite dramatic on organizations such as ours. The provincial budget states that a further $25 million will be provided in 1991-92 to assist other transfer agencies in meeting their pay equity obligations. However, MCSS has indicated that community transfer payment agencies, again such as ours, will receive no moneys for pay equity.

The majority of individuals who are mentally retarded now live in and receive services in the community. This means legislative changes, which have to be complied with, will reduce dollars available to client services, as spaces either have to be reduced or staff-client ratios increased. The money has to come from somewhere. MCSS facilities are to receive 10.6% wage increases over 1990-91 estimates, whereas transfer payment agencies, again like ourselves, are only getting 6%.

The point at issue exacerbates an already tenuous situation—staff salary awards and the bump awards for community agencies. With the proposed pay equity awards and increase in wages, the gap between transfer payment and direct operating expenses salaries will continue to widen. In fact, this morning Mrs Jackson could not be here because she is in conciliation for that very issue.

Discrepancies in benefits for staff further widen the existing gap. The average benefits for transfer payment agencies are 16%, while MCSS benefits are 21.38%. We want to offer our employees similar benefits without penalizing our clients.

The entire issue of salary awards must again be reviewed by the Ontario government to ensure non-profit agencies in the north can compete for staff with the ministry. Recruitment of qualified people to the north is difficult at best but, given the salary discrepancies, the issues become even larger. Staff training dollars must be increased to assist employees in accessing the knowledge and training opportunities necessary to competently perform in meeting our consumer needs.

The GST has provided the agencies another fiscal and annualized financial headache. As you may be aware, transfer payment agencies can only claim back one half of the GST paid. Depending on the type of service offered, this can have a significant dollar impact. The net effect is that it costs the agencies almost 7% due to the requirement of additional administrative supports. No new dollars have been made available to transfer payment agencies for this reality, thereby again forcing agencies to look at cutting corners, if not services.

Mr Tosello: The multi-year plan: The service principles upon with the multi-year plan is based, the promotion of independence, protection, individual attention and quality programs, are consistent with those of our two organizations. Nevertheless, a number of concerns do exist.

The government fixed an amount of $159 million some five years ago to depopulate institutions. This amount is not inflation-indexed or sensitive to legislative changes. The purchasing power is thereby significantly reduced, again having to do more with less.

Currently, MCSS plans to spend $311,659,000 to service about 3,000 residents in the 1991-92 year in DOE facilities. This works out to $103,886 for each individual. The Ministry of Community and Social Services has earmarked $30,000 for each person being returned to the community from designated nursing homes. The total costs for DOE facilities exceeds the $103,886 amount. Not even this basic amount is being returned with the client to the community, as the fixed part of the $159 million has not been adjusted.

The Ministry of Community and Social Services, under vote 802, item 6, indicates a total of 11,672 spaces in the transfer payment agencies for sheltered workshops and life skills. It is known that many more individuals participate actively in supported employment programs at various levels of schooling and in private employment. Assuming a modest figure of 15,000 individuals throughout the province utilizing community-based services, the provincial cost per client for 1991-92 is an average of $36,648. The same clients in DOE-run facilities cost $103,886. These clients enjoy a number of services that community clients and those returning cannot or will not enjoy.

Algoma has no kinesiologist, no music therapist, no recreational therapist, two speech pathologists, one physiotherapist and one occupational therapist for 1,100 consumers. While the ministry has made a commitment to providing community living opportunities for people currently waiting to move from institutions and nursing homes, no such promise for additional supports has been made to the number of people presently residing in the community who require services. Those community individuals we serve should not be penalized because they have not left the community. New moneys are required for this group of consumers. The budget in future must address funding increases in the multi-year funding exercise if this initiative is to achieve its goal as well as those in the community.

Consumer needs: In terms of consumer needs, programs and services to assist families to better care for their developmentally handicapped children at home through parent relief, infant development and other forms of developmental programming must exist so that institutionalization will not occur. This is a new program direction of the Ministry of Community and Social Services.

The provincial budget does not address the underfunding of the special services at home program. The program has expanded to include adults with developmental handicaps, further straining budgets without the addition of new moneys. The assistive devices program under the Ministry of Health did provide for 75% funding to assist handicapped individuals with necessary aids. The special needs at home program funded the remaining 25%.

The changes in both programs have virtually eliminated funding for wheelchairs where individuals are unable to propel themselves. These are costly at $3,000 apiece and are no longer funded. Assessments in Toronto are no longer funded and unavailable for the north. Already scarce resources are further stretched by the government's budgetary decisions. No mention was made in the budget about increases to residents' comfort allowance, which has not kept pace with inflation. The current allowance of $100 per month has increased since 1986, at which time it was $77, I believe. Our hope that future budgets will deal with legislated changes and reflect such in a more realistic manner.

The Algoma District Mental Retardation Service, the Sault Ste Marie Association for the Mentally Retarded would like to thank the provincial steering committee for its time and interest in hearing our concerns and we are open to any questions the committee might have.

The Chair: We have about six minutes for each party starting off with Mr McLean.

Mr McLean: I would like to zero in on the transition from the institutions to the community. Do you have a psychiatric facility here? I do not believe you do.

Mr Hibbert: The Plummer Memorial Public Hospital has a ward attached to the hospital.

Mr McLean: For chronic care?

Mr Hibbert: Riverview Centre provides some psychiatric care.

Mr McLean: Are any people being moved from nursing homes out into the community here?

Mr Hibbert: In ADMRS, we have just received a second one from designated nursing homes with the minimum. Those people are being repatriated or brought back into the community at this point in time. This is why we have alluded to the moneys the government has set aside for that process, the $30,000 per head. What we tried to do in this particular presentation is to highlight the kinds of dollars that are being spent currently on these individuals. The types of moneys are not forthcoming to the community; we cannot provide the kinds of supports and the kind of care in the community that they are currently receiving in institutions. We believe the institutions are inappropriate places for these people to be.

We agree with the government and past governments and the direction is great. However, the dollars should be coming with those people back to the community. The dollars originally set aside some five years ago have not been inflation-indexed and have not reflected the kind of legislative changes we just talked about. Pay equity is a problem but there are a number of other changes which have come to us. We do not get the funds so we have had to cut corners, but we cannot cut any more corners.

Mr McLean: If it was costing $100,000 to keep someone in the institution and it is only costing $30,000 in the community, there should be funds available to cover that. In other words, it is less money.

Mr Hibbert: We are hoping the government will do it that way.

Mr McLean: I have not heard before of people being transferred from nursing homes or homes for the aged into community. Is this something new?

Mr Hibbert: These are initiatives the government undertook some time ago. They set some $30 million aside for that.

Mr McLean: It is amazing, because in the community I represent I have not known a person who has been into a nursing home and transferred back out into the community under the care of your association.

Mr Hibbert: You have to go back in time. Some of the people who were being repatriated have been in institutions since they were two or three years of age and they are now 40, 45 or 50 years old. These people were originally placed in the most appropriate facility available to them. In some cases the nursing home was the only facility available to them and they have been there until this time, and through government initiatives have been brought back into the community.

Mr Tosello: We also identified a few clients who could be transferred out of nursing homes in the Sault who could be going into community-based programs, but unfortunately there are no spaces available. The spaces that are available are filled by people who are returning from institutions. We tried to swap but we are playing with people's lives here.

Mr Martin: It is nice to see you again this morning. I really appreciate your taking the time out to come and present on behalf of the two associations in the city that deliver services to the developmentally handicapped. To continue the discussion we have had in my office around this issue, I suppose it is important to note that you continue to advocate on behalf of those who cannot advocate on their own. You probably realize the difficulty we are in as a government. We are certainly committed to the kinds of things you are committed to and the people you work with, trying to provide the very best we can, but in a time of recession we find ourselves with a limited number of dollars. You are probably aware too that out of the budget we presented that put us into deficit by $9.7 billion, $8.5 billion was just kept in place the services we already experience.

I hear you saying here that if we simply took the money that is not being spent any more to institutionalize these folks and turn it back into the community, it would more than adequately meet the dollars needed to do the service that you would propose is needed to do, the multi-year program of deinstitutionalizing folks. Is that correct?

Mr Hibbert: It is correct to the extent that in our presentation we have talked about the $159 million that is originally set aside to depopulate all the institutions over a seven-year period. If you look at the people who are still remaining in the institutions—and a good number have been deinstitutionalized; we have taken 30 people back between the two agencies here alone—it is costing the government over $300 million to provide that service. There is not $159 million left, so what is happening is that to say, $50 million we have to bring 3,000 people back. We cannot do that.

I am overstating it here, but the issue is one of the $311 million. If the institutions are being depopulated, the same kinds of moneys should be coming back to the community so we can pay the same type of salaries or similar salaries so we can attract competent, qualified staff, which we cannot do because we are in the north and it is difficult attracting people here. But then also we can provide the kinds of services like kinesiologists and recreational therapists and the type of day program supports that people are now getting. But when you are doing it on $36,000 versus $103,000, obviously you can buy more for your dollar. The original money set aside for the depopulation exercise is not inflation-indexed, so what was $159 million is still $159 million. So every year, even if inflation is 5%, it is 5% less that we can buy.

Mr Martin: What I hear you saying then, Mike, is that in order to do the job that you know you and your staff can do you need more money.

Mr Hibbert: We would like to see the government support, with dollars, the legislation, the initiatives, the guidelines it has instituted, because the government has done, in my mind, a good job and is taking the right direction. But we in the community would certainly like to get some of the financial support to implement it the way I think it is intended to be implemented.

Mr Mahoney: Good morning. I am trying to grasp exactly what it is you are telling us. As I read what you are saying, you have shown the government how it can actually cut its operating costs in the area of service to your client group by two thirds if it adopted a more aggressive policy of funding community-based mental health care. Is that accurate?

Mr Hibbert: I would say that we are currently doing that—not to the degree that we would like and not to the level that they are currently enjoying in the institutions. We would like to see the appropriate amount—it does not have to be the same dollars—of support available to the individuals returning and to the community clients. There are no new moneys for those individuals who are not institutionalized. There is absolutely no new money.

So what happens is, if parents have kept their child at home and struggled and everything else, then the special needs program clicked in some years ago, which is a very positive step. But there are no new moneys for supports when parents are becoming older, can no longer care for their individual. We have no way of providing the kind of residential care, day program supports, other support services, social work, whatever, because the dollars are not there. If similar dollars that are currently being spent for DOE-run facilities were transferred to community agencies, then I would say we would be very well off.

Mr Mahoney: That is my exact point. You are saying $30,000 would cover the cost of service to a client in a residential setting, be it a group home or some form of residential care with a family or something of that nature. I assume that is what you are talking about. We have similar things in all communities. So for $30,000 you can provide that level of care but it is $103,000 to keep that same individual in an institution.

Mr Tosello: In an institution all these services are provided—there is a physiotherapist; there is a speech therapist; there is a nurse—which are not readily accessible to the person who lives in the community, plus, in addition, we also have community waiting lists. For example, I think between our two organizations our waiting lists have been about 80 people just for residential programs, and approximately the same number for day programs, which means life-skills services, supportive employment, sheltered workshops, and those people do not get any services or they get minimal services.

Mr Mahoney: Let me understand this. Are you saying that there are additional costs outside of the direct services that would have to be provided on a more global basis, such as the therapists, etc? What I hear you saying is identifying a way that the government can actually save money by redirecting the money to more appropriate sources, rather than simply asking the government for more money. I hear your pleas for some form of protection against inflation for your programs and that type of thing, but I also hear you saying that there are potential ways to save money. It seems to be falling on deaf ears.

Mr Hibbert: I do not know if the saving is the real issue for us as service providers. The issue for us as service providers—

Mr Mahoney: But you could provide better service for less money.

Mr Hibbert: We think we can provide better service. We would like to have some money to at least ensure that the standards they are now receiving are maintained when they come back to the community, and also for those community clients who were never sent away to institutions in the first place, so they also can get appropriate service. That is what we are saying. The bottom line throughout this whole thing is, we agree with the direction the government has been going in the past and now, and we agree with a lot of the legislative changes because they are very positive, but we need the dollars to be able to do it properly and not at the expense of the clients we serve. That is the bottom line for us.

Mr Mahoney: Sure. Do I still have time, Mr Chair?

The Chair: Yes, you have another two minutes.

Mr Mahoney: I enjoyed your presentation because for a change it is totally apolitical—not a change from your perspective, but from what we have been hearing; they have been less than objective views of the budget. I think you have identified the problems that you face and some suggested solutions quite well.

With regard to your organization, do you yourself run residential facilities here in the Sault?

Mr Hibbert: Both organizations do.

Mr Mahoney: Both organizations do, and do you have difficulty in expanding that program? Do you have community resistance, or do you think that you can do more of that kind of thing?

Mr Tosello: We have had very little resistance at all. We have a set of guidelines that we go through, just so the public is aware of what residential programs are operating even our day programs. Reluctance is not there. Once you see the ADMRS, it is not like the group homes with residential facilities.

Mr McLean: This is a question I am not so sure I will be able to answer, but I would like to ask it. The year depopulation, the $159 million, would you have an idea of what is left out of that $159 million or what percentage would have been spent? It is really a question for the government to answer, but—

Mr Hibbert: I can indicate to you from a meeting I attended about a month ago now that it is my understanding that in northern Ontario there is about $4 million that has been set aside for this year's effort of the seven-year exercise, so $4 million has to be spread across northern Ontario to continue with this exercise. ADMRS has received funding for a new apartment-type program, group home. It is a different, but a new program. However, again, it exempts the issue we are raising. So we are bringing in and providing service for seven new people and we have no additional administrative support dollars; we have no additional professional supports. We are talking about the occupational therapists, that kind of individual. We have received dollars for that.

Mr McLean: You indicate that it costs an average of $36,648 now to provide cost, and that still does not include the therapist or any of that other—

Mr Hibbert: That is the average that we are showing at that particular point.

Mr McLean: I had another question—it will come back to me, very likely.

Mr Tosello: Just to comment, the $36,648 is just out of 15,000, and that is just a rough number of people. It is not sure.

Mr McLean: When the program was brought in, we know there were a lot of people in institutions who were quite capable of being put back into the community, but we would have thought it would be more difficult now to find people who would qualify, in my estimation, because I think the institutions are still, for a lot of clients, the best there is. Are we getting into tougher situations now with the clients?

Mr Hibbert: ADMRS was one of the first places in the province where we took a lot of people who were in chronic care wards, a lot of children, and brought them back into the community, and for some time we have had children who have G-tubes and trachiotomies and had a variety of other different types of very serious health care needs. The Sault AMR has also opened recently a corridor with health care needs, and we are able to do it, provide that the kind of supports are there that are currently being received in these institutions. We can do it in much smaller settings, more appropriate settings, and the development of the people who come back is just incredible, even though they have been in institutions for 40 years. We work with the individuals and the families, and over a year you can see dramatic changes, very positive changes, and the results are comparable or less.

Mr McLean: Thank you for your brief. There is certainly some good information in there.

Mr Sutherland: I just wanted to ask you a little bit about your overall philosophy. In some of the discussions I've had with my local community living organizations, their philosophy now is again to move beyond the residential facilities or homes and try to get as many as possible of high-functioning individuals into their own places and apartments and into as much of what we would call a normal lifestyle as possible. I was wondering if you could give us some indication as to where your organization is at that philosophy and whether there are cost savings that way as well.

Mr Hibbert: I am going to let Mario address this, but all organizations, even though we are different organizations, have pretty similar philosophies. The basic underlying fundamental is the principle of normalization, which you've mentioned, so that is a given, I think, across most agencies. Maybe, Mario, you want to address this one.

Mr Tosello: First, the question was providing better services in the community-based organization compared to institution, right?

Mr Sutherland: Yes. I just want to know how far you are in terms of having people in individual apartments rather than in a residential home setting.

Mr Tosello: Both organizations have been around for many years, I would say, and supported employment and supported independent living programs have been around for a long time. We are at the point right now where, with the institutionalization, with people coming back, we also have community waiting lists, and we cannot provide residential programs or independent living programs because people who are returning get the first choice. First, spaces are created; that is where the money is coming from; then they get the spaces. If we can somehow make four spaces for two people, then two people from the community obviously are getting—

The Chair: I would like to thank you for your presentation. It was quite informative to the committee here. Thank you very much for attending.

SAULT STE MARIE AND DISTRICT WOMEN FOR WOMEN

The Chair: The next group is the Sault Ste Marie and District Women for Women and the sexual assault centre. Could you please come forward? Would you identify yourselves, please, for Hansard. You have one half-hour presentation, with a question and answer period at the end within that half-hour.

Ms Coppel-Park: Hello. My name is Bryna Coppel-Park, and I am representing Sault Ste Marie and District Women for Women. I would like it struck from the record that I am representing the sexual assault centre, please, whoever is taking notes here.

The Chair: I made a mistake also. It is a 15-minute presentation. I am sorry. We made two mistakes.

Ms Coppel-Park: Okay. I am employed by the Plummer Memorial Public Hospital as the co-ordinator of the sexual assault centre, but very clearly I am here today representing Women for Women. Sometimes I get that a little mixed up in my mind, but I am speaking on behalf of an independent women's group.

I just rushed from the office all the way up here, so I am also glad to know that I am only required to sit in this chair for 15 minutes.

I am going to start out by making an apology to you. I have been very ill. I debated whether I should phone and say that I had to cancel today because I am not prepared in the way I had hoped to be, but I felt it was really important to come here today to address some of the financial issues around sexual assault and violence against women in general.

I know you are all perfectly aware of the financial commitment of the present government and the announcement in early May by Anne Swarbrick allocating even more funding to both the issue of sexual assault—by sexual assault we mean an umbrella term “sexual assault,” sexual abuse—and also the issue of physical violence against women. So we are looking at a total financial commitment to violence in the lives of women, and by extension women and their children.

I do not want to bore you by quoting figures you can read yourselves, but I think the government has to be commended for understanding that the issue of violence in the lives of women and children is at the very core of many social problems. If money is not allocated, not only to address and treat women who have suffered violence in their lives, but also money that will be spent on education and prevention and hopefully eradication of violence in the lives of women and children, then very many other social problems do not have a chance. We can talk about pumping money into the education system or the social services system or this or that, but when we look at the reality of how women lead their lives, the fear in which women lead their lives, the dysfunction of families in which women and children need to live their lives, we look at the fact that it is very difficult to make other things in their lives work, like education or employment.

I think that in northern Ontario the situation is even more difficult, and I am glad to note that the government has made a commitment not only to increase funding for northern Ontario but for accessibility of services. It is one thing to offer services in Sault Ste Marie or Thunder Bay or Sudbury. What happens to all those people in between? What happens to the people who are in the more remote areas? I think the government should be congratulated for recognizing that funding needs to go into looking at ways of bringing services to women who are victims of violence, and sexual violence in particular, in those areas.

I think the reality of the situation, and I am speaking only for Sault Ste Marie, is that while there is financial commitment on paper, there are virtually so few available kinds of helping services that the majority of women and children who have suffered sexual violence or physical violence because of the fact that they are women are on long waiting lists. It looks fine to say that there is $17 million more committed to the budget to do this, that and the other thing, but today in Sault Ste Marie it is really hard to get people the help they need that is more than just a stopgap help. Yes, we have come a very long way, and now with the creation and the funding of the sexual assault care centre through the Plummer hospital people have immediate medical crisis intervention, but then what happens? How long do they have to wait before they can have some help?

The other point that I wanted to make, and I am not going to talk much more, is that there is a very big problem and we can treat as many women and as many children as we want, we can treat a million women and children who are victims of sexual violence, but that will not stop sexual violence directed to women.

There is money pumped into programs that treat young offenders, and I say young offenders because I have come to understand—I mean, I cannot really believe I am sitting here saying some of this to you, because a few years ago I would have thought: "Oh, what a waste of money. Just put the money into working with the women." The more I do this kind of work and the more I talk to other women, especially women who are victims of sexual violence, the more I see that it makes a whole lot of sense to look at funding programs.

I think that through the financial initiatives of this government there is some recognition of this, but we have to fund programs that can address the young men who are perpetrating these kinds of sexually violent crimes on women, because it is only there, along with education and prevention and everything else, that I think you really make a difference. You have to have the money there—and yes, it is in the budget—to treat the women and the children who are victims. They deserve every penny we have to give them, and more even than this government has allocated, but also we need to do something to stop the cycle. It is more than just education, and I think what I would like to emphasize is that it needs to be stopped with the very young perpetrators. They are the ones who can reverse their thinking and stop, and I think there needs to be some more money going into those kinds of programs.

The city of Sault Ste Marie does not have very much to offer along these lines, and with the kinds of funding available to the different agencies that are trying to provide this kind of service, with cutbacks etc, because of funding through United Way—I suppose you are all aware of this; it is a situation right across the province, I am sure—it is very difficult to find this kind of care for young perpetrators.

The Chair: Fine. A question on the government side, Ms Ward?

Ms M. Ward: You are talking about stopping the young perpetrators. Where are they identified? What age? I am trying to get a picture of that person. Is that someone who has already been involved in violence against women, or in a setting where it may have been?

Ms Coppel-Park: I think youthful perpetrators are identified in a number of ways, and I would also like to say at this point that very often they have been victims of violence or have witnessed violence themselves.

Ms M. Ward: That is what I was wondering.

Ms Coppel-Park: They are often picked up at the justice level. They are the kids who are getting into trouble. They are the ones who are on probation. They are the ones who are coming in front of family and juvenile court. They are the ones who are often wards of the children's society. They are often living in group homes. Things are often not working out for them in their lives. They are maybe leaving school early, having a great deal of difficulty in school. Sometimes it is a matter of just asking the right question to these kids when something is really wrong in their lives and we find out that, yes, this is what is going on. They are not always victims themselves, very often they are, and they are often identified because something is really wrong in their lives. That is how they come to the attention of different kinds of service providers.

Ms M. Ward: Are the services ready, basically developed, for those people? I do not necessarily mean are they widely available, because obviously that is what you are saying, that we need more, but is the expertise there to develop these services?

Ms Coppel-Park: I think it is a very underresearched area, although I know that individual organizations and agencies sort of struggle along on their own because they see a need and they try to provide a program to meet that need. There is some group work that is going on now in Sault Ste Marie, just because the need was recognized for the service provision level for kids who had been identified as juvenile offenders.

We are all really quick to judge these kids. I work with juvenile delinquents for many years. That is how I started out my career, and I know that it is not easy to work with them. Lots of them break the law and lots of them do really awful things. I think that if we do not stop them, and that is not easy either, but if we start asking some of the right questions, at least to try to get to the bottom of things and to try to start to identify whether or not they were also victims or witnesses of this kind of violence themselves, I think we have a whole better chance.

Mrs Sullivan: I am interested in hearing more about what facilities are available for victims of violence, whether it is sexual assault or violence against women or children, family violence. Are there sexual assault centres outside of the hospital environment that people can access? I was also wondering about secure housing here for victims of family violence.

Ms Coppel-Park: Yes, there is a very beautiful newly built shelter for women who are victims of physical violence. After years of being in an overcrowded, inappropriate house, they now have a very beautiful, adequate facility which is secure. There is only the sexual assault centre through the Plummer hospital which has as its mandate the provision of acute care, meaning the medical care and also follow-up, meaning short- and longer-term counselling. There are some agencies, such as the Family Services Centre or Women's Outreach, which are very inadequately funded and understaffed and in spite of that do a very good job with long, long waiting lists. But there is no grass-roots, more indigenous sexual assault centre.

Sault. There was one up until about five years ago, but because of the lack of any kind of funding or government support, it folded. The volunteers just could not continue longer.

Mrs Sullivan: Just to carry on from that, on the staff- and the professional services side, certainly in my community one of the things we have found is that the volunteer, community-based level of providing services, provision of support, or professional support, is becoming more and more difficult as organizations have to compete with institutions, with hospitals, with Community Social Services, for example. Are you facing the same thing here?

Ms Coppel-Park: Yes.

Mrs Sullivan: You are finding it difficult to pay people to provide those services?

Ms Coppel-Park: Yes. It is painful sometimes, because you have services that need to work together being pitted against each other for maybe one position. We went through this at the district health council not too long ago. These financial initiatives by the present government give us some hope that there is recognition for individual communities.

There is another very big problem here. I am sorry, I cannot see your name, I am not sure where you are from, but in northern Ontario it is very difficult to attract people who are willing to do this kind of work. Over the summer there were three agencies advertising for professionals, for social workers to come to Sault Ste Marie to do this kind of work. First of all, the salaries are very inadequate compared to southern Ontario standards, and second, for someone to make a commitment to come to northern Ontario—

The Chair: Okay, Mr McLean.

Mr McLean: How much time have I got?

The Chair: You have about two minutes.

Mr McLean: Thank you. You indicated that there is no place here in Sault Ste Marie for abused women to go?

Ms Coppel-Park: No, I am sorry, there is. There is a very secure facility for women who are victims of physical violence or women who are victims of sexual violence who have no place to go. It is a 24-bed, well-staffed, well-maintained facility.

Mr McLean: And it will be pretty well full all the time, like the others?

Ms Coppel-Park: I do not know off the top of my head what their statistics are, but pretty close to 100% full.

Mr McLean: That is all that I wanted to find out.

The Chair: Fine. Thank you for appearing before the committee today.

INTERFAITH SOCIAL ASSISTANCE REFORM COALITION

The Chair: Next we will call on Rev Phyllis Dietrich. Good morning and welcome to the standing committee on finance and economics.

Miss Dietrich: Good morning. Whoever called me for the booking of time, I understand that you wanted copies. Is that correct?

The Chair: If you have the copies, that would be fine. We will hand them out to all of the members. Just wait a minute before you start so everybody has a copy. They can follow along then.

Miss Dietrich: Okay, I sure will. Just to remind you that I have copied this on both sides of the page to try to save some expense to my church.

Good morning, my name is Rev Phyllis Dietrich and I am an ordained minister with the United Church of Canada here in Sault Ste Marie. I became a member of the Interfaith Social Assistance Reform Coalition—hereafter I will refer to that as ISARC—in the city in the spring of 1990. ISARC is a branch of the provincial ISARC, which has met since 1986. The main objective of ISARC was to sponsor public hearings which would give people from low-income groups and organizations the opportunity to once again tell their stories of the continuing reality of hunger, homelessness and poverty. In Sault Ste Marie our committee was represented by several Christian denominations, Jews, health care professionals and educators. The stories we heard of our community in September 1990 were frightening. Some of the dilemmas people in the Sault found themselves in were nothing short of horror stories. I come today to speak in defence of the budget as laid out by our current government.

In 1988, after the Social Assistance Review Committee held hearings across Ontario to look at poverty, hunger and homelessness, a report called Transitions was issued to the Peterson government. In the report there were many reforms given to the current general welfare and family benefits system. By 1990, seeing that very few of the recommendations were acted upon, religious leaders took it upon themselves to encourage our government to rethink the social welfare system. You see, from time immemorial, clergy have dealt with the disadvantaged. In many aspects we are the experts. There is not a clergy person who has not dealt with a person whose welfare cheque has not gone far enough, and they have come to us as they know the church is one place where they will not be judged. We hear stories of what it is like to try to live on welfare in this province, and how one service worker will treat you one way while another will treat you with disdain.

The clergy, in many aspects, are becoming the experts of the government's system. We know a lot of the possibilities through which a person can access the system in the hope of finding some relief in a current life of extreme poverty. But despite what we can do at accessing the government's system to provide help for any individual in need, we too get frustrated with the current system. Most of the people we deal with who are on social assistance never can work their way out once they are in the system. Many people become junkies to the system. They cannot get out of it because a job would not pay them to. With the cost of day care and health care, once they have a minimum-wage job they are in a worse dilemma than they were before. They might as well stay on the welfare dole.

Many people I have seen become known for using the system are indeed only trapped by a system that seems to work at keeping people in an oppressive situation. By the time many helping institutions such as the religious organizations start to help some of these people, the individual has been through the gamut of the provincial spider-web, getting caught or hung up on details so that they do not get ahead. We see people whose marriages have broken up, alcoholism, drug abuse, child abuse and extreme depression, just to name a few of the problems that are results of the welfare trap. That is why clergy across Ontario have become involved in this matter.

As a result of the hearings across Ontario in 1990, from the ISARC groups that met and from the thrust of the Transitions report, 88 action items became apparent that we would want any government to look at. If these items were implemented they would improve benefits, for example, by making special necessities such as medical supplies and basic dental needs mandatory rather than discretionary benefits; increase the personal needs allowance for people in need who live in institutions or hostels; streamline service delivery through such actions as authorizing pilot projects and self-declaration; set a service standard across Ontario that applications should be taken and eligibility determined within 48 hours of first contact with a welfare worker; give a voice to people who receive social assistance through the formation of a council of consumers.

They would make eligibility rules more equitable, less complex and more in tune with today's realities by, for example, making assistance available to people such as the working poor, self-employed people like farmers, or refugee claimants, on the basis of need rather than excluding them on the basis of category; begin implementing opportunity planning as advocated in Transitions to ensure that recipients are given the services and supports necessary to help them make the transition to independence; develop a community standard to measure adequacy of social assistance rates using a market-basket approach which prices a number of goods and services that people need to live; improve incentives to work by lowering the tax-back rate on earned income while making the rules about job searches fairer and more realistic; promote the rights of recipients by, for example, ensuring that they can have an advocate accompany or represent them in dealing with the system and ensuring also that they are notified in writing of decisions and their right to appeal those decisions; increase staff to improve services through, for example, agreement between the province and the municipalities on a reasonable client-to-staff ratio; improve funding for municipalities which deliver general welfare through 50% provincial cost-sharing of those administrative costs now borne exclusively by local governments; and create a special fund to promote relief to municipalities adversely affected financially by the reforms.

Those of us who have been involved with the ISARC hearings and the follow-up that has taken place understand that Ontario is in the midst of a recession and there are competing demands for public dollars. However, more than ever, social supports for the most disadvantaged and vulnerable people in our society must be strengthened. The fact that more people are in need during hard economic times should make the momentum for reform more urgent.

Before I end my presentation, I would like to say briefly about the poverty among those in our society recognized as young people or children. Through the ISARC findings, approximately 42% of those who depend on social assistance are children. Here in Sault Ste Marie I heard stories last September—they were horror stories I tell you—from our soup kitchen how three of our schools send children to the soup kitchen because they come to school with no lunches or no availability of a meal at home on a regular basis.

As of yesterday, our Sault Ste Marie soup kitchen had approximately 35 young people on a daily basis throughout the summer months. That is not counting the adults who go through the door. Some are accompanied by a parent. Leftover food from the day's meal at the kitchen is taken home with some of the more needy families. Sometimes some of the packaged macaroni and cheese food is taken home, but not much else. Milk is a near-scarcity.

Most of the people who come through the doors of the soup kitchen find it hard to secure reasonable housing for themselves and their children. They want to live like normal people. They want a little space and a place that perhaps they could grow a garden and try to take care of themselves. They want to live like the rest of us and I feel they deserve to.

If we do not act on the reforms the Transitions report made, we will have condemned yet another generation of children to a life of publicly supported poverty. In doing so we will be undermining the social, economic and political future of this province.

The provincial budget as presented on April 29, 1991, in the Legislative Assembly, I believe, speaks and acts to the growing problem of poverty, homelessness and hunger in Ontario. This budget for many people is radical, but I believe Ontario is in a state where drastic measures must be placed immediately in order that all who live in Ontario may enjoy the wealth this province possesses. Speaking through my vocation, which seeks justice for all people, this budget is the first budget in Ontario history that I see addresses the same ideals the majority of religious groups hold dear.

It will take a great deal of money to correct the mistakes of the past. Religious leaders understand the amount of time—and I will use a religious term for that—and the time that will take. The budget has committed $215 million on a full-time basis to reform the social assistance system. Some of us, after seeing the state the system is in through the eyes of individuals, wonder if that is even enough.

This government is committed to putting the reform process back on track through the implementation of the needs as described in the Transitions report and the Back on Track report. It is a major commitment. Some of us who really have not been affected by this current recession are also being committed, as our government is, to giving up in order that others may just live: quality health care, the possibility of employment, help for the working poor, the assistance for the keepers of our land, that is, our farmers and our aboriginal people, but mostly the commitment in this budget to be the foreseen elimination of hunger, homelessness and poverty.

This budget in the eyes of all religious groups is definitely a sign of new hope. We hope the Legislature will allow us to get on with it, as we have many people in Sault Ste Marie who need new hopes and new futures.

Thank you for allowing me this time to speak with you about a topic that is very important to me and I know is also important to our government.

The Chair: We have about one minute for each party caucus, starting off with the Liberal Party caucus.

Mrs Sullivan: Like you, we appreciate the commitment the government has made to the Transitions and RC reports. I want it to be very clear on the record, however, that the government simply expanded and built on a previous initiative of the previous government, which had originally committed $415 million, moving up to $600 million, over a very short period of time. The additional $215 million in this budget is simply an add-on to previous initiatives. Whether it goes far enough is certainly yet to be seen. I would like to know from you—

The Chair: Your time is up.

Mrs Sullivan: Too bad. I made my point.

Mr McLean: I have a question with regard to the food basket that you have.

Miss Dietrich: The soup kitchen.

Mr McLean: No, I am referring to your saying, "develop a community standard...using a market-basket approach that prices a number of goods and services that people need to live." I have no problem with helping people pay rent and no problem with supplying food. In your opinion, in today's society, should there be some allotment of some place where alcohol and cigarettes are determined to be in the food basket?

Miss Dietrich: I guess I am speaking now from my religious vocation on that. I would say there would have to be a lot of study done on that. You are talking about where people on the welfare system would be going and purchasing alcohol and tobacco products?

Mr McLean: I am talking about the public moneys chasing it.

Miss Dietrich: I honestly feel it is not up to me to determine how a person spends his money.

The Chair: On to the government party.

Mr Martin: Good morning. It is nice to see you here. Not so long ago the Transitions report, which you referred to in your report, came out. Everybody across the country, across the spectrum, supported that. We came out with Back on Track, which was to take the Transitions recommendations which the Liberal government did not have the courage to implement and put them back on track. We are not getting the same kind of support. We are committing as much money as we would like to. We are doing $250 million rather than the $450 million that we know is needed, yet we seem to be getting a backlash from the community out there against putting that kind of money into social assistance programs. Any idea why that is happening?

Miss Dietrich: I have no idea why it is happening, but I do know that there seems to be a undercurrent of a poor attitude that people are taking. It is not just towards government; we find it in church, we find it in volunteer groups. Maybe it is because we are in this recession, I am not sure, but it seems that people are saying, "This is mine; I am not going to share it with anybody." It seems to be running through everything right now, and I am not sure how to go about changing it.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for your presentation. We are running short of time. Thank you for attending our committee.

SAULT STE MARIE HEALTH CARE INSTITUTIONS

The Chair: The next group is Health Horizons, with Ross Reilly presenting, I believe. Would you come forward, please. Mr Reilly, take a seat, and your guests also. Would you identify yourselves for Hansard.

Mr Reilly: My name is Ross Reilly, and I am representing the Sault Ste Marie health care institutions. On my left is John Bennett, who is the chairman of the board of the Plummer Memorial Public Hospital, and on my right is Ray Yukich, who is the chairman of the board of the Group Health Centre. We also expect Dr Michael Nanne, who is, I believe, vice-chairman of the general hospital here, but he is tied up performing one of his usual functions, which happens at this time of the day. Whether he will make it or not, we do not know. May I begin, Mr Chairman?

The Chair: Yes, you can begin. You have a total of half an hour. Try to leave some time at the end of your presentation so the three parties can ask questions on your brief.

Mr Reilly: Right. Also, as backup, I might mention that we have Art Osborne from the Group Health Centre and Michael Marchbank from the Plummer.

Mr Chairman, on behalf of the General Hospital, the Group Health Centre and the Plummer Memorial Public Hospital, I would like to thank the all-party committee for agreeing to hear our presentation on health care and the recent budget. First, I would like to give you a sense of what health care in Sault Ste Marie means in economic terms.

The three health care institutions provide approximately 2,400 full-time and part-time jobs. These jobs are generally quite secure, non-cyclical in nature, and are paid at rates and receive benefits through a negotiated process in keeping with provincial standards. In addition, the jobs cover the spectrum from unskilled to highly skilled positions. It is fair to say that health care is a major engine of economic activity in our community.

The three organizations are working on collaborating to form one system of care in our community. While we do that, with the financial assistance of the city of Sault Ste Marie and funds designated for health care development, we need help, co-operation and funding from the ministry. The three institutions and the city of Sault Ste Marie are naturally concerned about any changes in funding which not only affect the ability of our health care system to serve our patients but also diminish its economic importance to the community, especially considering Sault Ste Marie's current difficult times.

The Ontario budget gave an overall increase of over 9% to health care; however, hospital base budgets received only a 6% increase. I am sure the Ontario Hospital Association has pointed out to you that this is not enough money for the system and, therefore, this increase will result in some decrease in patient care, either in quality or quantity.

I do not want to spend too much time covering ground that I am sure the committee and the Ministry of Health have heard from the OHA. I would now like to cover ground more specific to the institutions in Sault Ste Marie. There are major differences between Sault Ste Marie health care institutions and southern Ontario health care institutions.

Sault Ste Marie health care institutions are also feeling the results of a downsized major industry. While on the surface it may appear that the downsizing of Algoma Steel may not directly affect health care, it certainly does have an effect on hospital budgets. The effects are both short-term and long-term. I will deal with the short-term effects first.

Increase in benefits costs: When the strike and downsizing at Algoma occurred, a significant number of employees switched their benefit packages to the health care institutions. This has resulted in a dramatic increase in the benefit costs for each institution.

Reduction in revenues: Again, due to the strike and downsizing at Algoma Steel, there has been a significant reduction in other revenue sources for the institutions. Employees at Algoma Steel and other related companies often have semiprivate and private coverage. When an employee loses his or her job, their coverage ceases. This loss of coverage results in less people occupying semiprivate and private rooms, therefore reducing revenue to the hospitals. These increased costs and reduced revenues are fixed and they must be compensated for within the budget by reducing services, forcing some very tough choices.

High staff training costs: With Sault Ste Marie located far from major training centres, the cost of staff training is very expensive. Travel, accommodation and other expenses make it as much as twice as expensive for anyone here to attend southern Ontario sessions, compared to people living in those centres. With the changes in health care occurring so rapidly, staff training is a very important component of patient care. Without keeping professionals updated, patient care suffers.

Difficulty in recruitment: The difficulty in recruitment applies to professionals such as pharmacists and physiotherapists in health care institutions and also to physician specialists. While the government has set up programs to encourage physicians to locate in northern Ontario, there are still some serious gaps in service. Some enhancements to the current system should be examined, and we are prepared to work with the Ministry of Health to develop these.

The long-term effect deals with an aging population. As Algoma Steel downsizes, younger people will tend to move from the community, leaving a disproportionate number of older people in our community. As we all know, older people tend to require increased medical attention; therefore, the need for health care in Sault Ste Marie will not decrease at the same rate as our population.

Health care providers in Sault Ste Marie and district take great pride in the fact that 90% of those requiring health care treatment in Sault Ste Marie are provided that care right here in their own community. We would like to be able to at least keep it that way or to increase capabilities to keep patients near the support system of friends and families. Sault Ste Marie is not asking for special treatment. It is, however, asking for recognition of problems and some steps to ameliorate those problems.

The final area I would like to touch on is the difficulty with capital development for our health care institutions. While the Plummer Memorial Public Hospital was pleased to receive its capital dollars for the renal dialysis expansion, there are other needs in our community which require capital-dollar infusions while the studies go on and on. While the three institutions realize that the district health council is sponsoring a systematic review of health care in our community, improvements in health care through capital expenditures cannot continue to be delayed while the studies go on. With the age of the facilities in Sault Ste Marie, major redevelopment must take place as quickly as possible so that we can meet the changes in health care such as the move to ambulatory care.

In Sault Ste Marie, we are proud to have the Group Health Centre, the province's largest and longest-established health service organization. This HSO has provided 28 years of innovative ideas and service in this area that began with the initial investment of steelworkers and continued with the Ministry of Health as a partner. The Group Health Centre continues dialogue with the community health programs branch on matters of funding, and hopes for an early resolution. The centre's funding mechanism with the ministry needs adjustment, without which it will not be possible to continue provision of current services or to advance plans for the future.

Areas of concern have been documented and presented to the ministry. The committee is reminded of the February 1990 document Operation Critical: The Report of the Northern Democratic Task Force on Northern Health Care Issues. The Group Health Centre was mentioned several times in the report as being part of the solution. The report concludes by stating, "The members must appreciate the fact that what is needed is action, not further review and study."

One area I would like to briefly touch upon before I conclude these remarks is the area of mental health services. Sault Ste Marie and Algoma are in need of a full range of mental health service professionals. These include psychiatrists, psychologists and social workers. The three institutions would be more than willing to work with the ministry to recruit mental health professionals to our community.

In conclusion, we would like to reiterate our position that the budget provided a good increase in overall health care dollars. However, because of our special needs due to the function of geography and our pressing needs due to the city's current economic challenges, a closer working relationship with the Ministry of Health is needed to deal with needs specific to health care in Sault Ste Marie. The needs of Sault Ste Marie and Algoma are now, and we need solutions and actions now. Thank you.

Mr McLean: Have you seen any results of the report of the task force on northern health care since it was done?

Mr Yukich: Nothing specific. In so far as the Group Health Centre is concerned—as was indicated in Mr Reilly's presentation, it was mentioned three or four times—we continue to get soothing words from the Minister of Health saying: "You're doing a good job and we don't want to see you fail. Keep it up. You are doing a good job." Other than that—there are just words.

Mr McLean: What area does your district health council cover? Is it only this catchment area here? What does it cover, other than Sault Ste Marie?

Mr Reilly: Sault Ste Marie and Algoma.

Mr McLean: And Algoma, okay. Is it in phase 1 of its plan or phase 2 or phase 3? I know these just seem to go on forever. Are they making any recommendations? Have they come to any conclusion whereby they are making recommendations to the ministry that it should be proceed with rehabilitation of your hospital?

Mr Bennett: They had just received funding a short time ago for their consulting people, so basically what they are trying to put together now are some of the answers for the city and Algoma.

Mr McLean: You were talking about a major redevelopment. Did you have any commitments with regard to an addition or a new facility from the previous administration? What is the background there?

Mr Bennett: The background on the capital redevelopment of the institutions is that we had developed a central core some time back and basically did not receive approval in the final configuration of this central core between the three institutions.

Mr McLean: Do you feel you will have a computerized axial tomography scanner here?

Mr Bennett: Yes.

Mr McLean: Do you feel that the district health council is going to be an improvement or a detriment to you as far as dealing with the ministry is concerned? Last week in committee I know we dealt with two different district health councils in the province. The indications I felt we got from these district health councils were that some of the hospitals are bypassing the district health council in going for approvals.

Mr Bennett: Perhaps I could answer that by saying we are in the process of attempting to rather speed up the process, the three institutions forming a corporate body to deal with. We have asked for funding from the municipality to conduct our own process, to form a group composed of the three institutions to perhaps put together the structure; the three institutions themselves could present to the district in a co-ordinated way; that as the district health process moves along, at some stage within their process they would be able to say they have a one-voice, one-body approach that is together for the three institutions to work together.

Mr McLean: The final question is, do you have a major fund-raising campaign going on in Sault Ste Marie for the private sector part of it?

Mr Bennett: No, we do not.

Mr Reilly: But I guess it is fair to say that we generally always have. Between the three institutions we are always raising funds.

Mr Yukich: Yes, that is right.

Mr McLean: But you have no set target. You have an addition for $50 million and you are trying to raise $10 million.

Mr Bennett: At present we have an ongoing campaign to raise money for the renal dialysis process. The capital expenditure from the ministry has been approved but we have not reached our local target and are still in that process.

Mr Martin: It is nice to see you this morning. It does not surprise me to see you here. I do not think there is another group in the city that calls me as often and lobbies as hard as you do on behalf of the people of the community and Algoma around the question of health care. I want you to know I certainly appreciate that and consider you a partner as I bring your concerns to the government.

You realize, as I do, that the health budget of the province is humongous and growing in leaps and bounds as time goes on. It is a real challenge for us to try to bring it under some degree of control and certainly we need assistance in that. In going into deficit with the last budget, we are not happy to have to do that. Perhaps contrary to popular belief, we are not advocates of deficits, but if we have to in order to serve people, we will.

In this community there are some parallel studies going on to try to rationalize the delivery of health service. Certainly the group you represent today, Health Horizons, is probably one of the most interesting and exciting for us who have lived here and watched the three institutions at one time compete with each other and now eventually get to a point where you are sitting down around the same table wanting to move forward; and the district health council's effort to look at health in the broadest sense, and in that way maybe bring in some things that would assist the government in bringing down the amounts of dollars that need to be put into delivering health and perhaps doing it in more innovative and creative ways. Could you speak a little about that and how we as a government might facilitate the rationalization of services in a way that would be beneficial, most of all to the people who live here?

Mr Reilly: You could say it is something in this community that has been attempted probably for at least a decade, I would think. It is a significant and major step. The three institutions, that have different philosophies and different backgrounds, have taken the position of sitting down together and agreeing to develop one institution and studying the possibility of putting our institutions together in some form. What format that will take we do not know, but it is really a big move.

I do not think it is a move that has been taken within the province, to the best of my knowledge, certainly not where it involves a public hospital, a Catholic hospital and health service organization such as the Group Health Centre. I do not believe that has ever been done in this province. It is a very innovative step and it is going to require a lot of hard work. I think it is going to yield a much more efficient form of health care in the community and the community is going to benefit mightily from it.

We are treading into unknown waters, really. Where we will end up is pure speculation at this point. I think the significant thing is that we are working on it and the city itself has committed funds to enable us to proceed along this route. It is a big step in this province and one which the province will watch very closely.

Mr B. Ward: Our government made a commitment during these tough times to attempt to maintain our health services, our health programs as well as our social programs, and we have been criticized for that by some groups. If we had made a decision to cut our health programs, where instead of a 6% increase as the Ontario Hospital Association got it was a 15% cut, can you give us some examples of what that impact would have on the health care system for the people of Sault Ste Marie? I recognize this is hypothetical but you must know some areas that would be forced to be closed or cut.

Mr Bennett: I think it would be safe to say that even at the moment, with the present budget and the present allocation of the 6% to the institutions within our city—and I do not think that is any surprise to anybody—all three institutions are looking at financial difficulties with that 6%. If it had been a 15% reduction, across the board, totally, a range of services would have to have been reduced because we may even be in that position now with the increase.

Mr Mahoney: I am delighted to see a presentation on health care that looks at health care, to quote from your presentation, as “a major engine of economic activity in our community.” I think that is a very healthy, appropriate way of looking at the provision of services.

For your interest, I should tell you that my dad, Bill Mahoney, was very actively involved in the development of the health centre along with Johnny Barker and everyone in the steelworkers. That health centre is really a model that unfortunately has not been expanded by any government and should be, particularly as it was built without the government. It was built by the steelworkers and has since forged a partnership. I have been attempting to convince the Chinguacousy health services board in my part of the world to adopt that health centre model.

I should also tell you that I am delighted to see the three service providers working together. I do not know that that has always been the case in Sault Ste Marie. I have heard some interesting stories of some differences over the years.

The perception of the health care services in the Sault would obviously not stand scrutiny with your presentation this morning. The perception is two major hospitals, the finest Group Health Centre probably in Canada, good service provision for 78,000 people working well together, etc. I am somewhat disappointed to learn that level of service would appear to be somewhat superficial. Would you have any comments on that?

Mr Reilly: I do not think the level of service is at all superficial. The level of service in this community is really of a very high calibre. The three institutions have had valries in the past; that is quite true. But I think we are growing out of that. For instance, the Group Health Centre right now is trying to get funding, backed by the two hospitals, to look at the possibility of forming a comprehensive health organization. They are not having much success with that, but of course anybody is not having much success with funding these days. There is just not enough money to go around and we all recognize the facts. That is just a fact of life in our changing society.

I think we are taking some positive steps here and we have an excellent care system in this community which has a foundation of improving even more.

Mr Mahoney: I am delighted to hear that. I was under that impression, but I was concerned by some of the remarks that there might have been some slippage. One of the things we are investigating, aside from provision of health services, of course, on an ongoing basis, is the impact of this budget on the economy in general.

One of my grave concerns in this whole process is very clearly the deficit financing plan of the NDP government shows an increase in the level of the debt from $20 billion to at least $76 billion by the end of their term in office. On a per capita basis that is approximating the general deficit and would seem to me to leave future governments with severe restrictions in their ability to finance new programs or expand existing programs.

Your cost of debt service could increase to as high as 20 cents on the dollar from the nine cents it was when the party was in power, which will also restrict the ability to move, and flexibility for governments, whether it is for capital services or ongoing operational expansion or any level of service.

Do you share any of those concerns about deficit financing, about simply taking the deficit, which could be likened to an overdraft or a line of credit, and plowing it on to the debt, which could be likened to the mortgage on the province, and doing that successively each year so could wind up with $76 billion? And that is assuming the revenue projections are not somewhat larger than they would appear in reality. My own personal feeling is that it will be $80 billion, $85 billion, maybe even $90 billion of debt. How are we going to fund services if all of our dollars are going to service debt?

Mr Reilly: That is a pretty tough one. Yes, I suppose everybody is concerned about deficit. We have lived in this country with a federal deficit for decades. I think of Japan. They have been deficit financing for decades. You cannot live with deficits. It may not be the best way to go. I suppose everybody has concerns. Everybody would like to run a surplus. But if you have the fundamental structure underneath to recover from deficit financing, then we have a fundamentally healthy province. If we keep ourselves economically healthy, then we can pull out of a deficit situation.

Here in Sault Ste Marie we certainly have to look at that type of situation, probably more than other areas in the country. We are taking steps to try to stave off what could be disasters brought about by deficit financing. But I am optimistic; we will turn this community around. We will ing for some government help to do that, mind you. We want you all to recognize that fact. We will be visiting you.

Mr McLean: I have a couple of short questions. There is a hospital in Ontario that has started a practice where, when they give patients pills in the hospital, they charge them for those pills. Do you see that as an issue for some of the health care centres recouping some of their costs for supplying those services they would normally go to the drugstore and pay for? Now they are paying for them when they are coming out of the hospital.

Mr Bennett: I have noticed, Mr McLean, that there has been continual dialogue within health care and within government at all levels. I guess the importance put to that kind of fee, for anything perhaps, is not so much what can be recouped financially but to discourage very heavy involvement of patients in that sort of thing. I think there seems to be a real dichotomy throughout the political scene and certainly throughout the health care scene as to whether or not—

The Chair: Excuse me. Time has run out. Thank you, gentlemen, for your presentation before this committee. We will have a good day.

CANADIAN UNION OF PUBLIC EMPLOYEES—ONTARIO DIVISION

The Chair: The next group is CUPE. Would you come forward, and when you are seated would you identify yourselves for Hansard. The presentation will be for one half-hour. Just leave enough time at the end of your presentation, if you can, for questions from the three parties; it will be split equally among the three parties for questions and answers.

Mrs Rickaby: Good morning. I am Jean Rickaby, CUPE Ontario vice-president. On my left is Richard Balnis, the CUPE national research officer, and seated on my right is Brian Blakeley, the CUPE Ontario political action officer. We have quite a lengthy document, which is before you, and we shall try to summarize it for you.

The Ontario division of the Canadian Union of Public Employees welcomes this opportunity to offer our comments on the budget.

With over 400,000 members, CUPE is the largest labour union in Canada. The Ontario division of CUPE represents more than 151,000 members employed in both the public and private sectors in all regions of Ontario. CUPE Ontario members work in a wide range of settings, including municipalities, hospitals, public utilities, Ontario Hydro, school boards, rest and retirement homes, nursing homes, homes for the aged, social service agencies, the Ontario Housing Corporation, the Workers' Compensation Board, and universities.

The current recession is, without question, the worst to have hit Ontario since the Great Depression. Job losses in the province have totalled 214,000 in the first year of this recession, compared to 89,000 in the first year of the 1981-82 recession. Many of these jobs are gone for ever. In 1990, 59% of reported permanent layoffs were due to partial or complete plant closures. In the first five months of this year, 59% were due to partial or complete plant closures.

By contrast, in 1982 only 24% of permanent layoffs were due to shutdowns; the remainder were the result of companies temporarily reducing the number of their employees.

The loss of jobs and the resulting rise in the unemployment rate has brought about an unprecedented, in recent memory, increase in the level of social assistance cases in the province. Between May 1990 and May of this year the social assistance case load has increased by more than 70% in the province.

The current economic crisis facing Ontario represents the coming of age of several major ideals of the neoconservative political economy that took hold of this province in 1975. This policy of fiscal restraint was ostensibly designed to reduce inflationary pressures and deliberately allow the private sector room to expand. It emphasized the size of the political deficit as the most pressing policy matter.

In November of 1975, release of the Report of the Special Program Review, the McKeough-Henderson report, introduced the notions of too much and too big into the political rhetoric of the Tory and Liberal governments of Ontario and Canada. This rhetoric is echoed in 1991 by those who wrongly claim that the Ontario government's 1991 budget produces a deficit that is too big and contains too much government spending.

The publication of the McKeough-Henderson report marked Canada's first formal adoption of the doctrine of fiscal restraint in a systematic fashion. It is therefore important to understand the major features of this ideological commitment and how it has shaped the economic policy choices of past Ontario governments.

The theory of fiscal restraint holds that it is the excessive burden of government which has weighed down the economy and made it unable to function efficiently. Governments supposedly have established a whole range of non-productive social services which the economy can no longer afford. As a result, according to this logic, the share of the economy accounted for by the government must be cut to provide room for private sector expansion. The solution is felt to lie with major cutbacks in government spending.

The theory also holds that many services currently provided by the public sector should be given over to the private sector on the assumption that there will be a major improvement in provincial economic performance if the free trade market is given enough scope to operate.

The record of the Mulroney Tory government in Ottawa clearly illustrates the bankruptcy and false promises of the policy of fiscal restraint. As the last few years have shown us, cutbacks in public services do not result in a smaller tax burden on the population. Taxation on working people has been increased to allow the government to finance the free-enterprise pipe dreams of its corporate supporters.

Mr Balnis: To continue on: The principles of fiscal restraint have influenced relations between Ontario and the federal government in a dramatic fashion. In particular, past Ontario governments have long advocated fiscal disentanglement and the end to conditional cost-shared financing arrangements with the federal government for health, post-secondary education and social services. Today, in many respects, it appears that Ontario has finally been granted its wish.

As a result of the federal government cutbacks, Ontario over the next five years will experience a funding shortfall of $11.2 billion for established programs financing. It now appears that the federal Mulroney government has launched the same attack on the Canada assistance plan, or CAP, the only remaining open-ended cost-shared social program in Canada.

The Mulroney government's Bill C-69 introduced a 5% per year limit on the increases in CAP for two years for Ontario. Ontario stands to lose $3.9 billion. As a result of these changes, CAP will no longer be a guaranteed flexible source of money to help provinces adjust in times of high unemployment, poverty and homelessness caused in this most recent recession. In fact, Ontario's planned welfare reform has been seriously impeded by these cuts to CAP.

In the face of this double bind of the fiscal squeeze by the federal government and the economic squeeze of the current recession, the worst since the Great Depression, as we have noted, the NDP government of Ontario introduced its first provincial budget. This budget, in our view, represents the first denunciation of the principles of the neoconservative philosophy of fiscal restraint by a provincial government in Ontario since the introduction of the McKeough-Henderson report and its myths in 1975.

In putting the wellbeing of people before the deficit, the NDP government moved in the opposite direction from the federal and provincial Tories. Mulroney's answer has been to raise taxes for working Ontarians and cut services to those in need and thereby make the recession worse.

As you can see on pages 12, 13 and 14 of our brief, we indicate the measures the Ontario government has taken to fight the recession. In our view—on page 15 of our brief—this budget clearly states the intention of the government of Ontario to fight the recession head-on. The willingness of the government to accept the $9.7-billion deficit resulting from this budget is evidence of its courage and conviction to protect the interests of working people and the majority of Ontario's citizens in a time of economic hardship.

Contrary to the hysteria generated by the corporate media, the reality of the situation is that the projected Ontario deficit of $9.7 billion is moderate if considered from the perspective of recent Conservative deficits from other Canadian jurisdictions.

On page 16 of our submission we provide that comparison. In our view, the Ontario deficit, to emphasize, represents the rejection of the fundamental principles of the theory of fiscal restraint by the government of the largest province in Canada to meet the needs of the bulk of the province's population, something, in our view, that has been deliberately ignored since at least 1975.

We have found support in our position from groups such as the Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives and even the Conference Board of Canada, and we provide that evidence for you on page 17 of our submission.

CUPE Ontario is also pleased to note that the budget did not introduce any overt forms of public sector wage control, unlike the federal government, which is using its cuts in federal transfers. Budget announcements in Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia indicate their desire for wage controls. Fortunately the Ontario government did not follow that course of action. In fact, the budget of the Ontario government contained a much different message. In response to the Treasurer's challenge we are taking this opportunity to suggest ways to meet the challenges identified in the budget.

While the legacy of fiscal restraint is strong, the need to challenge this approach has never been greater. The Ontario government's 1991 budget, in our view, is a bold and positive step in the right direction. Admittedly, Ontario's independent capacity to plan the economy of the province, to seek full employment and to seek the development of an integrated manufacturing economy able to supply the domestic market has been jeopardized by the Canada/US free trade agreement. It will be reduced even further by a trilateral free trade agreement including Mexico. None the less, the creation and continuance of 70,000 Ontario job opportunities by this 1991 Ontario budget stands in sharp contrast to the statistics on job creation since the free trade agreement was forced on Ontario by the Mulroney government.

In the long term, action must be taken in a number of other areas, in our view, including taxation, the role of the private sector and, perhaps most important, enhanced democracy and public accountability. It is gratifying to note that the Ontario government has already embarked on initiatives in all of these areas. We look forward to participating in the work of the government's Fair Tax Commission.

Meeting real human needs, not simply pandering to big business, must be the ultimate goal of the Ontario government's economic strategy. We must seek full employment as our primary objective rather than using mass unemployment as a way of lowering wages and weakening unions. We must seek improved public services rather than eroding already inadequate benefits and programs and must use public policies and public investment to complement our economic development.

In our view a significant first step is to win back the terrain lost to the McKeough-Henderson big lie concerning the public sector. The public sector contributes to economic development just as the private sector does. If the private sector cannot create permanent decently paying jobs to satisfy the pressing needs of Ontarians, we must be prepared to use the public sector as a catalyst for the economic development of this province.

The problem is not that we have too much public spending, but rather we do not have enough. Moreover, much of the public spending we do have is of the wrong kind, that is, its purpose is purely to bolster business development in the private sector. An economic policy that gives priority to the social, economic and human needs of ordinary Ontarians is what is required. The goal of establishing a more favourable investment climate at the expense of the job security and living standards of our citizens must be reversed.

Our strategy has two aspects. The first strategy is a commitment to public investment: the expansion of socially necessary public services. On pages 28 and 29 of mission we provide a listing of measures to improve public sector programs and services.

Unfortunately, adequate funding and a political commitment to the public sector, while necessary, are not sufficient themselves to produce the long-term transformation and renewal of the Ontario public sector that is so urgently needed. Ontario's public sector has been both underfunded and unplanned. Moreover, no effective mechanism exists to complement long-term and democratic planning.

The real solution to the crisis facing Ontario's public sector that has existed since 1975 lies beyond the simple deployment of existing and new resources. CUPE's alternative strategy seeks democratic control of economic development to promote the objectives and needs of ordinary people. We need much more involvement in the economic planning and decision-making process, which in turn will require the creation of new methods of public input. Citizen participation in economic decision-making is vital both to make an alternative economic strategy work and to give it the political support necessary to succeed.

In the conclusion of our brief we talk of what could be done in the post-secondary education sector, for example, a consultative commission. We then speak on page 32 of health care, with our concerns about deinstitutionalization and decentralization. If it is proceeded in a planned and coordinated manner with full consultation we believe that success can work. In the area of social services we need adequate funding, planning, clear lines of accountability and a political commitment to the provision of a comprehensive, universally accessible social service system.

Mrs Rickaby: In conclusion, CUPE Ontario is pleased with the initiatives of the Ontario government contained in and reinforced by this budget. The government has taken a positive first step in the right direction to putting the economy of Ontario back on track. But, as we have stated, the government must do more and move to ensure that all community interests are represented in the decision-making process for the expenditure of public funds.

CUPE Ontario therefore calls for increased democratization of the public sector in Ontario. To this end, we urge the Ontario government to ensure that any agency or institution that is in receipt of public funds for its operation must be run by a governing body that is genuinely representative of the community and the clients the organization serves. These representative bodies must include representatives of their staff and their unions. Recognizing the need for community input into the operation of publicly funded organizations will ensure that these services can be best adapted to meet the social needs of the communities that they are intended to service. This process will go a long way to improving delivery of these much-needed public services during this recession and through this decade into the next century. All of which is respectfully submitted on behalf of the members of CUPE.

The Chair: Thank you. We are starting off with the government. Mr Ward.

Mr B. Ward: Thank you for your brief. You appear to have put a lot of work into it, as all groups have that have come before us, and we appreciate that. You mentioned in your brief our government's decision to fight the recession rather than fight the deficit, because we felt the recession was more important during these tough economic times to try to wrestle to the ground from an economic standpoint. Could you give some examples from your—assuming you all live in the Sault area, is that right?

Mr Balnis: Actually not. I am from our Ottawa office, and Brian is from Toronto, so it is a range.

Mr B. Ward: So I understand where you are. The anti-recession package included $700 million in capital for improving our infrastructure across Ontario. Can you give some examples or your views on whether this was effective spending, because, as I have said before, we have been criticized by groups and organizations for the deficit. People have been saying we should be cutting back, whether it is health care, whether it is social services or in fact our capital expenditures to rebuild our infrastructure. From your point of view, is it wise to spend capital dollars during tough economic times to rebuild our roads, to improve our facilities, whether it is schools, whether it is hospitals? Could you comment on that from your perspective as Ontario representatives of CUPE?

Mr Balnis: From our perspective it is sound economic strategy. We spend some time in our document talking about the estimate by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities, where Ontario's public infrastructure of roads, bridges, sewers and urban transportation facilities must be improved. Spending on maintaining social services in a recession makes eminent sense to us.

Mr B. Ward: Especially during tough times. That is when we should be putting dollars into job creation and rebuilding our infrastructure.

Mr Balnis: Precisely. I think we are also looking at a situation where Ontario since 1975 has prided itself as being the province that spends the least on social services. The McKeough-Henderson report, the report of the special committee there, has put Ontario for a decade into a bind that also must be addressed. We are not asking that you do it overnight, but in tough times you must spend on capital spending and you must also be prepared, as we suggest in our brief, to look at expanding the role of the public sector in the long term to address the damage that has been done since 1975.

Mr B. Ward: I think the gist of your brief, as we head into recovery—according to Mulroney the recession is over, but ask the unemployed and they have a different point of view. But as we look into the future, into the 1990s—and this is really a non-budgetary question—for us to be successful as a province, do you think there has to be greater co-operation, trust and partnership between organizations like CUPE and business and government, a greater dialogue and a working together? That is the direction we would like to head in as a government. Do you think that is a proper direction?

Mr Blakeley: I think that is a very appropriate direction, tying into your previous question. If you take public funds, and improve the infrastructure of the province during a time of economic downturn, when the money is not in the private sector, then you not only address the recession, you get people working. You also improve the infrastructure, the transportation systems, the community organizations that we need to take advantage of an upturn when it comes along so that we have a transportation system, we have the infrastructure to allow business to then take over and generate the involvement and the economic activity that they have always wanted to generate.

The Chair: I will have to cut you short. Mrs Sullivan.

Mrs Sullivan: Thank you. I wanted to follow up on your recommendations on page 27, that some of the recommendations of the AMO be followed and, indeed, that there be significant infrastructure investment throughout the province.

One of the things that is very clear from this budget is that long-term capital investment is not included. There is no increase in funding available for municipal sewerage, which is desperately required. There is no follow-up on the initiative of the water and sewage corporation, which would have allowed leveraging additional funding to improve the municipal sewer infrastructure. There is minimal increase in the capital transfers to universities. By example, the backlog capital requirements at the University of Toronto cannot even be met by the entire increase in the capital funding for colleges and universities.

What I do not see in this budget is long-term capital investment that will indeed solve the infrastructure problems that have been identified by municipalities, by colleges, by universities, by health care institutions, nor, as a result of the failure of addressing those infrastructure problems, is there any long-term job creation. How do you come to terms with those issues with the kind of brief that you have submitted?

Mr Balnis: You have identified exactly the source of our problems. You mentioned the backlog at the University of Toronto, which I attended a long time ago. Where did that backlog come from? Right now, this Ontario budget is under fantastic attack for spending too much, and you are expecting a government in one budget to correct, in our view, 15 years of omission, backlogs, underfunding, lack of strategy, no long-term plans.

I put the question back to you and say, why are we in the mess in the first place? As Mr Ward indicated, I think it has been a long time coming where we can be consulted to work co-operatively to look at the Ontario public sector and work to rebuild it. It is not going to happen quickly, and we will participate in that process. To be quite frank, I do not think we are going to turn around and say, "You didn't do enough in this budget." It is a first step. We will work with you to make it better.

Mrs Sullivan: One of the things that is interesting is that a large part of the deficit created here is as a result of operating deficit, not capital deficit, which would have made, in terms of long-term economic recovery, probably far more sense. You have talked about the capital needs. What is your response on that? Are you willing to accept continuing operating deficits to add to the long-term debt?

Mr Blakeley: Our response is that we see a situation where a number of policies have led us to the situation where a large number of Canadians in Ontario are in need of social assistance, are in need of work, and the government has looked at the long-term buildup of capital spending. The province, the university system, has looked at the province and seen a lot of need and has recognized, and I think properly, that the immediate need of the people takes priority over a long-term need to increase the deficit. At this moment, for capital funding. I think the initiative of the budget address the long term.

Mr McLean: Your brief is very comprehensive and very well done. It expresses concerns that you have relayed very thoroughly, and I have no questions for clarification.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chair, just before the next group comes on, I understand that we have a cancellation this afternoon at 1 o'clock?

The Chair: Yes, we did.

Mr Sutherland: It has come to my attention that the social planning council has a brief that it was going to submit in written form. I was wondering, if we had a party agreement, whether they could present that at 1 o'clock in verbal form, since we have had a cancellation.

The Chair: Mr McLean, do you agree?

Mr McLean: The majority rules.

The Chair: Okay. No problem.

SAULT STE MARIE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Chair: Would the Sault Ste Marie Chamber of Commerce please come forward for a presentation. You come to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs and to the budget hearings here. You have one hour to make your presentation. In your presentation, let me know enough time at the end for questions from the three parties and you can start right now, sir. Identify who you are, Hansard, please.

Mr Lajambe: Ken Lajambe, president of the Sault Ste Marie Chamber of Commerce. It is great to be here. We did a hearing similar to this in Sudbury last week on another issue, and we had a lot of fun there, did we not, Tony?

Mr Martin: Yes, we did.

Mr Lajambe: It was a good meeting and we hope it will be as good. We appreciate the opportunity, of course, of being here. How is it broken out today? Where are the people?

Mr Martin: We are in the Sault.

Mr Lajambe: I noticed that, Tony.

We have about 600 members in our Sault chamber. We are down from some 900. I do not have to tell you what that is. A lot of things have happened in the last two years in particular in terms of Algoma Steel's problem, which we will deal with in the brief. I would like to thank you once again for allowing this opportunity to be here to talk to you about our concerns regarding the provincial budget which was released, of course, in April of this year.

I also do not think I have to go into a lot of detail about what is happening in the economic conditions in Sault Ste Marie. However, I do feel it is important to provide you with an up-to-date overview of our dire situation. Algoma Steel, of course, is our primary employer. Its future is uncertain.

est. The chamber of commerce is very hopeful that the company, its employees and shareholders will be able to restructure by the October 31 deadline and that Algoma will continue as a viable operation in our community. What this restructuring has done in essence is waiting for the other shoe to fall. Our business community is very anxious about what is going to happen and so too are our customers. Consumers based in Sault Ste Marie do not have their hands in their pockets, because they are waiting for another shoe to fall. This constant delaying has certainly put us in great jeopardy, even further than what the recession has done, just the inability to sit back and wait.

Cross-border shopping continues to increase and losses sustained as a result of this problem are staggering. A study conducted by Ernst and Young in 1990 which the chamber commissioned indicated that the Sault has lost over $140 million in income and over 1,000 jobs have been lost in the community as a direct result of cross-border shopping. There is no end in sight to this trend.

Our unemployment insurance and welfare rolls continue to put a tremendous strain on our social system. Business closures and personal bankruptcies have taken their toll on hundreds of people in our community. The few people employed now are a lot of carpenters boarding businesses.

Regarding the budget, the surtax to be levied on small businesses earning over $200,000 will affect many of our small business people. These businesses and their owners are already struggling to make a profit and this unfair tax in many cases means the difference between making money and losing money, and more important, will reduce or eliminate the ability of business owners to provide much-needed jobs for our residents and contribute to the municipal, provincial and federal tax base.

Second, of the $700 million the provincial government plans to spend on municipal improvement projects announced earlier, only $20,400,000 has been allocated to the district of Algoma, where the welfare case load has increased by over 63% and the unemployment rate is approximately 15%. The $20,400,000 represents a mere 3% of the total anti-recession fund.

Third, the 1991 budget does nothing to assist Sault Ste Marie as a border community. In fact, it goes a long way to reducing our ability to compete. The most pervasive economic challenge for all businesses in the 1990s is that inability to compete.

The increase in gasoline taxes, which was a little surprising in the last budget, will have a further devastating effect on this community. We tie that to the Ernst and Young study commissioned by the chamber, where it concluded that the primary reason that Sault Ste Marie residents crossed the border to Sault Ste Marie, Michigan, was to purchase gasoline. That is still in fact an absolute. They also purchase significant volumes of other consumer goods, including groceries, alcohol and cigarettes, all products, except groceries, which are subject to considerable taxes.

With gas taxes predicted to rise 30% over the next six months and taxes on alcohol and tobacco at a record high level, not only is the Ontario government encouraging Sault Ste Marie and Ontario residents to shop across the border, it is also sending a clear message to American tourists, Sault Ste Marie's primary visitor drawing area, that Ontario is too expensive to visit.

Fourth, the Ontario government has failed to provide much-needed funding for the four-laning of the Trans-Canada Highway throughout northern Ontario. This road-way is a disgrace and has been compared to a cow path in certain areas. When we are struggling to compete, wanting to attract visitors to the north and eager to move products throughout the province, this highway is an integral link to existing and potential new markets which the north must capitalize on for our survival.

It is not good enough to say in terms of the highway that there is not enough traffic to warrant it. I think it is the chicken and the egg. If we had highway that could support additional traffic, we would probably in all likelihood very quickly realize the market that would bring to Sault Ste Marie. Without a first-class highway transportation system, we are at an extreme disadvantage with our southern Ontario and US counterparts.

Fifth, there have been no specific program announcements to deal with the loss of resource and manufacturing jobs in northern Ontario. This province has for decades benefited greatly by the varied natural resources and tremendous talents provided by northern Ontario residents, with very little capital reinvested in the north. The previous government made a commitment to decentralization of the public service and the Sault has benefited with the relocation of the Ontario Lottery Corp and the Ontario Forest Research Institute. However, with the continuing expected loss of jobs in Sault Ste Marie, similar programs are essential to allow us to properly diversify our collapsing economy.

Finally, in the state of Michigan, retail stores are open seven days a week and in Sault, Michigan, some stores are open 24 hours a day, seven days a week. If the NDP government prohibits Sunday shopping in Sault Ste Marie, Ontario, we will be hurt in two ways: First, American tourists will not stay in Sault, Ontario, where they cannot shop during half of the weekend; second, residents from small communities in the district of Algoma who come to the Sault to visit on a weekend would certainly drive to Michigan to shop, where the stores are always open and waiting for their business. This proposed bill, coupled with the devastating impact of the 1991 budget, will put the final nail in the coffin for Sault Ste Marie.

As president of the Sault Ste Marie Chamber of Commerce, I am frighteningly aware of the growing number of business people who are giving up the struggle or are trying to sell a business no one wants to buy. They feel it is hopeless to try and ride out the recession, because even if they are able to survive the recession, they will surely not survive the taxes.

The NDP government has attacked the very core of business psychology, the ability to predict and to plan. We are desperately afraid because we do not know what to expect. All we know is that people who risked their life savings, and the people who work for them, are suddenly the bad guys. You cannot expect business people to take risks, to take creative leaps of faith, if they are made to feel like the enemy. Unless the provincial government puts less emphasis on the arbitrary rights of citizens and more on our responsibility to remain prosperous together, there will be no one left to pay for the NDP's regressive policies.

Thank you again for this opportunity.

Mr Kwinter: Ken, I was pretty taken with one of the things you have said, because I have felt all along that with this present government, everything is either black or white and there is no room for anything in between. I particularly want to talk about page 5, where you say, "All we know is that people who risked their life savings, and the people who work for them, are suddenly the bad guys," and that, "You cannot expect business people to take risks, to take creative leaps of faith, if they are made to feel like the enemy."

In the presentation that was just made before us, and I unfortunately did not have time to question the presenter, on page 5, in the very last paragraph, it says, "Instead, as public services are reduced, taxation on working people has been increased to allow the government to finance the 'free-enterprise pipe dreams' of its corporate supporters through giveaways and tax concessions." I want to ask you, as the president of the chamber of commerce in Sault Ste Marie, do you agree with that? How do you relate that to what they are trying to do with Algoma right now?

The reason I am asking is because it is my feeling that it depends who it is who is asking. When it is the business sector, these guys are bad guys and it is corporate pipe dreams. When it is labour, then it is great: "Let's give them some money. Let's help them restructure. Let's give them tax concessions. Let's do all of these things because we have to help them." But if it is business, they are bad guys: "We don't have to help them. We shouldn't be giving them anything." What do you feel about that?

Mr Lajambe: If I had to say, I do not think the business community really is on the New Democratic Party's agenda. I think we are there, but I just do not know where the hell we are at. I guess it is criticism of the system, but I can only relate to feelings. I cannot relate statistics that are going to tell you what is right or what is wrong with the presentation prior to my own presentation, except that in Algoma Steel's case the restructuring, to a large degree governmentally, has put the lid on spending in Sault Ste Marie because we do not know what is happening next. The reason we do not know what is happening next is that the union has come up with a plan, and it is all being regurgitated through the system and some day they are going to make a decision, the same as the federal government did not make the decision on the other $10-million financing which would have bridged this a lot quicker and got things off faster. So that kind of interference in the process, without the due process of helping, is hurting.

In the business community, in my view, the feelings on this are that we have not had the consultant process which was promised at the outset by Bob Rae. We have not been consulted on any of the legislation to date. It is always after the fact, that I know of, and I am sure there have been some consultations during the process.

In any event, the final result of all the proposed legislation that is coming from this government contains an adversarial component. That is the thing I have a hard time with, and we are going through it again now with Sunday shopping, which puts us in a contentious position, where the union has not commented on, with the proposed legislation on the minimum wage. It is all great, but it is going to drive an absolute, horrendous nail through this business community. These are things that have not come to pass but they are certainly coming to the fore.

Where we stand as a business community related to the activities of this government with the labour community remains to be seen. I have a hard time with it personally and as president of the chamber I speak for the business community that have indicated their concerns over where we are going with this government. We have four years of this yet. We are not content that we are on the same damn wavelenght. I do not think that is an accident at times.

If we are not consulted as a business community, we are not going to make it as a province. You and I, as business community and the government, are going to be left in a hell of a position in four and a half years. Something happens to the New Democratic government in four years, what are we going to be left with? It is not a joint socialist movement. It needs to be considered something that everybody wants. Damn it, we cannot continue to be the enemy. When we see our members, we usually see them on some picket line in a lot of cases, we do not all due respect. We saw the Premier when he was chained to a tree or a bulldozer at Temagami where he was protesting. This is against business.

How the hell do you change overnight? We need to have partners and we are not. We are the enemy. I do not know where the hell they think the jobs are going to come from. They have to come from the business sector. There is no other place to get them. Where do we get money to support your programs? From the business sector. Where the hell else do you get it? At some point in time, we have to get together. I am concerned we have not done it, and that is why we are here. It is after the fact.

Consultation today is not going to change Floyd's budget. Conciliation or consultation last week is not going to change Sunday shopping. It is in the process, but it is not going to change a hell of a lot unless this means something. The meeting has to mean something to you as much as it means to me, and if it does not, we are wasting a hell of a lot of time here.

The members of the opposition in the Ontario government are doing the best they can, I am sure, to reflect the views of the business people, but I do not think they are falling on fertile ground. I sometimes think decisions already made that are not in the best interests of the business community. If we cannot do this together, I tell you, we will never do it apart, because there will always be that adversarial component which drives people apart and just cannot make for good relationships.

"Algoma is going to be restructured into a position where it is going to make it worth while. If this works, it will be a model for this province and probably for this country, and it can happen." That optimism, to me, is far too optimistic. I do not think we will see that kind of large facility, the we make this work, it will mean that business and the on and the labour people can work together.” This is what I see as the downfall of the system today. We are all human beings. We are all dressed the same. We are all the same in underwear. We have different principles, we have to get it together. We are not the enemy. We are the people who make things happen in this province. We create the jobs. We want to be innovative and go out there with the capital we earn and do some more things, but everybody is hanging by a God-damned thread. There is a happy businessman in this community that I know who can say he has been a full partner in the affairs of government.

I do not apologize for the things I am saying about how the system is. They are not statistically provable, but the question is asked. That is how I feel as an individual. That is how I think my business community feels. I am hoping this government will take some credence from the things I am saying today, not individually but collectively, for my part, and make a difference. We have to make a difference and we want the difference to be something we can look back on and say that this government did a hell of a good job in the final analysis.

The Chair: You have half a minute, Mr Kwinter.

Mr Lajambe: I guess I used up all the time. I have feelings from the heart that mean a lot to me, and I am hoping that in talking to people they mean the same to them.

Mr Kwinter: I want to thank you. It really indicates that you are speaking from the heart and I think it is important.

How do you see the cross-border shopping resolving itself?

Mr Lajambe: Is this okay?

The Chair: You can go ahead. You have about 15 seconds. Maybe Mr McLean can ask that question.

Mr Lajambe: We had a meeting in Toronto yesterday with the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology and it was very positive. We appreciated that very much. The gasoline taxes still did it.

Mr McLean: Is the Sault open now on Sundays for shopping? What effect do you think the legislation with regard to a common pause day will have on the Sault?

Mr Lajambe: It will be terrible for us. We have proven that there is new money being spent on Sundays, Sunday shopping, by very measurable proportions. If there is a common pause day—I think in a city like Sault Ste Marie, where we have shift workers and they are off every single day of the week, any day is a pause day the day they are off. In Sudbury they have chosen not to have Sunday shopping. I do not know what the clergy think here. I do not know who was the catalyst or what group promoted a re-look at Sunday shopping. If there was a common pause day in Sault Ste Marie and it was on a Sunday, it is not a good day for Sault Ste Marie.

Mr McLean: We had a presentation previously from the UPE and it was not mentioned. Are they in favour of Sunday shopping or not?

Mr Lajambe: I brought it up in Sudbury at this discussion and the union in this city had not been heard from one way or the other. I see reason for that, because it is good. There is more employment—it is proven—and I do not think any union in its right mind would take issue with that.

Mr McLean: In the public hearings we have had in Toronto, very clearly the unions that have appeared there are very definitely opposed to it.

Mr Lajambe: Sunday shopping?

Mr McLean: That is right. They want a common pause day. Nobody has determined for me what a common pause day is, whether it is going to be Saturday, Sunday or Monday.

Mr Lajambe: It is the day you have off, to me, at the plant. Sudbury is a shift-worker city. Sault Ste Marie is a shift-worker city in the main, at least it was. There was no presentation in Sudbury from a labour group that I know of. As far as I am concerned, the common pause day is the day you have off. The religious groups were initially not in favour of it, and we have never heard a thing since we started Sunday shopping. Probably it is a model for the province.

Mr McLean: Gas tax is an issue that many people have had to come to grips with in the north. However, they got the same increase as everybody else got, 1.7 cents twice for the year. We had a brief yesterday supporting the policy of increased gas prices so that they would have fewer big cars on the road, the gas guzzler tax; they support that. I am concerned with regard to the tourism and trucking business in the north. How are they going to survive with an increase in the price of fuel from a government that had indicated it wanted to level the price across the province?

Mr Lajambe: We have a major problem, as you know. I do not know where your hearing was yesterday, but if it had been in the Sault, there would have been a lot more people out in the hall here than there were today in terms of gas and fuel, if that was the issue to be discussed. The truckers did a big job in Toronto on their thoughts about fuel prices. As a border city, in our business community our gas stations are in serious trouble. They are selling $5 bits of gas to get people across the river. In the Niagara Peninsula, at a meeting yesterday, they said all they are selling is $2 worth. It is tough. It is tough on tourism. It is not only tough on local merchants; it is tough on getting tourists here, which percolates down to the tourism business. It is a disaster.

With one stroke of the pen, Shelley Wark-Martyn indicated at one of the meetings a couple of months ago that this government may look at a shift of taxes to accommodate less tax on gas. Gas to us is a very precipitous thing and it triggers a whole pile of things. Number one, it takes you across the river and you can be there in five minutes; not coming any more but going. Once you are there: “What the hell, let’s go out for supper. Let’s go up to the grocery store. Let’s get some milk.” Remember, we have been cross-border shopping since day one here. It is not new, but the extent of it is terrible. We have a lot of people coming here every day. I cannot get into the whole cross-border shopping thing because it is not part of this.

Mr McLean: Has tourism in the Sault increased over the past year or gone down?

Mr Lajambe: It is down considerably. It is down 30% this year.

Mr McLean: I heard it was up 21%.

Mr Lajambe: The lock tour traffic is down 30% this year over this time last year.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you very much, Mr Lajambe, both for a passionate and comprehensive brief and responses to some very interesting questions. I always enjoy the dialogue with the chambers across the province.

In listening to your comments about Algoma, I got mixed messages. On the one hand, you were concerned that business is not on the NDP agenda, then there were some negative feelings about our participation with Algoma and then I think you ended the comments with the hope that if it does work, it could be a model for the province. I suspect in terms of co-operation and wanting to work together, we are probably singing from the same hymn book. If we could lower the volume between us—I place equal blame in terms of why we are at this stage—I think we could close that gap and perhaps work together on more issues.

I must say that the feeling among most of us is that in the Algoma situation, we have played as positive a role as anyone could expect a provincial government to play. We responded immediately. Tony Martin, the member here, responded immediately to the issues as they were breaking. The Premier has been involved, as have the appropriate ministers. It has been our perception that we have been doing everything we can to try to bring some kind of resolve to that. However, I will leave that there.

I would like to move to a question. I found it interesting that you talked about the anti-recession program of the provincial government and stated that the Sault got $20 million and that was not enough. I can appreciate that every community feels that way in one regard or another. The interesting thing is that in addition, to that concern, you expressed concern that there still was not funding for the four-laning of the highway. Nothing I saw here comes close to making the argument about or against the deficits that we have heard from virtually all other chambers of commerce and what I thought was the provincial position of the chambers of commerce, that they were opposed to that and that sacrifices should be made.

I have two questions for you. The first would be, is your position the same as your sister chambers across the province or do you have a different viewpoint about deficit spending and kickstarting the economy?

Mr Lajambe: We did discuss the budget deficit at great length immediately following the budget, when of course no one had a lot of information except those who were privy to it earlier, but I think the position at the moment is that inasmuch as deficit budgeting is now in place, with this government, then all we have to talk about is what can we do about it. Whether it was a good thing or not is now irrelevant. I think it has been said by Conrad Black and others that it was not a good thing to do. I am not a rocket-scientist financier and I do not intend to discuss the financial logistics of it other than to say that in Tom Corcoran's assessment of it for the Ontario chamber, the deficit budget was a mistake and that has to be proved, disproven over time. I cannot comment for all the other chambers. Tom's position was it was wrong.

Mr Christopherson: I can appreciate that. Thank you very much. I really do appreciate your forthright answer.

The second part of my question would be more specific. It will make you a little more comfortable by talking about the Sault situation. Of the approximately $20 million that is coming into the Sault, about $640,000 is going to the YMCA for expansion of child care there. Local road construction and maintenance is $500,000, and upgrading the E-wing of Sault College is another $1.4 million. Those kinds of expenditures are consistent with our belief that we need to invest in our infrastructure because we are going to survive as an economy if we can compete in high value added areas.

I would like to ask you if you agree that this is the kind of spending that should take place and the kind of investment we should be making in our future?

Mr Lajambe: I have no problem at all with what that money went locally. I just have a problem with what the rest of it is.

Mr Jamison: I find your presentation interesting and certainly equate to where the community is. I came out of basic steel myself and worked there 20 years and I can only imagine what this community is going through at this point.

Because we are talking about expenditures and I would like to carry on from where Mr Christopherson left off, could you put into perspective what things would have been for this community if—for example, there is a strong relationship to transfer payments—I guess we all talk about that—from one level of government to another to the municipalities. The municipalities, of course, apply a tax levy. I know the city here is under large duress because of that, but what would have happened if we had, as the federal government did to us, frozen or capped the amounts at the levels of previous years rather than offer an increase? What would have happened to Algoma? I know Algoma Steel is in arrears at this point in paying its municipal property taxes and so forth. What shape would this city be in if we had not increased the expenditures through the budget to municipalities?

Mr Lajambe: The obvious.

Mr Jamison: What would they be?

Mr Lajambe: A lot worse.

Mr Jamison: What would the effect be on this community?

Mr Lajambe: Just getting the transfer payments dealing with Algoma Steel?

Mr Jamison: Dealing with the transfer payments to Algoma Steel.

Mr Lajambe: We just have a delay in $4 million of $6 million of the taxes from Algoma and that has already resulted in a 2% discount or at least immediate budgetary decrease. All of the tentacles from city hall are dependent on that funding, including the chamber of commerce. We do not get funding, but we do get payment to operate tourism information centres. So that is the first indication

Mr Jamison: It would have had an effect on your municipal taxes, of course.

Mr Lajambe: Obviously. Immediately. No question about it.

Mr Sutherland: I want to deal with your comment about consultation and the government's agenda. There seems to be a perception—Mr Christopherson dealt with it a little bit—that this government is anti-business. Maybe Mr Christopherson's analogy is there, but you mentioned there is no consultation going on, yet at the same time I talked about yesterday you were in Toronto at a meeting with MITT regarding cross-border shopping.

We have heard about Algoma and how this government wanted to get involved in the process in terms of bringing one of the partners with the different partners in the community, whether that be labour, business, the elected representatives, because Algoma's survival and success is the best interest of everyone in the community, participation in that when the federal government has decided not to.

The Treasurer met with many business groups before the budget. He has met with many after. We have had the Canadian Federation of Independent Business before this committee which said that they were being consulted to the hilt. My concern is that there seems to be a growing sense that we are not consulting, yet we are doing lots of consulting with people.

I would like to know your comments. What do you think as consultation? Can you expect the government or the Treasurer to consult with every single chamber of commerce on every issue, or every minister to come to every single chamber of commerce? How are you defining consultation, given what has gone on here in this community?

Mr Lajambe: I would like to think that this kind of consultation we are enjoying here today would have taken place prior to the formulation of the first or second reading of a certain bill. That is what I would say is consultative. I know Tom Corcoran from the Ontario chamber is in Toronto quite regularly and I know that Gillespie from the Canadian chamber and the Canadian Federation of Independent Business also see the government.

Do not get me wrong. It is not all wrong. It is perceptually wrong. There are good things happening every day because we all have the same objective here. It is to survive and to go ahead. That is the bottom line.

I am saying that things that affect northern communities particularly cannot be fed and watered from Toronto continually. We need to know what is happening up here. What is the consultative process I am talking about. There are not too many of us up in the north. We need things differently than southern Ontario does. We are fortunate in the Sault having two members of the government, one a minister and perhaps a to-be minister one day. Federally we have a New Democrat, so this is New Democratic country to a large degree. I think, based on that, we should be seeing a hell of a lot more of a consultative process, trying to do with the problems that are unique to northern Ontario. The uniqueness of northern Ontario is not being addressed in Toronto, in my view and in the view of the northern Ontario chambers.

The Chair: Thank you very much for your presentation on behalf of the Sault Ste Marie Chamber of Commerce. This committee will take your concerns and review them.

TERRY ROSS

The Chair: Next we have Terry Ross, professor of political science at Algoma University College, Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs and the budget hearings. You have one half-hour for your presentation. At the end of your presentation the time remaining in that half-hour will be given to the three parties equally for questions on your brief.

Dr Ross: Good morning to you and thank you for the welcome. I want to clear up any misunderstanding. I am not speaking on behalf of my home university, Algoma University College, today. I think after my comments you will understand that some of the views I will be expressing may not be shared by all.

It is truly a welcome to you as members of the standing committee on finance to come to Sault Ste Marie. I think it is important for the government and for Parliament to reach out to the people. You are in a tough business these days. You are all aware that politics and politicians are held by many people to be less than a perfectly good game, that there is a great deal of cynicism about politics and the political process. It is widespread and it is very deep. I was struck by how deep that cynicism was last autumn when I was campaigning in the provincial election and knocking on doors. I have done that for over 20 years and I have never found people so angry, so upset, so disenchanted by politicians of every political stripe.

There is cynicism, and that cynicism works two ways. The people are suspicious and untrusting of the politicians. If they were not, we would not have the Reform Party making such strides and gains today. We would not have the kind of support that Glen Kealey is receiving today. You have to be aware that the people are unhappy. It is a two-way street because I think the politicians too often are transparently cynical of the people you ostensibly represent: too many broken promises, too many attitudes that you know what is good for the people. So I am happy you have come to the north. I am happy you are listening to a cross-section of groups and individuals from the north. That is important.

As I walked into the hotel this morning, a fellow sitting in a cab called out to me, an old friend of mine. He drives for Checker Cab. He has a BA degree, but he does not have a job with it in driving a cab. He asked me what I was doing and I said I was coming in to make a brief to the standing committee on finance on the Ontario budget. I said, "What do you think of the budget?" He said, "Well, it is better than the federal budget." That is really what I want to talk about, I want to compare the two a little bit and talk a little bit about budgets. I am going to be brief because I would rather have some exchange between you and myself.

Budgets are not really hot topics around the dinner table, but in the game of politics the budget is the most important and telling story there is. The budget tells us what the priorities of government are; not promises but actual dollars and cents, what is going to be spent and where, and equally telling, from whose pocket money is going to come to pay for the expenditures.

Election campaigns are never as illuminating as budgets. This spring the residents of Ontario had the budget story told to them twice, first by Michael Wilson in Ottawa and later by Floyd Laughren in Toronto. The two budgets, federal and provincial, are a study of contrasts, two distinct approaches to macroeconomic policy reflecting, in my view, significant ideological differences. One is driven by the modern guru of monetary theory, Milton Friedman; the other informed by the late Lord Keynes.

It is useful to pause here and just take a look at what the two approaches to economic policy are that we are confronted with as residents of Ontario at the moment. New classical economics, or monetarism, or supply-side economics which is how it is usually referred to, is associated almost universally with political conservatism. This school believes in the inherent stability of the private sector and a very limited role for government, what some refer to as the night watchman state. The market is sacrosanct. Left to its own, the market will regulate all economic activity. Conservative governments in Britain, the United States, Germany and Canada, and even a labour government in New Zealand—I spent a year in New Zealand a year ago and was aware of the policies of that government—all adopted or embraced in one fashion or another the doctrine of monetarism with policies of privatization, liberalizing trade, deregulation, major cutbacks in social programs and very often union bashing.

Keynesian economics is associated with the interventionist state or what some call the welfare state; others call it the positive state. Proponents of this school call into question the role of the market as a primary regulator of the economy. Because of periodic cycles in the economy, booms followed by downturns or busts, Keynes argued that the state would have to intervene to restabilize the economy, heat up the economy when needed, dampen down when required, largely through public spending and taxation.

The Liberal government of Mackenzie King was the first western government to give concrete expression to Keynes's ideas. In 1945, the Department of Finance prepared a white paper which was called Policy, Unemployment and Incomes. That set out a specific plan for a government-managed economy which remained the keystone of government economic policy until the ascension of the Conservative government in 1984. According to Peter Newman, whom we are all familiar with, Mackenzie King saw Keynes's prescription as a way of purging capitalism of its defects without having to turn to socialism.

It is interesting to think of the kind of attacks we have witnessed on the Ontario budget of this spring, and how it is following policy so out of sync with current economic theory, yet the postwar period saw almost universal adoption of those very policies the government of Ontario is following at this time.

The federal Tories, not surprisingly, are attached to the monetarist school. When you examine the two budgets, the one thing that seems to come out—I heard it this morning in the dialogue, especially with the briefs by CUPE and chamber of commerce—is the concern about the deficit. That continues to come up over and over again, that we are spending ourselves into the poorhouse.

Let's just take a look at the deficit. Quite simply a deficit is a shortfall between what a government raises during a year and what it spends. That is the simple part. We all know about that. Each one of us has to operate on our own budget, our own family income. But there is a distinction between a cyclical deficit which economists refer to as a cyclical deficit and one which is a structural deficit.

A cyclical deficit is that part of the shortfall caused by variations in expenditures and taxes related to the state of the economy. A structural deficit, or what is often referred to as a cyclical-adjusted deficit, is the shortfall that would have occurred if the level of economic activity had been normal; that is, if the fluctuations in the business cycle had been ironed out.

This distinction is crucial for two reasons. The cyclical-adjusted deficit provides the correct measure of government's discretionary fiscal policy. Weaker-than-normal economic circumstances cause lower tax revenues and higher claims on public spending, through such statutory income maintenance programs as unemployment insurance and welfare.

Second, the cyclical-adjusted deficit is much smaller than the overall deficit. The large deficits that become a chronic feature of public finance in Canada are very largely due to weak economic conditions and political influences on levels of taxation, rather than a product of excessive generosity by the two levels of government.

None of this should deny the importance of the deficit where one in three dollars spent by the federal government goes to service the accumulated debt, but in emphasizing spending cuts as the solution to chronic deficits, we are left with the impression that the debt problem is one of excessively generous social programs rather than a poor economic performance, high interest rates, and a failure to increase the level of taxation, especially of business and the wealthy to keep pace with expenditure growth. In fact, there have been no major new social programs introduced since 1975. The cost of these programs has increased mainly because of weak economic performance during much of the period since the 1970s.

High interest rates, I think, are the real villain, but I do not have time to go into that here; the CUPE brief probably speaks to that. But debt and deficit reduction has become a national obsession; it is the number one issue.

I teach a course in public administration at Algonquin University College and I had my students engage in an exercise, a case study last year, in which they pretended they were a provincial government faced with declining revenues and increased expenditures, and they were asked to come up with a new scenario. Almost all of them chose a scenario that involved deficit reduction. It has become the dominant agenda in the late 1980s. It has become common for people to think in terms of the need to tighten their belts, that the government is too big and too expensive.

Increasingly, popular thinking is driven by the agenda of the rich and the powerful. I would like to quote a couple of lines from an article by Neil Brooks, with whom I think some of you are familiar. He teaches tax law at Osgoode, and I believe is vice-chair of the Fair Tax Commission. Brooks says: "The most obvious way that the rich control the agenda is through their almost total ownership of the mainstream media, and the funding of research think tanks. Their huge advertising budgets not only allow certain lifestyles and images to be sold to the public, but also provide a virtual veto over the presentation of alternative views in advertising-dependent media."

Equally important is the ability of the rich and powerful to impose their vocabulary on the discussion of public issues. When people adopt the vocabulary of the powerful, they unconsciously find themselves unable to imagine, or even easily discuss, alternatives. So we have now adopted a language of restraint, the language of deficits.

I heard that today. I heard the view that this government is antibusiness, that this government has an adversarial relationship with the business community. That is not surprising, because the corporate community has historically had an adversarial relationship to any party that espouses views similar to the NDP. We can go back to the views of J. S. Woodsworth and the creation of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation and see how the corporate community bleats, and the minions in the media accept the views of the corporate community each time there are proposals made to have a fair and a more just society.

Budgets are about priorities, and as I said earlier, budgets make transparent the priorities of government. The federal government, led by Michael Wilson, has over the last seven years sought to restrict the role of government and create the image, both nationally and internationally, of a government operating in a fiscally responsible manner. Wilson's deficit-reducing budget of 1991 closely followed the advice of that senior voice of business in Canada, the Business Council on National Issues. Wilson's deficit-reducing package included cuts to social, cultural and environmental programs, a heavy blow against social justice where one out of every four Canadians lives below the poverty line.

Budgets result in winners and losers. Some pay more than others. The Wilson budget rewarded the rich and the powerful. The least advantaged in Canada, those with the weakest voice, will be paying more through reduced services, opportunities and social support.

The Ontario budget, in contrast, tracks in a different direction. Some people say the federal government is operating on a corporate agenda; I think that is largely true. It is indeed that the Ontario budget is tracking on the people's agenda; I hope that is true.

"Premier Bob is keen to convince the business community that his government is not wacko," and I think the quote comes from Bud Wildman. His Treasurer, Floyd Laughren, has brought down a budget which is responsive to the needs of people: women, students, native people, the unemployed, the homeless, and people of northern communities.

As a resident of a northern community, this last point is important to me, and this is where I would like to conclude.

I would like to direct your attention to comments by the editor of a community newspaper in Sault Ste Marie, Sault This Week. The editor is Randy Russon, and on page 2a of the current issue, he asks a series of questions about Sault Ste Marie. For example, "What has Tony Martin done for Sault Ste Marie since being elected as our MPP 10 months ago?" But the one I really found interesting was this, "When the New Democrats formed Ontario's opposition party, it proclaimed more than once how it was for the people of northern Ontario, but what has Bob Rae done for the north since taking power?"

We have heard a bit today of the $700 million the Ontario government has allocated under the anti-recession program, and these figures—I am not sure how accurate they are, but these are rough figures—$210 million of that $700 million has come north; $58 million of it has come to Algoma; over $20 million has come to Sault Ste Marie, and $3.1 million has come to my own Algoma University College.

I have yet to see any of the local media, electronic or print, acknowledge the money that has come into the north. That tells you something about the media. When Algoma Steel needed bridge financing, what government came through with $10 million and what government did not?

Mr McLean: Whose views are right, yours or your students?

Dr Ross: I beg your pardon?

Mr McLean: You had a test done in your school where, I think you indicated, your students said they did not like to see a deficit.

Dr Ross: That is right.

Mr McLean: You do.

Dr Ross: No, I am saying I am not keen on a deficit, because I believe a deficit creates intergenerational inequality inasmuch as if we do not do something about this deficit then it is passed on to our children, and I do not like that. I am saying that if you take a look at the serious problems this country and this province are facing at the moment, I do not believe deficit reduction is the number one priority.

Mr McLean: So your students' views are not what you feel is appropriate.

Dr Ross: That is right.

Mr B. Murdoch: I would like to congratulate you. You brought the NDP philosophy to this committee and you have done a pretty good job of bringing NDP views to us. I guess that is what you have been told to do and it is—

Dr Ross: No, I have not been told to do that.

Mr B. Murdoch: Well, obviously.

Dr Ross: I am not driven by instructions.

Mr B. Murdoch: I am sure you had a very dynamic speech to give us. We hear this all the time; let's just hear it once more. You did not really say that, but I assume you like more government, that you feel the government is going to look after everybody, so you are in favour of more civil servants and the government being involved in people's lives. Is that true?

Dr Ross: No, I would not say I favour more government. I would favour more effective government and a fairer society with a fair system of taxes. I do not think in every case more government is good government. In fact, I think ultimately what we have to do is consider ways and means by which people in their own individual communities can assume the responsibilities that have hitherto been performed by the government at one level or another.

I think we have to build greater responsibility within individuals rather than dependency on whomever it may be. But that is a slow process and I do not think we are currently on that trend. I do not think the state is more evil than any of the other institutions in life, quite frankly.

Mr Martin: I would like to thank you for the obvious preparation that went into what you delivered today and to say that, in my experience, I have never heard the story presented quite so eloquently and so clearly. It was an education for me to sit and listen to you.

I would like to ask you two questions, Dr Ross. One is—because an allegation has been made—why are you here today? What motivated you to come before this committee? Number two is a more technical question re your presentation, and the whole concept of consumer confidence in the middle of a recession and how that impacts on the economic activity and therefore sometimes the need for a government to get into, as we have, deficit spending. It seems to me that consumer confidence is very much based on the amount of money a consumer has in his pocket and whether he is willing to spend that or not. If we do not put money in the pockets of people the business community in turn winds up in trouble, and therefore the whole system is thrown into a tailspin and we actually have what we have arrived at today.

Dr Ross: I will answer the last question first. My preference with respect to macro economic policy is Keynesian policy. I do not believe that in the long term monetarist supply-side economics is going to work. That is my position. I think, yes, you have to put money into the pockets of individual people during hard times to keep the economy moving.

Fifty-odd years ago we had Bible Bill Aberhart out in Alberta in the Social Credit movement and he said the money system was like the circulatory system in the body: If it dried up, and there was no money, then everything would go bankrupt. I think, to some extent, Aberhart was right. His approach was a little odd. That is perhaps understatement. There certainly is a need not only to get the cash registers ringing, but are we or are we not a highly developed civilized country, and Ontario the most developed within the country? If we cannot share the resources of this nation evenly in some fashion, then I think that is a real problem.

Why do I appear before the committee and who instructed me to say the words that I said? No one. I have been a New Democrat off and on over the years. Often I have been very unhappy with the policies of the New Democratic Party. To me, they lean far too close to the centre. I think their historical role should be to the left. That is one of the things I like about Floyd Laughren, Treasurer. To me, he was poured in the mould of a classical New Democrat and CCFer. He believes that the social programs that individual and average Canadians have struggled so damn hard to build and to get should not be sacrificed. I applaud him for that.

I hope that he and his colleagues are able to maintain a persistent struggle against those who would like, in the language of disentanglement or whatever else it may be, to transfer to the provinces, decentralization. We have to understand that there are certain basics that we as Canadians have and that make us distinct from our American cousins. We know damn well our American cousins look at us with great envy.

Teddy Kennedy came to Sault Ste Marie, Michigan, about 10 years ago.

The Chair: Excuse me, I am going to have to cut you short because we are dividing the time equally between the three parties and Mrs Sullivan has a question.

Mrs Sullivan: We have no questions.

The Chair: No questions? Then you can finish your answer.

Dr Ross: I will be very brief. Kennedy looked across the river and he said, "Across the river they have a health care program that is the envy of most Americans, and I wish we had it here." Do we want to see that dismantled? No. I do not think Floyd wants to see it dismantled either, and I do not.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation. The committee will be recessed until 1:30. The social planning council will not be appearing.

The committee recessed at 1200.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1339.

CANADIAN UNION OF PUBLIC EMPLOYEES
SAULT STE MARIE DISTRICT COUNCIL

The Chair: I guess we can get started. We will resume budget hearings at the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. Welcome to the committee hearings here. I are from the Canadian Union of Public Employees district council. Would you please introduce yourself for the record. You have half an hour. The first part will be your presentation and the last part of the half-hour will be divided among the three parties on questions and answers.

Ms Primeau: I would like to begin by thanking the committee for the opportunity to come forward and speak on the topic of the NDP's proposed budget for Ontario. The issue is of such a magnitude and the input will so affect all lives that I cannot imagine anyone remaining silent on this issue. As such I have come forward to have my views heard. My name is Louise Primeau. I am a mother of three and a grandmother of a 14-month-old toddler. I am a trade unionist and I am president of the Canadian Union of Public Employees local for the Algoma Health Unit. I have not stopped worrying about my own offspring, their education, their health and their future, but I must begin to be that much more concerned for my grandchildren, who seem to have even less opportunities than our generation had.

I used to be an ostrich by trade, thinking very clearly that these issues around us were not my concern, that they simply did not affect me. In the recent past I have taken a change in that attitude. I now am an activist, a grandparent, a parent and a social worker. These have influenced me to become involved, and so I am here to talk for all those in my life who are looking for answers. I am here to speak on behalf of the silent ones, all the ones who are most vulnerable when it comes time to talk about possible budgetary constraints or program cuts. I am here to talk for our expected grandchild, due in February, maybe one of the last fortunate ones to be delivered into the world in the secure embrace of a hospital setting, especially should there be any further health care cuts.

I am not an Ontarian who wants to be on a waiting list for medical care should further hospital cutbacks continue. I am not the sister who would be pleased to visit her brother in Toronto because he cannot receive the necessary chemotherapy in Sault Ste Marie. I am not the daughter who would be understanding if my mother were not to receive lifesaving treatment for cardiopulmonary distress here in Sault Ste Marie. In these cases I turn to the provincial government and say people must come first.

I am in agreement with the direction the government wishes to take. I agree with the personalized way the NDP is looking at the budget. There was a time when I thought you had to be an economist to even have a basic understanding about economics or provincial government. Perhaps that is the case, or perhaps many would have us believe that is the case. Perhaps that is why the average Canadian remains silent on the topic, for fear of sounding uneducated or unknowledgeable or for fear that his opinion does not count. Not enough people speak out. I felt very similarly until recently.

I am therefore pleased that the hearings are being staged around the province giving people an opportunity to participate. I do not hesitate to say I still do not understand the budget completely, or any budget for that matter. It seems simple enough in principle, but obviously has far-reaching implications when the magnitude involves the whole province and its population. One could argue that the fundamental purpose of the exercise is simply to ensure that the expenditures do not outweigh the income, that the left side of the ledger balances against the right side of the ledger. So the discussion continues endlessly in institutions, in business, in our homes and deliberately in government.

The NDP at present is in a very precarious position to say the least, one that should be no surprise to the masses. Their philosophy is people and not numbers on a page. The presiding government is taking a people focus, and I am here to talk about that and to affirm its position. I am here to support the provincial government of today and at the same time bring some criticism forward.

My first position is, who could argue with a government that wants to keep people employed and to keep food on their table? Who could possibly argue with minimizing any further devastation created by unemployment and program cutbacks? I have never been convinced that reducing jobs results in savings or benefits the community. It is simple for me to say I do not see any possible alternative at this time for the government to take. No one, including the NDP, likes that the bill is going to cost us a deficit of $9.7 billion. However, given the reality of our current economic picture, the public realizes that to just maintain the present status quo means deficit spending at the very least. The NDP started in office with a deficit. They were very clear throughout their campaign about their vision in governing. They clearly underlined in their platform: people first.

The NDP is not so reckless as to want to take political positions that are not consistent with its election promises. We knew what those results would bring. There is no doubt in my mind that this is precisely what the appeal was in the September 6 election. The people of this province wanted a fresh approach. They wanted a new direction and a new vision. The NDP promised that. They therefore have an obligation to live up to those promises. Simply said, the NDP must live up to the obligations they made during that election. The NDP came forward and tabled a plan. The voters liked that plan. They liked the ideas and the leadership. They voted accordingly. The voters endorsed the NDP's platform by giving the party a majority government. The voters have dictated a mandate to this government.

Mr Mike Harris seems apprehensive about following the wishes of the people of this province. The delays in implementation of policies will not be honoured or tolerated indefinitely, and that is my criticism today. I understand as a voter that the NDP is governing for the very first time in the province and that it takes time to be comfortable in that role. However, the government will be painted with the same brush if it drags its feet on all action. They have been given a resounding mandate to govern and so they must. Mike Harris should save further tax dollars by getting on with the business of the government. The voters are expecting leadership and the present budget demonstrates to me that the government is proceeding in a responsible fashion. That is my message to the hearings today, so let's move on from here.

I would like to briefly speak about housing and my understanding about what the proposal is as far as the budget goes. On a more favourable note, I would like to comment on the proposed plan for non-profit housing in this province.

This government has announced the provision of another 10,000 non-profit units, which will in turn stimulate the construction industry by creating 20,000 jobs, jobs that we need very desperately. Being in the business of social services, I see on a daily basis the need for safe, central and affordable housing. I am pleased with the government's direction and initiative in this regard. In future, when our circumstances improve, I would like to see further programs implemented that would assist young families, with home ownership programs made easier. Ownership often changes attitudes and instils a sense of pride and involvement.

Ownership might help minimize the oft-times unhealthy circumstances festering in highly populated housing projects. The decentralization of the units would help to integrate the targeted group into a more normalized way of living without identifying people on the basis of their income. The integration process alone helps to create a new environment where children attend neighbourhood schools with all social classes, all ethnic and religious backgrounds. We are committed to integration and normalization of handicapped people. Why then would we not be committed to the same philosophy of integration and normalization in housing? It only makes sense.

On the topic of violence against women, the Conservative Party in particular appears to be disenchanted with the government's proposed budget. No one argues that $9.7 billion is a high deficit. No one disputes that if there were another way to proceed, the government would do so. But no one wants to argue against the proposed initiatives tabled by the NDP.

Who wants to argue against funding for treatment centres for women and children who have experienced crimes of violence against them? Who in the population wants to put the victims back into further risk? Who wants to deny a woman in an emergency shelter a bed that she has long waited for when she has just experienced wife assault and has no other place to go? Who would want to tell that woman, "I'm sorry, you just have to go back home because there is no bed for you"? My feelings on the topic of abuse are that abuse is by omission or commission. Our omission would be just as abusive by overlooking this very critical need in our society. There is no forgiveness for that.

In the same vein, the pay equity legislation needs radical surgery. In principle the legislation at least makes the political statement that our society needs to review our practices and agrees that historically we have undervalued women's work. That is great in theory. We have built our structure a system that allows systemic discrimination. Pay equity legislation, although flawed practically in entirety, makes a statement that we recognize our error and wish to correct these inequities.

But that is not enough. The legislation does not add to the inequities in all places of employment for women in this province. The government has a moral obligation to take the legislation all the way to the end of the exercise. The government must continue to find equitable resolutions for all injustice arising from paying women on the basis of their gender. Pay equity was a critical issue during the last election. Promises have been made by the NDP to expedite the legislation, which would allow for proxy or proportionate comparisons for the workplaces that do not have male comparators. At present this is the very least that can be done to compensate women whose work has been undervalued for far too long.

On the topic of employment equity, during difficult times there is always the temptation to overly criticize the government for new initiatives. The employment equity legislation is progressive in nature. It is most regretful that individuals would even require protection that ensures employees have equitable representation and reduces systemic barriers to recruitment, retention and promotion. In an ideal world we would not require such legislation, but as we know, this is oftentimes less than an ideal world. Employers most often are compelled to do the very least required by the legislation. In fact, some would not even make certain provisions unless they were legislated. In such, the employment equity legislation, in my mind, is an extension of the human rights legislation. It is consistent with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and grants the same access to the workplace to original people, people with disabilities, francophones, racial minorities and women the same access to the workplace as others. To me, that is the right thing to do.

On the topic of social assistance reform, it is difficult particularly at this time, to talk about the necessary reforms but the topic of social assistance is most contentious at the moment even during non-recessionary times. Having been a direct beneficiary of the social welfare programs, I lend my voice with pleasure to the proposed reforms. I am pleased to see that recipients are treated with dignity and with expediency. I am particularly pleased that mechanisms are in place for reviews, such as a Social Assistance Review Board.

My criticism on this topic, however, has to do with ownership. I believe very firmly that the state is only one element in supporting a family through difficult times. I believe that there are other key players who have to be considered and have not been overlooked in meeting their obligations.

As we know, when there is a family breakdown, a frequent practice to date has been for children to reside with their mothers, although this trend has been changing in recent time. Nevertheless, I believe the courts and legal systems are too lenient in encouraging financial obligations from the children's fathers. I believe we should be much more consistent in having the absent parents meet responsibility in both financial and emotional support dependants.

All fathers should be expected to make contributions, either voluntarily or involuntarily. These contributions should not be negotiated through the children's mother. Regardless of the marital status of the couple, a financial law should be mandated on a very regular basis. I stress financial component of the father's contribution should be apart from that of the family, as this often leads to her reprieve. The onus is on both parents to provide for offspring, and I am convinced that there is still not an equal distribution of responsibility and of obligation.

At the same time, I am an advocate for fathers' involvement in rearing the children. When circumstances permit, I believe emphatically the father has the right to be involved in the child's life. All of society benefits in this culture. Education is the key factor in changing deeply entrenched attitudes and practices that have prevailed.

Transfer payments to agencies: It is redundant to say that we are smack in the middle of a recession. We all know that. The NDP has elected to fight the recession and the deficit. I agree that this is the right approach to take. I have been particularly pleased with the government's emphasis on partnership in governing, with the reaching out to business and labour. I therefore believe the government must be just as consistent in its relationship with those it sponsors through transfer payments. I believe, since the government's intention is to fight the recession, not the deficit, it in turn must advocate for wise spending.

They must advocate that agencies enter into compulsory reviews. The purpose of the review is not to cut jobs in any way, but to ensure that the services are cost-effective and streamlined. The compulsory reviews have a new accountability. The accountability does not come exclusively from management slicing of programs. It must rather come from a joint effort between management and labour. Both forces must assume a responsible, mutual partnership for the problems. The government must discourage and even probably abolish the hierarchy structure that has far too often resulted in top-heavy decisions.

All agencies should be compelled to review how they can improve providing services to the recipients. The focus of the review is the emphasis to be placed on clients' needs, rather than on paper focus. Every staff member must be encouraged to participate in this process. That will inevitably improve the service and ultimately save tax dollars. The thrust of the review is on self-assessment.

This government has emphasized its belief in people, its belief in the importance of people. I am convinced the reviews will likely result in creation of new jobs because of the cost-saving measures on all fronts of the business.

In summary, what I would like to say is that I am pleased you are here to listen to the people and that I am confident you will do just that.

The ultimate message I would like to feed back to the provincial hearings is that there was no mistake in the September 6 election. The results were because of careful orchestration between the New Democratic Party and the voters. There is, further, no doubt about it that the results were contingent upon a long-standing discontent from the voters in this province.

The NDP could not have done this alone, however. This must give thanks to the Tories, and the Liberals as well. Their governing provincially and federally has resulted in widespread turmoil. I am convinced that unless there is significant change in direction on a federal level as well, we will see the same sweeping effect in the next election. Very few are pleased with the favours provided through the Tories with the implementation of the GST, free trade, deregulation and privatization. The civil service is less than enthusiastic about the possible wage freezes being recommended.

The NDP has done its homework to get it this far in the process. Winning the election, however, was only step 1 in the vision. Fighting the recession is step 2, and governing is definitely its obligation. The NDP has been hired to do the job, and that is exactly what it must do. I am confident that we are well on the way to the road to recovery when we walk in joint partnership in governing. That is the thrust of my presentation, the joint partnership.

Mr Martin: I want to first of all thank you for your presentation and for coming today and participating in this consultation. To me, it is the essence of democracy.

We were certainly criticized resoundingly before the budget by the opposition and those who would normally criticize, and actually even by some of our own people, for not doing enough, for not living up to the promises we made on September 6. There was a statement that went across the floor in the House, "That was then and this is now." Well, this is now.

In the budget we proposed to do some things that spoke to that agenda. However, you have come today and I think affirmed us in that, but challenged us that we really have not gone quite the distance yet and that there is more to be done. I heard that loud and clear.

The one I wanted to focus on, though, in terms of maybe some comment from yourself, is your concern about your grandchildren. There are those out there who tell us we have made a mistake by putting the price of the deficit on the backs of our grandchildren. You are coming today to share that concern, I think from a different perspective. If we do not get into the housing programs you mentioned, if we do not get into the pay equity programs you mentioned, your female grandchild may pay for the deficit or non-deficit in a different way. Perhaps you might want to expand on that.

Ms Primeau: What I would like to do is clarify a little bit about my position. I guess there are a multitude of factors that are influencing me in taking the positions that I have. First of all, I am not a number-oriented person. I truly believe that sometimes placing a certain emphasis on numbers is somewhat of a fictitious exercise, although I realize numbers place limitations on what governments are able to do.

At the same time, as I said very clearly, I am a grandparent and I am concerned about my grandchildren. I am concerned about my own son, who does not have a job and who depends on certain programs. I am concerned that there is nowhere to go and no possible future at the rate we are going. I rely on the government to help those who are underprivileged and assume that they are going to be able to eat today and tomorrow.

Ultimately, the thrust of my paper, in talking about a budget, as I said very clearly, there was a time I would not have come forward. I thought it was none of my business and that to achieve harmony in your life, you just go and mind your own business and these things do not impact on us. I have recently had a very serious change of heart, because I think unless we come forward and say something—I am impressed with where the government wants to go, and as a result, I voted accordingly in the last election. I believe very seriously that the true resource in this province is the people and that we have to lend an ear to what is going on, that we have to support them through a recession and that we have to be attentive to their needs in the community.

Sault Ste Marie undoubtedly is in the middle of a crisis. How long-term it is going to be I do not know. None the less, I think that at this time I see no other alternative for the government, regardless of what government was presiding right now. I feel very confident that there are no choices. To not focus on the programs, to place more attention on the deficit in the programs, means cutbacks, means placing more people on welfare and more people on unemployment. To me, that is not the right way to go.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Ms Primeau. The research staff just asked, are you making this presentation on your behalf or on behalf of the union?

Ms Primeau: On my behalf and on behalf of the union. It is joint.

Mr Mahoney: I quite enjoyed your frankness at least. You have not hidden the fact that you are an NDP supporter and voted that way in the last election, unlike some of the other deputants who have come before us with very strident partisan views, trying to pretend they were just citizens off the street, when indeed they were here in support of the government with very partisan views. At least your honesty is refreshing, if nothing else.

I too would have concerns for your grandchildren. I found some of your statements quite interesting. I think even Bob Rae would admit to you that no one was more surprised in this province on September 6 than Bob Rae, and it was not a result, I submit to you, of some well-conceived plan of communication between the NDP and the people. Most of the men and women who got elected in their ridings frankly did so by accident, did not do so by design, in my respectful submission to you. Having said that, that is democracy and that is the way life goes and we live with that and we respect that.

The one area where we do agree is in your comments about Mr Harris and the fact that we should be getting on with it. In fact, these hearings are nothing more than a sham and are not the essence of democracy by any stretch of the imagination. The budget is in place, the decisions have been made and presumably the money will start flowing, if the government ever gets off its collective duff and starts to implement some of the programs.

But the reality is there will not be changes in the get as a result of these hearings. There will not be change in any of the legislation or the programs as a result of the hearings. We are simply here because the Tories decided to hold up the democratic process in the Legislature. The party was not part of that process. However, we are part of the legislative process, and as a result, we go along with the will of the Legislature and the Premier, in his wisdom, in kowtowing to the leader of the third party, who decided to conduct these hearings as some form of democratic process that has become merely laughable.

When you look at the agenda in Thunder Bay yesterday and here today and tomorrow in Sudbury, you can clearly see that the research people of the government party have done a tremendous amount of homework on the ground, and I complimented them yesterday on doing so. They did not sit back, unfortunately; they went out and frankly, stacked the hearings with people who were sympathetic to their budget.

Having said that, and recognizing—

Mr Sutherland: On a point of order, Mr Chair: for the record, do you remember that all three parties had input on deciding who the presenters would be at the hearings in all the communities?

Mr Mahoney: Having said that, and recognizing that the democratic process is at least attempting, I suppose I will listen to people, we all know what is not going to come of this.

You say, who could argue with the government, what are all its laudable goals? Frankly, I quite agree. What we are arguing about is the method. What this budget has done is set forth a course for doubling the total debt. Let's separate the deficit, which is like an overdraft, and debt, which is like a mortgage. They have doubled—

The Chair: Mr Mahoney, could you get to your question?

Mr Mahoney: If I want to ask a question, I will. I may not.

The Chair: Well, your time has run out.

Mr Mahoney: Three minutes is up?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Mahoney: That is good. I do not have a question.

The Chair: Okay. I just thought maybe you had a quick question.

Ms Primeau: Am I able to respond then?

Mr Mahoney: Just think about your grandchildren. They are going to be in serious trouble.

The Chair: Mr McLean.

Mr McLean: I have a question for our witness. When the budget was introduced and read that evening, the price of cigarettes went up, alcohol went up, on July 1 gas went up. Can you name me one thing in that budget that has not taken place through the normal process because of Mike Harris?

Ms Primeau: At this particular time?

Mr McLean: Yes.

Ms Primeau: No, I cannot. What I can say is that in observing what was going on in the process, it was so frustrating and what entertaining to a degree.

Mr McLean: You said you were pleased to be here to listen and to make—

Ms Primeau: To be heard.

Mr McLean: To be heard and make your presentation. Would you not want to give Mike Harris any credit allowing that to happen?

Ms Primeau: I would give him that credit, but to that I would like to add that no one came looking for me, nor do I feel I have been part of a stacked deck. No one called me up and said, "Would you attend?" I felt quite delighted having an opportunity to be here and submit to you what my views are as an individual and as part of an organization.

Mr McLean: I am very pleased you are here and you made a great presentation.

The Chair: Thank you.

UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA

The Chair: The next group before the committee is the United Steelworkers of America. Would they come forward, please. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economics, the budget hearings. Would you identify yourself for Hansard, please.

Mr Ostroski: I am Jack Ostroski, and I am the president of Local 2251. I will go through that in my presentation, which I am prepared to distribute, but you have already euchred me. It was my understanding that Mr Wiseman was Chair.

The Chair: He was.

Mr Ostroski: The document I have is addressed to him, Mr Chair. This will not be a lengthy presentation. I am sure you will appreciate that. I was solicited to see if I wished to appear by the local labour council. In any event, for the Chair, for Mr Wiseman, I have a bound copy, if somebody would pass that up. The rest of the committee I thought would be satisfied with photostats.

In any event, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, my name is Jack Ostroski. I am president of Local Union 2251, United Steelworkers of America. Our members, approximately 3,600, are employed at Algoma Steel Corporation in the production and maintenance unit. Over 2,000 other members are on layoff.

Ten years ago this month the numbers were 8,100-plus members in our local union. No member was laid off. In fact, the company was hiring permanent and vacation replacement employees; quite a contrast. A large number were permanently displaced the following year as a result of that recession, and the numbers have fluctuated over recent years according to the business conditions in the steel industry.

The current recession has affected employment opportunity at Algoma and at other steel producers in Ontario, as well as other areas in Canada. Talk of an economic recovery has not resulted in the reality of an economic recovery in the markets the steel industry depends upon, and in my view will not likely improve to any great extent until the new year.

What has all this got to do with the provincial budget? Not much, unless the government of Ontario had followed the example of the federal and other provincial governments in slashing spending and reducing services to their constituents.

Ontario, recognized and envied as the major engine of the Canadian economy, correctly chose not to exacerbate the steadily worsening downturn in all sectors of the economy, particularly in this province. The government's decision to invest in the province and the people in it will not be and has not been applauded by much of the business and financial interests in this country and elsewhere. There are many who recognize that bold measures are needed when the alternatives, in human terms, are more acceptable.

The Conrad Blacks and the Gucci coalitions protest in the press and at Queen's Park only when they perceive their ox being gored, making dire predictions about the severe consequences of the government's budget down the road. What they are mostly concerned about is that when the eventual turnaround occurs in the economy, they will be required to pay their fair share towards reducing the new debt. They also conveniently forget to mention that the NDP government did not invent deficit budgets, either provincially or federally, and have been disproportionate beneficiaries in the area of taxation, compared to the working poor and the workers generally, who do not have the luxury of tax and investment write-offs.

Yes, the other parties constantly campaign on and advocate tax reform. Frankly, the average taxpayer is sick and tired of such reforms, and is at the stage of advocating tax revolt to ease our burden. The critics fail to emphasize that this government inherited over 85% of the current budget deficit from the former government that crowed about the surplus during the campaign of 1990. We all should recall how the former Treasurer backpedalled time after time until the truth of the matter was revealed towards the end and after the election was over. It seems there were some slight miscalculations.

The main purpose, however, of this presentation is to encourage and support the direction this government proposes in the budget yet to be debated and enacted. Investing in improving the circumstances for the people of Ontario—the worker training, housing and infrastructure, the commitment to support improvements to educational facilities and other training—will provide long-term benefit and return, more so than if the decisions had been taken to reduce and curtail such measures.

I have always been supportive of having to pay my fair share for education, for the social network and the government services we require. I do not support paying taxes when any government abuses taxpayers by providing largess for their friends and supports, throws vast amounts of money into bailouts of financial institutions and their investors, or seemingly gives away plants, facilities and whole industries which the taxpayers originally developed and financed, all in the name of privatization. At the same time, the federal government contributes to the provincial deficits by reducing the transfer payments to the provinces, particularly in the most costly areas of the provincial budgets: education and health care.

Health care in northern Ontario is particularly costly to citizens because of distance and the fact that every community does not have a full range of medical and hospital services at hand. Some specialties are only available if one travels for hours to a major city. A neglected aspect of health care costs that must be addressed with regard to travel costs exists in dental care specialties. Orthodonty and periodonty, for instance, are not readily available here in Sault Ste Marie. Consequently, parents must take time off from work to travel to Sudbury from the Sault for over three hours each way, at their own expense for travelling.

Ontario does not have a safe and convenient four-lane highway system across the north to connect the four-lane systems at Ottawa and the Manitoba border. Still, we pay higher gasoline prices and taxes, as well as the tax on tires, while receiving fewer of the amenities of travel. While Highway 400 keeps being extended northward past Barrie to provide safer and faster access for southern Ontarians to cottage country, we northerners have to follow long line-ups of tractor-trailers, campers and Sunday drivers until the next passing lane where one to three may be able to pass the slower vehicles. Too, and most recently, innocent oncoming drivers have been killed or have taken to ditches to avoid coils of steel. Another such incident was reported today.

A commitment to finish a four-lane system across Ontario, in stages, would prevent the killing and maiming, while at the same time contributing to the economies over those routes in each community across northern Ontario. This issue should be addressed now and in future budgets.

Education and skills training plus support in the development of secondary and tertiary industry associated with resource and manufacturing capabilities and similar potential must continue to be a high priority, both in government policy and budgets. Sault Ste Marie and area are well positioned geographically and demographically for the development of markets southward for extensive trading opportunities. This area is closer to millions of American customers than we are to Canadian markets to the east of us. With proper planning, this area can exploit such potential and become a significant contributor to the provincial and federal economies. The highway and waterway advantages could greatly complement future penetration of southern markets.

There are other areas of the budget that we could address, but I am sure that others have done so at the various sessions of the committee held so far. The main point being made in this presentation is that, while the economy and world market conditions currently are in the doldrums, such events are cyclical. What has to be done is to provide for the forthcoming turnaround without savaging the population and the communities they live in, by contributing in a positive way.

Many communities and individuals are benefiting from the decisions taken by the provincial government in this budget. This community and area certainly has projects under way that contribute to employment, keep people off welfare rolls and alleviate some of the despair associated with the circumstances at Algoma Steel. Those are also being addressed. The provincial task force established in support of the restructuring requirements at Algoma Steel has contributed in no small way towards keeping the company going until alternatives to severe downsizing or bankruptcy can be negotiated. So far the result has been in the interests of this area, in maintaining operations providing much-needed employment and contributing to the local and provincial economies. We are grateful for these actions by the government as well. We appreciate the opportunity to make this presentation. Thank you all very much.

In case it is going to be raised, I am not only a member of the NDP, but also a member of the CCF. Some of the younger people may not remember that party. In any event, I have been a northerner all my life. My home town is Espanola, just down the road. You are going to be driving past it. I have been here for over 41 years. I started at Algoma Steel on June 15, 1950. In a variety of ways, except for the most recent 6 years where I was in Kingston as a staff representative for the steelworkers, I have been involved not only in this community but other communities in a variety of ways.

I am approaching my 25th year as a full-time union officer or representative. I am quite aware of some of the problems we have, not only in the steel industry, but in other parts of the economy as well. Certainly, allowing Algoma Steel to go bankrupt is not going to contribute what we believe is a necessary resolution of that problem and certainly will be of no assistance to this community, to the economies of Ontario or of Canada. We are not going to let that company fail. We are not going to downsize this community by a third to one half of its population because that would be the result of it. I did not write all this but I just wanted to make that point. Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you. Mr Mahoney, to start off with. We have approximately four and a half or five minutes.

Mr Mahoney: That is all? I will leave some time for Mr Kwinter. Thanks, Jack, I know you are obviously under a lot of stress these days in the ongoing negotiations and the concerns.

Mr Ostroski: I do not get ulcers. I give them.

Mr Mahoney: Yes, I am sure you do. I do appreciate your position in the community. I know you are highly respected and have a long history of working with me and with others in days gone by with the steelworkers. I appreciate that. I found your presentation interesting and we got over the partisan shots and all of the stuff and a little bit of the politics and got down to some really good ideas. I do not know where you get the figure of 85% for the current budget coming from us. That is not true. I do not know where that fact comes from. It is not even close.

Mr Ostroski: Excuse me, if I can just interrupt for a second. I did not see all the bottom-line numbers, but it was somewhere in the area, and a very rich area, of about $8 billion.

Mr Mahoney: No, I am sorry. We could go through all that, but $4.5 billion—maybe Mr Kwinter will give you those figures. I can give them to you as well, but not even close. I think your ideas on the road construction and the economy are good. I think they are interesting. What I find really interesting, however, is that none of them are in the budget. They are things that you are saying should have been, in reality, and should be done from a safety point of view, from an industrial point of view and from tourism and the benefits of the north. This being my home town originally, I well understand that northern Ontarians different kettle of fish from the Mississaugas and the Ontos of this world. There are very specific problems. I'm concerned, though. I understand your boss, Mr Gerard—I don't know if he is your boss or not—is now poised to move into the national director's chair, formerly held by your dad, and with some of the advice that has been given I could just tell you that it gives me a lot of concern. I fear for the steelworkers, I fear for this town and I am delighted to hear your commitment to try to save the plant, and to save the Sault, because it is a great spot. I know Mr Kwinter must have some questions.

Mr Ostroski: Could I just comment? I attended the session of the policy conference when your dad was chairman in 1977, and on behalf of the local union and his fellow workers, because he came from Algoma Steel originally, as a member of Local 2251. Certainly we had a long relationship. I thought an educational relationship because I learned a lot from him.

Mr Mahoney: So did I.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Ostroski, I just want to set the record straight about the deficit and the problems with it. There is a misconception, and it seems to be shared by the government members, but they actually had control of the treasury for six months of the last fiscal period. The election was September 6, the fiscal period ends March 31, so for six months of that period they were in control of it. The headlines screamed, right after the election, $750-million deficit, and everybody yelled and screamed about what a terrible thing happened that this government had left this $750-million deficit. Floyd Laughren appeared before our committee in pre-budget hearings and said, in February, that the deficit was going to be $2.5 billion. That was six weeks before the end of the fiscal period. He then had to stand up in the House and say that it would now be $3.5 billion. So, in a matter of about three weeks he had miscalculated by $1 billion—in three weeks.

Where you get this $8.3 billion they were left with, I don't know. But I can tell you this, he had the option, he chose to write down SkyDome, he chose to write down the CRTC to inflate the deficit then. That was his decision. It is not anybody else's, and the deficit—I am not condemning him for it. I have to say, in defence of Floyd Laughren, he has stood up publicly on several occasions and has said that this deficit has got nothing to do with the federal government per se; it was the result of the recession and anticipated revenues that did not come in. Now, he has said that, and he has never, ever pointed a finger at every single group that comes in here that is critical to lay the blame—this is the highest figure I have seen yet, where you suddenly said that $8.3 billion was left by the former government. This is just not true.

Mr Ostroski: No matter what you write down, if the deficit in principle and interest in most cases in business—microeconomics is not the equivalent of Economics 101—is that the bills have to be paid. My understanding from what I have read, and I read it in the Toronto papers so it must be true, is that those are the numbers that have been—

Mr Kwinter: Most people do not believe anything they read in the Toronto papers.

Mr Ostroski: I do, because they are so much smarter than us plow jockeys up north. I am not going to debate the numbers because I have a hard time managing my own budget at the office, without worrying about the federal or provincial government. I am sure other people would debate that question with you. In any event, the scaremongering, if I can use that term, about mortgaging everybody's future, and including my children, 6, my grandchildren, 9.4, is really not productive in the situation in which this economy and this country and this province and this community are found. Certainly, I believe we all have spent beyond our means at one time or another. I know I did. I came that close to bankruptcy when I was in business in Elliot Lake the first time Elliot Lake went down the tubes, so I have some experience in regard. Certainly, from the ox I have been gored by, Algoma Steel, I have had nothing but numbers and numbers and numbers for the last four months. In any event, the deficit spending by government has probably paralleled here the deficit spending by Algoma Steel. It puts them in the same position. However, people do not foreclose on governments. They foreclose on companies.

Mr McLean: I thank you for your presentation. The thing I like about it most is the highway proposal. That I think is an investment in the future for tourism, and not only that, but it will create a lot of jobs and get people working instead of being unemployed.

Does your union agree with the common pause day as proposed in the legislation?

Mr Ostroski: Yes, it does. We initiated it. You are talking about April 29?

Mr McLean: No, I am talking about the Sunday shopping bill.

Mr Ostroski: I am sorry; I am thinking of the day of mourning. Yes, working people have to have time to be with their families, the children and grandchildren the presenter before me mentioned. Also, as a part of our policy, we negotiate time off, days off during the week, vacation periods, statutory holidays. So certainly it is not in any conflict with what we do in the workplace.

Mr McLean: I have a problem trying to determine which is the common pause day, and nobody has indicated to me yet what is the common pause day. Is it Saturday, Sunday, Monday? I am one who used to work seven days a week too, so I know all about the opportunity to have some time with my family.

Mr Jamison: You do not now?

Mr McLean: And I still do now, that is right. But the fact is, the business in this community relies on a lot of tourism and shopping and one of the presentations we had this morning certainly indicated that they wanted to open Sundays.

Mr Ostroski: You have to understand that I just returned back to Sault Ste Marie on May 12. That debate has been going on. I personally shop very little across the river and I only do it—I buy my gas if I am on a trip. I do not go over there and shop for anything. I have the gas receipts and everything else. My clothes, my car, everything I own that I can possibly buy, made in Canada is the policy. My children have been told if they bring a foreign car to my driveway I burn it. That is how serious I am about that. It does not help the steel industry at all.

Mr McLean: I am glad to hear you because I am the same way. In other words, you disagree with the business community? They want to be open and your union feels they should not.

Mr Ostroski: I am not really certain if the local union, prior to my return—our first membership meeting was May 15 of this year—has taken a position on the common pause day because I have not had a chance to read all the minute books yet. But I believe there has to be a common pause day and wide open—whether it is for tourists or for business purposes, I do not know how anybody can spend more money in seven days than they can afford to spend in six days, or for that matter in five days.

Mr McLean: Is the steel plant open on Sundays?

Mr Ostroski: Yes. It is the nature of the beast.

Mr Jamison: Welcome, Jack. I am pleased to see you here today and I echo Mr Mahoney's sentiments, that you are a very respected member of the community.

Mr Ostroski: I wish you would all stop buttering me up.

Mr Jamison: I have been visiting here since 1981 and for people who do not know, I have gone through probably a few sets of negotiations with Jack and through the steel-workers. I cannot help but think of the situation that Algoma is in because, coming from the basic steel end of things, I know how I would feel and how this community would feel at this point in time. I think about the fight over free trade and how we have participated on the opposite end of things there and companies were saying that it would relieve us of voluntary restraint agreements and things like that. Certainly the Americans share much more of our steel market today than then. I would like to commend you on your work in bringing that partnership together in the restructuring area and heading down a road that has to be travelled, and working very hard at that.

My question, Jack, to you concerns your membership and your community and the budget. If we had followed the Conservative philosophy that the federal government had hoped we would follow, if we had frozen transfer payments to the community, if we had ignored the need for restructuring in infrastructure, what effects would there have been, Jack, on this community, a community that is already going through some tremendous change and potential for change?

Mr Ostroski: Certainly I am aware of some of the funding that has gone into programs in this community and the surrounding area. The one I guess you can go and take a look at is the one outside the Holiday Inn, where they are putting in the current walkway and the retaining walls, etc. The report I heard on that last night was somewhere in the area of a $3-million project, a lot of it funded by the federal—or provincial government; a Freudian slip.

From what I have heard our mayor speak about when I read the local paper, which I have not done for a week, I am aware generally, but I do not have time to tally. Some of the numbers, and it may be disputed cause I do not have the actual numbers—I believe for community and surrounding area, somewhere in neighbourhood of $20 million to $27 million are figures I have heard—you can correct me on it—that have been made available through a variety of grants and transfer payments, whether it is to do with schools or other municipal works, not only in the city but in the surrounding area that have contributed significantly to the reduction of the number of people who would probably be laid off on welfare. That is the information I have read. Of course, I read it, I know it must be true.

Mr Martin: I as well, Jack, appreciate your being here today and I certainly also appreciate the change in tone and comment of Mr Mahoney as he spoke to you. Perhaps it was his father's influence, I am not sure—

Mr Mahoney: Do you want to hear some other stuff?

Mr Martin: —as it stacked up beside his comments and attitude towards the previous speaker.

Mr Mahoney: I know a gentleman when I see one.

Mr Martin: I wanted to speak to you also about the budget deficit and perhaps throw some clarity on that question. Certainly $8.5 billion of that deficit would have been in place no matter what government took over the province and I think that is probably where your percentage comes from. The other thing I would like to thank you for is your comment, as well, around Algoma Steel. This morning we heard from the chamber of commerce that perhaps the Ontario government's participation had so much how fuzzied the waters in that process. Maybe you could comment to us about the Ontario government's role?

Mr Ostroski: The task force that was established is a catalyst for all of the things that have occurred since the interim funding in the first stages, starting in February and also assisting in the loan guarantee as one of the stakeholders and I believe a significant stakeholder. They represent the people not only of the province, but of Sault Ste. Marie. That, along with what the banks did, Dofasco and the employees did, and the federal government chose not to assist, is ensuring the plant can keep operating at least until the end of October, by which time we hope to have a restructuring plan in place.

Restructuring Algoma Steel is going to take significant sacrifice by a lot of people, including all of the stakeholders. On the other hand, the consequences of the proposed Algoma/Dofasco restructuring plan or bankruptcy, because we are currently in a bankruptcy court—I do not want to stare that one in the eye. If that plant goes down it will never be restarted. Some people think that somebody will come along and pick up the pieces, but that is not what is going to occur. Nobody is building integrated steel mills any more. They are building mini-mills. The overhead and the cost associated with vast debt and everything else has to be restructured, otherwise this plant will go down as well. It is as simple as that.

The Chair: Thank you for attending and your submission to the committee on the budget review hearings.

VICTORIAN ORDER OF NURSES

The Chair: The next group is the Victorian Order of Nurses. Would you come forward, please? Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs, the budget hearings. You have a half an hour for your presentation, if you can leave some time at the very end for questions and answers from the three political parties, which will be divided equally. Would you please introduce yourselves so Hansard has a record?

Mrs Blunt: Thank you. My name is Antoinette Blunt, I am the executive director of the Victorian Order of Nurses, Sault Ste Marie branch, and this is Mr Leslie Barber, business manager.

I am very pleased to be able to make this presentation on behalf of the Victorian Order of Nurses. Following my presentation I will respond to your questions. However, if I do not have the appropriate information, I will ensure it is forwarded to you as soon as possible.

The 1990s are proving to be very difficult times for the residents of Ontario. The economic recession has impacted the lives of individuals and businesses both small and large. Costs have continued to escalate in many areas. Unemployment is also escalating and is especially prevalent in Sault Ste Marie. Such factors as these place significant demands on our government's budget, yet the government has a responsibility to meet the needs of the people they serve.

VON in Sault Ste Marie is striving as well to meet the needs of the people we serve. In the past couple of years, health care budget has been under intensive scrutiny. We recognize costs must be decreased to save our universal health care system. In an attempt to accomplish this, the trend has been to focus care in the community sector versus the institutional sector.

The trend to community care is one that VON believes in. Our mission is to provide leadership across Canada in the development of health and social policy, the delivery of innovative community-based nursing and other health care support services, based on the principles of primary health care.

Many nursing and support services are not available in communities in Ontario. The institution of these services is mandatory to meet the needs of individuals if care in the community is to be successful. There will be initial costs for program development and training to ensure long-term success of these programs. Such is the case with specialty services in VON Sault Ste Marie. These services provide care of the terminally ill and their families, a 24-hour, on-call service as well as increased technical skills and intensive therapy programs. In the past, many of these services were only available in the hospital sector.

VON recommends the availability of a minimal number of services in all communities. We recognize that such services should depend on the specific needs of communities, and that introduction of such services be phased in. These changes will show economic advantages in the future. At present, however, they are creating a significant demand on community nursing and related service organizations such as VON, whose staff require training and support.

With many generous donations from the people of Sault Ste Marie and from our United Way, VON in Sault Ste Marie has been able to initiate some of these much-needed services. With unemployment so high and our future shaky, to say the least, we need the support of our government to develop and continue to provide these services.

Looking ahead, it is quite evident that our population is aging. Again, in order to save our health care system, we must plan and prepare now to meet these needs.

With the thrust in patient care from hospitals to communities, there is a need to ensure a firm foundation on which to build a new system. Historically we have seen an individual program approach and not a system-wide approach. A system-wide approach, such as one that would encompass home care, social services, the placement coordination services, and other general home support services, would be more effective.

VON is a not-for-profit organization. This enhances our position as the key player to economical, community-based care. Our position also allows us to focus our attention and services on the individuals in our communities. The volunteer board of directors of our organization is representative of those we serve. Their hours of hard work and dedication and their insight into the needs of the people of Sault Ste Marie provide added value to the community.

The board of directors assists the staff in developing cost-effective measures of operations that allow VON to reinvest in more services for our community.

Not-for-profits have also, in the last number of years, begun to recognize the need for fair employment policies. In terms of visiting nursing, VON has committed itself to parity in the community nursing field with hospital wages. This policy was taken as a direct result of the recognition that nurses working in the community have additional responsibilities. The scope of practice of community nursing is enlarging to include acute procedures, previously done only in a hospital setting, as I mentioned earlier.

On June 26, 1991, VON Ontario, which is our provincial body, was officially informed by the division of community health and support services that the VON rate increase for the fiscal year 1991-92 would be 6%. However, 12% was considered the requirement to meet VON's needs and to operate without a deficit. A shortfall in the rate adjustment and the ensuing inability to meet a fair wage settlement will have serious implications for VON.

Not-for-profits have traditionally stood for quality in service, as the focus of care is on the communities we serve. VON believes in quality as well as cost-effectiveness. The government should develop quality assurance criteria that ensures efficient services which recognize the needs of standardization of care.

One recommendation is a system-wide utilization review of community services and outcome assessments. There is a need to determine utilization patterns and rates. A basis for developing a systematic approach to services must be determined. There needs to be, as well, some basis of developing a systematic approach to services. Following this, an appropriate formula can be developed for funding, with appropriate rates that will form the foundation for building an effective community-based system. The government should then encourage all community provider agencies to meet these standards.

VON is acutely aware of the need to control the escalation of health care costs and recognizes not only meeting community needs with quality services but meeting these needs at a reasonable cost.

During these times of transition, VON supports the funding requirements that will build a strong foundation for community services to meet the needs of Ontarians in the future. Thank you.

Mr McLean: Has your organization made any recommendations to the overall organization with regard to more services that you could provide which would keep people out of various institutions?

Mrs Blunt: One of the things VON has been addressing is looking at the needs of individuals we serve and providing the service at the level of need, and with that we have instituted the use of registered nursing assistants in the community to help keep costs down.

Mr McLean: Are you affiliated with the district health council? Is there a health council here? We have county boards of health. Is there a board of health here that buys services from you?

Mrs Blunt: The services we provide in the Sault are purchased from Algoma home care, which is part of the Ministry of Health. They would purchase the services from us and we provide the care. The rate of pay for service is established provincially in Ontario.

Mr McLean: I have been an advocate for a long time with regard to getting people out of the hospitals, the chronic care units, and into more like a home setting or in a community, whether it is a rest home or what it is, that purchase services from you people to supply the nursing care that would be provided. Have you indicated any support in that direction, whereby your organization would become involved if they moved some of those people out of those hospitals?

Mrs Blunt: We have made a tremendous number of changes in VON in the last couple of years. In the last year and a half in Sault Ste Marie we instituted the 24-hour service. We started training nurses in specialty areas, to certify them in special procedures to deal with more advanced acute procedures in the community. We received no funding assistance for this, and all the training we have done in the Sault up to this date has been done with donations from people, and some small donations from United Way as well.

Our concern is that, especially in the last six months or so, we have seen more demand from physicians to discharge patients sooner and not to admit patients if they do not need to be admitted. But the type of care these patients require is much more advanced than was ever required before. We can do it. We need to prepare our staff, to train the staff and set up appropriate programs to keep these people at home. It can be done, but we need some funds to prepare us to deal with this type of patient in the community.

Mr McLean: I appreciate your coming today. I really support what you do. Keep up the good work.

Mrs Blunt: Thank you.

Mr Sutherland: I want to echo Mr McLean's comments about it being great that you are here. I do believe we will be hearing from any other nurses throughout the hearings, so this presents a unique opportunity from your organization.

You mentioned in your presentation that you probably needed 12% to fully maintain the level of service and you were granted 6%. It seems to me you are like some of the other organizations we heard yesterday in Thunder Bay and are hearing again today, that although we have attempted to maintain the level of services, there is still a growing need out there and we are not meeting all those demands.

Mrs Blunt: That is correct.

Mr Sutherland: Given the nature with long-term care reform and the move to providing care outside an institutional setting, what do you think the result would have been if you had a 0% increase this year? What would the impact have been on the people here in the Sault Ste Marie community?

Mrs Blunt: If there was a 0% increase in the budget then I am afraid our organization would not be able to operate. We would be in such a deficit position if we received no increase that we would probably face closure, or we would have to look at specific services.

The most costly services to provide in visiting nursing are the services to the terminally ill patients in this community. Right now our nurses are making, in the city of Sault Ste Marie alone—and that does not include the district areas we service—650 to 700 visits per month to people with terminal illnesses, many of whom decide they want to stay at home rather than in hospital while they have a few months left to live. Some of them have decided they wish to die at home rather than in hospital. That service in itself is very costly because they require more nursing care at home. There is no government funding for more than a visit.

A visit covers 58.8 minutes of service in the community. We do not walk out the door at the end of 58.8 minutes. Most visits to terminally ill patients can be an hour and half or more, but we do not get funded for more than one visit. We may go more than once a day, but there is a time factor involved. It is a very costly program, but I feel it is a very needed program. In the past year and a half it has grown tremendously, but it has also allowed many people more dignity, a greater quality of life, the ability to be at home with their families, and it has provided a lot of support for family members who wish to have a loved one at home.

Mr Martin: That is a good line of questioning. I just wanted to follow up by saying that certainly the whole delivery of health services is under review at the moment in the province, and we can probably look back to the Liberal government and say that it initiated it, because the cost of delivering health services is out of sight in some instances. However, it is still going to be costly, no matter how we deliver it, and our government chose to resolve some of the most obvious outstanding issues of settling the doctors and increasing the pay to some of the s within institutional settings. At the grass-roots level, re continuing an initiative of the Liberal government omoting district health councils and having them look e whole question of health, not just health service ery, but health, and Sault Ste Marie is doing a review. ou participating in that?

Irs Blunt: I am not directly involved in it, no.

Mr Martin: Do you see anything evolving out of that will enhance your ability to do your work?

Irs Blunt: I do not really know at this point if there e. I certainly think there is a very valid place for our ization in that review. However, we were not invited rticipate.

Mr Martin: On the review panel itself.

Irs Blunt: That is right.

Mr Martin: But hopefully, if they do not contact you, will contact them.

Irs Blunt: Yes, we have been trying to be involved. s well, I had mentioned earlier about the utilization of s. One other thing that our organization supports pro- ally is the utilization of other levels of care providers, as a health care aide; that the care should be provided e level of need of the individual. There is no legisla- that allows home care in this province to utilize that e level of care provider. That would help keep costs n, as well.

The Chair: Okay, you are out of time now. Mrs Sul-

Mrs Sullivan: I should just tell you that I have enor- s affection for the VON. Certainly in my community the ces that are provided through the VON are extraordi- , and with the last funding crisis that the VON went gh, our home care workers were providing travel in own cars at their expense just to ensure the service delivered. That means a lot.

am very impressed with the portion of your brief h speaks about the utilization review. I think that is a ularly important recommendation, particularly as we moving into more home care issues, more stitutionalization issues, and it is one that my district h council has included on the agenda for all of the home services. You may well be interested in following up Mr Martin's suggestion about working with the DHC in terms of its utilization review on a community base.

wanted to ask you if the 12% which you feel is the irement to meet your operating needs, as opposed to 5%, includes the effect of pay equity and/or the parity grams that you are introducing to ensure your staff is pensated at the same level as hospital staff.

Mrs Blunt: At this point in time, it includes parity. It s not address the issue of pay equity.

Mrs Sullivan: Parity, then, will only last for the time od until the pay equity comes in for the nurses.

Mrs Blunt: That is correct.

Mrs Sullivan: Right, so then you will be behind again.

This morning we heard from the association for the mentally retarded, which talked about the difficulty it is facing in terms of its funding levels. When people are in institutions the funding levels are, I think, at the level of $103,000 per patient on average per year. When the patient is treated by the association, services in their homes or in a group home, the funding that is provided is $30,000. Are you finding the same gap in the funding available from the province for treatment in and out of homes or—it would not be the same gap because you are dealing with a different kind of institutional setting usually, but are you finding that what is being paid for your services is able to meet the professional requirements, the training requirements, at the same level that they would be met for the patients if the patients were in an institution?

Mrs Blunt: It certainly is not equal. I really believe that the problems we are experiencing with lack of funds for training and for program development are based on the funding model. This is something we feel really needs to be addressed.

There is a provincial average time per visit and rate per visit that are established, yet there are many differences in all areas of the province. For example, one of the problems that we have in Sault Ste Marie is servicing the outlying areas. The standard time per visit of 58.8 minutes and the one-visit fee do not cover it. If it takes my nurse half an hour to drive to Searchmont or Goulais River and a half-hour back, we are already in the hole just from travel alone. It does not cover the hour she might spend in the home doing care. So there are inequities in the funding system.

Mrs Sullivan: My riding is the same, where there are distances that have to be covered. Do we have time for one more question?

The Chair: One more short one.

Mrs Sullivan: Okay, great. I wanted to ask you about training. Several of the other presenters today talked about the necessity of leaving the community for training for their professional people. The additional cost—for example, of training in southern Ontario on even a short-term basis—is substantially higher than for training which would be received by a southern-located organization. Do you send your nurses out for training or do you do most of your training here?

Mrs Blunt: Whenever possible, we train locally, but there have been instances where we have had to send nurses away. One example is when we had a nurse trained as an enterostomal therapist. The only location for that training was in Toronto. Our enterostomal therapist is the only certified therapist for the community of Sault Ste Marie outside of the hospital sector. It took six weeks in Toronto, so there were travel expenses plus her expenses while she was there for a month and a half. That was the only place we could get the training. Wherever possible, we train locally.

Mrs Sullivan: Is there a provision for northern training? Is there an extra fee that you get?

Mrs Blunt: No. There are no training dollars specifically allocated in our fee.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for coming before this committee to give us an insight.

The committee recessed at 1458.

ONTARIO METIS ABORIGINAL ASSOCIATION

The Chair: The standing committee on finance and economic affairs will resume. Welcome to the standing committee on the budget hearings. Mr Daniels, will you identify yourself for Hansard, and your associate and the organization you represent.

Mr Bjornaa: I will handle that part. I am the president of the Ontario Metis Aboriginal Association, Olaf Bjornaa, and Mr Daniels is our assistant here too. He will give the presentation this afternoon.

The Chair: You have half an hour.

Mr Daniels: We will not take quite so long.

My name is Harry Daniels. I am the chief negotiator for the Ontario Metis Aboriginal Association. I must apologize because I am not the financial wizard of the place. There was a long time in getting a response from the committee and our financial consultant took a holiday. I am sitting in his place as chief negotiator and I will do the best I can.

There are some observations that I want to make first here. Everybody is getting an increase in your budget. Operating expenditures get increases, some as high as 122.7% for labour. Nowhere do I see an increase for aboriginal people. But we will deal with that maybe in the question and answer period if you wish.

On behalf of the forgotten people of this province, the Metis and those Indian people who do not live on reserve, first, I would like to thank you for giving us the opportunity to speak at this annual ritual to which our people have never had anything to say. The Ontario Metis Aboriginal Association represents approximately 200,000 of the 280,000 to 300,000 aboriginal people living in this province, or, according to government statistics, 72% of the aboriginal people of the province of Ontario.

In my opening remarks, I stated that we are the forgotten people. Our reasoning is very simple. The first nations, status people, who live on reserve fall under the jurisdiction of the federal government. If you read page 14—not 16 as indicated in the table of contents—of the Ontario budget, all three paragraphs with the title Equity for Aboriginal People refer to the first nations twice, with no mention whatsoever about the Metis or those Indians who do not live on reserves or the Inuit people. Even here we are lost between the pages. The federal government tells us that we are not its responsibility and the provincial government chooses to ignore us. Therefore, you understand why we are called the forgotten people.

In our letter of July 15, 1991, addressed to this committee, we have stated that we will speak in favour of the budget. Certainly this budget, for the first time in the history of the province, acknowledges that there are aboriginal people living here, but only the first nations, which number approximately 60,000 to 80,000 people. The 200,000 or more do not exist; the Metis are not even mentioned.

Unfortunately, our presentation does not sound like financial budget commentary, but a comedy of errors. Everybody wants to tell us where we belong or whose responsibility we are. We think it is time that we should tell that we are truly the first Canadians, committed to here for a long time, to fight for our aboriginal rights, they be they political, social, economical, educational, health, ad infinitum.

Let's go to the business of the budget. As I said before, this budget has good parts and also not-so-good parts. I would like to commend this government for stating that this budget "is taking tangible steps towards equity" for aboriginal people. This sounds like a great commitment, but the dollar figures attached to the statements are tokenism and are not directed to us; they are directed to the first nations. We are ignored once more.

The budget states that $48 million in 1991-92 are committed to improve the quality of life "that is long overdue for the aboriginal people of this land." We have gone through a very simple mathematical exercise. As stated before, there are approximately 280,000 to 300,000 aboriginal people in Ontario. Allocating the $48 million, means approximately $160 to $171.42 per annum for each aboriginal person living in this province. From the $20 million, $20 million is allocated to building communal infrastructures, mostly on reserves, such as water, sewer systems, housing and electrical power.

Here we want you to understand that there are still a very great number of aboriginal people living in this province who do not have decent housing, water, sewage, electricity—this in a province and country which claim to have a standard of living in the top 10 countries in the world and its citizens are ready for the 21st century.

Let's go back to the figures. From the $160 to $171.42 this time $66.66 to $71.42 will go for native communal infrastructures. This leaves us $93.34 to $100 for an improved quality of life.

But there is more; $5 million is allocated to the nation communities for 400 new day care spaces on reserves. This means that an additional $16.66 to $17.85 are given from the original $160, leaving us with a balance of $50.66, a maximum of $53.57 per individual for the groundwork: self-government, resolution of long-standing land claims, economic development, education initiatives at all levels, and, let us not forget, an improved quality of life that is long overdue, with the last $50 per individual.

All these objectives do not even address our people, the Metis and those Indian people who do not live on reserves. This is all for first nations. It does not address the other 200,000 people, that $48 million. It does not come close to it. There is no indication it will ever get to us. It is all earmarked for a federal responsibility, treaty and status Indians who get billions of dollars every year in infrastructure, social welfare payments, all kinds of things, and have a massive bureaucracy.

Yet when this government comes forward with a $48 million budget, what does it do? When you break it down vis-à-vis infrastructures, day care spaces, the groundwork for self-government, the resolution of long-standing land claims, economic development, educational initiatives, none of it arked for us, when there is a massive education budget for status Indians at the federal level, money for them to care spaces on reserves, money for them for infrastructures, but this government chooses to ignore and be inconsistent with the Constitution of Canada.

The Constitution of Canada states in section 35 that the original peoples of this country are the Indians, Inuit and Métis, yet the only federal responsibility they will accept is status Indians under the Indian Act and section 91.24 of the British North America Act and the 1939 In re Eskimo whereby the Inuit people—then known as Eskimos, and obviously—are Indians for the Indian Act.

Now this government takes its money and puts it out, but for first nations. Are we to assume that "first nations" is all aboriginal peoples in the province? I think not. Because the AFN, the Assembly of First Nations, deals with status Indians. "First nations" has become synonymous with treaty and status Indians. So the forgotten people, as we have been calling ourselves for 10 these 17 years, are forgotten again even in the Ontario budget. It is an oversight. We do not know this. Maybe there are things going to be done, but not in this budget. We will have to wait now until the 1992-93 budget to accommodate us. What do we do in the meantime is our question.

Our people do not want handouts and/or tokenism. We want to work and pay our taxes like every citizen of this province. We are taxpayers. We have no write-offs for treaty status or anything. We are taxpayers in this province, 200,000 of us. We need economic development dollars to take care of our needs.

In the last few years, the federal government, under the Indian aboriginal economic development strategy, has invested in this province, in the native business community, $50 million to $50 million. This very substantial investment was made by the federal government, which claims it is not responsible for us. The province, which maybe could be responsible for us, invested only approximately $6 million in business for Métis and Indians who live off reserve. This represents only an investment of 12% to 16% compared to the federal government, but every day we hear about matching contributions. What happens to matching contributions? Are we so obtuse that we do not understand simple mathematics? If you give Mr Bjornaa $50 million, give Harry Daniels $50 million. Do not give him $12 million and $6 million. But I only got 12% of what he got.

We do not want handouts. What we require is some real, tangible support to be able to raise money for economic development. This is the assistance we need. With your support, the federal government's support, we may be able to go to the private sector and sell them, let's say, some 10- or 15-year native economic development bonds or launch a native economic development fund. This could provide all the money we need for economic development of our people and our communities.

We and our people want to work and generate private community wealth. We were the first people who lived with the first settlers to teach them how to live and do business in this country. We were the first ones to teach you people how to do business here, nobody else, but we got lost in the shuffle somewhere.

A federal government study states that if the native communities' standard of living could be brought up to the level of Canadian communities, the gross national product would increase by 2%. If our standard of living was brought up, we could increase the projected Ontario 1991 gross domestic product by approximately $8.5 billion—not millions, but billions. If we used those kinds of standards and those kinds of equalization payments and those kinds of moneys to bring people up in their standard of living, we could bring up the gross domestic product of this province by $8.5 billion.

With this type of economic activity each year, we could take care of our people and our communities, and furthermore, we could contribute more to the province and federal coffers. Let us not forget that we are taxpayers.

We are also against the policy of increasing social assistance by 40%, which doubled compared to two years ago, from $2.5 billion to $4.9 billion, justified as necessary because of recessionary pressures. The economic future of this province and the country depends on increasing the economic development potential, not the social welfare system. Certain social programs ought to be maintained, but not social welfare. We do not want social welfare for our people; we want economic development. Transfer social welfare money. Instead of maintaining your bureaucracy that is going to spend that money on our people and to watchdog them, give us some money. We will create economic development for it. We will watchdog them and help them pay taxes and become business people in this province, or else at least have a job, because you cannot have everybody being a business person, or a business human or earthling, whatever we say nowadays.

The amount of $2.4 billion invested in economic development could generate tens of thousands of jobs and eliminate the necessity of increasing the social assistance programs. Only $5 million in loans made by our development corporation in the last 2.5 years—we have a development corporation; we have loaned out $5 million—has helped establish and expand approximately 80 small native enterprises, which has taken out of the social welfare net at least 400 people. This is money provided to us by the federal government.

Using the same ratios and performance, if the $2.4 billion increase in social programs were invested in native economic development, 38,400 new native enterprises could be developed and approximately 190,000 to 200,000 jobs could be created, therefore solving totally our people's economic problems with one decision and one stroke of the pen. Certainly it would take time, but you reinvest the money. You do not keep people on the lower end of the social strata, or at one end of the spectrum. We are not asking for that.

We are not asking for welfare. This country owes us something. Our ancestors owned this country. You people have come here as immigrants, and you are sons and daughters of immigrants and third and fourth generations, "This is my country now." Certainly it is; we will share it with you. But you have lived off our gross national product for 300 years and we cannot become part of the structure because you prefer to keep us in social programs. Granted, there are great steps being taken forward with the $48 million and other things like this, but we are sick and tired of it.

We have been approaching people for a long time. Mr Bjornaa here and our vice-presidents have been trying unsuccessfully to get a lot of money. The memorandum of understanding you have signed may be different.

As I stated, changing the $2.4 billion of social programs, using the formulas that the governments use, we could solve totally our whole economic development problem and take everybody off welfare and they would all be working, every last one of them, theoretically. This would be called real economic development, and the improved quality of life that is long overdue, as stated in the budget, would become reality.

Let's go back to reality. The employment equity action taken in this budget will be helpful in the long run. In the short term, training and retraining of our people is a greater priority.

The tripartite Canada-Ontario-OMAA memorandum of understanding signed on April 21, 1991, calls for the creation of a partnership to support the economic development of OMAA membership and the communities we live in. Notwithstanding that this document was signed after the budget was launched, we hope that the provisions contained in this unique agreement will overcome some of the deficiencies relating to OMAA and our people in this budget.

All we are asking is that you take some of that money and redirect it, make equalization payments and lateral transfer payments to us. Instead of supporting a bureaucracy in government, transfer some people to us, some resources, financial resources. We will take care of it. We were the business people here long before anybody else. The Metis were the interlocutors between the Indians and the white people for years because we were mixed bloods.

Go anywhere from here to the west, in any community: Who did the business in native communities until recently when all these big economic developments came for Indians? It was Metis people, the business people of this country. Who ran the fur trade? The Metis people. Sure, the control was with the Hudson's Bay Co or the North West Co, but who ran it? We have been in business for a long time, and although the door slammed shut because we are supposed to be a conquered people, all we are saying is, just open the door, let us back in. We will compete. Thank you very much.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Daniels, I want to thank you for your presentation. I found it very interesting. I was particularly interested because, just by coincidence, I was reading in the paper this morning that an ex-deputy minister of mine has just been appointed to head up the Canadian Council for Native Business.

I do not know how effective that is, but give me a better idea of the structure of the Metis business community. You say you are the forgotten people. The people who are on reserves, of course, are a finite number because that is where they are. How do you operate as a community? Are you together or are you dispersed throughout the general population? In order to be effective, to direct it right the Metis, there has to be some knowledge of the structure of the Metis business community. Can you spend a minute telling me about that?

Mr Daniels: That is a copout to say you cannot identify us. We can identify ourselves. Why do we always to answer to somebody? Name all your people? Do you ask the Jews to do that? Do you ask the Scots people to name all their people when you finance their joints? No.

I am not being angry with you. All I am saying is the principle is what we are talking about. Government has established that 72% of those people live off reserves and we represent them. Let's get the formula there, establish the principle. Who asked anybody in here or anywhere to name their numbers unless they go and do it themselves? Does anybody ask them to come with a census—there are so many Jews in Canada, many Ukrainians? They do not.

Mr Kwinter: I am not asking you for the number. You are saying: "Instead of setting up these programs for us, give us the money." I am asking, are you saying we should give the money to Harry Daniels and let him do what should be done with it?

Mr Daniels: He would drink it up.

Mr Kwinter: No, no, the point I am making is, what is the structure? When you come forward, what is the structure to deal with that?

Mr Daniels: We have the structure already. We have the ODC, the Ontario Development Corp, which handles millions of dollars every year. I am not being frivolous. I apologize if I have insulted you.

Mr Kwinter: You have not insulted me at all.

Mr Daniels: We have a structure already in place; perhaps, Olaf, you want to tell them about a few of those things.

Mr Bjornaa: We have a structure here within Ontario. It is hard to believe, to sit here and find government people who do not know that OMAA has a structure. We have been here for 20 years fighting with you, saying that. We have five zones within Ontario. We have zone 1 up in the north, we have zone 2, zone 3, zone 4 and zone 5. Our structure has a president, a vice-president, a secretary-treasurer, and they have their own board of directors who put things together.

It is like yesterday. We were in Toronto, at the committee on the Constitution, and we were asked, "How do we know what the native population is in the urban area?" I said, "When I go to Toronto, I turn the TV on." They say: "Well, here's the Jewish population. Over here is the Polish population and you could go on and on—"the Finnish area and here's the Chinese area." You identified us. You have been doing that for years. You say, "When a school bus comes in the community, there is the Indian bus, there is the white bus. You have identified us, put a label on us.

We have an inner structure. We have an ODC put together; we lend funds out. We took how many people off the welfare lines, put them into jobs and gave them something to be proud of. Once you get economic development, you get better homes, you get better education, be-care. You name it. We have proved this, we have this. Each person we put to work, this government return on its dollar. I do not know why the government is scared to put a dollar into OMAA, into our people. The time you put a dollar there, it is not lost in the bank; it comes back many times over.

Mr McLean: What effect will the agreement that was signed here a week or so ago with the Premier and Mr. Martin have on you?

Mr Bjornaa: I think he should sign likewise with the people as well as the first nations.

Mr McLean: Why were they not included?

Mr Bjornaa: I guess they chose not to.

Mr McLean: The 400 new day cares on reserves: how long has that been there? Is that just established?

Mr Daniels: I think the budget states—I have a mind to set a steel trap—400 new day care spaces. That is in the budget. They have more. These are new; we are supposed to be taking new day care spaces, and I would assume they are new.

Mr McLean: Are your present day care spaces filled to capacity?

Mr Daniels: I would say yes. We do not have anything to do with the reserves.

Mr McLean: What type of enterprises would they be, 400 new enterprises that were established? Marinas or what?

Mr Daniels: Owning some of the hydro that is coming out of the land, being partners in it.

Mr McLean: Partners with Kakabeka Falls?

Mr Daniels: The government.

Mr McLean: That is owned, I guess, by Ontario.

Mr Daniels: All the new structures coming out—why are we not be partners in this? It is on our land. We are going to say, "Let's be partners in that." You are taking our reserves. We lived on it for centuries and centuries—

Mr McLean: But my question was about the 80 enterprises that, you indicated in your brief, have kept 400 people off welfare. I am wondering what type of businesses they would be.

Mr Bjornaa: What type of business? The logging business; people own stores. We are no different from you people. We are not just qualified to go out and trap and do a little bit of fishing and stuff. We are qualified for almost any type of business that is available. The logging business, we have people there. We have people who own stores. People have gone into the fur business, some went into the tourist business. I could go on about the many businesses they have gone into. Our people have much knowledge. Some people have gone into consultant work.

Mr McLean: The last question I have for you is about the systems within your reserves. Who supplies the equipment?

Mr Bjornaa: We have no reserves.

Mr McLean: Not for Metis, no.

Mr Martin: I just wanted to say how much I appreciate your appearing here today and challenging us in the way that you have. I would hope and I am sure you will continue to do so.

I attended your assembly here in these hallowed halls a short while ago and was very impressed by some of the activity and the discussion that was going on around a myriad of issues. I was actually very moved to read the stories of some of the people who have risen to great heights in our communities and served in very professional ways, and who do well both in business and as part of the government structure in some instances.

I would certainly want to encourage our government to participate in whatever way it could to ensure that continues to happen.

I also read a letter that you wrote to the Sault Star not so long ago talking about the relationship you have developed with Mr Wildman and the Ministry of Natural Resources and this government, which speaks to some hope and development. Would you care to elaborate further on that?

Mr Bjornaa: I have stated very many times, because I met with different ministers, that I felt this new government that has come in—with the Metis people there has been a recession. The Sault and Canada right now are in a recession, they say. I felt that right here in Ontario with this new government and with the right kind of support, maybe the Metis people are coming out of the recession. Maybe we are going to see a light at the end of the tunnel and some real good will come out of this.

As we said before, the federal government has given us something, but the Ontario government has left us out in the cold. All we are asking is that the Ontario government recognize us as business people, as workers, as taxpayers, give us an equal chance, give us the right funds to work with.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for appearing before the committee.

Mr Daniels: I just wanted to say one thing: Metaphorically speaking, I hope the light at the end of the tunnel is not a train.

SAULT STE MARIE AND DISTRICT LABOUR COUNCIL

The Chair: We have 10 minutes on the schedule for the Sault Ste Marie and District Labour Council, so you can just make a brief runthrough of your presentation or a question and answer period. That is all the time we have left. Please identify yourself for Hansard.

Mrs Graham: My name is Sharon Graham. I am the president of the Sault Ste Marie and District Labour Council. You all have a written presentation in front of you. Since time is of the essence, I will just skirt over a few of the items we covered in here.

We talked about the all-party committee. We are glad you are here and we hope this is more than lipservice. We hope the agenda is not already etched in stone—the final results—as we felt it has been on some past committee sittings under previous governments.

We know there is an uproar going on about this budget. We would like to see everybody set their differences aside and let's get on with it. If people at the end of your term are not satisfied, they know where to put their X on the ballot. They should give this an opportunity to go through.

September 6 will be the first-year anniversary of the New Democrats, and part of what this brief deals with is the fact that it is not going to be a successful checkpoint, because there has been such a concerted effort by big business to put down and criticize this particular budget. The reason we believe they are doing this is because of the pending elections in British Columbia and Saskatchewan, and the federal one coming down the road. What would happen if this budget were successful? How could they deal with that?

We did not deal a lot with the figures in this particular brief because we know you have been inundated with figures, and you will be until the end of your hearings. We wanted to talk about what we saw as the root of some of the problems and concerns in areas that you are going to have to work with, in the ambitious agenda of the provincial budget.

We address the federal cutback of transfer payments, the free trade agreement and the GST, how they have been selling it to us and how it is impacting on us on a local basis. We were glad you did not go into capping the salaries of the public sector workers. On the federal agenda, they are doing that with the Public Service Alliance of Canada and we are very concerned about what direction that is going to go in and the kind of message that signals to Canadians as a whole.

We are concerned about the upcoming postal strike. We hope the provincial government will not be promoting the use of the mail services during that time. We know you are between a rock and a hard place. We know you do not entertain the interest of labour exclusively and you have to be all things to all people in the province, but Canada Post spent $190 million during the last struggle, and we do not want to be a part of helping them to get the union out or part of other problems that are going to happen.

One of the major things we are really concerned about in the downturn in our economy and the things that are happening is the fact that people are so desperate. In the last recession there were jobs, there were places to go to. This time around there is not. If there is no job, there is nothing else to go to.

One of the things we were looking at on a national level was a national day of protest. We were all going to travel to Toronto or Ottawa, but we decided against it because the reality is we would be pitting worker against worker. There is so little for people to go to. We were concerned that if someone took a day off to go to this protest, people would be lining up to take their jobs for a day. So we have decided, if we are going to do anything, it will be done on a local basis.

We talked about the inflated interest rates and the impact they are having. One of the things you will read here is about a local fellow who is involved in part of the Canadian Steel Trades Employment Congress training program that the steelworkers have going on here in conjunction with Sault College. He was trying to prepare for the downturn in his own family economy by refinancing his mortgage payment to make it lower. He went to the bank, he was told, "Let's wait till you miss your first payment then we'll deal with it," which just makes it clear to us the banks, when it is sunny and shining, give you an umbrella, and when it is raining they take it away.

We are really concerned about some of the attitudes that are happening. We realize you cannot do anything about your budget about that, but we feel it is impacting on acceptance and the implementation of your budget.

We are concerned, back again about the GST, about millions of dollars that were spent to sell this issue to the public. Then it was lowered to 7% from 9%. We are concerned that as soon as there is another election and if he manages to squeak through, how much will that GST be and how much more will that impact on our budgets?

We are concerned about deregulation of our transportation system, which has caused a lot of problems all across this nation. One that is a real issue to us right now is going into Toronto and having us land in Hamilton. In order to do that, we know there has to be some kind of improved transportation system on ground travel between those two centres.

We are concerned about the provincial funding, if part of the budget is going to be on those roads or that improved system, and hope they will get those moneys from the federal government. They have taken everything else away from us. We should hope that if it is being changed because of their initiative, they should be responsible for it.

We know the auto insurance is going to be a major concern. There are 46 labour councils in the province. Ours is only one of them and we have received no more than seven calls from one public relations firm asking us if we want an expert speaker on auto insurance from the Insurance Bureau of Canada. There are a lot of dollars being spent on that and I can see that you are going to have to spend a lot of dollars of your budget to try to implement whatever program we come up with.

We are concerned municipally about what has happened with the UI bill and the increase in our local payments to the welfare system. With this introduction of federal policy, you have to work longer to collect less for a shorter period of time. That is really impacting on Ontario.

We are glad that the Conference Board of Canada has seen some pluses in your budget. May others soon see their wisdom too. The same naysayers who screamed that we were off track about free trade are now criticizing the budget. I believe some of them are suffering from free trade and I cannot believe they are not trying to give the chance. They know we all talked against free trade and went through and they are having problems. If they just let this go on, it might be interesting.

I was sorry to see that Mr Harris is not here today. I wanted to encourage him to get on the track of serving his constituents rather than his federal counterpart's agency. I also wanted to ask him how I got on his mailing list. If anybody can answer that for me.

In closing, I would just like to reiterate that the standing committee on finance and economic affairs certainly has a frustrating and, I am sure, enlightening task ahead of has probably never been any provincial budget such careful scrutiny from so many different interests and the media. It is truly a trailblazing budget. A member of our local media challenged us, through his commentaries, saying that the labour movement and the New Democrats are not supporting this budget and fighting back against big business for all its sins. He said that if we did not take a stand, the reality would be that the New Democrats would be a one-time mention on the map of Ontario. I would just like to say that labour is here to rise to the occasion and to publicly support the budget as a whole. Some of labour are not satisfied with it entirely, but it is a heck of a lot better than what we have ever been presented before. We wish you continued success on the implementation of this and will be of assistance in any way we can.

The Chair: Does the committee want to ask one question each? The time has expired for the presentation. It is up to the committee. I am just the Chairman here.

Mrs Sullivan: We have to get to the airport now.

The Chair: Okay. Thank you for your presentation before the committee. It is too bad other things came up and that you were not able to be here on time. This committee is dismissed.

The committee adjourned at 1600.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Wednesday 14 August 1991

The committee met at 0900 in the Senator Hotel, Sudbury.

Resuming consideration of the 1991-92 provincial budget.

The Chair: Good morning. The standing committee on finance and economic affairs will continue its budgetary hearings here in Sudbury.

SUDBURY AND DISTRICT LABOUR COUNCIL

The Chair: We would like to call on the first witnesses, from the Sudbury labour council. Would you please come forward? Please identify yourself for Hansard. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. You will have one half-hour. Out of that half-hour, try to use some time at the end for questions of the three parties. The time left will be allocated in equal amounts.

Mr Tooley: Good morning. I am Barry Tooley, president of the Sudbury and District Labour Council. A warm welcome to Sudbury. I am glad to see that this government is making a real effort to reach out to the people of Ontario by holding public hearings across the province on the budget. The members appreciate your efforts.

I represent the Sudbury and District Labour Council, with a membership in excess of 15,000. This labour council is proud to be here today supporting the budget put forth by the Honourable Treasurer Floyd Laughren, a budget that really invests in creating jobs for the people in Ontario. We support the budget, where $700 million will be used to provide direct employment to thousands of Ontario workers. The budget provides $175 million, which is retroactive to October 1, 1990, which will ensure workers will not be forgotten when companies declare they are bankrupt and workers have not been paid wages owed to them. This budget provides $3.2 million to help workers re-enter the market and improve their skills.

We in labour see this budget as no different than any business venture or a person who takes a mortgage on a house. It is considered an investment in the future. This budget will stimulate the economy by creating approximately 70,000 jobs. The 1991 budget will provide a system of tax fairness by ensuring that those at the upper end of the income scale pay a greater share. The recently established Fair Tax Commission will be reviewing and suggesting a fair and equitable tax system for the province.

We in northern Ontario are pleased with the initiatives in this budget to provide improvements to the northern Ontario travel grants. Northern residents will no longer have to face undue hardships when they are forced to travel to southern Ontario for medical treatment. This budget recognizes the higher gasoline prices in northern Ontario. Residents of northern Ontario will be exempt from paying the motor vehicle registration fee.

Many northern communities, especially single-industry towns, are suffering from long-term structural changes and the highest unemployment in the province. This government took office in the midst of the most severe recession experienced in the past 50 years and, unlike other recessions, this one is more serious because its effects are expected to last longer and our economic base is changing; 65% of major layoffs were due to permanent plant closures compared to 24% in 1982, while bankruptcies have increased by 73% compared to 24% in the last recession. In communities across the province, this recession is causing tremendous hardship for people and their families. We only have to glance at the increase in those needing social assistance to know that Ontario, its businesses and people have been hardest hit by this current downturn.

This budget not only picks up the slack in federal funding commitments for health, education and social assistance, but it also creates or maintains 70,000 jobs. We have maintained vital public sector services, especially health care and education, while building sustainable prosperity for jobs for the future. This budget is fighting this recession through undertaking the most aggressive anti-recession effort in all of Canada through increasing overall spending by 13.4%, the $700-million anti-recession program where, when combined with the contributions of local government and agencies, total spending will exceed $900 million.

This budget is helping to maintain health care and education in the province. The budget responded to the need for action in such areas as worker protection, pay equity, social assistance reform, affordable housing and the environment. This budget is putting spending power in the hands of Ontarians. By not imposing the provincial sales tax on the GST we are leaving $470 million in the pockets of consumers in 1991 and enriching the Ontario tax reduction for low-income earners. In recognition of the difficulties confronting northern Ontario people, its 30%, or $211 million of that anti-recession program, has already been allocated to help fund projects in communities across the north.

Some of the initiatives introduced in this budget include:

A $215-million social assistance reform package on a full year that is designed to provide benefits for those who are in greatest need, to help people get into the labour force, to increase fairness and accessibility and to provide further relief to overburdened municipalities; the largest enrichment in the history of the Ontario tax reduction program. This $50-million enrichment means the number of low-income earners whose Ontario income tax will be eliminated or reduced will increase to 700,000 for the 1991 tax year.

Other tax moves include an increase to the personal income surtax rate from 10% to 14% on Ontario income tax in excess of $10,000; an increase in the capital tax on banks and loan and trust companies from 0.8% to 1%; and eliminating the tax exemption for insurance companies on certain auto insurance premiums.

An additional $12 million for new shelter beds and enhanced services for women who are victims of domestic violence, and an increase of more than $8 million to expand and enhance services for women and children who are victims of sexual assault; $125 million will be made available to our transfer agencies, to major ones such as municipalities, school boards, hospitals, universities and colleges and to other agencies, to assist them with the cost of pay equity; $24 million in 1991-92 for employment equity initiatives in the Ontario public service.

An unprecedented level of provincially supported housing activity for the development of another 10,000 non-profit housing units, which will cost the province approximately $150 million in annual operating subsidies when completed; Ontario Hydro's commitment of $232 million for conservation efforts in 1991-92; a three-year $10-million program to assess abandoned mine hazards and take remedial work; $152 million for increased investment in the development of new technologies; a manufacturing recovery program worth $57 million for financial assistance to small- and medium-sized manufacturing firms; $100 million in programs to assist farmers with interest rates and a gross revenue insurance program; and $24 million in 1991-92 for employment equity initiatives within the Ontario public service.

In summation, this budget has taken the humane approach in the face of severe criticism from the business community and of course our federal government, which has literally given Canada away with its policies. I thank you for this opportunity to appear before this committee with our views on the budget and I would be happy to answer any questions.

Mr Kwinter: Thank you very much for making your presentation, Mr Tooley. I would have been a little happier if it had been really your presentation. All you have really done is to read the government news release on the budget. If you take a look at page 3 on your comments, you did not even go to the trouble of changing the adjective where it says, "We have maintained vital public sector services." This is verbatim the government's press release on the budget.

I would like to ask you one question. Again this is right out of the press release of the government and you are reading it. It says: "This budget recognizes the higher gasoline prices in northern Ontario. Residents of northern Ontario will be exempt from paying a motor vehicle registration fee." I am sure you realize they have reduced the registration fee but increased the price of gasoline, so on net there is no saving to northern Ontario residents at all. As a matter of fact, it is going to cost them considerably more money. Do you have any feelings about that?

Mr Tooley: We are aware that the gas prices are continually on the increase. However, any benefit that northern Ontarians derive from the initiatives we would most certainly support, because we have always had higher gasoline prices in northern Ontario.

Mr Kwinter: And you would support higher gasoline prices in northern Ontario?

Mr Tooley: No, I certainly do not support higher gasoline prices in northern Ontario.

Mr Kwinter: What are you saying?

Mr Tooley: I say I am supporting the initiative the government has taken—

Mr Kwinter: To increase gasoline prices in northern Ontario.

Mr Tooley: —eliminating the registration fee in northern Ontario people.

Mr Kwinter: But as I say, there is no saving. They are taking it out of one hand and they are saying, "We're going to reduce that but we're also going to increase it." The net effect to northern Ontarians is that they are paying more money for gasoline and more money to drive.

Mr Tooley: I am not sure there is that much of a disparity between northern Ontario gas prices and southern Ontario's. There is some disparity, but I have travelled in southern Ontario and have paid very, very close to the same prices we paid in northern Ontario.

Mr Kwinter: I think you should talk to your friends because, for the six years I have been in the Legislature, the members from northern Ontario have been standing up and complaining about the price disparity on a regular basis. They are saying, "Why does it cost more money to buy gasoline in the north than it does in the south when you can buy beer or liquor in the north at the same price as in the south?" It is a standard argument I have been hearing for six years.

Mr Tooley: We most certainly agree that the gasoline prices are too high.

Mr Kwinter: You just said they were not too high.

Mr Tooley: I am saying in general, right across Ontario and across Canada. When you look at the exodus of people going across the borders to purchase gasoline that invariably comes from Canada at a lower price on the other side of the border, there is something wrong with our system.

Mr Phillips: On jobs, I am always mildly surprised that labour councils are not kind of railing at the budget in terms of the unemployment rate for the future because, you know, the budget plans for the next three years for the unemployment rate to stay around 9% to 10%. You say it creates 70,000 new jobs. In fact, if you get into the budget, it does not create any new permanent jobs. Your statement on creating new jobs is wrong. It maintains jobs. It does not create any new jobs.

My question to the labour council really is, are you going to be satisfied with an unemployment rate in this province of that 9% to 10% over the next three years? This budget predicts? If not, I am surprised the labour council is not far more aggressive in terms of creating jobs. The reason I raise this is, as you know, a year ago, Ontario's unemployment rate was the lowest in the country. It is now it is the fifth lowest in the country so we are heading in the wrong direction. I would like the labour council's comments on our job creation programs in this budget over the next three years.

Mr Tooley: Certainly we would like to see an unemployment rate of zero. If we look at the policies that have been in place right across Canada, I think we are looking at a 10.5% unemployment rate. In Ontario this government has taken initiatives in maintaining those 70,000 jobs, and in the initiatives in the non-profit housing, there are going to be jobs created in the construction industry. Of course, when we are in a recession I think it would be unrealistic to look at a zero unemployment rate. Most certainly, with the initiatives put forward by this budget and the government, we would have no problem supporting the budget.

Mr Phillips: You know that the unemployment rate will be 10% next year in the middle of an economic recovery and you are still satisfied with that?

Mr Tooley: I am certainly not satisfied with that and I dispute your figure of 10.5% next year.

Mr Phillips: It is not mine; it is the budget's.

Mr Tooley: The economic predictions that are coming out now certainly indicate that we would be going into a recovery and of course there would be some jobs created.

Mr Phillips: No, those are not mine; they are from the budget. Page 43 in the budget says we will have real economic growth next year of 3.4% and the unemployment rate in the province will be 9.7%. I am just shocked the labour council is not saying "that is unacceptable."

Mr Tooley: Of course it is unacceptable, and it is unacceptable to the labour council when we see the exodus of manufacturing jobs and the exodus of businesses south of the border. There have been no initiatives by prior governments to take any steps to alleviate the exodus of businesses out of the province.

Mr Phillips: Does it strike you as ironic that this budget, when the full impact is felt, still sees unemployment at 9.7% next year?

Mr Tooley: I suppose those are predictions and I think they could change.

Mr Jamison: We are talking about the budget in general and that is what I would like to zero in on: the effects of the budget to really help at this point in time the needs of the north and, in particular, northeastern Ontario. The funds from the anti-recession package for northeastern Ontario amount to about $131 million. That accounts for about 19% of the anti-recession program. In Sudbury alone I guess the amounts are about $18 million; and if you look out the window you see people, construction workers, working.

The question I have for you, because you are a citizen of Sudbury, is, what do you feel would have been the effect if no funding had come through, if in fact cutbacks had taken place? There are two opposing views here and we have to realize that. What do you feel the effect on Sudbury during this severe recessionary period would have been if, in fact, the Mulroney theme had been followed by the Ontario government?

Mr Tooley: Most naturally, I feel it would be devastating, not only to Sudbury, but to all of northern Ontario, and the initiatives not been taken to inject funding for job creation. We have seen the increases in bankruptcies, in personal businesses and personal bankruptcies and it is something that is devastating to any community.

Sudbury is one of the more fortunate communities, of course, with the price of nickel remaining relatively stable—and those markets have been good in general to Sudbury—but the small businesses are still going under, because people in recessionary times are just not spending dollars, so there has to be something to create a feeling of wellbeing in a community in order to get people spending more.

Mr Christopherson: I would like to thank you very much for your presentation. I appreciate it. I would like to get specific about local matters.

When we were in the Sault we had a chance to meet with some of the officials from the economic development corporation there and some of the work that they are looking at. Sudbury came up in the discussions as an example of what a community can do when there is co-operation between labour, government, business and the general community.

Apparently, your project, initiated sometime in the late 1970s or early 1980s—I believe it is called Project 2001, though I stand to be corrected—and I would be interested to hear from you, from labour's point of view, how you approached those discussions. How was it that you held comfortable meetings with what are not normally traditional partners, and how did you go about bringing this whole community to focus on this one endeavour, and then have everybody behind it and quite frankly, to have succeeded so well?

I drove through here not too long ago and I heard the radio, as a public service, announcing with pride what had been done here in Sudbury and thanking those who were involved a few years ago and saying, "Thanks to that, we have a diversified economy," and talking about why you have what you have. From your point of view, I would like to know just a little bit of the history of how you became involved in that. How did you make it work?

Mr Tooley: I think it was a realization not only from labour's side, but the business community's side, that we were in difficult economic times, and that if we were going to succeed, in order to be able to create anything within this community, we had to get rid of the adversarial position that labour usually finds itself in. It was co-operation from many sides that allowed some of this economic recovery to take place so successfully in Sudbury.

Mr Christopherson: They diversified the economy too. Could you give me an idea of how you went about that? What were some of the things that you looked at?

Mr Tooley: Some of the things were secondary manufacturing jobs that were relative to the mining industry and, in some cases, exporting. I guess Burgess Powertrain would be an example where they manufactured certain parts for the US army, and those areas. Just in general, there was co-operation from many, many different sectors in order to come up with different ideas to create different jobs.

Mr McLean: I would certainly like to have obtained the views of the Sudbury labour council this morning and your personal view, sir, rather than the speech you wrote that we have already heard about three times. It is unfortunate that the council has not drafted its own submission, in my opinion, and so I really have no further questions to ask.

Mr B. Murdoch: I pass.

The Chair: You have none? Does the opposition have another question? We have 10 minutes left.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chair, can I ask—

Mr McLean: Mr Chair, I thought the time was split up and if each party wanted to use it, then it was their choice.

Mr Sutherland: Sorry, Mr Chair, if you have objections, fine, then we move on to the next one; but if you have no objections, what time is left can be divided between the other parties if you do not want to use your time.

The Chair: We can have a recess for 10 minutes. Thank you for coming, Mr Tooley.

The committee recessed at 0922.

JAMES N. GRASSBY

The Chair: We will call the next group forward, the Sudbury Social Agency Network. Would the people involved in this group please come forward? Dr James N. Grassby is the name I have got down here. Is the gentleman present?

Dr Grassby: Oh, he is.

The Chair: Come forward, sir.

Dr Grassby: I do not know whether or not he is a gentleman.

The Chair: You will have half an hour and after your presentation the time will be divided among the three parties. I understand now that if any party gives up its time it is not going to be divided among the other parties. Is it agreed that the same applies to the other two? Okay, fine.

Dr Grassby: Did I hear you correctly, Mr Chair; did you say I had 30 minutes and 10 minutes of questions, or 20 minutes and 10—

The Chair: No, you have 30 minutes total. After your presentation, the remaining time, up to that 30 minutes, will be divided among the three parties equally.

Dr Grassby: Thank you very much for inviting me. I am not sure whether I came under false pretences. Normally I do, but today I tried not to. I am a worker on the street. I am a retired senior executive from a large multinational company in New York City where I learned my street work. My current activities are running the United Way—behind the scenes, of course—and the action centre for youth on the street, and consulting at the university and teaching. So I have a diverse kind of representation, having run the cancer society and many other social agencies.

I do represent the group, although my presentation today is not exactly what you might expect. I have made presentations like this before royal commissions and others, and usually I forget my notes and I have to speak extemporaneously. Today I have not done that. I have forgotten my glasses and I cannot see what I am presenting. I am hoping it will have rather more clarity for you than it does for me.

My first thought was to try to convince this group that very often new governments, dedicated to reform and change, tend to reform and change the status quo rather than doing what is called—there is a term in industry for when you go back and you call it zero budgeting. You look at the basics of the economy and say, “What the hell would you want to do if you started from scratch?” It is so easy to get caught up in the day-to-day rat race of running a government, or endeavouring to—it is very difficult—instead of saying: “How did the economy get this way? How did it get this way, were the forces positive or negative that shaped it?”

I would rather that you try to not look too much at the notes for the moment, but to put your thinking cap on and try to do some visualization of what I am talking about.

What percentage of people were on the farm 150 years ago? It was 65%. What percentage of the people were in manufacturing: railroads, railroad ties, railroad tracks and things of that nature? It is only 20%, 25%. What fraction of the people were dilettantes or conspicuous consumers per Thorstein Veblen? A very small number. And how many people ran the economy in the States or Canada or Britain or Germany or France? A small group, a group no different in size perhaps, in absolute terms, than the group today.

I think it is vital that we understand how the economy has got to where it is and how the rates of change confront some of the people who are subjected to the results of the rates of change and some of the people who are putting the rates of change into effect.

We all know that most of the western democracies, with the exception of the Churchillian phrase of their being the worst governed of all types except this one, have not served their citizens as well as they could have been served had they taken a very cold-blooded—not necessarily cold-hearted—look at what we were planning to do.

If I were to form a government today, would I sit down and say, on zero-based budgeting: “I shall have 10% unemployed. I shall have 6% homeless. I shall have 22% of the children starving. I shall have a third of the people without medical care.” Of course I would not do that. I would say: “What is the wealth-producing potential of the socioeconomic mechanism? How will I maximize wealth production? How will I guarantee that everybody has a subsistence level with respect to the human term: living, not as a mere existence, but living as a human being?” I would go on from there, and when I had built a model—and I was at one time the world’s leading expert in the application of advanced technology to the mining industry, so I know all about models, male, female, mathematical—I would compare my model with the reality of today and I would see what the magnitude of change would be that was needed to move from where we are to where we should be. I think it would be very dangerous if I did not build those models and I simply took my government, as it were, and said, “We will have to tinker with it and we will have to tinker with that,” because we might not end up with the end product we want.

So I would like to look at the structural changes that have occurred over the last century and a half. I know that everybody here is probably more expert than I in certain fields of what we are going to discuss. I think I have done a fairly good job of generalizing my approach to western omies, having been privy to correspondence between Maynard Keynes and Kenneth Galbraith and others in the early 1930s because my father was a learned expert of what makes economies tick and stick.

Why is it that there is a natural trend in most economies, from the days of Alexander the Great to the days of John Mulroney and Ronald Reagan, for wealth to be easily transferred from the poor to the rich? Why is it so difficult to transfer wealth from the rich to the poor? The answer, of course, is extremely simple to define.

You all know the story of the tragedy of the commons, 10 shepherds who each had 100 sheep on a common and that fed 1,000 sheep very well indeed. One SOB—this is a mining term for a chap who works on the 13th—decided he would increase his income by 10% by buying one sheep. And he did. He now had 11 sheep, and said to himself—a very clever, machiavellian, legalistic, bombastic individual—“Nobody even noticed this because it is only a 1% loss to each of the others.” Of course, the commons collapsed because it could not stand overgrazing.

Take that analogy and look at what happens when we transfer wealth from the rich to the poor. Here are the three poorest people in the country and here are the 97 not-so-rich people. We wish to give a few dollars to each of these poorest people from the capacious pockets of these people and we can take $70,000 from each of them. It may represent 1% of their income. When we disperse it over these people, it becomes such a small amount these poor people hardly notice it. So the pressure to get this few dollars is less than the pressure to resist its transfer.

However, think of the reverse. If we wish to give these well-connected individuals a few bucks, we only have to take a few pennies from the poor and they do not notice it. We do that each year, a few pennies, at the end of 10 years there is a significant shift. It is inevitable that this will happen. The reason for that of course is a very simple power structure syndrome.

Behold the moose. The moose decides that there is a good way to transfer the best genes of the moose, and that is to have the widest antlers and the strongest head. So the moose goes about butting other moose in a very noisy and sometimes colourful display and guarantees that that particular life form will get the best genes.

We are no different from the moose, except for one thing: we have much more capacity; more than a hard head and more than wide antlers. We have the ability to seduce, to flatter, to lie, to connive, to be slippery, slimy, slithery, oily individuals, much more substantially than the moose. So the genes that are transferred are not necessarily the best genes. They might be the best power-seeking genes.

There will always be a power structure. From the emperors to the popes to the kings to the presidents to the bankers to the industrial tycoons to the military/industrial complex, there will always be a power structure, and to change about it is to be impractical. What you have to do is figure out how to counter it. If you are the victim of a power structure in the school system or in the church or in some place, what you have to do is to get your fellow victims together and seek out a common cause.

This is a most difficult thing to do. A common cause among the people in this room, some of whom are tall and some of whom are short, and some of whom are fat and some of whom are thin, and some of whom are black and some of whom are red and some of whom are white, is awfully difficult to isolate because there are so many different components of each of our approaches to society, economics and all these things.

Unless you can find common cause—and friend Barry here knows all about that; he is in the labour union. I worked in the days in the mines when labour unions were exceptional by virtue of their absence. People had to come together with a common cause. I formed co-operative credit societies, five of them, credit unions, because the banks did not trust the workers. We had to find a common cause, our inability to be capitalized.

So wherever you can get people to find a common cause which avoids the differences that separate them in other aspects of their lives, then it is possible to introduce change.

What is this economy we are discussing? I think there are three economies. There is the subsistence economy, and you know what that is. It is food, clothing, shelter, education, the arts, transportation, housing. Without that, society cannot function. Then there is the discretionary economy, which over time has become larger than it was in days gone by, the second radio set, the second TV, the second Skidoo, the second this, the second that. Then there is the frivolous economy, and I do not use that term in a pejorative sense, but only in an economic sense. Items that are part of the frivolous economy contribute nothing really to human experience or to the wellbeing of society, and they include the hula hoops, vaginal deodorants, cigarettes, cigars and Rolls-Royces, which consume much gas per mile.

These three kinds of economies have something to say about the stability of the totality of the economy. If we have a very large proportion of our workers producing things that have no utility, when a downturn comes or a problem comes, you can turn off that part of the economy, so what happens is that you have what is called the normal business cycle. It is no more normal than the shape of my head. It is forced on us because we distort the realities of the subsistence economy. So wise people have said, “If we’re going to have an unstable economy, then let’s put some props under it so it doesn’t shake.”

Turn, if you would, to diagram 1, called page 1. Here we show the 19th-century typical economy: a huge item for farming, fishing, forest operations and mining; a smaller section for heavy industry, transportation and manufacturing; and less so for services, professions, others and dilettantes. Then the little tiny group at the top controlling, that is the power group and the wealth-seeking group.

Turn the page over and you will find the same thing 150 years later, and my God, what a difference. The farming, fishing, forest operations and mining are now a small part of the total economy and the heavy industry, transportation, high tech and manufacturing not too different in size from days gone by, but the services, professions, administrators, white-collar and others—and, may I say it, governments—occupy a huge section.

I say that picture has a visual instability compared to the other one. It is more easily pushed over, and you know damned well it is, because from 1850 till now we have had a series of recessions and depressions that indicate that there are inherent instabilities.

You see, when you look at the first stage, one of the elements in stability is that everybody is needed as a worker to keep it going, because there is so little surplus.

Let's take the goods-producing section out of our economy, page 3. The subsistence part was very large. The discretionary, the semi-luxury goods, the grand piano and a few other things, were fairly modest. Frivolous, conspicuous consumption again, as per Veblen, was not terribly large, and the theft of course was about what it is now: the Dutch tulip scandal; the Teapot Dome scandal; the Whitney scandal in the stock market, 1929; the Samuel Insull holding companies; the Boesky $500-million-a-year ripoff in Wall Street of a few years ago. The theft section is always with us.

Turn the page again. Now we have the goods-producing section of our modern economy, and the subsistence section is not too different in terms of the things that produce it, the discretionary is quite large, but the frivolous is huge.

I went to a store the other day. My wife fell and broke her leg. I needed a piece of tape to tie it up, and I went to the drugstore and looked for a piece of adhesive tape and there were 17 different kinds. I need a new car. My car is 11 years old, and I go to the manufacturers and there are 450 kinds. That is an element of complexity and overuse of materials and energies and resources that is frighteningly expensive. We have been so conned by the advertising and the song and dance about how good it is to have three Skidoos that we have an element of instability in the goods-producing economy which is frightening. I call it low utility, medium utility and high utility.

Now we go to page 5 and we say, "What the hell have we done over the years to try to modify the effects of the increasing instability caused by this complexity and this misuse of resources for frivolous goods?" I have got some props there; see the props on page 5? They are called medicare, family allowances, welfare, pensions, unemployment insurance, which is spelled wrong. We struggle. Some political parties struggle quite hard to put into place props to prevent people from dropping through the cracks in the system, or the cracks becoming too wide.

That is very interesting. It leads you to asking the question, "I wonder whether it might not be a good idea to put all those God-damned props into one pot and make one big prop as an integral part of the total system," and if it were not for that, maybe we would use it, because it is a dirty word.

Now, when man was good on this earth, by some peculiar circumstance, because he has not been very good to the earth, there certainly must have been inherent in his system two powerful instinctive forces, one for competition and one for co-operation. The competition was actually essential, absolutely essential, because you had to compete with volcanoes and blizzards and storms and lions and sabre-toothed tigers and all kinds of things, so you had to compete against the elements to survive. Co-operation was an instinctive thing that said, "Unless we do it together, we won't be able to do it." There is no way that one little can fight a sabre-toothed tiger. This is kind of a dig operation, so they have to co-operate and dig a pit to catch him.

We seem to have in our economy perverted the competition element. We compete only with each other now, by doing so we are brutal, absolutely brutal. We use the word "competition" to mean something which it is not at all. We are going to become more competitive: we are going to reduce everybody's wages; we are going to reduce the standard of living; and we are going to stop giving medicare because it is too expensive.

Let me tell you something about medicare. The United States spends 37% more money on medicare than we do, their administration costs are three times as high; there are 37 million people without any service, and we say our system is too expensive. Somebody is crazy.

We have to increase and induce more pressure toward co-operative activity. When we have done that—the labour unions, the credit unions, the co-operative housing, consumer co-ops—it has worked. It has worked very well indeed. I know this from experience.

Speaking of experience, you might wonder why I have the nerve to come and present myself to this august group. Well, I want to tell you something about wisdom, experience and education. I am well into my eighth decade. I have been around. I have been a leading expert in technology, engineering in a wide variety of fields. I know my stuff. When I used to 10 years ago when I retired—I am out of date now.

Wisdom comes from good judgement, and good judgement comes from experience, and experience comes from bad judgement, and wisdom can only be transmitted to learners through education; therefore education is, in part, the ability to transmit wisdom, based on experience, without the trauma of the results of bad experience. It is complicated.

What I am trying to do today is stimulate a little thought about looking at some of the basic components of economies and how they change, how the potential production of wealth and goods is maintained, whether or not the people who shift paper on Wall Street really make a contribution.

I worked on Wall Street for seven years, and I would go down to work early because I was a bachelor at the time, a pseudo, and watched the 110,000 people go into the World Trade Centre, then at 5 o'clock, I would rush down to see what came out. Any nickel, any copper, any wheat, any ore, any cars? Not a damned thing, and I said to myself, "There is something odd about a system that can supply 150,000 people at huge wages, when the miner and the farmer and the garbage man, who are very important, do not get that kind of wages." It puzzled me.

In this community I am on the cancer society; member of the on-wheels; the United Way; Laurentian University development; built the University of Sudbury; sat on the board for 30 years—I am still there; I have been 10 years with the United Way. I know this community. But I have also been world conferences on bi-regional development and futures. I know something about the global structure. In order to act as a government in the budgetary and economic field locally, you have got to know something about the globe. You have got to know something about the pressures that will fight you and will co-optate with you. That is tough, because governments do always have friends in every single element of society. There is an inherent thing in governments which I wish to bring out, and it is called the corruption of longevity, this is the most insidious form of corruption there is. In 40 years in this province, we had a bland party that ran things, and they were not consciously corrupt. They were corrupt by virtue of the fact that when you are in power too long, anything goes, and it seems all right because it worked last time. We have found that in Ottawa, the party whose name shall not be mentioned, and in Ontario, and very often you find that there is an inherent corruption in longevity, so we need change.

Now a government comes into being and wishes to change things, and the previous administration changed the welfare system through the Transitions report, the Emerson report, and it is a very beautiful report. I have done some work with moneys from the Laidlaw Corp to do this thing and to implement it. It does not matter what party, you see. It does not matter whether it is this party or that party, if you do an objective analysis of the realities of the economic situation, there will always come forward an economic truth, which is not necessarily a myth.

Adam Smith had two great expressions, only one of which is remembered. Adam Smith, the great Scottish economist, said that society is best served by the multitude of decisions made by people seeking their own ends, and he said, "However, when businessmen of the same ilk come together, whether for pleasure or business, the consumer always suffers." So there are these two counterforces.

I hate labels. I do not want you to ask me what party I am from, what church I go to, what colour my skin is, or anything like that because we tend to listen to who is saying what is being said, rather than what is being said. I think that a government as new as this Ontario government needs to take the bull by the horns and—what was the name of the golfer over the weekend? John Daly. He went broke. He did not give a damn about the water, about the sand or about the distance. He just went for broke.

New governments have four to five years in which to make an impression on the permanence of change. It took a fellow in Saskatchewan who is interested in introducing medicare many years to do it. You cannot do these things in one year, so what governments do, they should be able to incorporate into the structure of the economy and the society as permanent elements. Sometimes you need outside support and outside consultation for this. You get so busy running a government, whether you are on the government's side or the opposition's side or the fringe side that it is hard to do new thinking.

I think we need to hire the best brains to do a fast systems study of our medical system. There is a perfect example in both papers this morning. I get up at 5 and I read all the newspapers, and the doctors have been told to stop taking freebies. Well, that is going to cut the cost of medicare, and they are doing it before they are forced to because they recognize it is unseemly. Medicare could be reduced in costs by transferring the services so that low-cost services are given to low-cost needs. Do not put home-care patients in high-care beds. You need some of that as a new government.

Somehow you have to do something with the educational system. I work on the streets with kids in trouble with the law, drugs, prostitution, alcohol, homelessness, helplessness, low self-esteem, malnutrition, family dysfunction, physical violence, sexual violence, psychological violence. The educational system is not supposed to correct all these things, but some kind of educational system is needed to change things. The dropout thing is one of the problems.

Now, every time somebody screams against the government because of a deficit—I want you to—none of you are old enough to do this, damn it. In 1939, we had just been through the world's worst depression, and there was no money or welfare. There was no money for unemployment insurance. There was no money. But on September 3, the first shot was fired between Germany and Poland; by God, there was money for everything. Now, do not give me this crap about a deficit. Deficits are no problem. We solve them by inflation. So the governments pay them back with low-cost dollars. The deficits have never destroyed a country until inflation got too bad, as in Germany in 1923. Naturally, there has to be some control. If we need to develop high technology in this province to replace those jobs that have fled to countries where they can pollute to their hearts' content and rob their workers to their hearts' content, government and labour and management have to come together and develop a new infrastructure for making business viable, economically sound and develop new educational systems that prepare our people for those jobs.

I got into trouble at a golf club in Bracebridge last week when I asked the students from university who were serving behind the bar what the native confederation was. None of them knew. The manager came to see me on the first tee and said, "You shouldn't do that." I said, "Why not?" He said, "They don't even know what confederation means." There is lots to be done.

The Chair: Sir, there is time for one question per party, unless you want to go your own time out.

Dr Grassby: No, that is fine.

The Chair: We have about one minute per party so we will start off with the NDP.

Mr Sutherland: I certainly hope I look as youthful as you do when I hit my eighth decade, if I do hit an eighth decade. I just wanted to ask you about your focus on training and education. Could you give us some specific ideas of what we could implement that would help some of those people you deal with on a regular basis with your involvement with the Sudbury Social Agency Network.

Dr Grassby: There are two levels. First, the level of the dysfunctional child from a dysfunctional family who is an early dropout. What we do there is seek the network in the community that will support that child and will get him back into the educational system and give him the basics.

You cannot think if you cannot read. You cannot assess if you cannot add. So that group needs the basics.

But what we need in the general education system is an entire new viewpoint being presented to the children. Why are there no damn girls in engineering and science? Because we have stereotyped who is a scientist and who is this and who is that. Somehow, starting with grades 7 and 8, and some of that is being done in this town by weeks at the university and weeks at the science centre and what have you, we must stimulate in the children in the educational system the understanding that they will never be a complete citizen or a wage earner of substance if they do not have an education. I am not talking only training. Education comes from the Latin word "educare," which is to lead out and grow and develop. Education is what to do and training is how to do it. So we need both.

So in answer to your question, the kids on the street need the basic training. The kids who are going to stay in school need an expanding of their horizons so they see they are a complete human entity, not just a job seeker and not just a philosopher.

Mr McLean: Your brief this morning has made this trip worth while to me. This is the most excellent brief that I have heard and it is coming right directly to us. I have a question, and you are going to be surprised at the question because I have not heard you mention it in your brief. How is Metropolitan Toronto going to get rid of its garbage?

Dr Grassby: Put it in the SkyDome. They are both the same quality.

The Chair: Or Mr Kwinter. One question, a short one. No preamble.

Mr Kwinter: As a matter of fact, I do not have a question. I just wanted to comment that I would love to spend an evening discussing this with you. Unfortunately, I do not have time to ask you the questions that I would like to ask you, but thank you very much for your presentation.

The Chair: The next group would be the Elk Lake and District Chamber of Commerce. Would they come forward please. Since that group is not here yet, how about the Northern Ontario Regional Co-operative Housing Association? We have not got them either. How about Laurentian University?

This committee will take a recess for 10 minutes, and the gentleman who just made his presentation, maybe you can catch him out in the hall.

The committee recessed at 1002.

NORTHERN ONTARIO REGIONAL CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Since the Elk Lake and District Chamber of Commerce is not here, what we will do is ask the Northern Ontario Regional Co-operative Housing Association to come forward for its presentation. For the purposes of Hansard, would you identify yourself. Welcome.

Ms Wearing: My name is Honor Wearing and I am here for the Northern Ontario Regional Co-operative Housing Association. Next to me is Cameron Hopkins who is the secretary of our association.

The Chair: I will explain a little bit of the format. You have half an hour for your presentation and question and answer period. After your presentation has been complete, the remaining time up to the half an hour will be split among the three parties. You are at liberty to start now.

Ms Wearing: The Northern Ontario Regional Co-operative Housing Association—NORCHA, as we are known—is a federation of 18 housing co-operatives based in northern Ontario and representing more than 750 units of affordable housing. We exist to provide education and support services to our members and to give the co-operative housing movement in the north a voice on housing-related issues. A very considerable portion of our member families are in receipt of rent-geared-to-income assistance—up to 75% in the newer federal-provincial co-ops—and is very sensitive to changes in government policy in the social service areas. We are members of the Co-operative Housing Association of Ontario and the Co-operative Housing Federation of Canada.

Our general interest: Our interest in the 1991-92 budget arises from our fundamental belief that access to affordable housing is a social right and that no member of society should have his or her security of tenure threatened by economic eviction. We see the availability of safe, secure and affordable housing as central to the creation of healthy communities and essential to the physical and emotional wellbeing of our citizens. In short, we are concerned not only with the roof over people's heads but with the economic and social health of the co-operative communities we represent. We are concerned too with the plight of the many thousands of people without safe, secure, affordable housing and we argue that addressing their housing needs should be central to the social policy of any government. To be penny wise and pound foolish in budgets for generation after generation, as we will assert later.

Furthermore, we view the budget from the standpoint of communities in northern Ontario which have endured a century of neglect at the hands of various governments in Ottawa and Queen's Park. The consequences of having a resource-based economy and one-industry towns has been a never-ending cycle of boom and bust and chronic unemployment running ahead of the provincial average. This has produced an increased demand for services, including housing, which have often been found to be lacking. The best address housing needs in the north is to address other needs as well.

Finally, we see the potential economic effects of the budget in terms of economic stimulation, job creation and retraining programs in all of Ontario but particularly in the north. In view of the urgent need for economic diversification of the northern economy, we appreciate the attention given to housing and job creation generally in this budget. In this brief we will attempt to address the social and economic impact the budget will have in northern Ontario.

The need for housing and social services: According to Canada Mortgage and Housing Corp figures, the apartment vacancy rate in Sudbury has been consistently below 1% during the past three years, significantly below the 3% which is the optimum vacancy rate required to maintain market equilibrium. In fact, the supply of rental housing ght that a recent report has concluded that 27,000 units additional rental housing are needed immediately to bring Ontario's vacancy rate to 3%. This is a pretty clear indication of the failure of the market to address the need for supply of an essential commodity. On the affordability issue we have a serious crisis. In Sudbury alone, 35% of households spend in excess of 30% of their income on rent. Other data compiled by a recent study of the social service research and advisory group document the extent of the affordability crisis experienced by low- and moderate-income earners in the Sudbury basin. We are aware that the situation is worse in many other cities, including Toronto.

Numerous studies quoted in the Social Service Research Advisory Group report have documented the link between affordable housing and health. Surely it is not necessary to reiterate the long-standing conclusions that unemployment and low income contribute directly to inadequate housing, nutrition and personal health. The Ontario Ministry of Health's Panel on Health Goals for Ontario reported in 1987 that government action, including provision of affordable housing, is required to reduce risks to health. It is surely obvious that unhealthy citizens cannot hold a job and pay taxes and that unhealthy citizens will produce a drain on resources of the health care system.

Moreover, the Ontario government's review of the social service system led to the publication of Transitions: Report of the Social Assistance Review Committee, in which housing was described as "one of the most critical problems facing social assistance recipients and the working poor." The report made numerous recommendations regarding the need for speedy action to address the housing needs of the poor. We have no doubt that no MPP spends 70% of his or her salary on housing or has any need to make a weekly trip to a food bank. Many of the members we represent did just that before they found their way into a housing co-op.

We are acutely aware that the present recession, exacerbated by high interest rates and free trade, is responsible for a dramatic increase in unemployment. This is hardly the fault of either this Ontario government or its predecessor, but as incomes have fallen, the need for affordable housing, as well as social assistance and other social services, has dramatically risen. Furthermore, the tax base has been seriously eroded and revenues have declined. The cuts in federal transfer payments, amounting to some $1.6 billion, are particularly reprehensible in view of the federal role in addressing the economic crisis.

The Ontario budget: We wish to commend the Ontario government for resisting pressures to cut and slash social programs and investment in social capital and for its expression of confidence in the Ontario economy and the Ontario people. The job creation programs, the proposed improvements to the infrastructure of the province and the emphasis on skills training are all of immense importance to low- and moderate-income earners, the single parents, the disabled and the senior citizens who make up most of the membership. So is the budget commitment to make sure that the cost of economic adjustments are not borne by those least able to shoulder the burden. Thus refusing to pass on the consequences of the $1.6-billion cut in federal social spending to the consumers of municipal, health and social services was a courageous and sensible response.

We particularly wish to address the housing initiatives in the budget. The budget commits the province to producing 10,000 units of non-profit housing beyond existing programs as well as providing funding for the remaining units in the 30,000 Homes Now program announced in the 1988 budget. Indeed, most of the 39% increase in the housing budget relates to the subsidy requirements of the Homes Now program.

This strong commitment to social housing will enable some 20,000 families to move into non-profit housing, including co-op housing, in the next 12 months. This will begin to address the needs of the 100,000 families on non-profit waiting lists in Ontario, not to mention the 500,000 Ontario families which pay more than 30% of their income for rent.

The social and economic effects of this spending in social housing are enormous.

First of all, we object to the disparaging designation of social housing as subsidized. All housing in this country is subsidized, from the tax breaks for investors in rental accommodation to tax exemption for capital gains on sale of residential property to supply-side subsidies for non-profit housing.

Second, an expenditure on housing, like an expenditure on a school or a municipal water and sewer system, is not government consumption. It is, rather, a public investment in social capital which will provide a long service to the community in meeting social needs. We understand very well that when we take out a mortgage to buy a house, it is quite different from borrowing to finance a vacation. The house is an investment with owner equity; the holiday is not.

Third, the creation of co-operative mixed-income communities, which are the ones we know best, provides a supportive environment for residents that reduces the need for other kinds of social spending and encourages personal growth and skills development. Furthermore, the volunteer participation produces operational savings of up to 25% as compared with other forms of social housing.

Fourth, since little new rental housing is being built outside the non-profit sector, the construction of 10,000 units of new housing will create some 20,000 jobs in construction and thousands in the manufacture of lumber, bricks and siding, not to mention flooring, roofing, appliances and so on. Beyond that are economic multiplier effects in the wider community and service industries. The economic stimulus is widespread in Ontario and will have a significant effect on lumber-producing communities in the north.

Fifth, the fact that land prices and interest rates have fallen with the recession makes this an ideal time to initiate new construction since dollars will go further and the public purse will benefit for many years to come.

Finally, to fail to invest in social housing and particularly co-op housing is to ensure that the social cost of poverty and homelessness is paid again and again by the people of Ontario in health care costs, in low wages and in the costs of despair, including substance abuse, crime and family violence. If we want healthy communities, the provision of safe, secure, affordable housing is a good place to start.

The alternative: Those who criticize the budget have some responsibility to tell us what their strategy is for deficit reduction and economic recovery. There can be no doubt that keeping the deficit at $3 billion would require dramatic cuts in college and university enrolment, elementary and secondary school classrooms, hospital beds, public health budgets and home care programs for seniors and people with disabilities. There would be cuts in social assistance and family benefits, prescription drug programs for seniors and those on family benefits, legal aid programs and highway maintenance.

Which programs would the critics cut? A high proportion of our members are living at the poverty line. They would like to know if the opposition wants to cut their family benefits or drug plan. What about health care and education? Should it be harder for our grandfathers to get a gallbladder operation? Should it be harder to get remedial reading assistance for the learning-disabled? Should we not sand and salt northern Ontario highways next winter?

What jobs in the public service should be slashed, thereby adding to the unemployment and driving up the demand for social services without the resources to deliver them? What municipalities should have their capital grants cut? Which of the homeless should be told to wait until the recession is over to get an affordable place to live? Would business people prefer that the social assistance payments in this budget and the purchase of cement, lumber, appliances and construction services required for housing not be reflected in the ringing of their own cash registers in their own businesses? Or if they do not want to cut the services, would they entertain a surcharge on income tax for high-income earners to fight the deficit?

We are anxious to know the answers to these questions because our members have a right to know if anyone close to the levers of power is keen to threaten their social and economic security. When we get the answers, we will be happy to share them with our members and the wider community.

In conclusion, we do not see in this budget everything we would like. The waiting list for social housing is still very long. But on balance, this is a responsible and forward-looking budget that provides support for society's most vulnerable members, which protects municipal, health and education services and which invests in infrastructure and skills development in a way which leaves Ontario well placed to leave the way out of the recession.

It seems to us that a per capita deficit of just over $1,000 is absurdly small by national or international standards. The Ontario combined deficit requires 10 cents on the dollar to service; the federal debt more than 30. Moreover, any family would be willing to invest an average of $1,000 per person to build family assets—for example, a house—to upgrade skills to be more productive or to get through a winter of unemployment, if a job were looming in the spring.

Borrowing by individuals is a way of life in North America essential to keeping the economy going. How borrowing by the state to buy the same kinds of goods with roughly the same economic effect should be regarded as a bad thing is quite beyond our ability to understand. We believe it is this Ontario budget and not the federal budget that should be the model for fighting the recession and we commend the Ontario government for it.

I will just read the addendum underneath the reference. A quote from the Social Service Research and Advisory Group study captures the essence of our view on the importance of housing in economic and social development, and hence our reasons for promoting co-op housing as an economically and socially viable approach to building communities:

"Emotional wellbeing is the first achievement necessary to overcome physical and economic barriers. While permanent housing may not ensure emotional wellbeing, a lack of permanent housing does ensure that emotional wellbeing is a persistently evasive goal. This in turn results in a constant, if not increased, demand on all support services such as food banks, general welfare assistance, personal counselling for mental health and substance abuse treatment, employment programs and so on.

"Housing is the foundation from where people build their lives and their communities. A community which hopes to maximize its social and economic development must ensure adequate and affordable housing for all its citizens."

Mr Kwinter: I want to thank you for your presentation and I want to make a comment. There is a common misconception that I have noticed through a lot of these presentations that we are Ontarians and we are totally separate from Canadians, and there is always a comparison saying "The federal debt is 30 cents of every dollar while Ontario is only 10 cents of every dollar and that's fabulous. Look at how great we're doing." We are both Canadians and Ontarians. That 30-cent debt is ours and the 10-cent debt is ours. You cannot compare them to say, "Look at how poorly they're doing; look at how well we're doing."

It just means that 40 cents of every dollar is now going to pay the debt of us as Canadians, not us as Ontarians. We have to share both debts. I just want to make that clear because I keep hearing all these comments, "Look how well we're doing compared to the federal government." We are not doing any better. We are the ones who are paying the tax. Every one of us is paying both of them and it is a cumulative effect that is really the crusher.

Mrs Sullivan: I want to make a comment about the general approach of your brief, in which I was quite disappointed because I would like to have known more about the co-operative housing initiatives in northern Ontario that you are specifically dealing with and the problems you are facing rather than having what we hear from the umbrella Co-operative Housing Association of Ontario. We are all familiar with the co-operative housing movement and many of us are very active in supporting co-op housing in our own communities. I think there are many areas that we would have liked to hear you address rather than hear really a kind of partisan note relating to the budget.

For example, you have not talked about the approval process and the necessity for changing that. Is that a fact here? You have not talked about the deficiencies in the budget in relationship to the expansion of sewage capacity at a factor here? You have not talked about the number of units that are being built as a result of this budget that will be coming on stream in your own communities, and about the particular problems you are facing that the budget does not meet. Those were the kinds of things that would have been very useful for this committee to hear, as we would like to get that information back to Queen's Park.

We do not have an awful lot of time, but I hope, in the time left or so that I have left for my response, that you can answer those.

Mr Hopkins: Yes, I could make a comment or two on this. I would just like to say that as a federation representing northern Ontario we are not divorced from Ontario as a whole. Certainly we are concerned about the number of allocations that come to northern Ontario. As a matter of fact, under Homes Now and federal-provincial housing in the last year we are talking about roughly 1,600 units, of which only approximately 300 were co-op. There are a number of things about the allocations that we thought should be much more appropriately directed to the Ministry of Housing rather than in a budget discussion, and we have said precisely that. Of the 10,000 units, we might very well hope that as many as 1,000 would come to northern Ontario to redress some of the imbalances of the past.

I would also like to note that a 30-cent contribution to deficit on the federal base budget and a 10-cent deficit on the much smaller Ontario base budget does not add up to 40 cents on the tax dollar. It adds up to something in the order of thirty cents. I think your point that we are all responsible is correct, but we are dealing with different areas of responsibility and with significantly different tax bases and abilities to pay.

Ms M. Ward: Thank you for your brief. I was interested in a comment on page 4, where you point out the fact that the land prices and interest rates have fallen with the recession, making this an ideal time to initiate new construction since dollars will go further and that the public sector will benefit for many years to come. I think that is a good thing to have pointed out. I think it also applies to other areas, aside from the housing initiatives: the anti-recession program and the funds that came to northern Ontario generally used for construction and so on. Again, more can be done with that money at this time.

I take it the housing situation in Sudbury is quite bad. You say there is a vacancy rate below 1%. I was here in the center for the hearings on Bill 4 on rent control. Do you think Sudbury is in quite a bad situation with regard to housing?

Ms Wearing: Yes, apparently it is about half a per cent right now, which is crisis proportions.

Ms M. Ward: How do you feel the situation would be there were not this funding in the budget not only for housing but for the anti-recession projects which have maintained employment?

Ms Wearing: It would definitely be a lot worse.

Ms M. Ward: Did Norm have a question?

Mr Jamison: Yes, the question I have deals with the recession and the effect of it on the building and construction of co-op units and housing in general. Do you have any comments on the effects of being proactive in the housing?

Ms Wearing: I am not sure exactly what you are asking.

Mr Jamison: The numbers of units announced have increased, probably not the numbers we would like, but certainly there has been an increase in allocation. Connected with the economy and the recession, do you feel that that is a positive effect?

Mr Hopkins: I think we would say it is a particularly positive effect because significant components of housing are produced in northern Ontario, lumber, of course, being the obvious case. Moreover, it must be said that all facets of construction, of housing, have perhaps more significant economic stimulus value than almost any other kind of government expenditure. Obviously the construction jobs are important, the manufacture of the components such as the lumber and the roofing and the cement and all the rest of it. There is the appliance manufacturer and there is the local business activity that goes on. The effect is distributed throughout the province, and in our view this is a very important initiative. Even though we would have been happier with 20,000 units, we certainly appreciate the thrust and we know very well that the expenditure is being made not only to meet a social need but also because of the economic stimulus that comes from it.

Mr McLean: You say, "We wish to commend the Ontario government for resisting pressures to cut and slash social programs." Can you tell me what news release there is or who has said they want to slash social programs?

Mr Hopkins: The federal government has put enormous pressure on all provincial governments to hold the line on spending. To imagine that you can hold the line on spending or have zero deficit without slashing social programs would be, I should say, an exercise in fantasy.

Mr McLean: I thought you were referring to somebody in Ontario who was suggesting that, because you had indicated you were talking about whether the business people here would prefer to have their cash registers not ringing because they want social programs slashed.

Mr Hopkins: I think perhaps the chamber of commerce should address that. I have not heard the chamber of commerce brief.

Mr McLean: But have you heard anybody in Ontario say that social programs should be slashed?

Mr Hopkins: I think the way it has been put is that there has been enormous criticism clearly from the opposition parties and from business for running up a deficit of $10 billion. I only say to you that most of the deficit is reflected in health, education and municipal services spending. You cannot hold the line—

Mr McLean: No, you are not answering my question, you see? It is all right for you to say that, but I want you to tell me and show me where it has been said that social programs are going to be cut. I do not know of anybody of any opposition party who has said that.

Mr McLean: The civil service got a 5.7% increase and some got an 11% increase. We have people at food banks, we have the poor people out there who are needing help. Would you sooner help the poor people or would you sooner give the civil servants an increase?

Mr Hopkins: I have no hesitation in saying that ordinary people who are doing a job ought to receive reasonable remuneration for the job they are doing. It seemed to me, from news reports I read, that the 5% increase has gone to people at the lower end of the scale and that the higher increases have gone to people at the higher end of the scale. But I confess to not being entirely sure about how that is distributed.

I am not prepared to argue; our organization is not prepared to argue that public servants should have a freeze on wages. If they are doing a job they should be paid accordingly. But quite clearly it is not either/or. We would prefer to see an end to food banks. We would prefer to see full employment. I think it is fair to say that if the approach that has been taken in this budget wins some plaudits from the Conference Board of Canada, it cannot be entirely out to lunch.

The Chair: Thank you for your appearance here at the committee.

DEREK WILKINSON

The Chair: We will call on Mr Derek Wilkinson, Laurentian University, to come forward now, and make your presentation to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. Welcome, sir, and you have one half-hour.

Dr Wilkinson: You are 15 minutes early. Does this mean I get 45 minutes?

The Chair: Are you representing yourself or the university? The research staff would like to know.

Dr Wilkinson: I am representing myself.

The Chair: Okay, you have half an hour, and out of that half an hour, at the end of your presentation, leave some time for the three parties to question your presentation, please.

Dr Wilkinson: I will try not to take it all.

The reason I asked to speak to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs is that I have been reading some criticisms of the current budget in the press. In particular, some authors have declaimed the fact that it is a deficit budget. I should like to add my voice to those who support this budget and oppose changing it. I would particularly oppose an attempt to push through a balanced budget without regard to the social consequences.

My remarks will be based primarily on three claims. First, it is important to cushion the blow for those who are unemployed by maintaining basic social services. Second, expenditures on education and health are very appropriate, especially in a recession. Third, progress towards equity should not be compromised. The fact that these expenditures at the same time have a beneficial economic effect is an underlying and linking theme.

Economic benefits: Perhaps the most important aspect of the context which applies to the budget is the fact that Ontario is experiencing a recession. A number of factories, businesses, mines etc, are laying off workers, reducing output and in many cases closing or moving to the United States. Some aspects of this appear to be caused by free trade. Some aspects appear to be caused by the GST restricting individuals' spending. The high interest rates which have been maintained by the Bank of Canada may also play some role. The end result is a significant contraction of economic activity.

The tragedy is that the federal government has been maintaining a much higher deficit with spending on programs which do little for the economy. Grants to industries for modernization of equipment often lead to companies in these industries buying capital equipment abroad and laying off less-skilled workers at home.

In this context, the Ontario budget also makes good economic sense in the short run. James Frank, chief economist of the Conference Board of Canada states: "A tight fiscal plan would have led to a significant delay in recovery and contributed to further increases in unemployment, bankruptcies and lost output."

Indeed, the Keynesian economic policies of this government are not substantially different from those followed by Franklin Delano Roosevelt, which helped pull America out of the Depression. The budget is economically rational; it is also socially responsible.

Basic social services: The major point missed by critics is the effect of this recession on people. The recession has caused a great increase in unemployment. The rates of unemployment can be obtained from economic statistics. What I want to emphasize is the real nature of this. Almost everyone I know has relatives who are unemployed; many of my brothers are currently unemployed; many of my students who have recently graduated are unemployed. Others are employed in jobs which they could have obtained with no secondary education at all. This recession means that significant numbers of Ontarians are suffering in a very real way.

Dr Patrick Burman, a sociologist at University of Western Ontario, has done significant research on unemployment and people's activities. He demonstrated that for the first year and a half many unemployed people work very hard trying to get a job. After a year and a half, on average, they begin to lose their optimism and start to become resigned. They lose their self-esteem and their sense of dignity; they come to blame themselves.

People who are put through this crisis situation often experience greater difficulties with their health. Studies have shown increased cigarette and alcohol consumption, greater probability of disability, more distressed mental health, etc. Some research has even shown that the mere threat of unemployment causes reduced psychological wellbeing. The health problems consequently lead to increases in health care costs.

Unemployment also leads to family stress. Burman found that relationships within the family suffer as the family becomes responsible for bearing the economic burden. Children will suffer because of difficulties the family faces, if indeed the family remains together. We predict that the first response for children will be declining school grades and a greater propensity to drop out of school. The long term may bring higher delinquency rates and hence greater costs in law enforcement, as well as an increase

1 for social workers in schools. The reality is that these al costs are not often measured.

I am currently engaged with another sociology profes- and two economics professors at Laurentian in a study determine exactly how these factors intermingle in hern Ontario. Our study uses Elliot Lake as an instance ook at the combined economic and social effects of ng laid off. It will also look at the effects of various ernment assistance efforts. I have appended a two-page eral description of our project to the written presenta- in case you would like more details. Our hope is that research will uncover the most effective strategies for vering assistance.

If it is important to minimize the social costs, to cush- the effects, it is important to do proper research on rvention processes. If the main aim is to balance the lget no matter what results ensue, then such research is ntless. We do not prioritize balancing the budget over hioning the effects of unemployment and economic cri- because budget-balancing may be much more expen- e in the long run. Once all the indirect consequences of economic crisis accumulate, they may entail a greater icit than would a tight-fisted, narrow-minded, Uncle oooge conservatism.

We can show this by counterposing two hypothetical estions. How difficult could it be to recover from the ancial costs after the recession is over? How difficult uld it be to recover from the social costs after the reces- n is over? The obvious answer is that a financial deficit uch easier to recover from than is a social deficit; thus, importance of the government's present policy of mini- zing the social costs. It makes good long-run sense.

Education and health: Educational spending must be intained. When the recession is over, it is the education e workforce that will determine how well develop- ent advances. Apart from the regular multiplier effect on e demand for goods and services in an area, education ntributes to greater employee productivity in the future. nd the best time to train people is during times of reces- on when people are not otherwise in demand. In times of pansion, industry's demand for labour is quite high. erefore, to avoid competing with industries, it is best to vest more in training during periods of recession. The overnment's program to expand and maintain services is rticularly appropriate in its emphasis on maintaining ending on education.

The other important aspect of education is that it builds pe. It counteracts the tendency towards despair through gaging people in a process of development, a social pro- ss through which they become more empowered and owledgeable about their citizenship rights. This hope n help people survive through difficult times.

The difficulty we have experienced getting funding for ur project to employ interviewers and coders to document e processes of adjustment to layoffs leads me to a mod- ate criticism. There appears to be no mechanism in the overnment, with this budget, for long-term analysis of the oblems Ontarians will face, no emphasis on research. ut this is something which should be important for a overnment which wants to ensure the long-run prosperity of working families. Somehow there should be some funds allocated for socially relevant, long-term research which is not part of the regular bureaucratic process aimed at imme- diate problems.

Some of the budget deficit is based on spending for health. This has been a growing problem for many govern- ments, not just the Ontario government. Here, the agree- ment limiting doctors' salaries through OHIP is a landmark in beginning to establish control over expenses. What the population wants is not health cuts, but the means of con- trolling the growth of health expenditures. And this is a problem which the government has been facing.

Equity: Projects which create social equity are also im- portant. A significant aspect of the budget is funding for employment equity. Provision of increased day care fund- ing is an important accompaniment. Some would say there is no point proceeding with equity during a recession: Wait until good times when it can be achieved at no expense. But it is important to continue meaningful progress to- wards equity in the worst of times. Basic citizenship rights which have been denied in the past, particularly for women, should not have to await governmental surpluses. Women deserve equality now, and this government should be applauded for taking positive steps towards that equality.

Immediate results of the policy at Laurentian: Just for the record, I would like to point out that the opinions I express are mine and not those of the university. The job creation capital development program in this budget af- fecting Laurentian University combines social support, ed- ucational development and progress towards equity.

The almost $2 million contributed by the government as part of job creation capital projects will provide office space. Both research and teaching have suffered greatly from lack of space at Laurentian. In addition, facilities are being provided for the disabled in the form of appropriate elevators and washrooms, a long-overdue development. Support for the development of a francophone day care centre at the university is also an important step.

Conclusion: The bottom line for budget critics is what should be cut. Food and housing for the unemployed? Ed- ucation and health for the majority? Or equity for women, the handicapped and minorities? This budget does not cut these. It stimulates demand and maintains hope, through spending on job creation and educational programs.

I would like to thank you for giving the public the opportunity to become involved in the political process and to give more input than they are usually allowed. But please do not change the overall thrust of the budget. Do not opt for a social deficit merely to balance the budget. Think of many people at the bottom who need the social programs. They need these programs to survive, to keep their dignity and to keep skills intact, looking towards the end of this recession.

Mr Sutherland: Thank you, Dr Wilkinson, for your presentation. I am almost tempted to pass for the time being and let Mr Kwinter come up with his response to the Mr Frank comment, but I will not do that.

You talked about critics saying where the cuts should be. We heard Mr McLean ask the last witness who in Ontario had said that there should be cuts to the programs.

It is interesting to note that the opposition parties have been what I would call very coy on that, saying that those should not be cut.

But they have also been very critical of the high deficit, and when I think of the third party and the tax fighter himself, Mr Harris, not wanting to raise taxes—and certainly good economic theory says you should not raise taxes, particularly business taxes, which we have not done in this budget—I really wonder if the only logical conclusion would be that they are suggesting cutting services as the way of balancing the budget. I would hope they will at some point elaborate on how they would have operated the budget, whether they would have had the deficit or whether they would have cut services, or would they have actually raised taxes?

We have you here today in terms of sociological perspective and what impact a recession has. I think what you are saying is that if we had not maintained the services, the longer people go without a job or are laid off, the more their self-esteem goes down, and the more they lose their confidence, and the longer it is going to take them to get back into the job cycle, and the more services they are going to use. I think that is really what we want to hear out of these hearings, what the impact of the recession has been on people and what that means for the longer term in terms of taking advantage of the recovery.

I want to pick up on your point about training. You express some concerns. Give us an honest evaluation of the education and training programs in this budget? Have we done enough. Should more have been done?

Dr Wilkinson: Oh, I am not unhappy with the education and training programs in this budget. No, given the circumstances of the recession, there is some necessity to limit expenditures and I think the budget has preserved allocations for education. The part that I added was something on provision for research for general social problems, which does not really come under education and training.

Mr Sutherland: In your research, have you come across other types of programs that are particularly effective and needed in dealing with the type of impact a recession and layoffs have on people? If you have, can you give us some idea what types of programs they are and what issues they need to focus on?

Dr Wilkinson: No, but I think educational upgrading is quite important. A lot of the people in Elliot Lake, as far as we can see, are actually going back for educational upgrading and will go on.

Ms M. Ward: One particular comment you made—I was walking back from picking up a coffee—it really hit me and I think it is something we should engrave in our minds. You said it is easier to recover from a financial deficit than from a social deficit. I am not sure if those were your exact words.

Dr Wilkinson: Yes, exactly.

Ms M. Ward: I think that is very relevant and we should remember it. I certainly will try. When you were mentioning the conference board I just thought we might suggest that we speak of Informetrica, instead because the witnesses who are referencing the conference board getting a big response out of the opposition. Mr McCrack also was quite complimentary about the budget. That is an alternative reference for people to use.

Mr McLean: I appreciate your brief. It was very well done and I want to say that I do not think anybody has been calling for a balanced budget. I do not know anybody who does. It would not matter which government was in power we would be in the position of a deficit. But the question we have—and you touched on it briefly—is about skills training.

It is very important to me because it is an opportunity to be training people for their skills. I have not seen anything in the budget that is going to help that. Have you? That is the problem I have. You indicate that it is important and it does not directly reflect that it is going to take place until a few years down the road. What are your comments with regard to skills training?

Dr Wilkinson: I am not sure what you mean by skills training, but it seems to me that general education is what is needed in our current social position, because what happens is that people will not likely have the same job over their lifetime, so they will have to have more general abilities. Some of the skills training programs are focused narrowly. I am not saying I am opposed to skills training but I think it would be wrong to say, "Let's just train people specifically for these jobs," because those jobs may not be there after another decade. It may be different kinds of economic circumstances or different kinds of technological circumstances.

It is important to give people a general education so that they can teach themselves. So I support education in general rather than specific skills training, but I do think, as you say, it is important to maintain the training for skills that are going to be—

Mr McLean: You touched on the doctors' salaries being capped. What else in the health field would you do—it is a third of our budget—to try to hold the line on health spending, so to speak? What other avenue? There is a hospital in Ontario now, and I am not advocating it is right, but when people leave the hospital and they have pills to take home, they are charging them for those pills. That is a kind of service—I do not know, I guess they could not give them for free, but give them a prescription so that they would go and buy them. They are giving them from the drugstores in the hospital and charging them for them. What avenue would you see to try to control some of the spending in health care?

Dr Wilkinson: I agree. As I said, a lot of governments are having trouble with health care. I think it is quite a difficult problem. My area is actually sociology of education so I do not know a lot about health care. I agree that expenses should be limited, but I really am not sure how to do it.

Mr McLean: I enjoyed your brief. I agreed with most of it but not quite all.

Mr Kwinter: You just happen to be the first opportunity I have had to talk about James Frank. I do not want you to think this in any way reflects on you, but it is kind of interesting in that virtually every single person who has come before this committee, who wants to quote an expert that is supportive of it, refers to James Frank.

I do not know whether you have seen this or not, but there was a chart that appeared in the Financial Times. It is, "How Well Economists Called the Shots." It evaluated the top 15 economists in Canada. They have taken a look at their record over the years and they said, "Here's how accurate they are." When they list them, number 15, the last one on the list, is James Frank. The year before, he was first on the list, so he is getting better or worse, depending on how you look at it. But out of 15 last year, he was number 15. He was the worst projector of what the economy was going to do. I wanted to put that into the record.

Dr Wilkinson: Yes, but this is not Playboy. This is the Financial Times, right, that is reading this?

Mr Kwinter: This is the Financial Times.

Dr Wilkinson: They have to pick out particular things. I would not want to defend—

Mr Kwinter: No, what they have done is they have spread across the whole sector of the economy all of these things and they have said, "Here is how these people performed in their projections."

I will give an example. When we had our budget hearings, we brought in a man, Mr deBever, who we thought had a good handle on this. Last year, he was third out of 15 and this year he is fourth out of 15. He is still up around the same level. No one ever quotes him. They always quote James Frank. The point I just want to make is that of the 15 top economists, he is number 15. I just wanted to put that on the record.

Dr Wilkinson: Can I be honest and add another answer to that?

Mr Kwinter: You do not have to apologize for him.

Dr Wilkinson: I would like to say I actually thought about excising that. I thought it was not a good thing for me to quote because many times in the past I have disagreed with what the Conference Board of Canada has said. So it looks bad if I just say here—because I did not want you to listen to me just because it was the conference board. I actually think it is—

Mr Kwinter: You do not have to apologize for him.

Mr Phillips: Just one little comment on the OMA agreement, by the way, just for a point of information. Rather than controlling it, it is now in the hands of an independent arbitrator. My own judgement is that the government has completely lost control of it, and it now has nothing to do with the government. The arbitrator will make that decision in the future. That is just a point of information for you.

Through this exercise, my own feeling on all of this is that we are all listening to forecasters. We will only know a year from now—I think a year, maybe a little bit longer—whether the budget is good or bad.

I am going to keep all these briefs. That is why I liked our quoting the Conference Board of Canada. I think you may live to regret the conference board.

But my question to you really is this. I think most of the critics of the budget have been concerned about the revenue side of the budget, the economic activity. All of our budgets are the same. We get some money and we spend some money. Some years we spend more than we make, some years, hopefully, we spend less than we make. I guess you are saying to us, "Listen, I think this is the right budget to ensure the economic future of this province." That surprised me a little bit, because the budget called for an unemployment rate of 10% next year. It calls, you say, for a Keynesian theory, but it calls for deficits ad infinitum of $8 billion to $10 billion. It is not a Keynesian budget of surpluses and deficits. A year from now, you are saying to us, we will come back here and you believe this budget will have been the budget to generate the right economic activity to ensure wellbeing in the future. That is the concern of our party, I know, and I suspect of the third party, but you are convinced this budget will get the economy of Ontario going. If that is the case, what would you expect a year from now in terms of things like unemployment and deficits?

Dr Wilkinson: Maybe I did not express myself very well. I do not think that this budget will get the economy going. I think, as someone said earlier about the 30 cents for the federal government, that we are part of Canada, we are part of North America and we are in a free trade agreement. A government budget is not the only thing that affects our economy. There are many other things that are going on. So one year from now, I cannot say that there will be a change in this.

What I am saying is that I think the budget, the way it is done in terms of the deficit, is doing the kinds of things which are likely to be successful if there are things which can be successful. Maybe there are not. I am not very happy about what I expect to see next year. I have seen a lot of industries close which I did not want to leave Ontario or to leave Canada. I do not know what can happen on that.

The Chair: Thank you very much for appearing before this committee.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chair, just before we continue, I was wondering if all the committee members could have a copy of this article that was referred to on the rating of the economists.

The Chair: Okay, fine. I will see that the clerk copies it.

I would like to note that the Elk Lake and District Chamber of Commerce had the wrong date on their calendar, so they are not appearing today. What we will do is ask the Théâtre du Nouveau Ontario, if they happen to be present right now, for their presentation. Since we wind up with the group that is on for 11:30, this committee will recess for 20 minutes until 11:30.

The committee recessed at 1113.

The Chair: I would like to inform the committee that the clerk has just checked with the last group, the Théâtre du Nouveau Ontario, and they are not going to be appearing. So this committee will recess until 1 o'clock.

Mr Sutherland: Just before we recess, I would like to make a couple of comments on this chart that Mr Kwinter referred to. Mr Kwinter suggested that somehow, because Mr Frank was 15th on the list, we should not accept his arguments as being credible. Remember, this is the top 15 overall, and we know there are far more than 15 economists in the country, so I think we should look at it as a positive sign that Mr Frank is on the top-15 list in the country and not so much the fact that he is ranked 15th.

The Chair: Mr Kwinter, would you like to reply?

Mr Kwinter: Every single person who comes forward, if he quotes any economist, has been quoting James Frank. My only concern is that, when you consider that of the top 15 economists he is 15th, why are they not quoting anyone else? Why not quote some of the other economists, who are critical? That was my only point. If he had appeared as number 1, I can assure you that you would be saying: "Take a look at this. This guy is number 1." The fact that he is number 15, you are saying, "But after he's still in the top 15." That is fine. I have no quarrel with that. I just happened to come across this by sheer accident. I looked at it and I said: "Now, isn't that interesting? The top 15, he is 15th." That was all.

Mr McLean: The interesting point of it all is that the government side never had that at all; it had to come from the opposition.

The Chair: We are officially recessed now.

The committee recessed at 1135.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1303.

IAIN MACDONALD

The Chair: We will resume our budget hearings at the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. The first group we would like to call is the Manitoulin Health and Social Services Advisory Committee. Would you please identify yourself for Hansard. You have one half-hour. Make your presentation and leave some time at the end for questions and answers of the three parties. The three parties will wind up dividing the time equally. I welcome you to this committee. We will be waiting for your brief.

Mr Macdonald: My name is Iain Macdonald. I have been spelling on copies of my presentation so that Hansard can get that right. The part of Scotland I was born in is named to have its own variations of spelling both Iain and Macdonald, so I will leave that for the record to clarify.

I was tempted not to come because while I chair a committee which is important to the life of Manitoulin Island, I think my remarks are mainly personal. I thought so compassionately, being a minister, of what kind of kind-numbing experience this must get to be for you to have to listen to everybody. But when I reflected on it, I thought, what the heck, I am a citizen and this is what you are here to do. So let me extend my personal welcome to you to rainbow country and say only that while Sudbury is the fine city in which to gather for these hearings, what a pity it is that we could not have provided you the wonderful hospitality of Manitoulin Island today.

Mr Sutherland: That would have been a good place to go.

Mr Macdonald: I bear Sudbury no grudge in this, nor speak I with envy, but I am bound to observe that your own wellbeing would have been immeasurably enhanced by the beautiful, serene surroundings of our island. Perhaps you will have the good fortune to visit us there in the near future.

The Manitoulin Health and Social Services Advisory Committee comprises consumers, providers and elected municipal representatives and meets monthly to discuss health and social service issues affecting Manitoulin district. The committee has a reporting relationship with the Manitoulin Municipal Association and the Manitoulin-Sudbury District Health Council, and with the Ministry of Community and Social Services for seniors programs.

The committee has not discussed the provincial budget as much, so I have no resolution from it to convey to you, nor indeed has it directed me to make any particular submission to you. My comments today are accordingly personal, albeit enriched by my experience with the committee.

I appear today to commend the Ontario budget but not extol it. I deplore the deficit and its extraordinary amount. Any thinking person in Ontario or in Canada would surely agree. But I do not see what defensible alternative was available to any new government in the circumstances. In that sense, this seems to me a non-partisan deficit rather than one caused by what some in the media have leaped to characterize as socialistic principles of the New Democrat government. Even the former Liberal government would have been looking at a deficit in excess of $8 billion, given the shortfalls in provincial revenue caused by the recession and cuts in federal transfer payments.

I might add a third factor affecting revenue about which I can only speculate, but which I would welcome any discussion about. That is what a friend has described to me or named for me as the "underground economy," by which increasingly people work for cash payments as a means of evading the need to pay tax. The existence of that is made known to me in my hat as a minister through the privacy of the confessional. I cannot really speculate on what information has come to you about that, but the impression I have is that its impact on tax collections must be substantial.

Those are factors that I think even the Liberals would have had to deal with. The argument that acute recession in Ontario called for some public works pump-priming would surely have had some persuasive force with a party that advertises pride in its compassion.

It seems clear today from what they have said, and I suppose your being here today demonstrates that they said it, that the provincial wing of the PCs devoutly wish the deficit had been smaller. But I do not know by what process they would have provided reductions had they won office last September instead of the present government, because to take a dollar out of the deficit, logically you have to take that dollar out of provincial programs. Either they were simply going to impose such cuts holus-bolus or they would have been obliged to enter into some such consultative process as this, which they urged, and the deficit, provincial credit rating and time frame would have been about the same. In that sense, I see this as a non-partisan deficit.

One great benefit of this budget is that the government has sustained the level of health and social services at a time when they were sometimes desperately needed. It is not merely that the so-called safety net of the province was kept intact; its effectiveness was protected. Any social program is affected rather traumatically by funding cuts. What may seem to an outsider as simply a matter of tinkering with the scale of things here and there, from the inside becomes a time-consuming preoccupation with sorting out whose ox is to be gored how badly. The case load inevitably suffers during the process of readjustment.

We did not need to overlap that sort of year of traumatized professionals with the present year of traumatized clients whose jobs, hopes, morale, and sometimes homes and families as well, have evaporated in the course of corporate downsizings and restructurings.

The collateral benefit has been that the budget also sustained a base level of economic activity which has insulated us from the worst shocks of the recession. You might have thought, for example, that interest rates and the addition of GST would have eradicated tourism in Ontario this year. In fact, the reports are that Manitoulin Island has enjoyed a good season so far, after a somewhat scary slow start.

Whatever people might have said about the budget, the indications are that a great many have been able to continue to enjoy life in spite of the recession. Lord Keynes prescribed government spending as a remedy for hard times. These have been hard times and the prescription seems to have helped the patient.

Perhaps as important is that the budget invested in Ontario's infrastructure at a time when such investment is jeopardized by federal policies unseen in Canada since the Bennett government in the early 1930s.

Cuts in provincial programs may well have to come for compelling reasons of economic prudence. But for this year, at least, the highways have been repaired, bridges maintained, GO service continued, hospitals operated intact, seniors housed, young people educated and more people employed. We have had time to begin to think how and where, if they are to come, cuts might best take place in our communities.

Let me digress briefly to allude to one problem. Keynesian approaches to economic policy have been under attack in recent years, because while it is easy to do as Keynes urged and spend in hard times, it has been all too easy for past PC and Liberal governments at federal and provincial levels to spend in good times too. Not just for the sake of Keynes's credibility, but for its own, the new government will have to show that it can break with the good-time Champagne Charlie pattern of profligacy established by its predecessors.

A new economic theory of popular government has emerged in consequence of that profligacy, which many call small-c conservative and which has acquired the status of hallowed doctrine with the federal government and some of the provinces. The theory holds that political parties operate in a free market of competing interest groups which bargain votes at election time for program funds during the life of governments. This marketplace generates, according to the theory, an irresistible pressure upon governments to spend, in order to buy coalitions which will re-elect them.

It strikes me as a curiously fatalistic theory to call "conservative" which excises all operation of reason or principle from the working of such a supposedly free market. The theory is shallow and trivializes the society it is supposed to model. It assumes that voters are always and only perfectly rational about their limited particular interests. It also assumes that no government can ever afford just to tell the truth to its people about major problems or debate openly with them over principles of policy. If the theory were valid, there would be neither point nor hope to these hearings. The worst we can say is that the evidence is not yet in on that score for this government, for which I think many people hold great hopes.

To move on, let me suggest, in response to a remark attributed to Premier Rae some months ago, that I believe it is important to document in the annual provincial budget accounting the portion spent on investment in human and physical infrastructure.

New roads, public buildings, education and research are perhaps the most readily recognizable aspects of such investment. There may well be something of a grey area in distinguishing between the capital cost of an upgrade and the operating cost of maintenance. For all ministries, however, it should be possible to separate out bona fide capital from operating costs and to report these clearly in the budget because if cuts are to become necessary, as Keynes proposed, it is on the capital side of the ledger that they should take temporary effect rather than on base budgets for operations.

I do not want to suggest that the human services should be exempted from cuts. It is to say, first, that when deficits must be reduced, in those areas too there are capital outlays—pools of discretionary or onetime funds—which could be targeted first.

It is also to say that the government must be very cautious about viewing contract or targeted grant programs—programs which are initiated by the government but generally for reasons of cost are contracted out to a third-party agency—as able to be cut on a par with capital costs. A great many good programs are now being provided that way, for instance, nursing homes or our local literacy program, and it would be cruel to lose what has been needed for so long.

It may be possible to reduce such contract services, but that decision should not be imposed by fiat, but taken at in concert with the local level. The case, of course, is somewhat different with grant-funded programs which result from local initiative. The local community, however, should have a say in whether these are cut.

The importance of local consultation in deciding the extent and application of funding cuts, if they are to come, cannot be overemphasized. If this is accepted as a process of value, certain implications follow. In the first place, it suggests that the government will be forthright in presenting a flexible, multi-year plan, saying what the problems are and stating its budget goals. Nobody likes cuts and the spirit of partisanship cannot be wholly absent, but then nobody says government is supposed to be easy. If it can be open, honest, consultative and fair, as Hamlet said, 'tis a consummation devoutly to be wished.

So far as human service programs are concerned, when and if there are to be funding cuts, it is imperative that an effective mechanism exist at the local level to be cutting priorities, involving local communities in great planning and co-ordination roles. It seems to me, just to comment to the side for a minute, that this has been a clarion call in all the recent policy reports I have read about human services from government, whether it is dealing with long-term care, the reports from the Premier's health council or Children First. All of them emphasize the need for local involvement in defining needs and setting priorities.

There is a need for a mechanism to make it work and seems to me the prerequisite for such a local role in rural areas such as the district of Manitoulin is to begin now to have the accounting for our human services broken down in sufficient detail to show the full capital and operating dollar content of the funding envelopes for our area, because otherwise we cannot judge how to make the decisions asked of us.

The alternative is that we will simply be told by program managers in Toronto or here in Sudbury what we are going to have or not have. While that is largely the present lity, it is not a healthy situation. In a time of program it would be an unacceptable one.

Let me close with just one unrelated and perhaps wholly gratuitous suggestion. Last Thursday I took my wife and our five year old to catch a plane at the new terminal 3 in Toronto. There were certain last-minute expenses for parking and a hasty meal, so we cashed a well established brand of traveller's cheque for US$50 at the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce kiosk in the departure concourse. To my astonishment, the service charge for this was $4.

It seems to me that if major chartered banks feel free to take back what was in effect 8% of that transaction, the province ought to have the right to take its 8% as well, especially since your 8% is only of the fee, not of the dollar value of the transaction. I would gladly pay Ontario an extra 32 cents for the privilege of seeing in the next budget just how much the banks have managed to collect for that and similar service charges this year, and the PST revenue therefrom would be a new and useful contribution towards paying off the deficit we all deplorably accept.

Mr Kwinter: I do not have a question per se. I apologize; I got in a little late in your presentation, but I was very taken with some of things you had to say. I was wondering, your proposition is that local entities should have greater control over what funds they get and how they spend them.

Mr Macdonald: We should have a share in the control.

Mr Kwinter: I think it is laudable. I think that people in local communities have the best idea of what their requirements are and should not be dictated to by bureaucrats or politicians, say, in Toronto. The major concern of course, which is what has happened over the years, is that it works well in an ideal situation where everybody is knowledgeable, everybody is responsible and everybody does what he is supposed to do. Where you have the breakdown is where you do not have those people with that ability. That of course is the problem. How do you keep some fiscal responsibility, some local control to make sure that the taxpayer's dollar is being spent not necessarily wisely, because that is a matter of opinion, but that there is some accountability?

Mr Macdonald: I do not advocate a transfer of control to our level. What I would like to see is our involvement in the control process at our level. I think you retain responsibility for service standards and for raising the funds and disbursing the funds, and all that I think is right and proper, just as there is at present, let's say dialogue on the question of what is needed and what takes priority. That kind of dialogue I think needs to be enriched and extended.

In terms of what I take to be an implication of your question—what resources are needed in a rural area like the district of Manitoulin to be able to handle that kind of responsibility—part of the answer is that an awful lot can be done by concerned volunteers because in our community, just to take the particular case, individual tenure tends to be very long term; people are there for life. We export our kids, not our adults. If people manage to stay and get a job of some kind, they tend to stay for ever. When somebody in his 30s, say, begins to get interested in human services and gets involved, he tends to stay with things. So you get a lot of volunteer expertise growing on people and it is not really difficult to encourage that, particularly, I think, if organizations like the one I chair continue to have an involvement with established political organizations like the municipal association and so on. I do not know if I am really answering your question.

Mr B. Ward: Thank you for your presentation. I found it very informative.

Mr Macdonald: I take it you are not Margery's brother?

Ms M. Ward: No.

Mr B. Ward: No. The Wards are taking over, though. I found it very informative and I think that your presence here is very worth while. Based on your experience on Manitoulin Island—I was out there I think in May to assist in announcing a program with the native people on reserves, a certificate program so they could build houses on reserves. I was impressed with the local leadership, from people I have met.

Mr Macdonald: So am I.

Mr B. Ward: Yes. Could you, in your experience in chairing the committee you are on, briefly describe how things are on Manitoulin?

Mr Macdonald: Compared to Oka we are in heaven. Our native/non-native relationships are, I think, as good as they have ever been. Last year I was honoured to be the master of ceremonies in our Gore Bay arena for the signing of a friendship treaty between the native peoples of Manitoulin and the rest of us, which included a pledge to work together on all issues because all issues on the island affect us jointly.

We have 12,000 people—the population of Port Hope—in an area roughly the size of Prince Edward Island and in terms of resident population we are roughly one third native, mostly concentrated in the east end, but in one way or another sprinkled all over the island in five different reserve areas. I suppose there is a residue of some racism, but the relationship seems to work well on many levels.

Manitoulin bands are involved in the MMA, the municipal association. We have two native representatives who are both involved with native services on our committee. It is of course a complicating factor that funding for them tends to be federal and the funding for the non-native community tends to be provincial. We are discussing with them ways of collaborating more concretely in terms of the kind of question Mr Kwinter raised. Our municipal association has put forward, with a lot of support, the proposition that Manitoulin needs to have an autonomous planning and co-ordination body, and it is our purpose that this committee that I chair evolve, in short order, into that. We see them as involved in that. I cannot say at this time that it is clear exactly who is going to be involved, but certainly ambulances; I am a volunteer in the Gore Bay ambulance. If someone needs an ambulance, they get it.

Mr B. Murdoch: I can relate to Manitoulin Island. It is not too far from my riding.

Mr Macdonald: Where are you?

Mr B. Murdoch: Grey, Owen Sound, so we are not too far, just up the peninsula and over in the Chi-Cheemaun. It is nice to hear a non-partisan report come to us here.

Mr Macdonald: I do not know if it is non-partisan, but I tried to be objective.

Mr B. Murdoch: That is what we got and we appreciate those kinds of briefs. About the credibility, I think local municipalities probably have a lot more credibility sometimes than Queen's Park. I think you could maybe look after that better than some of the credibility we get from Queen's Park. I am talking about the bureaucracy, not maybe the politicians so much.

There is one question I want to ask you. You tried to be non-partisan. The government has predicted that it is going to be in deficit funding for the next four years. That is a concern. I do not think anybody would argue that they would not have a deficit this year—maybe not as much, some of us feel—but the problem is deficit financing for the next four years. There does not seem to be any light at the end of the tunnel. What do you say about that?

Mr Macdonald: I am not comfortable with that at all, Mr Murdoch. I am not comfortable in my own life or in the province's life with deficit funding as a way of life. I have a lot of respect for Floyd Laughren and his ability. I guess I can only say in a vaguely partisan way that I think if Floyd Laughren can find a way to trim the sails of that kind of deficit, he is going to do it. I would urge him to do it. My main concern would be that the process by which it would be achieved be this kind of process. To go back to an implication of Mr Kwinter's question, if and when cuts do come, and I expect they will have to come, we really need to have a say in what happens, and in different ways. There are going to be all kinds of complications.

There are certain kinds of programs in areas such as ours that I think are vulnerable in ways they might not be elsewhere. I do not want to make too much of that, but I am thinking of women's shelter programs in particular, which are not always as well-regarded in the country as they deserve to be. I have people complain to me that they challenge family values. In my business, I am expected to be sympathetic to that, but I fear it is going to be important to find ways of protecting certain kinds of service and certain kinds of committees. Yours and mine may both be alike in that. I think it is going to be important that the process of working on the deficit be looked at, as well as the fact of it.

Mr McLean: I have a couple of short questions. The first one, Mr Macdonald, is who invited you here today? Did you get a call? How come you are here today?

Mr Macdonald: My wife was the candidate who got within 207 votes of Mike Brown last year. She said to me: "You are involved with human services. Why not go tell them what you think?" I thought it sounded like a great idea.

Mr McLean: So you are here in a partisan way, then?

Mr Macdonald: I am a partisan here, but I do not think I am here in a partisan way.

Mr McLean: The second question is short and simple. It is about the Manitoulin Health and Social Services Advisory Committee. What is their priority at this time? What is their greatest need?

Mr Macdonald: To get control over our own affairs and to improve our capacity to do planning and co-ordinating instead of what the description says, to simply discuss issues. We are not capable of taking that kind of role yet.

The Chair: Thank you for your report to the committee and for attending.

Mr Macdonald: Boy, this is worse than preaching will tell you. I have half a dozen extra copies of this. Even though it took until 4 am, I had fun. Thank you.

CITY OF ELLIOT LAKE

The Chair: Next will be the city of Elliot Lake council. Wilma Sanderson, alderman. Welcome to the committee and the budget hearings. You can start proceeding when we are handing out the briefs, so it gives you enough time to get questions and answers in at the end.

Mrs Sanderson: Attached to the proposal I have today is quite a lengthy summary of information that I believe will be summed up in our proposal. It shows the things the community has been through in the past year and how devastating their impact has been. It also shows what we are trying to achieve, given the devastating situation we are in. I will try to summarize and highlight the facts.

You are fully aware by this time that the Elliot Lake miners have suffered over 2,000 layoffs, and the elimination as well of 6,210 jobs in the area. This has created economic and social strain on the community, both on individuals and the infrastructure. Assistance has had to be provided for these workers to allow them to adjust to the new economic reality and to continue on with their lives.

On April 2, 1991, the Minister of Northern Development, the Honourable Shelley Martel, and the Minister of Natural Resources, the Honourable Bud Wildman, set up a working group in the area with the express mandate of providing an opportunity for consultation with the province to ensure area representation in identifying viable plans to help ameliorate the impact of uranium mine downsizing. The working group developed recommendations on critical issues in the following areas: adjustment measures, temporary job creation of an economic transition period, social assistance, and economic diversification projects. Proposals for projects were identified that totalled $592 million.

Last fall, the first layoffs occurred: 1,600 jobs in Ram Jam. From that first impact, only about 600 miners are left here. This spring, Denison Mines announced further layoffs of 400 workers, as well as 13 weeks of temporary shutdown for its entire workforce. The company experienced an economic setback and will eliminate 700 more mining jobs and an estimated 560 support jobs by 1992. In April 1992, the mine will close. The working group notes that to date 3,450 mining jobs have been or will be eliminated. This decline would result in additional job loss of 2,760 in the service and support sector. Some $280 million of economic activity will be lost in that area.

All of the above dramatic reduction in both the mining and manpower is due to the cancelling of contracts to ario Hydro. Its major purchases are being made in Saskatchewan. We tried to pressure the government to have Hydro buy 100% of its uranium from Elliot Lake, but to no avail. We have been trying to develop something else that could boost up this community, with long-term stabilization for future development in the diversification of our local economy.

The city of Elliot Lake was born of the uranium industry. Nearly 40 years ago, in the early 1950s, rich uranium ore deposits were discovered in Elliot Lake. We first incorporated as an improvement district in 1955, as a township in 1956, as a town in 1976, and as a city in 1991. In 1966, the federal government committed to a five-year stabilization program for Elliot Lake. We grew from there, increasing housing by 3,266. New sewage plant costs were $30 million, expansion to the hospital was $6 million, and the additional five schools and college campus costs were $6,600,000. The total of $300 million in capital investment made over 15 years is now at risk.

The provincial budget, while running a considerable deficit, must focus on assistance to northern Ontario communities, particularly single-resource communities such as Elliot Lake. The current economic situation in the country makes it extremely difficult for those communities to diversify their economies and attract business. In many instances, they lack needed resources to make attractive offerings to commercial and industrial initiatives. These include adequate infrastructure to support expansion, a trained labour pool to draw from and transportation links to the local markets. To offset this, the government must look at ways and means to expand the economy in the north. This could be done through moving training, institutional and service sectors to communities such as Elliot Lake and supporting them.

By moving such institutions to the north and supporting them, the needed mass can be generated to assist in the diversification of the economy. Sudbury is a prime example of this process, with growth continuing after the placing of a number of significant government initiatives in the city to act as a catalyst. Similar benefits can be reaped with the placement of the French college in Elliot Lake, the Ontario College of Art's northern campus being established there, and the continuation of the initiative to place an MTO training centre in Elliot Lake. These institutions will provide employment and economic activity upon which other initiatives can proceed.

With budget deficits being incurred, there is a necessity to create a base for sustained activity which will contribute to the repayment of this deficit. The budget, when addressing these types of development, will have a definite benefit for the north, including Elliot Lake. Cabinet, in concert with Ontario Hydro, has provided a vehicle in the $65-million package to Elliot Lake, which came from Ontario Hydro. The package was for Elliot Lake and the north more to start the needed activities to build a diversified economy. The $9.8 million of work projects which come out of the $65-million package from Hydro will ensure a labour pool over the next two years, a business development fund to assist with entrepreneurial business initiative in the area, and social and infrastructure assistance will assist the municipalities with their budgets over the next few years to be able to maintain essential services without significant tax increases.

Just to give you a brief notation to date of what is happening to Elliot Lake, there are now 13,500 in our population. How come we still have that? We had 16,500 two years ago. Right now, with retirement living there, some of the seniors who are moving into the area are kind of offsetting some of the miners who are moving out with their families. Of the miners who were laid off, there are 600 adults taking upgrading programs. We have over 150 miners who are taking literacy programs. We have over 100 miners who are taking courses in skills and trades. They have set up two mining adjustment committees and one community adjustment committee. What they do is help with the stress and help the miners and people who are laid off in that area to adjust to how to go about getting jobs.

In Elliot Lake, there are at least 250 residents and business people who have pooled together as volunteers to help to diversify the city, to stabilize it. With this $9.8 million, we will start September 1—due to the fact of their layoffs at the mines, there will be people who have now exhausted their UI. We will be putting them into jobs to give them a 20-week workplace so they can get back on unemployment. We are trying to stabilize them for two years in order to re-establish them in the workforce.

In closing, the government, through its budget, must continue to take positive steps to assist those municipalities in northern Ontario to diversify and develop a strong economy not reliant on a single industry and resource. Most important, the programs must create a sense of self-reliance in the community to ensure a future for its residents.

Mr Sutherland: Mrs Sanderson, thank you very much for coming forward today. I know it must be a very challenging time to be a member of city council in Elliot Lake in terms of the serious issues you have had to address. Seen from my perspective anyway, as we were in Sault Ste Marie yesterday and dealing with Algoma Steel, and we heard this morning that the Kapuskasing issue is hopefully going to be resolved, there seems to be a sense of real community coming together in all these situations to find some solutions. Hopefully we as the government are being part of the solution in terms of trying to help find new ways and diversify.

I wanted to ask you a couple of things. I have seen a bit of stuff in the paper about the French college. Has a decision been made about that yet?

Mrs Sanderson: No. Tom Lankin is in Elliot Lake today having a meeting with the committee in that area. No decision has been made.

Mr Sutherland: Okay, no decision on that.

Could you give us a little more sense of what the impact has been in the community of Elliot Lake in terms of the individual impact on people, a sense of how that has affected decision-making on council's part, and maybe some impact in terms of, had there been no increase to any of the social services agencies, what would the result be in Elliot Lake right now?

Mrs Sanderson: The social impact has been devastating. We have had several teenagers who have taken their own lives because of the stress in the family. We have had a lot of families separating. We have had a lot of women going through our crisis centre, just to give you an idea of the social impact of this. In social services, the increase has gone up considerably. It has gone up dramatically in the social area due to the fact that some of the miners who were laid off had pulled out their severance pay. Some of them had tried to pay off their bills in order not to have to worry about that area.

When Rio Algom laid off 1,600 last fall, social services did not have in place an area where they were given two weeks' funds—it takes six weeks after they have applied for it before miners can get some kind of welfare cheque in order to help them. When the Rio Algom group was laid off, that was not put in place. When the Denison layoff took place, for the first two weeks they gave them some funds to help them through the six-week stress. That helped a little bit. But the welfare roll increase is dramatically high. That is why we are hoping that this job creation we are instituting will put them to work and alleviate their putting more impact on the welfare area.

Mr Sutherland: Earlier this morning, we had Derek Wilkinson from the department of sociology here at Laurentian. He indicated that he had been doing some analysis and research on the people who were laid off and that there was a great need for skills training in Elliot Lake in terms of basic literacy, upgrading grade 12, and then a little more beyond that. I was wondering if you could give us your sense of what type of skills training programs are needed in Elliot Lake.

Mrs Sanderson: There are some programs. Just to give you an idea, there have been two classes of 13—there were 26 miners who took up driving these tandem trucks. I do not recall; I think it is industrial tandem truck driving licences. Upon completing those courses, none of those guys were able to get jobs. If there was an incentive for the employers, or possibly a loan for these guys to get a truck to get into the workplace, it would help. There is nothing in place. That means it was a waste of time for these men to go after it, because they have no previous experience driving a truck and they cannot get on any of the jobs.

In the other skilled jobs, we have about 100 miners who have gone out to—I believe there are quite a few here in Sudbury who are taking masonry or other areas and trying to get their licences. When they were working for the mines, their existing job did not qualify them for certificates, so now they are trying to get their certificates through the school and through the universities and colleges.

Other than that, I think the miners were quite glad, due to the fact that they are on UIC at this time and were able to take the upgrading. Some of them did not have any higher than a grade 7 level. We were devastated to find out there were over 150 illiterate miners, who were quite happy to go to school. They were glad to take that.

Mr Sutherland: Let me just make a comment. I wish you all the luck and hope that the community continues to come together to find solutions. I think we are seeing that if it is successful, the community usually ends up being stronger for it. You alluded to Sudbury and we certainly have been made well aware of what a success story has occurred here in Sudbury with its diversification, and we are all hoping and pulling that the same thing will happen in Elliot Lake.

Mr McLean: To build a diversified economy, what type of industry are you envisioning should take place?

Mrs Sanderson: At this time there are several industrial businesses I have been trying to get established there. What is happening is, a lot of them do not have the matching assets or the money to pool together to match the grant they are applying for. There are five proposals on cogenerational plants that are in place at this time. It is supposed to give up to 500 jobs in that area, but it is down the line; it is two to three years down the line. Any of the existing businesses that are going to establish themselves there, it is still going to take some time before they are established, so we are trying to diversify for the next two, three years.

On the other hand, we are trying to enhance, through some of these grants we have received, and we are fortunate to have been able to have them, to diversify the tourism and enhance Elliot Lake to attract tourists. We have been doing that, so that is taking place. That has had some job creation to help in that area. So we are trying to work towards tourism attraction, as well as establish some cogenerational plants and some industrial plants. We have had a few proposals in, but it has not flourished as yet. It is just in the works.

Mr McLean: As an alderman, is there a great amount of taxes not being paid and business taxes that are not being paid? Are there write-offs taking place? It would have a devastating effect on a lot of those businesses.

Mrs Sanderson: We would have had to raise the taxes 30% had the government not cleared our debt at the time due to the fact that the mines are pulling out. That would have meant a devastating problem for Elliot Lake on the tax base. We would not have known where to go for the money, the funds to pool for paying the taxes. The retirement is helping some, because they are purchasing 1,700 units from the mines. We will be able to get the taxes from that. But if the government had not come through to pay off our debt, with Elliot Lake and Blith River, I do not know where we would be. We would have had to charge a 30% increase in taxes and that would have been devastating for the residents of Elliot Lake.

Mr McLean: I am disappointed, Mr Chairman. There must be another meeting going on. Most of the afternoon there have been two NDP members here and I am sorry that there are not more here to listen to what this lady from Elliot Lake has to say on what the problems are.

The Chair: Mr McLean, I think there are some interesting views going on out there. I believe the briefs have been handed out, and we will be getting Hansard after, if they are unable to be here. We have asked the questions already from the government side, in that there are two from each party here, and three.

Mr Christopherson: On a point of privilege, Mr Chair: I think it is also maybe important. We did not announce it, because it was not an announceable item, but v at the lunch hour meeting with the regional chairman, municipal officials and representatives from the Sudbury development corporation to talk to them about some of the problems they are having in Sudbury. Unfortunately, the meeting went a little longer than expected. There were no local media that wanted to know what was discussed and that has held up a few people.

Mr McLean: Why were they not brought before the committee so they could express their concerns here themselves?

Mr Phillips: Just on the point of privilege about that, committee met with the mayors?

Mr Christopherson: No, it was an informal meeting myself as parliamentary assistant to the Treasurer, and as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology. It was strictly that while we are here, we are trying to make use of being available to talk to local representatives. We did the same thing in Sault Ste Marie and attempted to do it in Thunder Bay.

Mr Phillips: Why would they not have come here to talk to us?

Mr Christopherson: It was a different process entirely.

The Chair: It was not to do with the budget.

Mr Christopherson: It is not related to the budget per se. It is related to economic conditions. It just does not seem right to have members of the government here and then not meet with local officials if they would like to dialogue with us, since most of the parliamentary assistants do have the ear of their minister. That is where we have been. I just do not want to leave the impression that it is somebody off on personal time.

Mr B. Murdoch: I just have a question on how the welfare is up and everything like that, and you being on council, I just wanted your remarks on the Hopcroft report, where the municipalities would like to see the government take 100% of the welfare costs.

Mrs Sanderson: That has been a proposal that was made through the municipalities and the townships. They have already, I think, gone through with that.

Mr B. Murdoch: No, it has not been decided yet. I think the government is still looking at that report. I just wanted to know how you felt about it, just for my own knowledge, you or the council; you can speak for it. Do you think it is a good idea for the province to take it over or not?

Mrs Sanderson: I think there is a shared cost that could be implemented, a percentage of shared cost. I think the majority of us would like to see the government take 100% of the social services cost, because it is a very heavy tax burden on the taxpayers at this time.

Mr B. Murdoch: I think the reason for the municipalities wanting that is that there are a lot of mandatory programs sometimes, mandated out of Queen's Park, that maybe some local municipalities just do not feel are needed. I just wanted to know what your opinion was, and that is fine.

Mr Kwinter: Wilma—I hope you do not mind me calling you Wilma.

Mrs Sanderson: That is fine.

Mr Kwinter: I have a preference for the name; it is my wife's name.

Mrs Sanderson: It is not very popular.

Mr Kwinter: I used to be the vice-president of the Ontario College of Art, and I noticed that as part of your recommendation you suggest the establishment of a northern campus. Is that something that is being pursued? Is that something that has been suggested? Where did that come from?

Mrs Sanderson: Due to the fact that we can provide such a good service up there reasonably, and because the province had said that it needed to—you are talking about the college of arts, are you not?

Mr Kwinter: Yes.

Mrs Sanderson: At one time the centre of community education used to have programs and people from all over the provinces used to come to Elliot Lake for continuing education through the centre. We never had an establishment of an existing building or place where we could have all these artists who used to come into Elliot Lake, so it has been brewing for many years that we would really like to accommodate all these artists to come into Elliot Lake. We have beautiful scenery and we now have all kinds of infrastructure, buildings and accommodation that is quite reasonable, that could really enhance that area.

Mr Kwinter: Has the college shown any interest in it? Are they involved at all in discussions?

Mrs Sanderson: Oh, yes. They have made many proposals. They have a building in place and the plan is all engineered and everything to have it built up there.

Mrs Sullivan: I would like to know further about the success of your retirement living programs that were initiated in Elliot Lake a couple of years ago. My understanding just recently was that while the infrastructure was there, the recreational services, the social services and so on, to provide for the retirement community summer and winter, one of the things that was becoming a problem was that many of the people who were moving there to retire were moving out of the community in the winter months, either to go south or whatever, and as a consequence there was an extra burden on some of the facilities that had been put into place. Is that a correct report?

Mrs Sanderson: I do not know. What do you mean, an extra burden? Can you elaborate on that?

Mrs Sullivan: In terms of staffing, in terms of ongoing operating and indeed capital costs to provide for a community which is shrunk during the winter season.

Mrs Sanderson: No, I do not believe you received the right information. We do have a small percentage, maybe 10% of our seniors, who go down south where they have homes in Florida and that area, but we have a lot of programs in place. In fact, they hired a co-ordinator who works out of Huron Lodge who handles all these programs. You would not believe the programs we have up there for the seniors. They are quite happy.

Mrs Sullivan: I knew there were a lot of them. I have visited them and seen them. But I understood that there was some pressure on the municipality in that the uptake in the winter months was not strong enough really to maintain the operating costs.

Mrs Sanderson: Maybe what you have heard is that at the time they established retirement living, it was a project that was instituted through Claire Dimock, who was the co-ordinator of the program. She worked for Denison Mines, and people were coming into Elliot Lake and buying homes and renting homes, and did not have any snow removal or accessibility to have anything done in that area. Denison Mines was burdened with having to give that service. Now it is falling on to the retirement living and there is money there for that this year. There is no problem there; that has all been straightened out.

MARCEL ROY

The Chair: We will call on Mr Marcel Roy. Would you please come forward? You will have 15 minutes for your presentation totally, and within that 15 minutes try to save some time at the end in which the three parties can ask questions on your presentation. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget review.

Mr M. Roy: Thank you. I was originally told I might have a half an hour, so I will try to keep it short.

Again, my name is Marcel Roy, and good afternoon. I am representing mostly social services, because I work as a social worker for Service familial de Sudbury, Sudbury Family Service, and I am also a member of the United Steelworkers, holding the position of recording secretary for Local 7282. I am also involved with non-profit housing. I preside over a housing corporation known as Habitat Boreal and sit as a board of director on yet another corporation known as the Bud Germa project.

I also would like to sincerely thank this government for the approach it has taken towards the people of the province regarding budgetary matters. I think the Ontario government should be commended for going to the extent that it has in trying to ensure that all people of the province are taken into consideration by allowing them to speak and voice their opinion on such important matters that affect us all. Again, since much of my experience and background is in social services and housing, I will be addressing the committee in regard to the impact the budget will have on these matters.

I think it is important that the budget be regarded not simply as another provincial budget, but rather as the first budget of a type of government which has never before reigned in Ontario, a government of change, for it was change which the people of Ontario sought back in September 1990. This first budget of the New Democratic government of Ontario reflects change from the traditional Conservative and Liberal party politics.

Equally as important is the economic climate in which this budget was released, for any government's true test of worthiness and valour is not during good times but during hard times, and we have fallen on hard times.

We know that during hard times many problems surface. During economic hard times we can expect problems such as high unemployment rates, high inflation, devaluation of the dollar, large deficits, government cutbacks, all of which have direct impact on other less seemingly related problems such as a lack of affordable housing, marital conflict, spousal abuse, chronic depression, child abuse, sexual assault, drug abuse, and the list could easily go on.

At any time there is always a certain ratio of the population which is in need of government services, but during hard times that ratio is augmented, sometimes greatly. If the government chooses to ignore the increase in those people in need of service by not properly servicing those people, then that government becomes responsible. This new government chose to serve the people in need rather than to ignore them and therefore this government acted responsibly. No doubt, in order to serve its people properly, this government will have to do so at a cost and that cost is one which the people of Ontario will carry for some time.

The present deficit is large and its projected growth is even larger, but most of the deficit is not attributed to poor management on the part of the New Democrats since they have not been in power that long. Some of the deficit, however, can be attributed to this present government as it will borrow money from the future to pay for today's bills. That is usually what we do when we borrow money, such as for a house which will meet our family's needs today and we indebt ourselves for 25 or 30 years in the future. If we choose not to borrow against the future we cannot adequately meet the needs of today. Today we are in recession and the need is great.

Looking more specifically now at how this government plans to meet the needs of its people, the Honourable Floyd Laughtren, Treasurer of Ontario, has indicated in his budget that the government has committed $215 million on a four-year basis towards social assistance reform. This is a major commitment of government capital towards those hardest hit by the current hard times.

I remember the Transitions report, released back in 1988 by the Social Assistance Review Committee, which clearly indicated that in order to properly serve those on social assistance major reform would have to take place, and we were not even in a recession at that time. However, the Liberal government at the time heeded the advice of SARC and some changes to the system began in 1989. But it seems that even those changes were too little, too late since yet another independent working group, known as the advisory group on new social assistance legislation, whose mandate was to report to the Ministry of Community and Social Services, had also clearly stated in its report, entitled Back on Track, that the momentum for reform had been lost since those initial changes began in 1989.

Part of the proposed reforms of the social assistance system will incorporate a plan to reintegrate some of the non-working social assistance recipients back into the workforce. This plan will provide those individuals who can work with the incentive to work, and in turn increase self-esteem and their societal self-worth. As a social worker, I know how worthless and trapped people feel by the negative stigma attached to being a welfare recipient. The stress of this prevailing attitude is enough to cause people to experience depression to the point where they are hospitalized and need therapy.

Municipalities will also benefit from this plan, as existing services will be increased somewhat in order to help them deal with the increase in demands for services which they are responsible for. This is good news for municipalities because it will help alleviate the numerous problems certain municipalities face due to the spinoff effects of the recession. In these days of transfer payment cutbacks, municipalities can rest assured that help will be there for them.

This government has taken the initiative to put back on track those necessary changes which were due and to show it is committed to reform. Two hundred and fifteen million dollars may not rectify all of the problems which our social assistance system may encounter. However, given the fact that this is the first budget of this new government, I think we can safely say that reform is forthcoming. I therefore endorse the government's stance towards social assistance reform.

Another major point of concern for me, which this budget addresses, is the need for more and better service delivery for women who are victims of violence. This point is of major concern for me since I work as a therapist in a batterers' treatment program. I know and understand the dynamics of spousal abuse and the power and control tactics utilized by men to keep their female partners submissive to them. This is a social problem of great magnitude because it is often handed down from generation to generation and upheld by societal beliefs and attitudes. We need only to look at our sports, our entertainment forms and even our cultural beliefs to see how violence is sanctioned by our society. Violence against women is difficult to eradicate if our society accepts even implicitly any form of violence.

I do not expect the government to change societal beliefs and values. However, if the government shows its support towards combating this most vile injustice towards women by committing itself to more financial aid to all the components involved in the prevention of violence against women, then it is conveying a most important message to the people. That message is that violence against women is not acceptable and that something can and will be done. Indeed, something has been done about it. A commitment of an additional $12 million for more beds and staff for emergency shelters as well as for counselling and prevention and treatment programs, such as the one I work in, is an integral part of the necessary changes long overdue in preventing violence against women.

Sexual assault is also on the agenda for this government, as there is a commitment of more than $8 million towards servicing those women and children who are sexually victimized, not only for those in large urban areas but also for people in rural areas, and immigrants and racial minorities as well. For anyone aware of the staggering statistics of women and children who are sexually abused in Ontario—I believe in 1989 the figure was over 10,000—$8 million may not seem like much. But for a first budget, from a new government, I think it is a step in the right direction and I for one welcome it wholeheartedly.

As a social worker having worked—to some extent I still do—on Manitoulin Island, I cannot overlook the budget's impact on aboriginal people, for I have personally witnessed the impoverished conditions of natives living on reserves without such basic amenities as clean water, sewage systems and proper shelter. If I had not seen it with my own eyes, I would not have believed that people in my province were living that way. I was not surprised to find that these people were not living this way out of personal choice, but rather out of necessity. For this reason, I commend and approve the government's commitment of more than $48 million towards improving the quality of life, which is so desperately needed for the aboriginal people of Ontario.

Looking at housing now, my own commitment towards housing in this community speaks for itself. I marched on the streets of Sudbury in the cold, wet fall of 1983 one year after being laid off from the Falconbridge nickel mines when people, through no fault of their own, lost their homes because they too had lost their jobs. There were 1,000 laid off at Falconbridge and 2,000 at Inco. These were for the most part young families that had borrowed against their future to provide for today, only for them there was not much future, only unemployment and welfare lines. Some left the city in the hope of securing a future. Others stayed and tried desperately to make the best of it.

For over 15 years, Sudbury has had a very low vacancy rate for people wanting to rent decent, affordable housing. In 1983 it was even worse. It was for that reason that I began to advocate on behalf of those without shelter. I joined an organization called the United Tenants, and we lobbied all three levels of government in order to gain their attention to the problem. In 1984 a proposal was submitted to both the province and the federal government in order that a private, non-profit housing corporation could be established to take over some of the houses which had gone into receivership. Anyhow, our lobbying efforts managed to secure some 35 houses in the Sudbury region in order to help some of those who had lost their homes.

Today I still work towards bridging the inequalities in housing which still exist in this community, and many others have also followed. Affordable housing is a key issue for any family, and that is why I am pleased to hear that the Ontario government has decided not only to go forward with the development of 35,000 units, but also to provide yet another 10,000 units. I know, through firsthand experience, how vital these housing units are to the people of Ontario and what it means for a family to secure a decent place to live at a cost it can afford, for shelter is one of our basic, yet highly valued needs. Without appropriate shelter, people are often forced in overcrowded conditions, perhaps without proper amenities such as hot and cold water or sewage. Very often they pay more than 50% of their net income on rent, so little is left for other important needs such as food and clothing. Again, here, as with many other social problems, women and children are the biggest victims.

Overall, I found this budget to be very supportive towards bridging the many social inequalities which exist in our society: housing, social assistance reform, aboriginal issues and violence against women.

These are all issues which reflect the kind of society we live in. Any government which cares deeply about its citizens must be able to convey that it cares about them by enriching their lives and making great attempts to alleviate those plights which its people face on a daily basis. The level of concern and commitment displayed by the New Democratic government of Ontario through its first budget is, in my experience, unprecedented. What remains to be seen is how effective the actual implementation of this budget will be. That is an equation which can only be measured over time.

It has been less than one year since the government took over the reins of power, and we have seen some great changes. I am certain the next three years will bring even more changes which will benefit the people of Ontario and hopefully provide a secure standard of living for all.

Mr B. Ward: In your experience in the housing movement and the social aspect, could you briefly describe your feelings on how the recession has impacted the people of this area.

Mr M. Roy: I do not think the recession has impacted on the community in Sudbury as it has on others. However, Sudbury has always had a housing problem, so that problem is still there from 15 to 20 years ago. It is still here, although a lot of small organizations have banded together and lobbied the governments to try to get more equitable service in the housing field.

Mr McLean: What is the Bud Germa project?

Mr M. Roy: This is a new project which has just started. We are proposing a 60-unit apartment building in the downtown area, specifically for elders.

Mr Phillips: A year ago the unemployment rate in Ontario was 5%, I think it is about 10% now and next year it is predicted to be at 10%. The Agenda for People was the big document in the campaign. Is 10% unemployment in the future acceptable in terms of your own thinking of the budget, and are you pleased with the progress that has been made so far in implementing the Agenda for People?

Mr M. Roy: I think unemployment is a factor that is related to the economy and especially in the private sector in terms of how well things are going. I do not think the government can put everybody back to work. However, if there are good social services, programs, to catch those who are unemployed, then I think that is what is needed.

UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA,
LOCAL 6500

The Chair: Would the United Steelworkers of America please come forward.

Mr Campbell: I notice your agenda refers to a Bernie Young, who took the message on our vacation shutdown. I am Dave Campbell, the president.

The Chair: That is why I did not mention a name. A lot of the presenters are not the ones on the list here. Would you just introduce yourself for Hansard.

Mr Campbell: My name is David Campbell. I am president of Local 6500 of the United Steelworkers of America here in Sudbury.

The Chair: Sir, I welcome you here. You have half hour for your presentation. Try to keep some time at the end for questions and answers from the three parties. It will be divided equally.

Mr Campbell: First of all, on page 3 of the document I presented, there is an error that I corrected this morning. Two thirds of the way down it says, "You know and I both know"; that should be "You and I both know." When I got to that I will just skip by it. I did not have time to correct some of the grammatical errors in this document and hope you will bear with me while we go through it.

We represent over 6,000 workers, about 6,137 to be exact, who are employed at Inco. I guess I could also throw in that we just certified approximately 800 of the office and tech workers, who could be added to those numbers. On behalf of the membership of Local 6500, I wish to express my appreciation for your coming to Sudbury and affording us the opportunity to make this presentation. What I am going through in the first seven pages was prepared through me, our national office research department and so forth, at the end of which I would like to make some comments as a person born in the Sudbury area who has lived in Sudbury all his life.

First of all, I will share with the committee some of the statistics provided to us by the research department. I have to assume these statistics are accurate because I am not an academic and I did not put them together. I can only assume the information gathered is accurately reflected, so if you challenge it, do not challenge me; talk about a politician.

These graphs show the population in 1984 in northern Ontario to be some 429,000 people, as compared to 1991 with 425,000, showing an almost 1% reduction change. Compare that to Ontario's total of 6,887,000, compared to 7,670,000 in 1991, for an increase of 11.4%.

We drop down to the next stat, which talks about employment. You can easily see where northern Ontario does not follow the flow of Ontario as a whole. The growth in Ontario reflected in these stats reflects more southern and central Ontario, whereas northern Ontario has been somewhat left out.

On page 2, the stats are taken, as we see, from the Labour Force Survey conducted by Statistics Canada, and they compare basic trends in northern Ontario with the same trends in the province as a whole. That is something that concerns us greatly as northern Ontario dwellers. Those fighting for secondary industry, etc, found this something ongoing. Take it back as far as stats have been kept and there has never been a high point where northern Ontario has done exceedingly better than southern Ontario.

Three points are made by these statistics that underline the gravity of the economic situation in northern Ontario. First of all, between 1984 and 1991, the population of Ontario increased by 11.4% and the population of northern Ontario fell during this same period by slightly less than 1%. Later, towards the end, I am going to talk about your ple leaving the north. That stat reflects how dramatic it is and causes that stat to come forward.

Second, during the same period the number of jobs in Ontario as a whole increased by 10.1%; in northern Ontario the number of jobs increased by only 1.4%. In short, northern Ontario did not get anything like its share of the recovery and the expansion that occurred in the rest of Ontario. Perhaps to compensate for this inequity we will, however, get more than our share of the current recession. We are going to talk about the recession, and we are going to do a bit on Sudbury and its claim to be recession-proof. We will get to that later in my presentation.

Third, the percentage of employed persons to total population is significantly lower in northern Ontario than in the province as a whole. This means the market for real businesses is smaller in relation to the population than it is in the rest of the province. It also means that the demands on the public sector are growing faster than the regional tax base. We keep hearing about the cutting of federal funds to the provinces, and from the provinces to the municipalities. If we are going to maintain the growth in the public sector, where are the funds are going to come from this? Hence, we must get into the private sector and encourage secondary industry.

The message of these statistics is simple. The economy in northern Ontario is in trouble and it is getting worse, not better.

As a Steelworker at Inco, I know the resource industries have achieved and will continue to achieve significant gains in productivity. As a steelworker, I also know that these productivity gains are essential to the future competitiveness of our resource industries. But as a Steelworker and a long-time resident of Sudbury—from birth—I also know that jobs being lost through productivity gains in the resource sector are not being replaced elsewhere in the northern economy.

It is interesting to note that approximately a year and a half ago I attended a world mining conference as a Canadian labour delegate, with 22 other countries, in which one of the two topics covered was technological change in the workplace. It was evident at that time that Canadians, Americans, Australians and Britons knew that technology was important, so that we would not end up like the steel industry in the United States, that it would be better to have a percentage of the people working with technology and profitability than everyone laid off if you are not able to produce cheaply on the world market. That was the end of the two-week convention in Geneva, so it is not something new. It is something out there that all levels of government are going to have to address. It is here now and it is going to get much worse in the decades to come.

Quite simply, the private sector employment base of the northern Ontario economy is being eroded. Here is where I get to my mistake. It should read, you and I both know that neither the province nor the federal government can move enough public sector jobs into northern Ontario to compensate for the erosion of employment in the private sector. That is not to say we are not appreciative of the Ministry of Northern Development and Mines and the taxation data centres and all of those things. It is imperative that they should be diversified through the province, but that cannot do it on its own.

You and I both know that without diversification in northern Ontario, the economy will have a succession of crises in single-industry, resource-based towns. Kapuskasing and Elliot Lake are only the beginning. You and I also know that without a strategy for economic diversification, there will be many more Kapuskasings and Elliot Lakes.

Speaking on behalf of all Steelworkers, we look forward to working with the government on developing an economic diversification for northern Ontario. We are currently investigating the establishment of a labour-sponsored investment fund to create more manufacturing jobs in northern Ontario. But Steelworkers are under no illusions. An economic diversification strategy is not something that can be done by unions alone. What is required is a new partnership involving government, communities, business and labour.

The members of Local 6500 acknowledge and appreciate the steps that have been taken thus far in the early months of the new government's mandate. The government has allocated 30% of its anti-recession spending to northern Ontario. The government eliminated the motor vehicle registration fee for people living in northern Ontario. The government is committed to a federal-provincial agreement on minerals development and research and development in the resource sector.

Members of the committee, the measures announced in the Treasurer's last budget were a welcome signal of the government's intentions and its goodwill. The next budget, however, must take major steps towards putting in place a serious strategy for economic diversification. Last year's budget spelled out in budget paper E the vision the government is endeavouring to frame for economic renewal in this province. It is a vision which is centred on building up the human resources of this province. Steelworkers in northern Ontario applaud that vision. We welcome enthusiastically the government's call for new partnership and extend wholeheartedly our co-operation in forging those new partnerships. Steelworkers in northern Ontario want to urge the Treasurer in his next budget statement to set out the diversification strategy the government envisions for northern Ontario.

Like most unionized workers, the members of Local 6500 have negotiated a pension plan with our employer. We have fought strikes—often very long strikes—to build into the plan the kind of basic benefits managers and professionals take for granted. But like most workers in this province with employment pension plans, we have no say in the management of that plan. I say that candidly because I do sit with the company once every six months and go over the investments and the experience of Inco's pension plan. I am in no way going to reflect that they have not done a good job, because if each company in Canada had administered its plan like Inco does we would not have the mess in places like Algoma Steel and so forth. We are allowed to watch, make comment, but we have virtually no say in the administration.

I cannot convey to you the anger and the frustration our members feel when they see our savings sent out of the country to create jobs abroad when northern Ontario's economy so desperately requires capital to finance its diversification. We all know the federal budget. We are going to let some more pension moneys trickle out of Canada, and we think that is ludicrous.

Like every other local of the United Steelworkers, Local 6500 belongs to the Ontario Federation of Labour. In an important statement on pension policy adopted at its 1988 convention, the OFL said: "The export of our savings is the export of our future. There can be no restructuring of the economy of this province which does not include a role for pension funds." The members of Local 6500 agreed with the statement in 1988. We agree with it today. We think it is high time pension funds played a role in developing the economy of this province in securing the future of its people.

The pension fund managers clearly have different priorities. They have successfully lobbied the federal government to permit pension funds to increase the proportion of their assets they invest outside of Canada. As a result of the vigorous lobby undertaken by the pension managers, a ceiling on capital exports will rise from 10% to 20%. What this means for the people of northern Ontario is that without deliberate action to change the management of pension funds, our future will be exported along with our resources. Pension funds are supposed to be a trust. Some trust.

Simply put, we think those moneys could be invested at an equal or a better return in the north to encourage secondary industry, rather than just having the public sector and those industries that are already here. It is money made and earned in Northern Ontario which should be reinvested, or at least a portion of it, putting back into the ground that you took it out of.

Pension fund management and economic diversification in northern Ontario are inextricably linked. It is pointless to discuss economic development and diversification while allowing private pension managers to increase the export of workers' savings. We deem that when we negotiate a pension fund, the dollar value charged against our collective package is in fact a dollar we did not take in our paycheque to be placed into the pension fund. Therefore, we should have more say on what we have negotiated. This would be one way to do it.

We urge the government to move expediently to give pension plan members at least an equal say with employers in the management of our pension funds. Having done that, we urge the Treasurer in his next budget statement to spell out how he envisions empowering the ordinary working people of this province to enter into a partnership with their government to use pension capital to pull this province up by its own bootstraps. Self-reliance begins with empowerment.

The last budget described the government's commitment to develop the human resources of this province. The failure of the private sector to invest in training and new workforce skills is well documented. The Canadian private sector is significantly outspent and out-invested on training and skills development by virtually every other economy in the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, including even the United States. Workers bear the costs of this underinvestment in training and new skills. We pay the costs when we lose our jobs and must seek new employment.

You may be aware of a study by Statistics Canada on the experience of the one million workers who lost their jobs between 1981 and 1984, during the last recession. That study set out two important findings. First, after two years, only 57% of the laid-off workers had found permanent, full-time re-employment. Second, of those who found re-employment, 45% experienced a wage loss. The average wage reduction among the 45% who suffered a wage loss was 28%.

That is the way workers pay the price for the private sector's chronic underinvestment in training and new skills. Businesses underinvest in training and new skills but it is we who lose our jobs because of their underinvestment. When we lose our jobs, almost half of us will not find permanent re-employment. When we do find re-employment, almost half of us suffer a wage reduction averaging 28%. That is the future that chronic underinvestment in training and new skills holds out for us. That is the future the continued erosion of private sector employment makes likely for an increasing number of working people in northern Ontario.

Steelworkers in northern Ontario are looking to the government to get a firm grip on the problems of chronic underinvestment by the private sector in training and new skills. The last budget statement stressed the importance of human resource development to our competitiveness and economic wellbeing. The government indicated that it was soon to be in a position to announce the structure it envisioned for an Ontario training and adjustment board. We want to stress to the government and to the Treasurer that a training policy is only going to work if it addresses the funding question. Structured without funding, it will be of limited value. The question is not whether the private sector can afford to invest in training and new skills; the question is whether it can afford not to and whether we can afford to let it repeat its past mistakes. We urge the Treasurer to include in his next budget a statement of what measures the government will take if the private sector does not voluntarily increase the investment in training and new skills.

In his last budget, the Treasurer courageously rejected the policy of intensifying the recession through public sector retrenchment. Steelworkers applaud this courage. We fail to see how the right-wing strategy of laying off public sector workers, cutting back on health care and reducing social assistance would have got this province out of a recession. In his last budget, the Treasurer showed his willingness to lead. Steelworkers in northern Ontario look forward to being able to continue supporting the Treasurer and his economic leadership that he is providing.

I am now going to reflect on some other comments I jotted down this morning. You must bear in mind that I just came back from holidays on Monday and found out it was coming here today.

One of the things we talked about through that presentation, which I admittedly did not put together entirely myself—I had some input from our research department

I am voicing the words. What comes from me is as a Sudburian born here in 1947, who has lived here all his life representing the largest section of the workforce in this city.

We saw that if you took away the public sector jobs such as we discussed, the data centre, Northern Development and Mines, etc, we would be exactly where we were 20 years ago with a one-industry town, with Falconbridge or Inco producing nickel, etc. We need something that will be substantial, that will sustain growth. We need something more than a government office and/or a nickel mine. We need something in the middle. I heard talk as far back as two decades ago of our need for an automotive plant, for a shoe factory, for textiles, but it has not come to be.

Besides the mining industry and the public sector, we have hospitals and schools. Sudbury, I might say, is doing very well right now. We have looked around the rest of the province, northern Ontario especially, and seen places like Elliot Lake that are not doing so well. Without the technology, we would have not been profitable. We would have been the way of the steel industry in the United States and we do not want that.

As the president of my local union, I support the fact that technology creates work; it takes away work, but it also guarantees it. Technology killed 12,000 jobs in Sudbury. Twenty-five years ago, Inco produced 280 million pounds of nickel with 18,000 unit employees—that is not off. Today, they produce 25% more with 6,000 employees. Technology did that, but without it there would not be a mine. They would all be closed, because they could not produce nickel at prices that the markets would make profitable. We are in close touch with this industry. We are told that within a few years that 6,000 will be reduced to the 5,000 level because of technology, while production will roll at about the same levels.

One of the reasons Sudbury has been recession-proof—I hate to use that word—in the last short while is because Inco, for instance, has invested about $300 million per year over the last two years, and will over the next two, creating work for some 2,000 to 3,000 contractors and the ripple effects of their working in Inco's plants. Modernizing, getting ready, making the place cleaner and more efficient, that will end within the next three years.

If Sudbury does not have what it takes to pick up the slack from these major investments being made by the nickel companies, we are going to be in the same boat everybody else is. We are into mass expansion, and once it is over we are in trouble and we will join the ranks of Algoma Steel or Sault Ste Marie and Elliot Lake and all the rest, not to their degree maybe, but we will be in trouble.

In my presentation I talked about technology, I talked about training and I talked about the industry's need to train the workers. Currently, today, if you look at industry, whether it be Ontario Hydro, Bell Canada, Inco, any of the major players, if they need technicians, if they need technologists, if they need engineers, they steal them from other companies. There are only so many out there.

I sit on a panel in Sudbury that is concerned. I sit with management from corporations, with representatives from Laurentian University, Cambrian College, the public and separate school systems, plus labour, and the problem we see here today is that our schools are closing their technical doors. The shops and the trade lines and the engineering skills are slowly being made less available to our students.

Ten years from now, we are going to have a drastic shortage of engineers, and for every engineer you are short—and we are talking in the thousands—you will be short 10 to 15 to 20 tradespeople.

Industry is seeing it. For example, industry in Sudbury has created a course at Cambrian College in which a student can say, "I want to work in the mines some day. I want to learn for two years what that is all about."

Industry better get on the bandwagon, or else we may have some work for people to do and nobody to do the work, because we are putting out academics. We are putting out our doctors and our lawyers and our business people and our bankers and our loans managers, but we are failing drastically on the technical people it would take to encourage secondary industry in the north—or anywhere else in the province, because Toronto is going to have the same problem as we have.

We are all getting up there in age. The average age of an electrician, I understand, in Ontario today is something like 47 or 48 years old. That person is not going to wire your house 20 years from now. We had better find some others, but the school system is not doing it.

The one other part that scares me, as a Sudburian: My daughter is going to be 15 years old. She is going to school here and would probably like to live here. We like to call Sudbury Ontario's best kept secret. It is a wonderful place to live, to bring up your children, and we have much more than people think we have. I think we have the most sunshine of any Ontario city, although you would not know it today.

Two things have happened in Sudbury. Sudbury is becoming a city of retirees. We have done a wonderful job—I am bragging about the Steelworkers prior to my becoming president, Ron MacDonald and those before him, and the Steelworkers as a whole—because when Inco was reducing from that 18,000 to 6,000 and we had some layoffs, although they were threatening massive ones, we encouraged some pension incentives.

We have 6,000 working members. We have 9,000 pensioners, of which 87% remain living in the Sudbury area. That is scary, because pensioners, although they spend money, have bought their homes, have bought their vehicles, have kept the economy rolling for their working lives and now they are coasting. That is not going to inject massive amounts of moneys into industry or development.

The other thing that scares us is our young people. You talk about the unemployment rate being bad in Toronto; it is bad here. A young person finds it very difficult to get a job in Sudbury, or northern Ontario. Where does he or she go? To Toronto, to southern Ontario. If you want to lessen your problems with unemployment in the south, create some jobs in the north and we will keep our children home where we would really like them to stay; in reverse, yes.

Anyway, I have covered it all. I am watching my watch. They said to leave 10 minutes. I am close.

Mr Phillips: I thought it was a very thoughtful presentation, and I commend you on it. Just a couple of thoughts. One thing we would agree with is what is at the bottom of page 4, but we would say, why is that not in this budget? In our opinion, we are going to waste two years putting in place what is absolutely required. I do not think we would disagree with it; we would just not suggest we wait another year.

There are two big issues coming up that you comment on here. One is pensions, and you have implied that perhaps your membership will be prepared to take a lower return on their money in their pension fund in return for investment in northern Ontario.

Mr Campbell: I should say not. I think investment in northern Ontario would quite probably create a higher return. In following some pension plans—I excluded Inco, which I sit on and read the documentation—we have found investments that incur less than 1%, and there is no input. We found a number of years ago, about a decade ago, when Hamilton—

Mr Phillips: Maybe you should just answer my question, Dave, because I have got—

Mr Campbell: I think that is a fallacy. There would not be less.

Mr Phillips: But it may or may not. You say it may or may not be, but it has to be prepared, I think, and I think we are going to face up to that.

I think you are suggesting that training should be the responsibility, not just of a company but industry wide. That will be another interesting debate, because I suspect Inco, for example, is probably spending more on training than the industry average. You are suggesting that perhaps what you do in industry is charge all of them the same amount for training. Inco, I think, may say: "Listen, I think I know what I should be doing. I want to spend a lot on training, but you are asking me to train in my own organization and spend money for other organizations that do not really give a hoot about it."

This is going to be an interesting debate, I think, on how we want to handle training in the future.

You have laid out for us two big issues that have come up. I think, particularly with your background in Inco, you will want to look carefully at them. Would you penalize a progressive organization like Inco in your training programs? Are members of pension plans prepared to take the risks of, perhaps, a lower return on investment in a certain geographic area?

Mr McLean: He actually asked the question I wanted to ask, so we will get the same answer, probably. Is there any skills training being done in any institution here in Sudbury at this time?

Mr Campbell: To a degree, probably more than others. Cambrian College is well-noted as a good area for technical training, per se; but per capita, I think, in Ontario we are lacking. The numbers of skilled technical people who are going to be required in industry are phenomenal.

At Inco, as Mr Phillips said; they are participating in exactly what he is suggesting, but they are using the tax dollars paid by the people of Sudbury who fund Cambrian College, per se. They have 80 students taking mining development. Inco cordially takes them into the plant for three months during that training session. It oversees the uses that as a probationary period to pick the cream of the crop, and hires them at the end of the two years. There is some argument about whether the company should be more responsible in paying for Cambrian College, if that is the methodology behind it. Will Bell Telephone jump on that? Will Ontario Hydro jump on that? We do not know, but something definitely has to be done.

Lots of work, lots of little holes, and I disagree there would be less money paid back in pensions.

Mr B. Murdoch: I have one quick question. Your brief was well done, but I had some problems with some of it. I wonder where you got the information that it is a right-wing strategy to cut back on health care and social systems.

Mr Campbell: We listened to what was hitting the floor at the Conservative convention; I guess that is the place. We see, everywhere, right-wing governments—they have one federally which has cut funding to the provinces for medicare. As trade unionists, as democrats, we are dreadfully afraid that we are going the way of those south of the border, and we will do anything we possibly can to block that.

Mr Sutherland: I want to compliment you, too, on your superb presentation. The opposition parties have been claiming that labour representatives coming before us are just saying the same thing. This is a very good presentation that deals with the real issues. I am just wondering what you feel would be some of the specific areas that Sudbury could pick up in terms of diversifying the economy beyond Inco and beyond the government jobs.

Mr Campbell: As a Sudburian, you get into regional politics, but one thing that does not attract secondary industry to establish in the north is transportation costs. I hope you all ride back on Highway 69. You will find out why it would cost, I think it is, 28% more to ship goods from Sudbury to Toronto than it would on the 400, on the same nice four- and six-lane highway.

The other thing is that they keep on talking about the cost of properties in the Golden Horseshoe, how much money a piece of land costs per square foot to develop in Toronto. Come on up here. We have miles of it. You have Burwash farm. You own that. Divvy it up to some nice little industries that is going to pick it up and do something with it.

We could spend the next six or seven days talking about what industry would be attracted to the north. Inco, for example, used to be an importer of technology. We are now an exporter of continuous mining systems. There are mines here, so they develop mining equipment. There are mills here, so why not develop lumber equipment? There is a multitude of things; we can go on and on.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for your presentation and attending the budget review hearings here in Sudbury.

The committee recessed at 1446.

NIPISSING TRANSITION HOUSE

WOMEN'S ACTION COMMITTEE OF NIPISSING

The Chair: You can proceed with your presentation. You have a total of 30 minutes. Try to save some time at the end of your presentation for the three parties to ask questions on your brief.

Ms Alcorn: I will begin by introducing myself. I am Ms Alcorn. I have worked with assaulted women and their children for the past seven years. My first job at our shelter began during the shelter's first summer. I was hired as a recreation worker to assist with the children's needs during this tumultuous time in their lives. My work experience in the shelter has gone from child care to research to on-site crisis work with women and to all else shelter work entails. I will not get into the long job description.

Nipissing Transition House is a 14-bed residential dissonance shelter for women and children escaping male violence. It opened in January 1984 as a nine-bed shelter, but the need for increased services became immediately apparent. Finally, in September 1989, we reopened as a 14-bed shelter in a newly renovated and expanded facility.

The Women's Action Committee of Nipissing was founded in July 1989 after women's groups and individual women continued networking following a meeting with the Ontario women's directorate. In December 1990, we adopted the following mission statement, "To promote the empowerment and status of women in Nipissing district through the elimination of barriers to the full participation of women in all spheres—economic, social and political."

At this point, I would like to quote from the statement of principles of Nipissing Transition House as well, "We acknowledge that some groups of women in our society, such as economically disadvantaged, immigrant, native, Francophone and disabled women face a double oppression."

These are two statements which name and describe, in a basic way, women's issues which must be attended to by our society. I have been involved with women's issues and women's organizations since 1985 at both a local level and provincial level, the focus of which has been primarily male violence against women.

We have come here today to speak to the link between economics and the oppression of women. I sincerely hope we will not be lumped in with the other "social workers" who have made presentations so far. I have to comment on some of the remarks I heard this morning on CBC radio. I am going to assume they do not reflect the majority of the committee members. If we had already presented, I think I would be angrier and more upset than I was when I heard some of them, because it was dismissive language that was being used. The taxpayers are paying for this. Please do not allow it to be any more of a waste of money than it is being considered by so many people. I am really urging everybody to listen to what we have to say.

I will borrow from the statement of unity of yet another women's organization, this time using a statement which the Women's Action Committee of Nipissing adopted from the Northwestern Ontario Women's Decade Council, "As a feminist organization we believe in the dignity of womanhood, the value of women's work, the voice of women as experts on our own lives and equality through the freedom of choice."

Dignity: In this society, dignity requires access to financial resources, be it the basic human right to food and shelter which often, more and more often lately, forces people to turn to social assistance, or be it the need for subsidized day care which attempts to offset an invisible barrier to women's full participation in the labour force. Dignity for women in this society also requires access to adequate services if we have been physically, sexually or emotionally assaulted.

Value of women's work: The recognition by this society of the importance of pay equity and employment equity would indicate that women's work is considered valuable.

Voice: The voice of women as experts of our own lives can be developed through funding resources which are women-based and women-focused, such as shelters for assaulted women and sexual assault centres. Funding of these and other such support services helps break the silence on many levels. They give women a voice on an individual basis so that as individuals they can voice their own pain, thus breaking the silence. These services enable women to advocate on behalf of each other, thereby breaking the silence at a societal level.

Equality through freedom of choice: We can increase women's choices through the adequate funding of the services which women require in determining our own individual future. Women's options are lessened in number and in viability due to factors such as fewer economic resources, fewer employment sources and lower employment standards as well as inadequate support and health services.

For instance, when a woman is forced to seek safety in a shelter for assaulted women, will she be able to exercise her right to safety if the shelters in her area are full? Currently in the North Bay area there is one shelter for assaulted women right in the city. It is a multipurpose shelter. There are three shelters outside the city of North Bay as well. They are within about a 40-kilometre radius of each other. Currently all the women's shelters are full and we have a waiting list at Nipissing Transition House, which is fairly common, so obviously there is always an increased need for services for safety.

If she considers separating from an abusive partner, will she have access to community resources which can help her explore her options? If she requires social assistance, will she be made to feel guilty for so doing?

I have to refer to a letter to the editor I read in the North Bay Nugget recently which appears to have been circulated throughout various communities. The headline in our papers was "Put Them to Work." "I am writing about a huge problem our country has but some places are doing something about it. I would like to see Ontario do something. The problem is why are the people on welfare getting cheques for doing nothing?"

That attitude concerns me greatly when very many of these people are fighting to find ways of maintaining a basic standard of living. That kind of attitude, I think, just continues to make it harder and harder. So the stigma continues.

When we heard the strong opposition to the recent budget and the subsequent demand for public hearings, we felt compelled to speak out as well. The Conservatives demanded that public reaction be included through this format. Well, what you are hearing from us today is just a whisper of what many women are saying, many women who are very concerned about services and social services, and the need to continue.

What would those who want cutbacks have this province do to social programs?

We may be in a recession. I know there is some debate depending on who is stating what about whether we are still in it or out of it. This does not stop people's need for food, shelter, clothing and safety. Men continue to assault women during times of economic restraint.

Those worrying about food, clothing, education, health, shelter and safety would quite likely welcome the luxury of worrying about our tax system.

While women live in a society in which the dignity of womanhood is undermined, the value of our work is yet to be fully acknowledged, our voice is denied or dismissed and our choices are limited, we will continue to face oppression. We would expect that this committee will not dismiss our input at this hearing. The women of Ontario require and expect to have access to the financial resources allocated to the various social programs through this budget. In fact, many of us expect and are calling for more economic attention to women's rights.

Ms Neault: My name is Alvina Neault. I am one of two co-ordinators in the Women's Action Committee of Nipissing. I live in Mattawa, which is 40 miles east of North Bay, a little lumbering town. Like Pamela, I am a shelter worker in a slightly different shelter. It is a family resource centre and the mandate is different, but most of what we deal with is the result of violence as well. All my life I have been a resident of northern Ontario.

Like a lot of other Ontario and Canadian women, I am married and I have a family. Like many other Canadian families, we lived through the last recession and we will live through this one. We will do it by making some cutbacks. There will be fewer luxuries and treats for every family member. However, when my husband and I are considering our budget, there are several realities we have to face, because like it or not our basic needs, just like everyone else's, remain the same. We have to eat. We have to have a place to live. Our children continue to grow out of their clothes, and as much as I wish it would not happen, they get sick and they need medical attention.

As the ones responsible for making the decisions in our family, my husband and I have to consider all of these things when we sit down to decide where the limited resources will be allocated.

At one time in the not-so-distant past, it was considered acceptable to expose members of the family who were considered useless or just another mouth to feed to the elements to die. Girl babies and the elderly often suffered this fate. In this vastly more enlightened age, we have laws to protect people from this sort of treatment.

However, when times get tough, as they do in a recession, people begin to cast about for solutions, and inevitably someone decides that we are spending too much on low cost housing, too much on medicare and way too much on education. Complaints are heard, in the paper and elsewhere, about how easy it is to get UI benefits or general welfare or family benefits. On the same page in any newspaper, we can read about plant closures and people being thrown out of their jobs, and government promising to spend on our social welfare net at the same time Canadians need it most, and Ontario is part of Canada.

In my family, my husband and I are the adults, and therefore the ones with the power to say where the money will be spent. We do not expect our children to quit school and go to work to help support themselves, even if it were possible for them to find a job. We have no intention of asking them to quit eating. We will not refuse to provide them with medical attention. What we will do is put a second mortgage on the house or borrow money to ensure that our responsibilities to them are met. That is our job. It is government's job to see to it that the citizens of Ontario are guaranteed the necessities of life so that when the recession ends we will not have been pushed so far down that we will be incapable of rising again.

Do not get me wrong. My husband and I do not want to go further into debt. We will not do it without a great deal of thought. But if it is necessary, we will do it because the alternatives are unthinkable.

I just want to make it clear that I am not a member of any political party. I feel free to praise or criticize any government and any of its ministers. I will admit that the Ontario deficit is distressing, but it is justifiable. It is justifiable on the same basis that many family deficits are justifiable: The money is being used to take care of people.

The people who are the beneficiaries of the Ontario budget are by and large people who are long overdue for some consideration from government: Ontario native women who are victims of sexual assault; low-income people who had their income taxes reduced or wiped out by the new tax credits; children on reserves who will benefit from 400 new day care spaces, and that is hardly enough; child care workers who were long overdue for pay equity; after all they have one of the more important jobs in our society and they are making lousy money; and university students who were long overdue for some education and violence against women.

While we are considering all these things, we might ask ourselves a few questions. Where did this deficit start? Was it during another recession, this recession, or did the previous government incur it during a time of growth and plenty? How much are these hearings costing the Ontario taxpayer? What part did the cut in federal transfer payments play in the Ontario deficit?

Mr McLean: Two excellent briefs, from the heart and saying it as it is. The first question I have is with regard to the transition house. How long has it been in action?

Ms Alcorn: Since 1984, the Nipissing Transition House.

Mr McLean: Does it have 14 beds? That is not near enough, I am sure.

Ms Alcorn: No.

Mr McLean: Are you planning on enlarging it or are you doing to get more quality places for these people who are in need?

Ms Alcorn: What North Bay is doing right now is looking at a sexual assault centre. I think that will help. We have a lot of crisis counselling as well—women trying to figure out whether they are going to leave or are not going to leave and some women who need to come in crisis to the centre. Whether or not that sexual assault centre will be a reality as well, we are not sure yet because we are just in the planning stages. We are one of the areas which has not been designated to receive a sexual assault centre, although we have not got at all into the planning stages.

I do not know that we would expand the size of the shelter, but I think the increased use of service—it is just skyrocketing and certainly we would love to have another shelter in the community. Many people look at North Bay and they say, "You've got Nipissing Transition House right in the city." There's a multipurpose shelter for men and women in the city and then the three family resource centres just outside. The city has been forced to put families out of hotels, into hotel rooms. So nobody is turned away at the doors; that is definite. Women can come in and we get them to another shelter. Sometimes it means going into a completely different community and sometimes it means a hotel room is her only other option.

Mr McLean: Your food banks.

Ms Alcorn: We have a food bank.

Mr McLean: Are you getting enough supplies to operate that food bank? Some of them are not.

Ms Alcorn: Every summer there is a major drive for the food bank and we just had a festival in town.

Ms M. Ward: One of your comments, which I think is aside from your brief, was that you were describing the blame-the-victim attitude that is somewhat prevalent nowadays against people on welfare, with people commenting about lazy people on welfare. We find the same attitude in some segments of society about women who are victims of violence. Not everyone supports the need for those services. I think in some cases people are not eligible for support if their husbands are assumed to be able to support them at times when they might need to come to a shelter.

Ms Alcorn: You mean women having to pay for their own safety?

Ms M. Ward: Yes.

Ms Alcorn: I think that is being negotiated with the shelters at a provincial level. But in our community I cannot remember when a woman has had to pay. One of the things is that when there is a separation usually you cannot get to the assets pending division of assets, or they disappear, whatever they may be. Very rarely do women actually have financial resources and when they do, many women are concerned that they will have to pay for their own safety.

Ms M. Ward: That is the point I wanted to emphasize to get you to comment on, the need for community resources to be put into it. The woman might come from a family with some financial resources, but the woman is left without any resources, and that is really a form of imprisonment if you do not have the community resources there and she has to stay within that violent situation.

Ms Alcorn: The shelters contract with the municipalities and some shelters are having difficulties with municipalities. We are not; a very co-operative municipality.

Ms M. Ward: That is part of my concern, yes.

Ms Alcorn: But I am concerned that power would go to municipalities. I think it should be provincial. There should be guidelines and no woman in Ontario should have to risk not being able to get to a safe haven.

Ms M. Ward: Do you find that public awareness of the need for this service has grown in the last few years, that people really are becoming aware of the problem the more it is talked about? It is not hidden any more. No one laughs nowadays about wife assault, I hope, as happened a few years ago in the House of Commons.

Ms Alcorn: I do not want to hog the microphone.

Ms Neault: I think that there is a danger that people are going to see shelters as a solution to wife assault, and they are not, and no shelter worker wants to stay at work forever, not in the shelter. We would far rather see violence eliminated so we can all get on with our lives, because this is more than a job.

Ms M. Ward: One of our presenters yesterday was speaking of the need for education at a much younger age, being able to identify potential offenders.

Ms Alcorn: I think we have to be careful about education, as well. I am concerned sometimes. That is why I referred to "women-centred." I do not think we can lose sight of who brought this issue out. It was assaulted women and their advocates who finally screamed loud enough for people to start listening. A concern of mine is that the community had not been responding for centuries, or society had not been. I think we have to be very careful about what we do, where the money goes, how it is allocated, and plan our strategy, not be short-term. So many people want quick solutions to social problems. This has been in existence for ever and it is going to take some time. I think we have to be very careful on how we apply money, allocate money.

Mr Jamison: I would like to thank you for your very direct presentation. I would like to ask you a question about the children involved where wives are abused, about the effect on children and the numbers. You have children who are experiencing this first hand and you are seeing the effects of that within the shelter itself; but there is the ability to deal properly with the situation, to provide the support in relationship to the children involved also. I wonder if you could speak about that for a moment.

Ms Neault: Children in shelters have even less power than their mother. Whether the mother has any power or not, the children still see her as being powerful. So their situation is quite different from their mother's. I think almost every shelter now has a child care worker who sees to the specific problems the children experience when they are taken away from their home and perhaps a father who does not abuse them, might only abuse the mother. It depends largely on whether the children are male or female.

They see it quite differently. Little boys see it quite differently. It became obvious to us, almost as soon as we opened the shelter, that violent families were a training ground for future violence, because the little boys quite often, depending on their age, take over where their father left off. When dad is not there, they become the abusive one. They will hit their siblings and their mother and expect her to pay attention.

Mr Phillips: Thank you both for a thoughtful presentation. I just have a couple of comments and then a question to you, I guess on your presentation. I think there were some questions in there. I think one of your questions was where the previous deficits start. You can get a copy of the budget, I guess, from the clerk. It goes through it. On page 48 it spells that out for you.

You also mentioned that you admit the Ontario deficit is distressing but a justifiable deficit. Just a comment, I guess, about why some of us worry a bit about the budget: It is not this year's deficit; it is deficits for a long while. I like your analogy with the family. That is the way I think about the budget. The second part we worry about is just where is the revenue is going to come from. Where are we going to generate the activity to ensure that we do fund the programs in the future? I wanted to share with you some of our concerns about the budget, the long-term deficit which goes on for ever, and just whether we are going to have enough economic activity to fund the programs.

We have talked to other groups, by the way, which have expressed their opinions, but I would like yours. In difficult economic times, does the demand for your service go up or is it irrelevant to economic times? Second, are we seeing an increase in battering or is it that there is just more access now to services and therefore people are able to come forward a little bit more? In other words, is it a situation which we are beginning to change? I think you mentioned this is not going to be something that is changed overnight, but are we beginning to make an impact in terms of getting at the root causes of this or not?

It is troublesome to me to hear that you have a waiting list or that at least you are trying to accommodate it. You have four facilities in your community and neighbouring communities, but still do not seem to be able to meet the demands. I would like you to give some of your experience to us in terms of economic conditions. Do they impact one way or the other on this? Second, what is happening out there?

Ms Neault: The family resource centres are slightly different, as I mentioned before. We have a wider mandate, so we can take any woman in crisis, and the woman defines the crisis. It can be economic; her house might have burned down. We have actually never had that, but the woman defines the crisis. It is not a transition house that deals primarily with violence in the family.

Having said that, yes, we do see an increase during hard economic times because we take women for whatever crisis. Sometimes family breakdown is precipitated by a loss of employment and so we might see a woman in that situation.

Ms Alcorn: Our shelter, however, is only for assault women and their children—physical, sexual and emotional abuse. We have been asked that and we have tried to see if there is some correlation, but it just seems to be that there is some need for and the use of our services seems to increase steadily. There are times it slows down. Then the next year we are full before Christmas. There is no trend that we can really identify.

We do know that economics is not what causes the men to be violent towards women. There is our social structure in our society. When times are good, there is violence. Some people say, I guess, it is the end of the month when the cheques come in, referring to a very classist remark. That does not seem to make any difference either. We do not notice that. It seems just to be steady. In fact, I have heard some women say they felt worse leaving during hard economic times, because they felt guilty leaving. Maybe it is because of the economics. They think maybe it is because of the economics, that maybe when times get better, the violence will go down, and it does not, typically. It is hard to tell, but there is no cause and effect of that one aspect.

I think you were asking if we are seeing an increase in violence, or is it an increased use of service because of public awareness?

Mr Phillips: I think you said the demand for your services increases, and I am just trying to get from you what the cause of that is.

Ms Alcorn: Increased awareness is certainly having an effect. Women are starting to realize they have a choice. There are options. However, what worries me is that women will think, as Alvina was saying, that because we have shelters everything is taken care of. Shelters are definitely not what every woman wants or can see as an option. When our shelter is full, the thought of going to another outlying rural community is quite frightening for a lot of women who live in the city. Their support networks are in the city. There are transportation issues, the children, friends, the schools, the relatives, all of those things, some of which women need to get away from, but very often support systems help.

There is debate about whether violence against women is increasing or if it is awareness. I think, unfortunately and fortunately, it is both. But more and more women are phoning and saying their awareness is increasing of the various systems—the social system, the health system, the justice system, the civil system, the law system.

Ms Neault: I might also make the comment that it seems to be word of mouth rather than any education that is on television, although that might help, but when women come to us they are typically referred by a relative or a neighbour or another woman who has used the shelter.

Mr McLean: I really have not any further questions, just enjoyed listening to the comments. But I presume that awareness now of the program would be the biggest reason why you are getting more people. It is because they are aware now there really is some place to go. A lot of people, I believe, stayed in the situation because they did not believe there was someplace else to go.

Ms Alcorn: Many women have said that to me and others that although there is a place to go, they cannot. A lot of it has to do with community awareness too, that society says, "Yes, it's okay for you to leave." That really bothers me, that she gets messages from anybody she may come into contact with too, community awareness, that society is saying: "It's okay for you to leave. You have a right to leave. He doesn't have a right to do that."

The Chair: Thank you very much for making your presence and your presentation here before the committee.

ONTARIO HOTEL AND MOTEL ASSOCIATION

The Chair: The next group to make a presentation is the Ontario Hotel and Motel Association. Please come forward and identify yourself. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget review. You will have one half-hour, and out of that half-hour at the very end, before the half-hour comes up, you will save some time which will be divided equally for presentations from the three parties. You may proceed.

Mrs Dozzi: First of all, I would like to apologize for my voice this afternoon as I have this terrible cold. I do not intend to try to speak too loudly, but I just apologize in the meantime.

Thank you for allowing me to make this presentation to you. My name is Melinda Dozzi. I am from Sudbury, but I am also the president of the Ontario Hotel and Motel Association, whose head office is in Toronto on Airport Road.

I was born and raised in Sudbury, Ontario. I am proud to be called a Sudburian, a person from northern Ontario. My family has been in the hospitality business in this community for 54 years. We have been active in this region not only in a business and social environment but also, as years have witnessed, in this area in the political arena as well.

I am a concerned Canadian and I believe in Ontario and in our future. In my capacity as president of the hotel and motel association, I wish to outline to you my perception of some of the key issues affecting the hospitality industry, which is the third-largest industry and the largest employer in the province.

I would like to tell you a little bit about our association. I feel some of you may be aware of it already, since you are perhaps with the Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations. The Ontario Hotel and Motel Association is incorporated in 1925. The objectives of the association are to represent the hotel, motel and food and beverage industry in government and legislative matters; to provide means for members to exchange information on problems and new ideas; to review industry trends and develop forecasts; to provide guidelines for professional conduct in this industry; to provide educational programs and services; to provide guidelines for accommodation and operating standards in the industry; and to act as a focal point for organizing joint efforts among members for the solution of industry problems.

The Ontario Hotel and Motel Association represents over 1,200 members who own and/or operate large and small businesses in this industry, such as hotels, motels, taverns, restaurants, resorts and lodges. The association's membership represents over 51,000 bedrooms and 150,000 licensed dining and lounge seats, employing over 45,000 people. I read last week that one of the problems with the hospitality industry is that we have failed to tell the world—yes, the world—how valuable and significant tourism is. Now every nation worldwide wants to be counted as a tourist destination. No one could possibly name a country or a nation that does not want this industry. We as Canadians do not realize that tourism is vital to our wellbeing and economy. Tourism is being neglected.

In this past provincial budget, there was not a mention of tourism or any support for this industry. Tourism means jobs and foreign receipts. Ontario has come into a summer of soft convention bookings, post-GST spending thriftiness and dwindling tourism from the US. Ontario tourism operators are burdened with taxes—fuel, airport, transportation, property and liquor. Compounded with the GST, the PST and the Ontario health levy, plus other proposed taxes on our industry and country, many tourist operators find operations a paperwork nightmare. Hoteliers are now handing governments an estimated 47% of their revenues. The industry sees no signs of recovery and is, when and if it happens, anticipating a slow one.

A recent study sponsored by the Hotel Association of Canada and Tourism Canada suggests that high taxation is contributing to the industry's loss of international competitiveness. It is a fallacy to conclude that Ontario hotels are not competitive. They are, and you must believe that they are. Hundreds of tourist and hospitality businesses, both small and large, have been brought to their knees by this recession, wiping out countless millions of dollars in personal and family investments while crippling the entrepreneurship which has sustained development and growth in our industry. We recognize the importance of working together and joining our efforts with our colleagues.

We are pleased to have heard the announcement of Peter North, Minister of Tourism and Recreation, of a $200,000 commitment for the establishment of the Ontario Tourism Education Council. This will provide opportunities in our industry through job apprenticeship, national certification standards, training and education and the promotion of hospitality awareness.

In the recession of 1982 the small business person was helped. In this recession, one that is deeper and longer than most people ever dreamed, and not over yet, the small business person has become a non-entity. It must be remembered that not only are employees people but employers are people too.

The GST is not popular. The GST story is probably still very unfinished and will remain unfinished for a while. No one could have predicted that the GST arrival in a master stroke of deadly timing would come in the midst of widespread recession, nor did anyone predict that the Canadian dollar would be as strong as it is.

Our industry has traditionally provided meaningful and productive employment and steady incomes for hundreds of thousands of Canadians and Ontarians, and particularly for women, youth, aboriginal peoples, new Canadians and visible minorities in greater numbers than in any other sector or industry in our province. Many of them and their dependents are now suffering the hardship of permanent or indefinite layoffs and reduced available work opportunities. There must be a recognition of the vital economic importance of the Ontario tourism and hospitality industry to the economy of the province. Canadian consumers are going to the United States for goods because of price differences. The cross-border shopping greatly affects the hospitality industry as well. This is also causing economic pain and in some cases bankruptcies for domestic retailers in border communities in Ontario.

Canadian shoppers, in order to benefit from the 48-hour visit, are opting to stay in American hotels and motels so they can bring additional goods back across the border. The occupancy, on the weekends, of the border cities' accommodation property is down everywhere. This means that the hotels are losing money, retailers are losing business, jobs are decreasing and the government's tax revenue is diminishing. It would appear that our tax policies therefore are self-defeating. When people continue to shop across the border, it becomes a part of their routine and part of their life. Routines are difficult to break. We are people, but we are creatures of habit. How long before we convince them again to shop Canadian and utilize our own resources?

People in cities and towns near the American border find it more economical to drive across the border to purchase gasoline. Gas increased 1.7 cents a litre after this last budget. Gasoline prices are to go up 1.7 cents per litre in January 1992. In northern Ontario we are too far from the border to buy inexpensive gasoline. It has been stated by Mike Brown, MPP for Algoma-Manitoulin, that the average cost for a northern Ontario motorist will be $110 more by January. This is devastating to tourism in the north since people planning vacations will tend to find it more economical to tour the American states.

Sunday shopping, mandatory service training, minimum wage increase, off-premise sales, pay equity, wage protection, the sin tax, employee health tax, environmental and waste regulations, workers' compensation, directors' liability, Bill 70—where does this end? Business has long been recognized as the major creator of new jobs. Business, by its very nature, is innovative and creates new products and advanced technology which can be exported worldwide.

Wherever you go, in any part of the world, as you know, people think of Canada as a safe haven, a country where politics works, where there is a minimal amount of corruption, where there is safety in our streets, where we have a phenomenal environment and where our economic performance has been consistently strong over 45 years. All of that brings on the perception abroad that we are a politically stable country. This has been such a trump card that we have taken it for granted. If the government continues to apply more legislation, taxes and restrictions on the employer, it soon will not matter if the employment standards are met or the employees are being paid a good wage, because there will not be any reason to have employees.

Retail, manufacturing, hospitality operations large and small are closing their doors already in alarming numbers. Of the 130 Ontario hotel and motel members who responded to a recent survey, 65% said they had laid off staff within the last six months. The 479 laid-off workers represent 16% of the total number of people employed by the survey respondents. In addition, about half of the layoffs are permanent. About 65% of the survey respondents indicated that business had declined over the past six months. When asked to identify one or more reasons for their losses in business, 69% of the respondents said recession, 66% said the goods and services tax, 61% said the employer health tax and 43% said excessive property taxes.

Unfortunately, governments tend to turn their backs on businesses and often policies are developed with no consideration of the impact on the business community. Governments tend to listen, but do they really hear once they assume power? When it is no longer profitable to carry on business and there is no reward for the hours, the risk-taking, the amount of pressure constantly faced by employers, the sense of insecurity and the pressure on family, what is the answer? We know Mr Rae understands that the generation of wealth, meaning business investment and growth, is essential for Ontario to provide jobs and find resources to support health care, education, the environment, culture, the public infrastructure and the quality of life in cities and towns in this province.

To stimulate activity in northern Ontario and thus utilize the region's most readily available non-depleting industry, an economic generator, northern Ontario must be perceived as a major destination by potential visitors, both domestic and foreign. Tourism is an increasingly important factor in northern Ontario, particularly for those communities lacking any major resource industry. Tourism is northern Ontario's third largest industry and provides numerous employment opportunities. The north offers a great deal of promise for tourism, and through proper promotion tourism in northern Ontario can offer world-class wilderness and outdoor vacation opportunities. The best potential for tourism lies in the non-resident pleasure travel market.

The key to success is northern Ontario's ability to develop long-range plans for the future and sell northern Ontario. Without the proper transportation and upgrading of amenities, northern Ontario's ability to capitalize on the world's largest and fastest-growing industry may be lost. The north must be opened up. We must have better road transportation from southern Ontario to the Manitoba border, and soon. Our highways are our lifeline. If we wish to develop industry, attract visitors, maintain and improve the quality of life and be competitive across Canada and in world markets, we must have a safe and dependable highway network.

Is it right that our generation should be building massive debts in order to pass them on to our children and grandchildren? The fact of the matter is that we are heavily indebted that there is no question that our children and our grandchildren are going to pay. Where have we gone wrong? What are our values? What is the answer? What are we going to do? We would be prepared, as an association, to give input and direction, as would many other Canadians. All you have to do is to ask and be prepared to listen, as I hope you are now. We welcome the opportunity to work with you.

would like to take this opportunity to highlight some requests and recommendations that were collected made with Tourism Ontario's submission: that the Ontario government maintain student wages and the differential in wages for wait staff; eliminate the exemption of the current provincial sales tax prepared food purchases under $4; eliminate the discriminatory provincial beverage tax on beverage alcohol purchased by licensees, which will enable them to be competitive or to compete on price and merchandise spirits, wine and beer with other provinces and significantly increase provincial tax revenues; encourage industry sales of taxable food and beverage by harmonizing the collection of provincial sales tax applied to food and beverage alcohol at 8%; freeze the provincial tax rate applied to the accommodation industry at 5%; eliminate the application of the commercial concentration on large hotels and associated parking areas in the Greater Toronto area; reduce the unfair employer health tax for tourism and hospitality enterprises to a flat 0.5% of payroll regardless of size; eliminate the application of the employer health tax on taxable benefits and allowances in our industry; collect the employer health tax from persons who are self-employed or are compensated through unincorporated proprietorships; reinvest all provincial tax revenues collected annually from provincial fuel taxes, drivers' licences and vehicle purchase/rent/repair taxes, levies and surcharges in the improvement, repair and expansion of provincial and municipal roads; co-ordinate a multimedia network by a Canadian campaign and emphasize social and economic benefits of travelling in Canada and purchasing Canadian goods.

Sunday shopping should be unrestricted in Ontario to create a level playing field and unrestricted freedom of choice in the marketplace to offer shopping selections, convenience and availability to all our visitors.

The hospitality industry today is faced with many obstacles, increased operating costs and restricting legislation. In order to remain competitive and recapture some of the lost business from our neighbours to the south, we must have the ability to compete on a level playing field. We ask the Ontario government to consider our recommendations as we strongly feel that these recommendations, if approved, will help the economy of Ontario and therefore the people.

As an ending, I would like to quote from Audrey McLaughlin, federal leader of the NDP: "People feel we are living not just the prosperity of the country but the very character of the country. We seem to be losing the country we knew. The fate of this country is much more than the fate of political parties." Thank you.

Mr B. Ward: I appreciate your brief and the recommendations you have included and I am assuming we are going to get a copy of that as part of the package. I would not like to point out some perhaps unintentional inaccuracies in your brief. You mentioned there was little support for small business. I believe you touched on it to a degree. I can use my riding as an example, the city of Brantford, where I know of a number of small- to medium-sized manufacturing industries that have received loans or loan guarantees from the Ontario government corporation to allow them either to expand their capability or introduce new technology. There is assistance for small- to medium-sized business from our government.

You mentioned the levels of taxation as a concern and I agree. I think the GST has done more to hinder the advance of tourism in this province than anything other than the recession. If you look at the budget from a business standpoint, I think there is very little cost added to business from a taxation standpoint other than the 1.7-cent increase of gasoline. Again, I can relate to Brantford, and I agree it is different up north because there is more competition, but that 1.7-cent increase has not been noticed at the pump price because prices fluctuate so much and generally they are down more than up.

We do have a program in the government called tourism redevelopment incentive program, or TRIP, and it was not our initiative. A hotel in Brantford has taken advantage of that, $500,000, to expand its services. I am just wondering if you could comment on that specific program. As well, it is my understanding, from previous presenters, that tourism is up by 21% in Thunder Bay over the last three months, which I think is great. As well, we had a gentleman from Manitoulin Island who said tourism appears to be better than it was last year. Perhaps you could comment, if you can.

Mrs Dozzi: Manitoulin Island is unique in the fact that its tourism is up this summer.

Mr B. Ward: Yes, and Thunder Bay is up 21%. They are doing something right. Perhaps we could learn from that. That was my question.

Mrs Dozzi: They had better tell Toronto what they are doing, because I think Toronto is the biggest crier of its soft market right now. As far as small business is concerned, I am not speaking directly of manufacturing when I am speaking of small business. I should probably say it relates more to small business than to the restaurant and hotel association. Maybe it is because we sell alcoholic beverages in most cases and we are licensed properties, but they do find in many cases that it is not that easy. Your hotel in Brantford might have been able to get this $500,000 loan, but they have experienced a more difficult time getting loans in some cases.

Mr B. Ward: Through TRIP?

Mrs Dozzi: Whether they are using TRIP or not, maybe because we are licensed properties and people will stand back for that, and the fact that we do sell alcoholic beverages; but not all of us do, of course. As far as TRIP is concerned, maybe they are not going to the proper thing. I am not hearing so much from my members that they are applying for loans or wanting to expand and being refused, whether they are applying to TRIP or any other organization that might be helpful to them.

Mr Jamison: I understand what you are saying about the budget, that clearly the government took a neutral position there, basically. I wanted to just comment quickly on the state of the Canadian dollar and how that affects the tourism in our tourism industry and the exemption in the Sunday shopping legislation that is pending. How do you feel about the recognition of tourist facilities in tourist areas being exempt from Sunday shopping? I know in talking to the minister that he was—

Mrs Dozzi: Let me just tell you one thing that happened last Wednesday when I did a presentation on Sunday shopping. Just before I came to do the presentation on Sunday shopping—

Mr Jamison: Our time is limited. I would like you to be specific about tourism.

Mrs Dozzi: I am. I had a busload of Americans came in, 37 Americans from Madison, Wisconsin. They came in for lunch. They had been in Ontario for one week. And all they did was complain about the high cost of food and accommodations in the province. The tour guide they had was I suppose the most vocal. She complained the whole time she was there, especially when they came to the cash, not so much because of my establishment's prices, but just what she had incurred when she had been travelling through the province. She said: "When you tell these 37 Americans"—who were senior citizens—"what the price of the meal is, don't talk anything about GST, don't mention provincial sales tax, and for heaven's sake, don't say there's a service charge, whether it is 10% or 15% or 12%. Just tell them one amount. If you're going to charge them $8 for the salad bar or $13 for a buffet or $10, don't mention anything else. Give them one price, because this GST/PST for the last week has mind-boggled them. They are absolutely mind-boggled."

She was the most vocal. She came to the cash, and when they paid their bill, these 37 Americans—this was their last stop before Sault Ste Marie, Michigan—were in their pockets digging out every single Canadian coin they could find to pay their bill. They did not want to have any Canadian money left in their pockets. It bothered me so much that they were so anxious. I had never seen a group—and maybe it was her fault, because she was a very aggressive tour guide. She wanted no Canadian money left in their pockets at all. We took pennies and nickels and dimes.

Mr Kwinter: Thank you very much for your presentation. I can sympathize with what you have to say. A branch of my family is in the hospitality business.

I was quite interested in your survey, and what I would really like to find out from you, if you are able to tell me, is, have you done any studies to find out what is going to be the difference as a result of the recession ending, if it does, and the cumulative effect of all of this other tax-related legislation? The recession is throughout North America. The Americans are feeling the recession just as much as we are, yet they are travelling, they are coming here. But when the recession is over, some of this legislation is still going to be there. How is that going to impact? Are you going to see any improvement?

Mrs Dozzi: I do not think anything is ever going to be as good as 1988 was. I do not think we are ever going to see years in this business like in 1988. I am not a fortune teller; neither are you. We may be able to look back and say, "Oh, she was wrong, look at 1990, it was wonderful," or as we prepare for the year 2000. But I do not think the tourism and the economy, as far as the influx of tourism in Ontario is concerned, is ever going to be as wonderful as it was in 1988. That was a really keen year in this business and I do not think we are ever going to see—I do not have an answer for you. I do not know what we are going to do. We are looking to you people to tell us what you think we should be doing. We elected you people; we want some good inspiration from you too. We input to you—

Mr Phillips: And you fired us.

Mrs Dozzi: I think you have to answer that question for me.

As far as the survey is concerned, I can give you all the facts; all the little results are sitting in the office.

We spoke in Thunder Bay, but I just want to say one thing. This was in the Toronto Star. Michael Beckley is chief executive officer of the Holiday Inns across Canada and he says, "Maybe we should start growing melons on our ballrooms."

You mentioned Thunder Bay, and they are saying here this is from Motels Ontario; Bruce Gravel is their chairman. He said, "Members in the United States border areas, Kingston, Niagara Falls, Sault Ste Marie, have suffered a 20% drop in occupancy."

Mr B. Ward: Thunder Bay is up 21%.

Mrs Dozzi: Maybe it is because they have tried to get

Mr B. Ward: Holiday Inn is aggressive.

Mrs Dozzi: Maybe it is because they are driving from North Bay to pick up beer. We have had this huge issue in northern Ontario about northern Ontario draft beer shortages. Our director, Don Johnson, in Thunder Bay, with the hoteliers, is transporting beer from Powassan, keg beer from Molson's and Labatt's, up to Thunder Bay. Maybe that's why.

Mr Kwinter: Have you done any studies as to the drop in foreign conventions that have cancelled as a result of what they consider to be uncompetitive pricing?

Mrs Dozzi: Well, from the Metropolitan Toronto Convention and Visitors Association, last year 16.7 million tourists visited Toronto, 500,000 fewer than the year before and the Metropolitan Toronto Convention and Visitors Association is not expecting the shortfall to be made up this year.

Personally, I do not think in the north we get a lot of foreign conventions. Your big foreign conventions are happening in your downtown Toronto hotels. The best ones to answer questions like that would be people like Michael Beckley and people like Ray Jacobi from the Four Seasons and Klaus Tenter from the Inn on the Park. They are the ones who are so concentrated on the accommodation industry.

The Hotel Association of Metropolitan Toronto's biggest thrust right now is to worry about and be concerned about filling their properties. Their properties are down, they are suffering greatly, as you can see the competitive pricing they are putting in. There is no GST any more on foreign conventions. That was one thing that Mr Hockin was kind enough to grant, the fact that if you are booking a foreign convention and most of your conventioners are from foreign countries, whether they be European or Asian or American, there is no GST, thank goodness, on those conventions.

According to this article that I read in the Toronto Star, says here: "Despite an aggressive marketing campaign launched this winter by the Toronto convention bureau in which the bureau guaranteed that prices on rooms and facilities would cost less than comparable rooms and facilities elsewhere in North America, the number of convention bookings by the association this year has jumped to 651," which is not a great drop from 666.

Mr McLean: Just a short question. Mrs Dozzi, you had a tough year to be the president of your association, I know the association well and it does good work. The question I have for you is, in Sudbury, what is the difference in vacancy rate this year from last year?

Mrs Dozzi: The vacancy rate in Sudbury, to tell you the honest to goodness truth, is not down a great deal from last year. I think we are off maybe 5% or 6%, but not a great deal. Sudbury has been a lucky community. I feel that Sudbury, as you well know, has really not felt the recession. You must have heard that, and it is true. We have not really felt the recession. The recession, what we have felt, started maybe in March of 1990, but it was so gradual and slow that we did not feel the huge impact that smaller communities, like in southern Ontario, that are totally interested in manufacturing, have felt.

Inco is pretty powerful and strong right now. They are doing a lot for the environment. They are still a great employer. No longer can Sudburians depend on just International Nickel for their livelihood, but because the region has so diversified itself and our chairman and our council are continuing to try to diversify this region, I feel that Sudbury has been very strong.

My fellow hoteliers, in the last three to four weeks, have been complaining. We do not see many tourists, and as we see are, lots of them, travelling in the motorized trailer homes. They seem to stop only when it rains or because they get tired of driving. We have had such a wonderful summer, yet they are not stopping.

A member of Parliament told me once that this is what Sudbury is like. Sudbury takes six months to fall into whatever you are falling into, and then it will take you another six months to catch up once everybody is caught. Whether that is true or not, it seems to be true. It is only in the last three or four weeks that I hear them on the phone, or when I call or they call, "How are things?" Well, it's pretty bad right now." But it has not been so bad, it has been the last three or four weeks really. I cannot say what September or October is going to bring, but we do not see a lot of those American dollars crossing our desks any more. They are just not there.

Mr B. Murdoch: You mentioned Sunday shopping in your brief, and I was just wondering again what your thoughts were. Would the government be better out of the whole deal and not regulating it, or do you think the—

Mrs Dozzi: I wish the government had not done what it has done, sort of thrown it back to municipalities and even mentioned chambers of commerce. They have these seven guidelines they are to follow to designate tourist properties. I was in Niagara Falls a couple of weeks ago and our director there said, "At one time you thought of tourism, you thought of Canada, you thought of Niagara Falls." You can go to Cobalt and they want to be a tourist destination now, because the tourist dollar is important to them.

I wish the legislation had come right from Queen's Park and had stayed there. I think under the Liberal government we had open Sunday shopping and that is where we should have stayed. It was light-years ago when you could not go to the movies on Sunday. Do you ever think about not going to movies any more? You think: "This is crazy. Whoever thought of not going to a movie on a Sunday?" Why can you not shop? Have you ever shopped on a Sunday? Have you ever gone to the States and shopped on a Sunday, or anywhere else? I do not think you have to be open from 9 in the morning until 9 at night, but you could be open from 12 to 5.

The Chair: I want to thank you for your presentation and for appearing before the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget review.

CRISIS HOUSING LIAISON (SUDBURY)

The Chair: The next group we have is the Crisis Housing Liaison, Mr Barry Schmidl. You have one half-hour for your presentation and at the end of it a question and answer period from the three parties. I would like to welcome you to the committee. Please proceed with your brief.

Mr Schmidl: This is a copy of the statistical tables I will be referring to.

Mr McLean: Have you got a copy of that?

Mr Schmidl: Yes. I will pass that out to the folks afterwards.

Mr McLean: It would be nice to follow through this.

Mr Schmidl: If the committee would like it now, I can give it to you now.

The Chair: Some of the committee members like to make notes beside some of the comments.

Mr Schmidl: Fair enough, just so long as I do not catch anyone following with their fingers.

I would like to thank you for this opportunity to present the views of Crisis Housing Liaison (Sudbury) on the proposed provincial budget, and particularly on its housing and social services aspects. I have been informed that there is a time limit on my presentation, so I will attempt to be brief and to the point.

Allow me to begin by introducing the organization that I represent. Crisis Housing Liaison (Sudbury) is a non-profit organization which provides assistance to people in need of housing. The primary service currently offered by the agency is a housing registry program. This program consists of a computerized listing of all available rental units in the regional municipality of Sudbury. These listings are given to families and singles who register with the program. In 1990 a total of 1,353 families and singles looking for housing used this service.

Using the registration information given by our clients, statistics are compiled by the agency on a quarterly basis in order to secure and maintain funding for the program. The statistics also provide useful indicators on the impact that the lack of affordable housing has on people's lives. I will be referring to these statistics through my presentation in order to demonstrate the rationale for our position.

Sudbury, and indeed large parts of this province, are in the midst of a serious housing crisis. Vacancy rates in the Sudbury region, consistently around or below 1%, demonstrate that. Crisis Housing Liaison's statistics illustrate the situation quite well.

Table 1 in the package that has been distributed to you shows that over 42% of the clients coming to our agency in 1990 were living with family or friends or in a temporary shelter of some sort or on the street. In actual numbers, this means that 574 clients did not have a place to call home when they came to see us last year.

We are not talking here of only the stereotypical and incorrectly portrayed street person who does not hold a job and has many social problems. As you will see in table 2, the largest single source of income for our clients was a job.

As you will see if you look at table 3, over 60% of our clients were families. Please keep in mind that when we refer to a client, we are talking about a single person or a family, not the number of individuals served. Each family client represents about three people. Children were a significant part of the 42% of our clients who were homeless in 1990.

My purpose here is not to take up the committee's time by arguing that we are in the midst of a serious housing crisis. Any rational human being can see that this is the case. To disagree is to show that one has one's head in the sand. Rather, I pass along this information to you to show the depth of the crisis that we find ourselves in. It is a crisis that the provincial budget is helping to fight. It is for that reason that we support it.

Economic security is something that many people in Canadian society lack. Quite simply, paying the bills is a problem for many people. This is not through a lack of financial skill or through wasteful spending; it is because money taken in does not always equal the amount that has to go out. When the major expenditure each month is that which keeps a roof over your family's head, it is a serious concern for someone who may not have the money this month. If my choice was paying the rent or feeding my 10-month-old son, I know what my decision would be.

One of the major threats to tenants in the present housing crisis is the amount of rent charged. Generally speaking, the more affordable the unit, the less likely it is to become vacant. Why would you want to let an affordable place go unless it was in poor condition or you were overcrowded?

If you refer to table 4, you will see that the average rent of vacant units generally exceeds the average rent of all units, vacant or occupied. In the case of two-bedroom units, it is by $130 and by hundreds of dollars in the case of three- and four-bedroom units.

This would not necessarily be a bad thing if people were normally able to pay these rents. If you refer to table 5, however, you will see that this is not necessarily the case. In order to pay 30% of your income for the average vacant two-bedroom unit, you would have to earn $23,680 a year. This is not a princely sum by any means and is certainly within the range of many. However, if you look at the average personal income for a woman in Sudbury you will see it is only $11,518. Consider what this means for a single mother with two children who works for minimum wage and is receiving social assistance. This is by no means an extreme example. A full-time minimum wage job would earn only $11,232 a year based on 40 hours a week and $5.40 an hour.

I am not here to talk about rent control—I did that last week in this room, actually—but rather about how the provincial budget affects those placed in the situation I have just described, that of families having to deal with low vacancy rates, high rents and low incomes.

The government has pledged in its budget to build an additional 10,000 units of affordable co-op and non-profit housing across the province. If there is one item in the budget that most helps to alleviate the housing crisis that Ontarians find themselves in, I would say it would be this one. The 10,000 units combined with the regular allocation under the federal-provincial non-profit program and the reallocation of Homes Now program funds for the quick start process should allow for 35,000 units of affordable co-op and non-profit housing to be developed this year. Of these 35,000 units, a majority will be rent geared to income.

While these 35,000 units will not solve the housing crisis in this province, they will be a large step towards it. A study performed in 1988 stated that the Sudbury region's housing supply problems would be largely alleviated with the construction of an additional 1,000 units of affordable housing. If the region receives its fair share of the 35,000 units based on its population, which is about 1.25% of the Ontario population, then 437 units of affordable co-op and non-profit housing will be constructed here. We will be watching to see whether the 35,000 units come to pass and whether they are shared equitably with the Sudbury region. Assuming they are, these units will deal a major blow to the crisis in housing supply in the region.

Housing supply is only part of the housing crisis and only part of the problem for low-income earners. Even assuming you live in rent-geared-to-income housing, your grocery bill and the cost of your children's clothes are not geared to your income and still have to be paid for.

The budget helps low-income earners in several ways. The $215 million set aside in the budget for social assistance will help individuals in genuine need and municipalities overburdened by high welfare costs; the $50-million enrichment of the Ontario tax reduction program will lower or eliminate Ontario income tax for over 100,000 low-income earners, making the total assisted by the program 700,000 in 1991. The number of subsidized child care spaces will be increased, allowing more single parents to get a job and get off social assistance. A $53.8-million provision will create 5,000 subsidized spaces and increase the salaries of chronically underpaid child care workers. Another $5 million will create 400 new spaces on Indian reserves.

It has been said many times that the best form of social assistance is a job. One of the reasons we support this budget is that it helps retain jobs for people and creates more. This budget will create or maintain 70,000 jobs in this province. Of that figure, 20,000 will exist because of the added 10,000 units of affordable non-profit and co-op housing.

Tens of thousands of jobs have been permanently eliminated in the last year or so of recession. This recession is h worse than the one of the early 1980s. In 1990, 65% permanent layoffs were a result of partial or complete closings, whereas in 1982 the figure was only 24%. It is clear that these jobs are not coming back and a provincial budget that does something to maintain and create jobs is welcome.

The federal government's cuts to established programs including and Canada assistance plan transfer payments come to $3.6 billion in the 1991-92 year and would cost thousands of jobs in this province if the provincial government had not acted to maintain them. If the people of Ontario now owe more money on the provincial debt, it is because that debt has been transferred from the federal government through EPF and CAP cuts. We will end up owing about the same amount, and thank God we have a provincial government that has the sense to maintain health and social services jobs when the federal government does not.

Why are jobs and the deficit such an important part of the presentation on the housing and social services aspects of the budget? Because the services provided by people who would have lost their jobs due to federal cuts are those that low-income earners use; because when jobs are lost, the people who lose them are often low-income earners, and many who were not end up as such, and as social assistance recipients; and because job creation, job training and social care initiatives in the budget are geared to allow people to get off social assistance and into education and the job market, helping low-income earners increase their opportunities in society.

In conclusion, I would like to say the provincial budget is a positive budget for those caught in the housing crisis for low-income earners. In addition, it is the most passionate and fiscally responsible response to federal cuts, the recession and the problems they have caused and intensified for low-income earners.

Thank you once again for the opportunity to make this presentation to this committee and I look forward to your questions.

Mr Kwinter: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: The hon. member has one spelling for the presenter and his presentation and another. Could he just clarify what the correct spelling is?

Mr Schmidl: My name is spelled Schmidl. I spelled it right; you spelled it wrong.

Mr Kwinter: I just wanted to make sure who was right and who was wrong.

The Vice-Chair: That will be officially noted on the record.

We are going to start with the official opposition. Mrs. Sullivan.

Mrs Sullivan: We had a presentation this morning from the Northern Ontario Regional Co-operative Housing Association which discussed many of the issues you have raised in relationship to the provision of co-operative and non-profit housing. I noticed in your brief you have suggested that if the Sudbury region gets its fair share of co-op housing, 437 units would be built here. They indicated this morning under questioning that for the entire area, the 18 co-ops that are served through the Northern Ontario Regional Co-operative Housing Association, they have had indications that 300 co-operative units will come their way. That is what they told us this morning. We might want to follow up, just to be certain.

I am very interested in your strong support for the budget, in relationship to the housing issue, because there are a couple of things that are absolutely critical to the provision of co-operative, non-profit or any other kind of housing that were left out of that budget. One of them was additional sewage capacity and one of them was provision for a speedup of the approvals process to ensure that serviced land comes on stream earlier so that in fact we can get the units built. I wonder if you would comment on those two things which, it seems to me, were significantly left out of this budget.

Mr Schmidl: I can comment on the second one in somewhat more depth than I can the first one. I know the Ministry of Housing is presently undergoing a consultation process regarding the whole non-profit and other housing systems. Certainly in the response that Crisis Housing Liaison is making to that green paper, the two green papers, we are suggesting some changes regarding the zoning process and speeding up approvals, that sort of thing. I do not know exactly what impact that would have on the provincial budget, so I cannot comment on whether it should have been included or not, since I do not know what financial—

Mrs Sullivan: It would certainly have an impact on the cash flow. But the other question relates to sewage capacity. I understand in this area most of the communities around Sudbury are at their limits in sewage and Sudbury itself is approaching its capacity on sewage.

Mr Schmidl: Are you talking about servicing to the actual sites where the developments would be built? I think the municipality is making non-profit and co-op projects pay for servicing to the site, so if this would have an impact on the budget, it would be—

Mrs Sullivan: If the plant is at capacity.

Mr Schmidl: Oh, I see, the total plant. I am afraid I do not know much about the capacity of the total sewage plant of Sudbury or whether we need an increase in the amount of capacity. I would hope that if the government were to be conducting a complete review of the housing system, especially as it pertains to non-profit and co-op housing, it would take that into consideration.

Mrs Sullivan: You should put it in your brief.

Mr B. Ward: He just did, by saying that.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the focus on jobs and deficit in here. As you look at the budget, does it concern you that even as we head into "good times" we are still talking about unemployment rates in the 9% to 10% range as a result of this budget—not as a result of this budget, but that is going to be the output of the budget. The number of unemployed people probably will continue to be at an all-time high for the next two to three years. What impact does that then have on your housing demands?

Second, I know you mentioned federal transfer payments. As you probably know, about 10% of the revenue for the province comes from federal transfer payments.

Mr Schmidl: They are a significant portion, yes.

Mr Phillips: Ten per cent of the revenue comes from federal transfer payments. I know it is fashionable to blame the feds, because that is neat, but even had they taken their transfer payments up 20% or 25%, that still would not have come close to making a dent in the deficit. I am just wondering if you are advocating that the federal government should be spending substantially more money or not.

Mr Schmidl: The federal government should live up to its responsibilities. I do not think they should cut EPF or CAP transfer payments. I believe the amount of the transfer payment that was cut was $3.6 billion, or that which would have existed if they had not reduced—

Mr Phillips: They actually transferred the same amount of money this year as they did last year.

Mr Schmidl: Yes. Accounting for inflation, though, it is less in real terms, I would imagine. Inflation happens everywhere, even the government. Certainly the federal government has made it more difficult for the provincial government, as far as I can tell, to fund health, social services and education by not increasing EPF and CAP transfer payments. You say it is fashionable to blame the feds. If the feds were doing what they were supposed to be doing, there would not be any need to blame them.

Mr Phillips: I am just saying that last year they transferred 5.5 and this year they are transferring 5.5.

Mr McLean: Your brief was explained very well and I was glad to see that table along with it. That gives us a little bit of an idea. However, I really have only one question and I would like your comments with regard to the housing end of it. I do not know how much housing has taken place here in Sudbury, but the lot levy that the municipalities or school boards are allowed to add to the price of that home, do you feel that is a good policy?

Mr Schmidl: I feel that part of the budget should have been a larger increase in unconditional grants to municipalities. However, the lot levies act as something of a deterrent to development, I suppose, but I think you have to look at the amounts that are there. I know in the case of non-profit and co-operative housing, it is built in as a line item in the capital budget. It is a cost that is taken into account, just as are taxes on land before you start construction and interest on your mortgage, so I am not sure it acts as a really significant deterrent to development.

Mr McLean: What percentage of your co-op housing, the funds, goes to architects, consultants, people drawing up plans? What percentage would you estimate?

Mr Schmidl: Architects, development consultants, engineers, that sort of deal? I would say, generally speaking, less than 5%. In some cases, it might be as high as 7%.

Mr McLean: Do you have any idea what the average costs of your units are here?

Mr Schmidl: The average cost for a two-bedroom, or what is called the maximum unit price for a two-bedroom town house is $105,000 or $110,000, and they go up, believe, $5,000 for each additional bedroom.

Mr McLean: I know a development that runs about $118,000 is the average price. The three-bedroom is subsidized by the province by about $1,300, two-bedroom about $800 and a one-bedroom by about $500. That based on the residents who are in that residence. So for $150 million we are talking about that the public will be picking up to keep those floating year after year is a substantial amount of money and I would have thought it could have built them for less money than it is costing us.

Mr Schmidl: I do not want to denigrate the quality of any of the co-op or non-profit units that are built in the Sudbury area because, generally speaking, I think all the projects I have seen have been done quite well. However, there is a point at which you are not building a unit that will last the length of its mortgage, 35 years; you are building a unit that is going to fall down after 20 years. And who is stuck with the mortgage after that when you cannot occupy the building any more? The government of Ontario. I think they are built right now to last at least the length of the mortgage. If you start cutting back on the maximum unit price, and therefore on what is going to end up as the mortgage, to cut operating costs I suppose you are going to end up with units that become uninhabitable, no matter how well they are taken care of, after 20 years.

Mr B. Murdoch: I notice one of the other briefs you had today said there was not too much building going on in Sudbury in housing, especially in the private sector. I was wondering what your thoughts are on the rent control especially on Bill 4 and the rent bill that is going on right now. Would that have anything to do with cutting back on a lot of the building?

Mr Schmidl: You are asking, would rent control affect the amount of private sector building?

Mr B. Murdoch: I am just asking your views on because you are an expert on this kind of thing.

Mr Schmidl: I can best answer that by comparing it to the British Columbia experience, where there has been no rent control or rent regulation in effect for several years. Their vacancy rate situation is almost as bad as in Ontario. Indeed, there are a couple of municipalities that have the lowest vacancy rates in Canada, after Sudbury.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you for an excellent presentation. Particularly in light of the kind of assistance in which you are involved, in helping people in need of housing. I gather that would cover a fair range of assistance and not just one kind of assistance. You would be fairly familiar with all the needs of the individuals and the families you are helping. One of the statements you made in your presentation says, "If there was one item in this budget that most helps to alleviate the housing crisis that Ontarians find themselves in, I would say that it would be this one." Obviously we concur to the extent that this was one of the areas we expanded and were willing to spend new money on. We did not spend a lot of it. Most of the budget, as you know, was er of keeping everything in place in light of cutbacks, nue losses and increased welfare assistance costs.

(In your own words, what kind of impact would you e seen on the people and the families you are trying to here in Sudbury, if we not only had not provided the ey for housing, but had not maintained the infrastruc- of social assistance and all the other safety nets we e in Ontario? What would have been the result on the ilies you deal with now if we had gone in the federal y direction, if you will, instead of the Ontario NDP ction?)

Mr Schmidl: I think it has been said that Sudbury is, has been, largely recession-proof. I think that would e, had the provincial budget not followed the course you e just outlined. I mean, the 10,000 units improve the ation considerably. The infrastructure you are talking ut would have been eliminated if the federal cuts had n passed on. It could have caused severe problems for e people of Sudbury. In fact, of the $215 million for ial assistance, I believe $25 million was aimed at mu- palities to take care of part of the welfare rolls. I do not ow how much Sudbury has received, but I think without e receipt of that, the municipality would have been in e significant trouble.

Mr Sutherland: Looking over your statistics here, u you give us some indication about seniors and hous- ? I know you did not break it all down that way, but ticularly just some of the policies here. I guess it comes of a concern in my own riding about seniors, widows, single people whose spouses have died before them nting to get into housing, living together in the housing, t there are some policies in place that seem to deter that. u you have any here in Sudbury? Are there any concerns t way?

Mr Schmidl: There is an aging population here the ne as everywhere else. I just heard somebody mention the me sharing program, which exists here in Sudbury as well.

Mr Sutherland: Oh, you do have one here.

Mr Schmidl: We see a fair number of seniors our- ves. However, I think our major population, in terms of ents served, is maybe between 18 and 35. That is the ajor client group we see, although we do see a reason- ly large number of seniors. Certainly, with the addition e the 10,000 units as well as the other units that would be rt of the ongoing program, that also eases the burden of niors' housing. When you build a seniors' project, that eans one person who is living in a house that is big ough for four or five people can move into a one-bed- om senior's apartment and let a family move into a ree- or four-bedroom house.

The Chair: Thank you for appearing before the standing mmittee on finance and economics on the budget review.

SUDBURY WOMEN'S CENTRE

The Chair: The next group we have is the Sudbury omen's Centre. Would you please identify yourselves for ansard at the beginning of your presentation. Welcome to e standing committee on finance and economic affairs. ou have one half-hour, and in that half-hour try to save some time at the end for question period between the three parties present. Thank you. You may proceed.

Ms S. Roy: Hello. I would like to welcome the mem- bers of this committee to the Sudbury area. My name is Sharon Roy, and I am here as a representative of the Sud- bury Women's Centre. With me is Donna Mayer. We both serve on the steering committee of the Sudbury Women's Centre. I am glad to have this opportunity to express my own and my organization's thoughts on Ontario's most recent budget. That a public hearing such as this one is being held can be seen as a positive indication that our governments may be beginning to recognize the need for greater public input into how our affairs are managed. However, I am a little concerned with the costs these hear- ings must require. Perhaps in the future more cost-effec- tive methods of gathering public input could be utilized.

Indeed, the new focus on economic and social equity, as well as the plans to incorporate multilevel involvement into the budget-making process, are suggestive of a long- awaited change in attitude. Feminists have long promoted a flattening-out of the traditionally pyramid-shaped power structures which have governed both our personal and po- litical lives. The decisions to increase spending in order to aid abused women and to include input from MPs and segments of the public in the budget-making process indi- cate a willingness to round off the tops of our present hierarchical power structures.

While our struggle for greater equality has been under- taken chiefly to improve woman's position in society, we have not neglected to point out that every gain made by women has meant increased benefits for society as well. It is reassuring to see that the Ontario budget for 1991 clearly recognizes that economic and social equity are linked and that the government must therefore shoulder greater re- sponsibility for social as well as economic conditions. Measures such as decreasing the tax burden carried by low-income earners and single-parent families, and in- creasing the amount of money available to provide ser- vices for abused females, will go a long way towards improving women's economic and social wellbeing. As women benefit from these changes, so will society.

There can be no doubt that someone who is freed from severe economic hardship and/or abusive situations will be able to participate more fully in life than someone who is under constant and crippling hardship. For all these rea- sons, it is my opinion that the Ontario budget for 1991 is clearly moving in the right direction. However, as I will point out later on, it is important that we recognize this budget as only the initial step towards a more truly equita- ble economic and social arrangement.

Women's centres across the province, and indeed across the country, have given birth to other important community organizations, such as the Sudbury Sexual As- sault Crisis Centre, Women Across Cultures and Joujoutèque, the latter of which is a play centre and a parents' educational and support centre. Recently the Sud- bury Women's Centre successfully lobbied on behalf of Joujoutèque for a $1.1-million grant, which has been uti- lized for extensive building renovations. Even more re- cently, our centre has been working on a health study project to determine women's health care needs and how they can best be met. The ultimate aim of this project is to establish a steering committee which will oversee the establishment and subsequent operation of women's health clinics. Our involvement with Joujouthèque and the health study project are but two examples of how we act upon our commitment to working towards the amelioration of women's lives.

Other services provided by the centre include a variety of clinics, information sessions and special workshops. For example, every month we offer a legal clinic which provides many women with their first contact with the legal community. We also provide valuable information and referral services and to this end we house a small reference library and keep track of all the various agencies, individuals and organizations providing valuable services for women.

Another important role played by the centre is that of advocacy, which includes everything from seeking information and services on the behalf of individual women to lobbying and preparing briefs. In addition, our co-ordinator is a trained social worker who can provide counselling and crisis intervention services when required.

Perhaps our most important function is as a provider of the safe and secure environment where women can meet and develop important support system. We make a conscious effort to maintain an open and welcoming atmosphere at all times so that women will feel comfortable. I believe we have been quite successful in our efforts, for our steering committee offers a wide range of women. We vary in age as well as in occupation, religion, nationality and economic status.

The biggest problem faced by our organization is the lack of core dollars. There have been several occasions in the past when the centre has been threatened with closure due to lack of adequate funding. Our commitment is as great as the need for our services, for somehow we have always managed to stay afloat. The need to constantly focus on where and how we can obtain necessary funding creates a great deal of stress for those involved with running the centre. This budget speaks about the need to take proper care of the people of our province and recognizes that money spent on education and training is an investment in our future.

Women's centres have long been at work changing societal attitudes towards women and re-educating women about their rights and their personal worth. We have, in short, been working towards creating a greater social equity and therefore greater economic equity. We are still working towards those goals and when they are reached, we will still be working to maintain them. Surely it is time that our government recognized our important contributions by awarding us the funds required to continue this work.

Women have been trying for some centuries now to convince husbands and wives, churches and governments that wife beating is neither a husband's right nor a subject we can treat lightly. A lot of us like to think that wife assault is a phenomenon which we have pretty much gotten under control. The truth is that for many women, wife assault is still a matter of life and death. As recently as 1987, 61.7% of all women murdered in Canada died as a result of domestic violence. Those women who survive attacks can look forward to being 74% more likely to rely on sedatives and 40% more likely to take sleeping pills than their non-abused sisters. In addition, approximately 61% of the survivors will suffer from injuries that range in severity from bruises and welts to broken bones and internal bleeding.

We also like to think that we as a society are becoming more aware of these problems, yet studies indicate that an abused woman makes it to a hospital emergency room, the chances that the source of her injuries will be properly identified are only 1 out of every 25 cases. Why do these women not tell someone about what is happening to them? The explanation is quite simply that the psychological and emotional trauma suffered by assaulted women can be just as serious as their physical injuries. In 1982 it was discovered that a little more than one half of women beaten by their husbands did not report the incident. When they were asked why they did not, 52% of those women cited fear of revenge as the reason. Sadly, 59% also believe their abuse was a personal matter.

One of the most important roles of the women's centre has always been to inform women about their rights and to educate them as to their own worth. We also seek to change society's attitudes towards women. An important change that has surely been brought about by an increased awareness of sexual discrimination is a law that now requires police to lay charges against abusive men. We now recognize wife assault as a crime against society rather than as a crime against an individual or, worse yet, a husband's right or duty. And yet incidents of wife assault still occur with alarming regularity.

The Ontario budget for 1991 sees $12 million earmarked for new shelter beds and enhanced services for battered women. The money is both desperately needed and greatly appreciated. However, emergency shelters and short-term counselling are often not enough. As suggested by the severe physical and psychological trauma these women have endured, as well as the possibility that they have been using prescribed drugs as a coping aid, women coming out of abusive situations stand a very good chance of requiring long-term support.

Safe and secure places such as the Sudbury Women's Centre can provide some of the ongoing support these women require, but recent work on the subject suggests there are women who often need intensive daily support in order to ensure a successful return to a productive and fulfilled life.

If the abused woman has children who were witnesses to or who perhaps also suffered from the abuse, her adjustment problems will be even greater, for her children will also require special care. A mother who has severe problems of her own is not likely going to be able to help her children deal with theirs, and yet her children's problems cannot be ignored.

Some studies indicate that between 40% and 50% of assaultive men witness wife assault during their childhood. Another study suggests that over 50% of young offenders were found to have been exposed to domestic violence as children. These numbers need not be so high. Proper counselling can change the attitudes which shape the lives of these

g people. In one residence, 25% of children thought it for a husband to strike his wife if the house was y, but after a period of counselling none of the chil- approved of wife assault for any reason.

he problem with existing approaches to the problem ife assault is that emergency shelters provide only rary housing, and counselling agencies often have a month to two-year waiting list. Research has indicated what is required is second-stage housing complexes h would provide abused women and their children both the longer-term counselling and the housing red to ensure their full recovery. While it is true that complexes would be costly, we should keep in mind he crime of wife abuse is one that already costs soci- great deal of money in terms of the human cost of the igned lives of the wives, the children and the assaulters selves. Can we really afford to continue to provide e people with inadequate services? Organizations such e Sudbury Women's Centre can and do provide such en with long-term, ongoing support, but we must look e government to provide the funds for the specialized ces that these women and their children so desper- require.

One of the most important services the Sudbury en's Centre offers is its telephone lines. Calls come t women requesting information or referrals to agen- that provide specialized assistance, or from women simply want to talk and to come in on a regular basis. Unfortunately, calls from women who require assis- e because they have been sexually assaulted also come our centre far too regularly. I say unfortunately because ite all the attention that has been focused on this issue despite all the money commitments that have been e in the 1991 budget, occurrences of sexual assault are ng way away from being eradicated. In 1989, there e 10,070 sexual assault cases reported in Ontario alone. udbury, there were 210.

The Sudbury Sexual Assault Crisis Centre reports that recent provincial government initiatives and increased get spending in this area have enabled the centre to ease community awareness among local women as to t constitutes sexual assault, what their rights are and t services are available to them. As a result, the centre been inundated with women seeking assistance. While ding has increased, there do not exist sufficient moneys ire the additional staff required to meet the increased and. Such funding must be granted or we will run the of seeing abused women unable to access the services y require, and overburdened workers unable to cope with sheer numbers of women requesting their assistance.

In addition, there still exists a great need for public cation. Of sexual assault victims, 62% still do not report r assaults. Studies indicate that women are failing to ort incidents because they believe police can do nothing ecause they are concerned about the attitude of police and irts. They also fear the risk of another attack. An alarm- number of women still cite fear and shame as a reason their failure to report their experiences. Clearly there l exists a need to educate and inform our professionals as well as the general public. Such mass efforts cannot be embarked upon without considerable funding.

It is estimated that 27% of women experience rape or sexual assault at some point in their lives. The funds provided thus far to help this rather large segment of our population are an excellent beginning to facilitating the recovery of these people, but a greater commitment is required if we are to ensure that as many people as possible become healthy and therefore productive members of our community.

I would like to let Donna Mayer speak now.

Ms Mayer: Equality is of course the primary objective of the women's movement. Achieving equality is a long-term goal which requires the co-operation of all sectors of society and the personal commitment of all individuals.

This government's budget addresses economic equality for women on two fronts. The $125 million allocated to assist municipalities, school boards, hospitals and other agencies to further implement pay equity is crucial if the government is to continue to live up to its promise of pay equity. The $24 million allocated for employment equity in the Ontario public service shows leadership in providing fair access to jobs for women, natives, disabled people and other socially disadvantaged groups.

Spending money on affordable housing makes a lot of sense to a lot of people. The benefits extend from the construction trades to the low-income tenant. Women and children stand to benefit a great deal. A recent study of unmet housing needs in the regional municipality of Sudbury showed that single-parent families were the largest group among the homeless surveyed. As well, of those homeless people over the age of 45 who were surveyed, the vast majority were single women.

Housing groups have described the affordable housing crisis which is happening in this community, but I will reiterate this for you. The vacancy rate for the private rental market has been at or below 1% for the last 10 years, well below the commonly accepted 3% level for market equilibrium. Furthermore, the vacancy rate for subsidized units has been virtually 0% for these past 10 years. That means the 1,900 subsidized units that are available in the Sudbury region do not become vacant very often. Right now the waiting list for these units is over 800 families long. The demand for non-profit housing is at a critical level in Sudbury. Commitments to build affordable housing must be made in significant amounts and on a continuing basis.

There were nearly 9,200 households receiving social assistance in the district of Sudbury last year. Since January 1991 the numbers have increased to peak levels, as we know. Forty percent of the recipients are children and many are single mothers. Living on social assistance is not fun. We can all nod knowingly about the humiliation and hardship as if we know, but the cold, hard facts are that social assistance levels are not enough to live on in this province. Last year in Sudbury, a single parent with two children received $14,556 in family benefits. That is nearly $3,300 below the poverty level. The cost of an average three-bedroom apartment in Sudbury would take nearly half of this woman's income. If she had to go and find a new unit on the market, she would be paying 65% of her income for this house. Little is left for other life essentials like food and clothing, and it shows. The primary food bank in Sudbury feeds 350 families a month for a total of 700 men, women and children. The Catholic Charities Soup Kitchen serves over 200 meals a day.

The provisions for social assistance in the Ontario budget epitomize the sad state of economic affairs in this country. The cost of $1.4 billion to add people to an inadequate and impoverished means of existence is a hard pill to swallow, but increased permanent unemployment demands immediate relief.

Had there been no recession, had there been no free trade, it is possible this $1.4 billion could have been spent on social assistance reform. That would have been $600 million short of what is actually necessary for proper reform as identified by the Social Assistance Review Committee in its 1988 Transitions report. Instead, $215 million was allocated to social assistance reform. This will provide some relief but will not greatly increase the standard of living for the majority of recipients. Although the tax relief in the Ontario tax reduction program is a humane gesture, women and children on assistance will still be living below the poverty line. The $1.4 billion for income maintenance is a legal and moral mandatory requirement precipitated by high unemployment. Social assistance reform is technically a discretionary expenditure, and the $215 million allocated shows commitment to the overwhelming task of meaningful reform.

The government's decision to fight the recession as opposed to the deficit is a wise choice. The immediate economic consequences of high unemployment and decreased spending power weigh heavily on the poorest people of our province. Women and children make up the vast majority of Ontario's poor.

Measures to keep the economy functioning at a level which sustains current jobs and creates new ones are necessary to ease the impact of the recession on people's daily lives. As deficits rise both in Ontario and in Canada, it is easy to become alarmed. We should be alarmed but we should not panic. Panic leads to hysteria, which distorts perspective. Becoming obsessed with paying the deficit clouds the primary function of government, which is to provide essential services to its people.

The Sudbury Women's Centre believes people come first. There are many areas of the budget which we did not talk about. All of them are of interest to women, including health care, education and the care of our earth. The maintenance of essential human services is critical to the health and wellbeing of our communities. Spending in this area at this time is warranted. The social problems we are plagued with cost us greatly in both human and financial measures. The new spending on services such as sexual assault centres and shelters for battered women is certainly warranted. Spending here does not meet the need, although at this time it is a fiscally disciplined response to the problem.

Finally, the economic strategy of fighting the recession is imperative in order to keep people working at this vulnerable time. Personal economic stability plays a dominant role in daily family living. An economically unstable home can be a terrifying place to live.

We appreciate having this unique opportunity to participate in the government's budgetary process. We hope the information you gather through these hearings is valuable, and, moreover, that it warrants the expense of such exercise. The cost of these hearings would pay the operating costs of the Sudbury Women's Centre for over 10 years. If you decide you do not need to go through the process next year, we would appreciate the money. Thank you very much.

Mr McLean: I would just really like clarification. Sharon, are you related to Marcel?

Ms S. Roy: Yes, I am.

Mr McLean: Do you work in the same office?

Ms S. Roy: No.

Mr McLean: You have separate offices?

Ms S. Roy: We do not work in the same area at all.

Mr McLean: I see. That is all. Your brief was very clear and precise. I have heard most of it before, but I appreciate your time to come here.

Interjection: To reinforce it.

Ms S. Roy: That is right.

Mr McLean: That is what it is all about, reinforcement.

Mr B. Murdoch: Just one quick question. In your budget for the women's centre, how much do you get from the provincial government, what percentage?

Ms S. Roy: I am not sure. The way our funding works, it changes constantly. It would be practically impossible to tell. We are funded mostly through projects. We apply for a variety of projects, which is where we get the majority of our funding, and then we raise funds on our own.

Ms Mayer: Our centre is 10 years old this year. Originally we had received a lot of our project funding through the Secretary of State, but through cutbacks with the provincial government to social assistance programs and transfer payments, we no longer get nearly as much money from Secretary of State for those programs. We have to turn to the province, through the Ontario women's directorate, for other project funding. So the reliance on the province has increased as we have been kicked off the federal payroll.

Ms M. Ward: Thank you for your presentation. I would like to ask you about older women. Someone this morning was commenting about the growing number of seniors in Sudbury, and I recall a couple of weeks ago in Toronto that a group making a presentation was talking about the "invisible senior." There is an image nowadays that seniors are becoming younger, that they are very active, mobile, they travel when they retire and so on. They were talking about the invisible ones whom you do not see because they cannot even afford bus fare. I think they predominantly tend to be women.

Your agency provides a variety of services, not just social. Should not say "just" because that seems to say it is not the importance it is, but not just assault counselling and so on. You have a variety of services for women, do you?

wonder if you could describe the needs you see for older women who are very often underhoused. If they're living, say, on a government pension, they probably can't even afford transportation and they are very isolated and probably not very demanding. Do you have any programs in place to reach them? Are you able to reach them? What do you see as the needs for the older women community?

Ms S. Roy: We do not have any specific programs in place for older women yet, but that certainly is something we need to look into. They are welcome to access any of the programs, like our legal clinic, for example. We do make attempts for those women who have difficulty getting to our centre. Because of lack of funding, it is not a very accessible place, and we do try to make arrangements to get women who require our services to the centre. They wish to be there. We also have a list of referral services, so if they need specific services they can call us and we can refer them to the agency where they can get help they require.

Ms M. Ward: I think one of the problems is that they can't access the service, and that is a difficulty. How do we reach the people to tell them that the services are there and to determine what services they need?

Ms S. Roy: We make a great deal of use of community advertising in the area through radio and television and the media to inform people about events. We also have door-to-door blitzes. We put posters up and we have activities going on. A lot of it is through word of mouth. We are associated with a lot of other women's organizations in town as well and we get the word out about our activities that way.

Mrs Sullivan: I was very interested in your presentation which seemed to me a succinct summary of some of the off-the-issue matters affecting women in Ontario today. I am surprised at the rapid embrace of the $12-million increase in funding that is included in this budget. In my constituency, we are looking for a shelter. We have been very active in raising community funding for the provision of that shelter to meet very serious needs. To accommodate the purchase of that shelter in my community cost $1 million. There is an additional $12 million allocated in the budget. It is not very much, so I am quite taken aback when I see women's groups and advocates for women who are embracing this budget wholeheartedly without having a significant look at what the needs are.

Ms S. Roy: Excuse me. We did not embrace it wholeheartedly. I said it was a great start. It was a good start to us receive that money, but it is nowhere near enough. I pointed out that the emergency shelters themselves are inadequate, and neither are the counselling services that are being provided to women right now. We need more of that and we need more money as well. It is an initial step, but it is nice, but we have a long way to go yet.

Mrs Sullivan: Good. Are you part of the Decade Council? Does your organization belong to that?

Ms Mayer: Not exactly. That is northwestern Ontario.

Ms S. Roy: We network with them, yes.

Mr Phillips: Help me out a little bit on the budget, because in my recollection of the good old days when we were around, the budget had gone up fairly substantially in this area. It seemed to me each year we tried to allocate a significant increase, so it always offends me a little bit when I hear it is a start, when I would have labelled it a continuation. But just in terms of the last five years, the revenue that your group would have gotten from the province, has it been going down? What would it have been five years ago, and what was it last year or this year?

Ms S. Roy: I do not have exact figures, but I do know that it has been going up.

Mr Phillips: Up? From what to what?

Ms S. Roy: I do not have exact figures.

Mr Phillips: Are you the executive director?

Ms S. Roy: No, I am the president, but it does not mean a whole lot. We are not a hierarchically structured organization. We each do the best.

Mr Phillips: Who knows the finances, then? Is it you?

Ms S. Roy: No.

Ms Mayer: What you have to understand about women's centre funding is that we operate on a project-to-project basis. We grab whatever project is available to help operate the main service of a referral and information centre. There are no operating dollars for that available anywhere, so we have to grab what is available.

Mr Phillips: I understand that.

Ms Mayer: More and more in the last few years, there have been programs through the province for issues involving violence against women, sexual assault, employment equity, those sorts of things, and women's health, which is how we have tailor-made some of our goals to get what funding is available. So it has gone up in that we have applied for more provincial money because there has been less federal money available.

Mr Phillips: I understand that, but five years ago what might it have been? What was it last year?

Ms Mayer: We get about $12,000 a year through the Ministry of Community and Social Services' community neighbourhood support program, which is money we are able to apply to our operating expenses and is not project-related and is given according to our own fundraising efforts. That is the most consistent funding we have received from the province, in addition to special project dollars through the Ontario women's directorate. Most specifically, we have been running kwon-do courses, which is self-defence for women, because it is a very direct way of dealing with sexual assault.

The Chair: Thank you for appearing before this standing committee on finance and economics and for your views on the budget review and your comments.

Mr Kwinter: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: The Sudbury and District Chamber of Commerce has attempted to get on this agenda. For some reason, they are not on it, but they are here and would like to make a brief presentation. Could I get consent to have them do that?

The Chair: We have one problem: We are leaving at 5:15. The taxis are out there for our flight back to Toronto. But how about—does everybody agree to five minutes? That is about all we have.

Interjection: Did they apply to the committee?

Mr McLean: Why were they not put on?

The Chair: Why were they not on?

Clerk of the Committee: They were not on the contact list.

The Chair: On the choices of who was going to be on, is that it? If we do that, we are going to change our flight plans.

Mr Sutherland: We did not hear from a chamber of commerce today, and if they can make their verbal presentation quickly—we obviously will not have any time for questions—then maybe we should try and accommodate them, since we have not heard a regional voice from that group today.

The Chair: Maybe we will not get a question period, but you have a brief?

Ms Warwick: Yes.

The Chair: Okay.

SUDBURY AND DISTRICT CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Ms Warwick: It is very short, and I am a fast reader. My name is Jeanne Warwick, and I am president of the Sudbury and District Chamber of Commerce. For some reason, we were supposed to be on the agenda today, but we were not. I do not know what happened, and I feel we represent the business community here and we should be heard from. So if you will bear with me for two minutes, I will be real fast.

The Sudbury and District Chamber of Commerce, now in its 96th year of leading and serving the Sudbury area business community, represents over 1,000 businesses throughout the regional municipality of Sudbury, or, if you wish, employers.

Our membership encompasses both the multinational corporation and the small entrepreneur, but primarily we represent small business, the backbone of our economy.

The Sudbury Chamber of Commerce, along with many of its counterparts from throughout the province, has long been encouraging governments at all levels particularly federal and provincial governments, to adopt an attitude of fiscal restraint and responsibility. The April 1991 provincial budget, in our opinion, does not address this mindset and in fact does little to alleviate Ontario's economic woes. We would have preferred the government to set an agenda that provided an opportunity for economic recovery by restoring investor confidence in the economic future of our province.

While we are thankful the provincial Treasurer did not introduce any new taxes and, in particular, no minimum corporate tax, we remain unconvinced that this will not be introduced at some later date, and that in fact the corporate tax is a foregone conclusion. This is unlikely to inspire much-needed investor confidence.

The provincial budget sees government spending increasing by over 13% and the consolidated deficit to $9.7 billion, up from $3 billion last year. In our assessment, these adjustments are unjustifiable and unacceptable. We see the province heading in a very dangerous direction.

To expect to be able to eliminate the provincial deficit within the next seven or eight years, as Mr Laughren proposes, is overly optimistic, in our estimation. One of the factors of our achievement of economic recovery is our ability to control inflation, and one of the keys is controlling the public sector wages. With the Treasurer's failure to implement any restrictions on public sector settlements, this picture does not look promising.

Visions of the provincial government rearranging deck-chairs on the Titanic come to mind. Rather, we would suggest that when the water is coming into the boat faster than you can bail, the most important thing to do is fix the hole. Without some solid and positive signals from the province that will restore business confidence and demonstrate the government is serious about creating a prosperous and sustainable economy, potential investors will look to other provinces and beyond for job creation and investment opportunities.

We heartily support the government's call for consultation on business and economic issues, and firmly believe that the business community must have a say in Ontario's economic future. Unfortunately the consultative process has been seriously lacking, and this provincial budget does not give us much indication that the government is listening.

The Chair: Maybe we can get one question, a short one, one minute.

Mr Phillips: I just have an observation. There is an attempt to balance the budget in seven or eight years. That will balance the operating. There will still be a $6-billion deficit on the current calculation, so it is even worse than you think.

Ms Warwick: I have heard that rumour.

Mr Phillips: It is in the budget. I will show it to you.

Mr McLean: I will make an observation. There were no tax increases in the last budget. Your brief said there were none, but there were 14.

Ms Warwick: I am talking about corporate.

Mr McLean: Oh, corporate taxes.

Mr Sutherland: On the consultation process, the Treasurer and the Treasury have met with over 200 groups. The Premier has met with many, many groups. I think we need to categorize what we define by consultation. Consultation is meeting with groups, hearing what they are saying. It does not mean, in all cases, that groups are going to get everything they want. But this government has been consulting. The Treasurer has. This committee had public budget hearings where we heard from many different groups, including the Ontario Chamber of Commerce, so I do think that point needs to be stressed, that consultation is occurring on a regular basis.

Ms Warwick: Perhaps the chamber does not feel that way.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for appearing. As you know, if we stay on much longer, we will spend another night here in Sudbury.

The committee adjourned at 1702.

Resuming consideration of the 1991-92 provincial budget.

The Chair: Good morning. We will call this committee order. This is the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget hearing review.

TORONTO ENVIRONMENTAL ALLIANCE

The Chair: The first group we will call on is the Toronto Environmental Alliance. Would you come forward, please. Welcome to the committee. Would you please identify yourselves for Hansard when you begin. You have half an hour. In that half-hour make your presentation and reserve some time at the end for questions and answers between the three parties, which will be divided equally. You may begin.

Mr Coffey: My name is Gerard Coffey. I am representing the Toronto Environmental Alliance.

Mr Hartmann: My name is Franz Hartmann. I am with the Toronto Environmental Alliance. I guess we could say that at this stage we do not have a written submission. We are just going to read a few thoughts we have down and later on, once we get this typed up, we will submit it to the clerk.

First of all, the Toronto Environmental Alliance, or TEA, would like to thank the committee for giving us this opportunity to present our views on the Ontario budget. Before commenting on the budget itself, first of all we would like to congratulate the Treasurer and those involved in the budget process for producing the first budget for Ontario that consulted and listened to ordinary Canadians. The Toronto Environmental Alliance was one of many grass-roots organizations given the opportunity to submit a pre-budget brief and meet with the parliamentary assistant, the Treasurer as well as Treasury officials. We welcome this new openness and hope the Treasurer will continue to turn the budget-making process away from a business-controlled process towards a democratic controlled process.

That said, it is not surprising the budget has received much negative criticism. Our assessment is that most of this criticism has come from those circles in society which are threatened by a more democratically produced budget. As we believe, lies behind the obsession with the $9-billion deficit. To be blunt, we think that Canadian corporate interests have made such a stink over the deficit, even though the Tories in Ottawa and the Republicans in the US have created much higher deficits, because they do not like a government that really responds to the needs of its citizens. We have been told by corporate leaders, over the last years especially, that Keynesianism is dead and that monetarism is the only hope in fulfilling people's needs. The Tories have tried this approach federally. The result has been economic upheaval for an increasing number of Canadians, while US-controlled corporations flourish.

The people in Ontario voiced their opposition to this corporate approach, which was also essentially adopted by the previous Ontario Liberal government, and voted in a party that spoke about and promised a new approach. What we got was a different, better, but not quite new approach. While we acknowledge the necessity of resorting to a more traditional Keynesian approach in the short term, in the long term it will be as detrimental as monetarism.

Let me be clear on this point. We support the Treasurer's decision to increase government spending for necessary social programs; however, unless the NDP government is willing to combine this increased spending with a restructuring of the tax system so that large corporations pay their fair share, there will be no way of paying off the deficit. Working people cannot afford much higher tax burdens. Therefore, we support the budget as a positive step away from the failure of monetarism.

However, as environmentalists we must also note that there are some fundamental flaws in the budget as well as the underlying principles which were used to frame the budget. The most notable flaw is the notion that economic growth as defined by gross national product is a good thing. As any economist knows but rarely admits in practice, we live in a finite world with finite resources. If growth in the GNP continues, at some point we will destroy the very planet we depend on. Most people hope this point will not be reached in our lifetimes, but the reality of increasing environmental degradation, pollution levels and the greenhouse effect suggest we are closer to environmental collapse than we want to admit.

This said, we must kick the growth obsession. We must redefine what has economic value. This does not just mean incorporating environmental costs into price; it means fundamentally rethinking how to put value to various activities. For example, why is it that we put no value on ensuring the continued existence of an old-growth forest through labour-intensive management that most efficiently cleans the air we breathe, yet put high economic value on the creation of capital-intensive, as opposed to labour-intensive, automobiles that cause dangerous levels of pollution?

We understand there are no easy ways of redefining, let alone implementing, environmentally sensitive economic value. However, we are absolutely sure that it has to be done. The planet's health is deteriorating at a faster rate every day. We have no choice but to eventually stop the growth of all economic activity that causes the deterioration of the planet's health. We must move towards creating an environmentally and socially just economy.

How do we as a society go about this and how can the Treasurer of Ontario and the members of the Legislature contribute to this? The Treasurer has taken the first step in this direction with the 1991 budget. By rejecting monetarism and responding to the needs of Ontarians, he has also rejected the primacy of the market. The experience of working people throughout the province and the world has shown that while the market may be good at producing consumer goods, it is dismal at fulfilling more important health, social and environmental needs. With respect to the latter point, there is a fundamental contradiction between a market-driven economy that must perpetually expand to stay healthy and the needs of an environment that has finite resources.

The Treasurer must confront and rise above the failure of the market by moving in an alternative direction. He must resist in all ways possible the movement towards continental free trade. He must increase the prominence of social and environmental concerns in budgetary and economic decisions. Those who believe in the market and those who believe that only a US-dominated market can be the engine of the Ontario economy will obviously criticize and resist such a move by the Treasurer. They, of course, do not want to lose economic and political control, but we believe working people welcome an environmentally and socially just economy. By having workers intimately involved in the Ontario economy through, among other ways, community economic development and worker co-operatives, working people can not only create their own jobs, but ensure that their economic activity is good for the environment.

We therefore congratulate the Treasurer for tabling a more humane budget, but we also caution him not to be complacent. In the short term he must urge his colleagues to ensure the creation of a fair tax system. Meanwhile, he must begin the long-term process of restructuring the economy so that it is socially and environmentally just. Luckily for the Treasurer, there is no shortage of ideas out there about how to go about this. Ontarians have been putting them forward for years. The Treasurer has indicated he is willing to listen; now we are asking him to act. Thank you.

Mr Kwinter: Thank you very much. I have a question for you. What gives you the idea this was the first budget that ever had some pre-budget consultation?

Mr Coffey: I do not think we said that. Let me just pull it out.

Mr Hartmann: There has obviously been pre-budget consultation in the past. I think this is the first budget, though, that has seriously canvassed and consulted and listened to ordinary Canadians and ordinary people in Ontario. I do not know when an environmental group has been asked in the past to submit a pre-budget document to the Treasurer, and TEA was asked.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Clerk, has that happened before? Have the environmentalists made submissions?

Clerk of the Committee: I believe to this committee they have, yes.

Mr Kwinter: I think virtually every time there has been a pre-budget consultation some environmental group has made a presentation.

Mr Coffey: Yes. Our understanding of this process was that it was much broader than previous consultation processes with many, many more people and many more organizations, including ours. We know we were not the only environmental group to make a pre-budget submission, but that was our understanding.

Mr Kwinter: For the record, I just want to tell you that the consultations were no more and no less than what have been with Liberals or Conservatives. It happens every year. In fact, this committee had consultation hearings. Unfortunately, I thought they were too late to affect the budget. I just want to correct that; I do not want to get into a great dispute with you. I just think you should know that this is the process, that environmentalists have made representations in the past and that it is nothing unique.

Mr Hartmann: I think there is a difference, though, between being invited to speak at this committee, and being more involved in actual consultation while the budget is being written up. I cannot comment on exactly what happened when the Liberals and the Conservatives formed the government. I do not have those details. My perception, and I think the perception of a lot of groups outside the government, is that this time around it was a bit more open. I think the government and the Treasurer, especially, should be given that credit.

Mr Coffey: Yes. I would also like to say that our information about the scope of the pre-budget hearings did not come from politicians, it came from people within the ministry bureaucracy itself. They told us that in fact the pre-budget hearings were much broader in scope than they had experienced before.

Mr Kwinter: I just wanted to tell you that, with due respect, your perception is wrong.

I would also like to hear your explanation of—I am quite amused at the double standard. I hear people decry the fact that businesses are closing down, that companies are moving, and why does the government not do something about it, because it has to keep these companies going, and on the other side, people coming in and knocking business and saying this should be a worker-based economy, workers should control their destiny, they should be able to create jobs.

Just exactly how is this going to happen? Are you suggesting that we should encourage all industry to move out of the province so that the workers can take control and make sure that the economy is stimulated by workers themselves?

Mr Hartmann: First of all, I do not like getting caught up in kind of the ideological dichotomy of either having workers control it or private corporations.

Mr Kwinter: I am just repeating what you said.

Mr Hartmann: That is not what we said, not in quite the same way. What we have seen throughout the last few years especially in Ontario and in Canada is that this dependence on corporations is just not working. Some people think it works. We think a lot of people in Ontario know it, and their personal experience says as much. How many corporations have left Ontario in the last two years, since free trade has been here? Let's be real. The bottom line of a corporation, understandably so, is profit.

Mr Kwinter: And do you think that is wrong?

Mr Hartmann: I do not think it is wrong, but if it becomes the underlying motive of an entire society, I think it is wrong, because it means that the social needs of people, and, as environmentalists, the environmental needs of the planet cannot be incorporated into the bottom line. Experience, situation after situation, has shown that to us. What we are saying is that we know that corporations do not fulfil these needs, which does not mean to say that they should not exist or that we should tell all corporations to close, but we should realize that there are other ways of organizing an economy. One of those is by having the community control production and consumption decisions. I do not think that is anything very radical.

Mr Kwinter: Not if you are a socialist it is not.

Mr Hartmann: Not even a socialist. We say we live in a democracy, and I would think that part of everybody's democratic right is to have some say over economic decisions. That does not mean that they have to control every aspect of production and take over the means of production through the state. We are saying that people should have a more say over what gets made in their communities. It does not happen when corporate decisions are made in New York or in Tokyo or in Frankfurt or in London, that happens when decisions are made in communities, and at this stage we do not think that is happening. If that is considered radical or socialism or whatever label you want to put to it, that is your definition. To us, we see that as a fundamental right of any democratic society.

Mr McLean: Let's clarify one thing. You said that the process has been different, that you were invited this time. Who invited you?

Mr Hartmann: We received a letter from the Treasurer of Ontario asking us to give a pre-budget submission.

Mr McLean: To this committee?

Mr Coffey: Not to this committee.

Mr Hartmann: Perhaps we should clarify this. We are talking about in February.

Mr McLean: But now who invited you here?

Mr Coffey: Nobody invited us here.

Mr McLean: I thought that was the indication.

Mr Hartmann: No, not at all. We are talking about in February. While the Treasurer and ministry officials were putting together the budget, they asked us to give a submission about what we thought should be contained in the budget.

Mr McLean: The question I have for you is, what is it, an hour after a rain now the beaches are closed for a day?

Mr Hartmann: Right.

Mr McLean: I would like your opinion on what is causing that and I would like your opinion on what we are going to do about it and I would like your opinion on the budget with regard to sewers. There is nothing in the budget for it, so let me hear your view on it.

Mr Coffey: I see this as being somewhat off topic, because basically we are here—

Mr McLean: We are talking about the budget. There is no money in the budget and this is the budget process.

Mr Coffey: I understand that. We are not here to take apart the budget item by item and to criticize what is in it for sewage control, what is in it for waste management. I think those things have already been done fairly well. We are here to look at the macro implications of the kind of economic system that is being promoted by this and other budgets which have used different systems but, as we see, are moving towards the same basic end. That is uncontrolled growth, whether they are worker-controlled economies or whether they are corporate-controlled economies. We see that there are major problems with the kind of uncontrolled growth that is being stimulated in whatever fashion.

As far as your question about the beaches is concerned, it is obviously caused by flooding of sanitary sewers, and as far as we understand, it is not even going to be possible to totally separate sanitary sewers from storm sewage, although I think the city and Metro are working on it. To be perfectly honest, I do not have the figures in my head of what was allocated to that kind of thing within the budget, and it is not why we were here.

Mr McLean: That is not why you were here, to answer questions because of the budget?

Mr Coffey: No, we were here to make a submission and to tell you what we thought about the budget and about the major implications of the budget.

Mr Hartmann: Just on that point of what causes all the pollution in the lake, very simply, a lot of toxic pollutants are put into rivers and sewers that eventually flow into the lake. One of the reasons that is done is that it is usually a lot cheaper for manufacturers, and in some cases residents, to continue with practices that are polluting than it is to switch over to environmentally cleaner practices. The reason for that is often because they are forced to keep their costs down because they have to remain competitive. This gets back to the macro issue of, is the market an effective tool in incorporating environmental concerns? That to me is yet another example of where the market is not a successful tool.

Mr Sutherland: Welcome to the committee. As you have said, you met with Mr Christopherson and some Treasury officials in the pre-budget hearings.

You mentioned something about environment and economy in terms of the way the economy is established now and not working together. I am finding in my own riding, actually, that there are some businesses that are really finding that it is economically advantageous to be concerned about the environment.

One of my manufacturing firms did more or less a garbage audit. They watched their garbage bin dumpster for two weeks and figured out everything they were throwing out and then figured out what they could recycle. They also changed their paint shop. By putting on new nozzles and adjusting the angle, they were able to reduce the amount of paint. They found that not only have they cut down on their garbage by about 80% and their excess paint by about that much, they have also cut their costs significantly. This is making them more competitive in the current economic setup.

What is your sense of finding that out? Does that seem to be a growing trend in the manufacturing sector and people are realizing the economic benefits of being environmentally friendly?

Mr Coffey: Sure, I think it is true. I think we should make it clear that we are not here to bash business. We are not here to tell people that they should get out of the country or to stop doing what they are doing. Let's face it. We have an economic system; it is working at the moment. We are just trying to point out some of the disturbing long-range trends that we think will be exaggerated as we move down this path.

But yes, I have seen lots of examples of people cutting down waste, doing it profitably, cutting down on the amounts of toxics that they use, recycling them. I think Pollution Probe put out a document quite a number of years ago, called Profit from Pollution Prevention, which was very successful. It pointed out how major industries, major businesses, could in fact cut down on their environmental impact and still make a profit, and make more money from it in fact. I think that is a growing trend and it is a valuable one and I think it should be encouraged; there is absolutely no doubt about that.

But as I said, to look at specifically—and I think this is taking a bit of a chance—the automobile industry, we know that automobiles are much more energy-efficient, they are much less polluting than they ever were, and will continue to become less polluting. But as the automobile industry grows worldwide, we will find that the gains that are made on an individual basis are wiped out on a global basis, because I think now the projection is that the world automobile fleet will double within the next 30 years.

That is the problem that we see coming up on the horizon. No matter how efficient we make the individual units, the actual push towards production and growth throughout the world economy is going to wipe out whatever gains we make, and that ultimately is going to lead to some sort of environmental collapse. We think that we have to start looking now at what the alternatives are. We do not pretend to have all the answers.

Mr Hartmann: May I make one more comment based on that? With respect to these small businesses that are not only doing things that are environmentally good but also profitable, to us I think those are examples of what we are trying to promote. It is usually small businesses that are fulfilling the needs of their community that are also the ones that are successful, and we very much want to promote those. We believe that is the future path.

But on the other hand, we also know that the market as a system is really problematic when it is used in a larger sense. I do not want to name particular corporations, but there are some big ones out there that are known polluters and they are going to say, "Hey, we would love to be more environmentally friendly, but we've got to remain competitive and that means we can't put this huge amount of money into pollution cleanup equipment." When you get into the large scale, that is when problems occur, and that is why we are saying promote those sorts of businesses.

The Chair: Thank you very much for appearing before this committee.

Mr Hartmann: Thank you.

ONTARIO NON-PROFIT HOUSING ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Would the Ontario Non-Profit Housing Association please come forward. Welcome to the committee. You will have half an hour for your presentation and if you can, leave some time at the end for questions and answers from the three parties, which will be divided equally. Would you please identify yourself for the purpose of Hansard.

Ms Kraus: I am Debbie Kraus, and I am the executive director of the Ontario Non-Profit Housing Association. With me today is our vice-president, Roger Maloney, and Mr. Maloney is also the commissioner of housing and general manager of Peel Non-Profit Housing Corp.

The Ontario Non-Profit Housing Association was established by municipal and private non-profit housing corporations in 1988 to build a strong non-profit housing sector and promote the production and management of high-quality affordable housing in Ontario. We have about 400 members from across Ontario. These members own close to 50,000 units and represent more than half of all municipal and private non-profit housing under management. Our members include a full range of housing providers including small, single, community-based, corporations in urban and rural areas and range to the large, multiproject producers in major urban centres in Ontario.

Our association made a presentation to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs prior to the budget, and the copy of our presentation is attached to the letter that you have received. At that time ONPHA stated that the lack of affordable housing is a major factor contributing to poverty in Ontario. We noted the insufficient supply of affordable housing for households with low and moderate incomes, and we stated that it was essential for the 1991-92 provincial budget to provide funding for the development of new non-profit housing units. We also urged the government to recognize the need for an ongoing non-profit housing supply program and recommended that the 1991-92 budget be the beginning of a predictable and stable source of funding at a level appropriate to meeting housing needs.

I would like to ask Roger to provide our specific comments on the budget.

Mr Maloney: ONPHA wishes to take this opportunity to express our support for the provincial budget announced by the Treasurer of Ontario in April. The budget shows that the government recognizes the urgent need for more affordable housing. Households across Ontario who were depending on the government to cushion the effects of the recession were offered hope. ONPHA believes the budget took the right approach at the right time.

the need for 10,000 more non-profit housing units is supported by the report entitled The State of Housing Ontario, which was released in April of 1991 by ONPHA, the Co-operative Housing Association of Ontario. A synopsis of that report was handed out to you this morning. The report identified an immediate need for the construction of 27,000 new units to create a healthy vacancy of 3%, as well as the need for a consistent supply of 14,000 to 16,000 rental units per year over the next two decades just to keep up with the projected population growth for Ontario. The report also stressed the need for more affordable rental units, as almost one third of all households, approximately 477,000 households, spend more than 30% of their incomes on housing. In addition, more than 100,000 households were identified on waiting lists to live in non-profit, co-operative and public housing. The problem is evident throughout Ontario.

ONPHA believes that the government has shown leadership by committing itself to spending funds on housing at a level free of financial constraint. The budget recognizes that housing is a critical factor in considering solutions to the province's housing problems in that the recession presents significant opportunities for the non-profit supply programs. The budget also recognizes that the development of new non-profit housing is critical in meeting the growing needs of people who have lost their jobs because of the economic downturn. The development and construction of non-profit housing is effective in creating and sustaining jobs in the building industry. Each new unit produced has a multiplier effect on maintaining jobs in related manufacturing sectors. As an example, a report was put forward by the Canadian Home Builders' Association in January of 1983, which is generally accepted by the various sectors as being right on target, which indicated that each new apartment unit generates 1.7 years of employment. So, that is a very significant contribution in working towards turning the economy around. The economic decline also means greater efficiencies in the overall costs of building non-profit housing at this time because of more competitive pricing in terms of land and construction costs.

In conclusion, ONPHA wishes to express support for the provincial budget. The budget demonstrates the government's commitment to assisting the growing numbers of people hurt by the recession. In our view the government has taken the right approach in committing itself to spending funds on housing even though we are facing a recession. The development of non-profit housing offers opportunities to create jobs in the building industry and related manufacturing sectors, and the economic decline means that more housing can be produced at this time at less cost. We look forward to working with the government to meet the housing challenges ahead. That is our presentation. We would certainly be prepared to answer questions.

Mr McLean: There are approximately 84,000 units in Ontario now?

Ms Kraus: There are 84,000 public housing units. In non-profit housing there are an additional probably about 10,000 units right now.

Mr McLean: What would be the average subsidy for those units last year, compared to—has it increased? You may have the statistics on this. I am just curious.

Mr Maloney: I can give you an example based on Peel Non-Profit's portfolio. It really depends on the targeting plan for the project. Until 1986, the projects were 75% rented to market people and 25% per cent rented to subsidized people, and the subsidy in our portfolio for one of those projects is $307 a month.

Mr McLean: That is average.

Mr Maloney: Yes. The total economic cost of a particular project—I will give you an example, a 153-unit town house project. To operate the project, the economic rent for each month is $927. The amount of rent we collect, on average, from the tenants is $620, including when you average the market and the subsidy, so that leaves $307 a month that is subsidized, and that particular project is subsidized totally by the federal government. Since then the approach has been to provide housing to people who need it more, so we provide more subsidies. I will give you an example of that. We have a project that we rented out about two years ago. It is 100 units and the economic rent without subsidies would be about $1,400 a month. The average rent paid is around $500 a month, so the subsidy is about $900 a month. But 80% of the people in that project are receiving some type of subsidy, whereas in the old program it is only 25%.

Mr McLean: Is that the trend today?

Mr Maloney: Yes, definitely.

Mr McLean: And is it going to increase more? When it first started, I thought it paid for itself more or less, did it not? It was evened out. There was not much subsidy from the government. The high end helped pay for the low end.

Mr Maloney: In the first example I gave, that happens, and over time the subsidy decreases. In the one example I gave you, we believe within the next four to five years there will be no subsidy needed for that particular project. But since the situation has changed where we are trying to subsidize a lot more people who need housing, the costs go up.

Mr McLean: So in Peel region, which you are familiar with, what would be the average subsidy per unit?

Mr Maloney: I am guesstimating the average subsidy in the portfolio as probably around $550 a month.

Mr McLean: I will pass for now.

Mr B. Ward: Our government has been criticized for the economic direction that we have taken during these tough economic times. We have been criticized by some groups and organizations and individuals that we should have paid attention to the bottom line and the sheets should have balanced out, that in fact we should have had a balanced budget or a massively reduced deficit rather than what we have incurred. They do not seem to put faces to the statistics. Part of our initiative was in housing, and we said we are going to maintain or attempt to maintain the health standards, the social programs.

You alluded to the fact land costs are cheaper and construction costs, because private sector contractors have sharper pencils during tough times. From your experience in your organization, can you perhaps expand on that? We have heard from other organizations that now is the time to move ahead in social housing, because of these factors. Is that a fair statement in your experience, or is it just isolated in certain areas?

Mr Maloney: Maybe I will tackle it first. From a Peel experience, it is very true. The situation now is that we have developers knocking on our door with potential sites who would never talk to us before, and every day we have new people coming in saying, "I have a tract of land here that I would like to build non-profit housing on and work with you."

To give you a prime example of the cost, we were allocated some provincial land at Highway 10 and Highway 403 about three years ago. That is now coming forward for construction. We just tendered the project. The initial estimates were, just for the construction site, about $50 million, because it is 500 units in four projects. We are working with the co-ops and Peel Non-Profit. We tendered that and the tender came in at $38 million, rather than $50 million, so that in itself shows how low the costs have come in, and it is related to the construction. The land is government land, so that does not take the land into consideration. So the construction costs are considerably down.

In the past we were having a very difficult time getting projects in at 100% of MUP, which is the maximum unit price set by the provincial government. Now projects are coming in the 90 per cent range consistently. So costs are definitely down.

Ms Kraus: And that is consistent across the province as well. Sometimes it is even lower, maybe 80% of the maximum unit price. So it means that we can produce more housing at less cost.

Mr B. Ward: One other question. What would you say to the critics of the budget who say we moved in the wrong direction? How would you answer that criticism from your organization's standpoint?

Mr Maloney: From our organization's standpoint, we have to look at the demands, the need for affordable housing, which is very significant. Some of the points in our report definitely show the tremendous need. Also, we can provide data that show the costs have gone down significantly. Your own provincial staff have that, because they approve each project. They can easily look and see that it is consistently low, that land prices have gone down and that construction costs have gone down. So that type of concrete data as part of the situation that you put forward is saying now is the time to build non-profit housing, because when the condominium industry is booming all the good sites go to condominiums and we really get the residual sites that they do not want; those groups will not even approach us because they can sell their condominiums. But that situation and scenario has turned totally, and now is the time to take advantage of that because the costs will go back up. They are cyclical, and you get more bang for your buck now and produce the units now while the opportunities are there.

Mr B. Ward: And it fills the gap in the construction industry.

Mr Maloney: Oh, for sure.

Ms Kraus: If I can just add something: There are greater problems now and more demand for housing because growing numbers of people are losing their jobs. The demand is certainly increasing, and the fact that it provides jobs when a lot of people are losing their jobs is another important point for why we need the housing now.

The Chair: From the opposition party, Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: Just a comment on the previous comment. The debate around the budget is very difficult because it is like forecasting the weather. What we have been saying is we think the problem with the budget is it is not going to stimulate economic activity. We will only know that in a year or two, so you will probably be back here in a year. Maybe they are right, maybe they are not. But when you put the human face on it, and the unemployment rate now is 10%; it is probably going to stay at 10%, according to the budget, next year. So those are our concerns.

But my question to you, two of them to get an idea of what we should be thinking about providing in budgets in terms of the numbers of units per year—I was not satisfied from your brief what you would estimate we will need per year each year—I would say, over the next two decades, 15,000 rental units. But how many non-profit co-op would be required?

My second part is, the budget document on page 10 says, "In addition, we are announcing the provision of another 10,000 non-profit units, which will cost the province approximately $150 million in annual operating subsidies when completed." I am just wondering what that means? Is that each year we should be providing about $150 million per 10,000 non-profit units in our budget each and every year?

Ms Kraus: That is what that does mean. Those are annual operating costs.

Mr Phillips: How long does that go on?

Ms Kraus: Well, theoretically, it can go on for the life of the mortgage, which would be 35 years. But the costs go down over time as costs get paid off, the cost would be reduced over time.

Mr Phillips: But over a 10-year period should we be thinking about $150 million per year per 10,000 units?

Mr Maloney: I think that is probably a reasonable estimate if the mortgage costs go down, and you have to remember that rents go up as well. It depends on the economy. If people are getting a lot of jobs, they will be able to pay more rent too, so the costs can come down considerably based on that. That is what my example earlier was trying to indicate. But when there is a higher level of subsidy, the costs cannot come down as quickly.

Mr Phillips: I am just trying to figure out how much money we should be thinking about. So each 10,000 units, $150 million per year, and that is reasonable for maybe 10 years, but let's just say for the next 10 years?

Mr Maloney: Yes.

Mr Phillips: And how many units a year do we need providing?

Mr Maloney: We are saying 14,000 to 16,000 rental units. For non-profit, that issue depends partially on what the private sector is doing. Right now, they are not really building rental units other than that you have some high-rise condominiums.

Mr Phillips: I am told it is not affordable for them to build right now.

Mr Maloney: That is exactly the situation. That is what they are saying.

Mr Phillips: What would be your guess, maybe 100,000 per year?

Ms Kraus: That is probably about a reasonable number of units to plan for, 10,000 units per year. The other thing that is very important is that there be some predictability and stability so that groups can plan to develop 10,000 units per year, because it takes a while before the housing units actually come on stream. There is a great deal of planning that is involved. The more groups can plan ahead, the better they can take advantage of maybe good buys and we have a steady stream of housing coming on.

Mr Phillips: What I have in my mind right now is that we should be thinking about annual subsidies, each year, of $15,000 a unit and, once the unit is built, for a considerable period of time, it is that amount of money. So if we build 10,000, we have to provide $15,000 a year in subsidies each year.

Mr Sutherland: I just want to get an issue clear here. In the non-profit housing sector, co-ops, low-income, a lot of planning has gone into not getting them into the ghettoization of low-income people, yet there seems to be some controversy in terms of the fact that government money is being used to subsidize these units but you want to have a reactive housing development, a co-op housing development that is reflective of the community. You do not want it to be a low-income in and of itself.

I get people in my riding coming up to me and saying, "The government shouldn't be subsidizing people who can't afford to pay." How do you defend against that argument? What do you say to people who come to you with that argument in terms of trying to have a mixed housing development?

Mr Maloney: I can assure you we face that kind of opposition every time we build a project. Often we have to go through rezoning. I have been to meetings where we have a lot of people in opposition to us and that is exactly what they say. It is land values and it is, "Why are we spending money in this area?" First of all, they are concerned about the standards of our projects. We say, "Come and see our projects, see our projects." None of them is identified as social housing. They all blend into the community. We try to build small projects and integrate them.

The other aspect of what we say is: "These people you are talking about are often your wife, if your family splits up, your mother or your child. Where are your children going to live in Mississauga if the rents are $800 a month?" Those kinds of statements bring them down to earth. Often what happens is that the very people who are in opposition to us six months later are calling me saying, "Can you get so-and-so a unit for me?"

The other thing we do when we go out to those meetings is we try to take people with us who were either in opposition prior to that or else people who are going to live in the project, saying: "What's wrong with me? I'm working, I have two kids. My husband left me. I have no choice. I need a place to live." That is very effective.

Those are the types of things that we say to people. We spend a lot of time anticipating what is going to come to us. We get school problems, so we do the research to show what impact it will have on schools. We do property value studies. We provide that kind of information. What we have to do is anticipate their questions and deal with them effectively in a public forum. Those are the types of things that I think would be useful to you in speaking to someone about it.

Mr Phillips: Again, I am anxious on the numbers. Right now there are about 50,000 units in the province, I gather, of non-profit co-op housing.

Ms Kraus: It is closer to 100,000.

Mr Phillips: I just added up your numbers here. So as we add 10,000 a year, we are adding $150 million a year to the budget. I guess that is another reason why your success depends, in our opinion, on strong economic growth, because those are substantial amounts of money. A year from now, I guess, we will be meeting again and hearing how successful the budget has been, not just at spending the money but at creating activity. As I say, your success hinges on both of them, the government's intention of spending but also the government's intention of raising money. At an incremental $150 million each year, that is a big chunk, I think you would admit.

Ms Kraus: Although the amount that has been spent on housing is only 1.5% of the total provincial budget. I think this year it went up slightly to 1.7%. As part of the whole budget picture, it is quite a small percentage.

Mr McLean: In 10 years then, what would be the cost to the budget of subsidizing 200,000 units, in your estimation? You are running at $15,000 a unit now.

Mr Maloney: Our view is that the cost will go down in 15 years. Our portfolio shows that because of a couple of factors. First, rents go up, because people's incomes go up and our market rents go up each year. If we can maintain our costs at a reasonable level, over time the cost should go down and the amount that comes from the federal government and the provincial government goes down. Certainly under the old programs, which we have a lot of experience with, we can show that dramatically. Under the new programs, they are so new that we have not had the 10 years' experience; we have had only about three years' experience. But our view is that they will go down over time. They certainly will not go up.

Mr McLean: But you are bringing more units on stream.

Mr Maloney: Yes, bringing more units on stream. They will not go up because it is a permanent supply of affordable housing. There is no profit margin in there to have to jack the costs up further, from that perspective. We are creating a permanent supply and the cost will go down over time.

The Chair: Thank you very much for your submission to the standing committee on finance and economics on the budget review.

This committee will recess for five minutes because we are ahead a little bit.

The committee recessed at 0953.

PROVINCIAL BUILDING AND CONSTRUCTION TRADES COUNCIL OF ONTARIO

The Chair: I call the committee to order again. We are going to call on the Provincial Building and Construction Trades Council of Ontario to come forward, please. Welcome to the committee. You have a half an hour totally, for a presentation and a question and answer period in that time, if you can leave some time at the end. Would you please identify yourselves for Hansard. You can begin.

Mr Duffy: My name is Joe Duffy. I am business manager and secretary-treasurer of the Provincial Building and Construction Trades Council of Ontario.

Mr Majesky: My name is Wally Majesky. I am doing some work with the building trades council.

The brief is 16 pages. We are going to read some of it, some of it we are going to skip over and with some of it we are going to do ad hoc stuff. It is fairly obvious some of the things in the brief—probably most of them—were in fact covered by the Toronto-Central Ontario Building and Construction Trades Council. The difference is that this provincial building trades council represents 100,000 construction workers across Ontario. This is in the industrial, commercial and institutional sector and the residential construction sector, so this building trades council is substantially bigger and is the provincial one.

The building trades in Ontario have faced a devastating economic climate which is worse than the recession in 1982. In fact, there is a very stark difference in terms of how the federal government has responded to the recession. In 1982, the federal government took a very proactive role, through government-sponsored projects, which, compared with the present Mulroney Tories, demonstrates a very glaring insensitivity to the needs of construction workers in 1991. The sad fact is that although many critics are claiming that social assistance is being abused, we can proudly point to our members and claim they would rather work than collect social assistance.

Just digressing for a point—I think I talked to some of the members, and many I know personally—the building trades are really in a situation they have never been in before. We are seeing in the Toronto area people who have probably never been on social assistance—the labourers, the people who do not have the kind of cultural thing, Portuguese Canadian and Italian Canadian workers. So aside from not wanting to be on social assistance, the political reality is there are hundreds of people on social assistance for the very first time, which quite frankly is a very frightening aspect.

Our council has strongly endorsed the budgetary measures undertaken by the NDP government and can say positive things about how some of our members have been put back to work through various capital programs announced by this government.

Quite frankly, we are very disturbed by the chorus of criticisms which are intended to spook the public into believing that the NDP is unable to govern the finances of this province. These criticisms are being levelled by industrialists like Conrad Black and others, decrying the policies of an NDP government.

Second, we are disturbed by the psychology of fear being manufactured about the deficit. It is kind of ironic that business heroes like Bob Campeau were seen as visionaries by the business elite when in fact Bob Campeau was a foolish entrepreneur who blew his brains out trying to go on the American market and show how well he knew things.

We are very sceptical about the current criticism levelled against certain segments of the media and federal and provincial opposition parties. The sad fact is that the NDP government came into office when the economy was sliding into a recession; in fact when the revenue side of the fiscal picture in Ontario was depending on the bookkeeping assumptions of the previous government, in the order of somewhere around $2 billion. In addition, the economy has been on a further slide, which has been compounded by the federal government's high interest policy, the C-11 and the disastrous free trade agreement, which has caused more havoc in the economy than in recent memory.

The NDP has been derided for making budgetary decisions in favour of working people, just people in general. Clearly, this government could have cut back on government funding and plunged the province even further into the recession, which already is in a disastrous state. The NDP could do the responsible thing and try to kickstart the economy with some badly needed infusion of government money to crucial segments of the Ontario economy, which is exactly how previous Conservative governments, like Bill Davis's, responded to the recession in the early 1980s.

We, as building trades people, are proud to support the $700-million anti-recession program which, when combined with local municipal government agencies, will total somewhere in the vicinity of $900 million. For your information, the $700-million program is presently being implemented, resulting in the creation of thousands of unionized jobs: water, sewer mains, a whole bunch of things. The fact of the matter is this translates into real live jobs. Whether it is this government or any other government, these kinds of measures are important for building trades people in Ontario.

It is fairly obvious that 57 economists, led by Mr. Watkins, have clearly endorsed the economic initiatives of the current government. There is no question that someone is going to say, "Well, what the hell, these are left-wing economists and NDP activists and we want to be clear." But these people are economists, and they in fact have credentials that belong to their own selves. We have had some corporate spokespersons being very critical of the budget, whereas the Conference Board of Canada, not exactly prone to the postulating or fawning over the left-of-center economic policy, was at least positive about the 1991 budget and Monte can come after us again in terms of what-

r. But there are people on the left and on the right who think there are some very positive things about the budget.
We are not going to get into that. We are here to talk about the positive things are and what it does for construction workers in terms of real jobs.

When we look at the specifics of the Ontario government, we believe that it is both appropriate and timely to discuss the role of the federal government, because we feel that some of the major problems in Ontario are as a direct result of federal fiscal and monetary policy. The Ontario Home Builders' Association, when they were here last week and the question was put to them, "What are some of the problems of the home building industry of Ontario?"
It surprised me, quite frankly, and said very clearly that probably the fault does not lie at the doorstep of provincial governments but at the doorstep of the federal government.
They said high interest rates, the GST and lot levies.

When Mr Mulroney lectures Ontario on its fiscal imbalance, we are left with a half-truth regarding the budget deficit. The Tories cut back on health and education and raised social benefit contributions at 3% at a time when health care rolls have soared. The Tories neatly eliminated about $4.5 billion from the Ontario Treasury. That kind of politics is both perverse and a gross distortion of the true fiscal situation. In an abstract sense it is part of the blame-the-victim psychology, and it is certainly an odd sort of political hyperbole.

Without going into the thing, what we find kind of odd is that the Ontario government had two choices: You could either try to inflict pain on Ontario citizens in the name of fiscal necessity, or you could attempt to act as a buffer and mitigate some of the hardships during a grim period of our economy. We believe the government acted in the interests of Ontario citizens, who have already borne an excessive burden of hardships by maintaining funding to essential services while at the same time aggressively financing necessary infrastructure, this being immediately tangible to the building trades people.

At the same time when Ontario has lost its revenue base, the Canada-US free trade agreement has virtually decimated the manufacturing sector in Ontario at a loss of approximately 240,000 jobs. This was further compounded by the feds' slavish adherence to high interest rates and the famous revenue-neutral goods and services tax. Sadly, the federal government's policies have virtually stalled the Ontario economy.

Ironically, the feds have generated more revenue with the GST than the manufacturers' sales tax, all this within the context that the consumption tax—GST—is paying off handsomely for Mr Mulroney and will provide further windfall revenues once consumer consumption rebounds.

That is the cruel reality in Ontario. Mr Mulroney and company are literally sucking more money out of a depressed consumer market and are contributing even less in fiscal transfer payments. The bottom line is that the feds have lined their pockets with surplus GST revenues at a time when the economy would benefit from additional consumer purchasing power and confidence.

I guess these are the kinds of things we find kind of ironic in that here you have a provincial government and the federal government doing things which, in fact, do not particularly benefit the provincial economy. We are going to talk about some things which we think are important.
The co-op non-profit housing has created jobs, quite clearly, and we, as building trades, support that because, ironically, not only does the co-op and non-profit sector create jobs, it also creates jobs for entrepreneurs. When I heard the previous presentation, these are private contractors who build it, so they in fact have business, and the construction workers have business, so we find that is a very positive thing. We can get into the whole question about the subsidies or whatever, and I spent 15 years of my life in the co-op housing sector, so I am quite willing to argue why the co-op housing sector ideologically is a good thing.

The private housing sector also is very important, because one does not want to put the eggs in the basket of just social housing and whatever. So the private market has a very important role to play, and we clearly recognize that. This government should look at the whole question of a mixed economy. It is very important.

When we were here last time we also heard the whole thing about the land approval process. Quite clearly, that has to be straightened out, because what is happening is that the land approval process is stalling it; it is taking land a hell of a long time to get on stream. It does not help social housing; it does not help the private sector. It is fairly obvious that that is something that has to be addressed. It seems to me that by the appointment of John Sewell there is going to be some attempt—and it is not an ideological argument; is it just a straight thing that is very important in terms of being looked at.

We want to talk about something very briefly, which is that we have long advocated something called a provincial fair wage policy. Gerry Phillips knows exactly what it is. It has been five years in the making. I do not want to belabour the point about a fair wage policy. Clearly a provincial fair wage policy is giving a level playing field to everyone bidding on it. It has been five years in the review process, started by the previous government and picked up. All we are saying is that somewhere there should be some light of day on a provincial fair wage policy, and we think it is very important.

We urge this government to make sure that the provincial fair wage policy is not only looked at—this is my standard speech—but implemented and enforced. We think it is very important. We think the wage protection fund in fact will help the construction workers. Whether you know it or not, many times people go bankrupt and people are left holding the bag. So we think that is very much a fair, innovative approach.

We just touch on the school boards because what we find, ironically, is that there is a mentality out there where local municipalities, boards of education and public utilities think that because they have the right to award contracts, the rationale is, "What the hell; low bidder." The fact of the matter is that this government funds many of these projects. Even in the private sector the water and sewer main associations want a level playing field because, quite frankly, people use a labour component to make a profit. So once again, this awarding of non-union contracts is very important, and the provincial fair wage would address that. The low-bid deposit thing is in there too, and that is related to the provincial fair wage policy.

It is very fashionable, by the way, to say that Canada and Ontario are into the information society and information-sharing and are on the leading edge of technology. One of the things that never fails to amaze me is that I never hear the Japanese and the Germans talking about being on the leading edge. They make things like cars and they make a lot of other things, but we somehow cannot make manufacturing. If you take a look at the underpinnings of the two major powers in the world, it is not information-sharing; it is cars, heavy equipment and manufacturing.

So one should not cut adrift the manufacturing sector and get into this simplistic ideology that there are all those buildings downtown, there is information-sharing and we are into a service sector. Yeah, we may be. I will tell you, the Japanese and the Germans are also into some heavy equipment things. It is just an ideological pitch; one should not cut adrift the manufacturing sector jobs that pay $14 an hour to serve hamburgers at $4 an hour, if someone thinks that serving hamburgers in the service sector is that great.

That, in essence, is it. It is fairly obvious there are other things in there, but I think the brief attaches it. It affords an opportunity for you to ask Joe something.

Mr Christopherson: I would like to thank Mr Duffy and Mr Majesky for your very articulate presentation this morning. It is interesting that many of the people who come in to offer support for the philosophical direction and economic reasons for the budget we presented talk a lot about the federal Tories. I think it is impossible not to when we look at causes of the recession and what has complicated matters for the provincial government as a whole.

I think it is also interesting to note that in yesterday's papers it was reported that the federal government's projected deficit may be wrong by more money than our entire deficit. So their miscalculation alone could be greater than the entire deficit we have budgeted for, and what are we getting out of that as Canadians? They have cut back on the social programs. They have gone in exactly the wrong direction than we have. Now it looks like they are going to have a deficit that is out of control.

We, on the other hand, are presenting a deficit that is meant to stimulate the economy, invest in the infrastructure, support people who need some help during a recession. We have a manageable deficit that so far is on target. I think that is the kind of message that these hearings are showing us. At least they certainly showed us that in the north, and they seem to be continuing that today.

In terms of the investment in the infrastructure, as people who are out there working in the communities across the province, you see more than anyone the actual construction activities that are happening in the real world. I would ask you, from your point of view, representing your members, how do you see the investment in the infrastructure as putting Ontario on a firmer footing to respond to the changes in the global economy and our ability to compete.

Mr Majesky: It is fairly obvious, in response to the first question, that the infrastructure stuff is very important. It translates into very specific jobs. You drive around Toronto, to Orillia, to Thunder Bay, some of that stuff is very clear jobs. On the other hand, I am not fooling myself for the second that the infrastructure stuff puts us on some sound footing on a global basis. The infrastructure, $700 million, gives people an opportunity to do the sewers, water mains. In the brief we did not say that the $700 million is the be-all and end-all, but when you have 70% of your members out of work, that puts people back to work. I do not want to dodge it. I do not think I want to tie in the $700-million infrastructure to what it does for our competitiveness on the world market, but in today's market, that puts people to work, and that is part of the thing that Joe has with his members. People are going and putting in this kind of stuff.

That is dodging it, and I am not quite sure how to address it. I do not think we have the time to tie that into the competitiveness and the global stuff, David.

Mr Christopherson: No, that is fine. Other people have responded that way to other questions, and that is fine. I am no expert in all these things and I do not expect anybody to be. I raised it only because we think it is important, because part of our strategy was that in the economy we are a part of, if we are not successful in the high value added—skills training, adding all those things that other countries cannot—then we are going to be in big trouble on the competition issue because then it is going to be a question of competing for the lowest standard of living.

Mr Majesky: You had better have another hearing because our track record collectively on skills training in this province and this country stinks. Probably one of the few which have any kind of credentials happens to be the building trades because of an apprenticeship program and a clearly defined program. If we had a nickel for every bunch of people who had talked about how uncompetitive we are because our workforce is not skilled—but that is another hearing and another time. At least these guys have the credentials to say they are not the ones; they are trained. You know what they are. They have an apprenticeship program. That is another hearing for another time, because I have some views on how well we are trained in terms of competitiveness. I do not think we do a great job, period.

Mr Christopherson: "A lousy job" would be a good description.

Mr Majesky: Any time you have to import bricklayers from Portugal, you must know that we have some problems. That is another thing that Joe wants, but that is manpower policy and that is something else entirely.

Mr Duffy: The importing of tradesmen does not need to be done for our industry. That is only—what do you call it—an economic problem that exists in this province where people who are unemployed in one part of the province cannot come to an area where there is employment because of the high cost of living. You cannot convince a carpenter or a plumber or a steamfitter or a bricklayer to come from Thunder Bay to take a job in Toronto and pay high cost of living in Toronto out of his daily wage and two homes. He is better off—and I state this emphatically—to stay on unemployment insurance, if he has enough stamps to get it.

Mr Jamison: A very interesting presentation. You asked about the effect on the employment of the members your organization represents. What kind of effect have you seen in numbers? Do you have numbers attached to what it is meant to your membership?

Mr Duffy: I do not have numbers, but you had a presentation from the Labourers' International Union, Local 3. I believe they stated numbers to you. That is an organization that I believe six months ago had something like 10,000 people out of work, and now they tell me they have reduced that by about 20%.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Majesky, I enjoyed your presentation, as I always do. It is always very thoughtful, very evoking. There seems to be a dichotomy and I would like to get your reaction to it. It is not your dichotomy; it is the fact. On page 14 of your presentation you say, "And more often than not, these are countries who have extremely cheap non-unionized labour which makes it virtually impossible for Canadian manufacturers to compete, and one only has to look at the current state of the Canadian textile and garment industry as well as the electronics and furniture industry, etc."

So on the one hand you are saying these cheap-labour countries make it impossible for Canadian manufacturers to compete, and then further on the same page you say: painfully silent on what the successful key economic factors have been in places like Germany and Japan. The political reality is that these countries are major players in manufacturing ranging from electronics to heavy equipment, to steel fabrication, to car manufacturing; in other words, all key manufacturing sectors." Now, by no stretch of the imagination can Germany or Japan be considered low-wage countries. They are highly unionized and highly competitive.

As I say, I just want to get your comments on it.

Mr Majesky: It is pretty obvious, Monte, we are not talking about the Germanys and Japan. Second, we probably have something in Germany and Japan we do not have in this country in terms of co-operation between the private sector, non-unionized sector and what have you. The reference here is to low-wage countries like Mexico, Malaysia or Singapore. Quite frankly, I do not think we will ever compete with those kinds of people. The only point we made in this is some sort of procurement policy to at least encourage buying of Canadian goods, which I gather under the free trade agreement makes it a lot tougher because that is, whatever.

I am the first one to admit that the Japanese and the Germans compete very well in terms of high wages, but on the other hand they have a whole different set of circumstances that we do not have. I am one who leans to the German model. But in Germany if I am a union person, I am a part of the decision-making process—not that I think you can import the German model for Canada. I think we should look at it.

I do not know how to answer that, Monte. This is in reference to those low-wage countries, and quite frankly I am one who thinks that the Mexico free trade agreement is a God-damned disaster. I am sick and tired of people telling me that a Mexico free trade agreement is in our best interest. In the first-flush results of the US free trade, my friend, I have not seen it. All I have seen is the going south, I have not seen anything coming north. So if someone says to me or to the construction workers that we have to compete with—I do not think we will ever compete, Monte. You were the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology, and I just think it is very tough. I do not think we will ever compete, so I am not an advocate. I am not dodging it.

Mr Duffy: We in the provincial building trade have seen things coming north, American construction workers coming across the border under the free trade. We recently got it stopped through a change in the free trade agreement, where American construction workers were allowed to come into all parts of Canada and do work under what they considered maintenance and manufacturer warranty work, which was actually downright construction work. We had to go as far as putting a protest on in Windsor and also close down the Fort Erie Peace Bridge to get our point across to the federal government.

One of the problems with it was that the description of the work was not passed down from the government to the border-crossing people who work there checking immigration visas and stuff like that. We have recently got that changed, but what we have seen through the free trade agreement was American workers coming in. Specifically in the free trade agreement it was spelled out that Canadian construction workers could not go in under any circumstances to the United States. It was a deliberate loophole left in that agreement.

The Chair: One short question, Mr Kwinter or Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: I never thought I would see the day the labour council would be supporting a budget that calls for essentially 10% unemployment each year over the next four years. I guess my question really is around that—

Mr Duffy: Could I just answer that point?

Mr Majesky: Let him finish his question.

Mr Phillips: Thanks, Wally. I think that is what worries the critics of the budget, that we are going to see economic activity, not this year, but in the future in Ontario that will get people, as you call it, jobs, jobs, jobs. Is the council supportive of this budget in terms of getting economic activity going that will—or are you accepting that we are going to have to look at unemployment rates of 9% to 10% each and every year for the next four years?

Mr Duffy: To touch on your first point in regard to the 10% unemployment, I am afraid to say that if this budget was not brought in the unemployment would probably be a lot higher in the construction industry. And no, we certainly are not supportive of any kind of system that gives us high unemployment. One of the main points in supporting this budget is that we see a situation where we have gone to every government in this country, federal, provincial, municipalities, asking these governments not to jump on stream when our economy is going up through the sky. We have asked them to get out of the business of jumping into putting on public work programs, to back off and wait until our—to eliminate the ups and valleys in the construction industry.

That is one of our major points of coming here today to praise this government. Another point, I would say, is that the construction workers know there is probably going to be a tax on all the people of Ontario. I am here to tell you for the construction workers, when we are working we do not mind paying taxes. We have never objected to the fact of paying taxes to support the governments that have been in power. But certainly we cannot sit back and see the unemployment go higher. And I can tell you right now, if Gerry Phillips is telling me that it is 10%, and I have seen it in the paper that it is 10%, I can tell you that by next year when the budget comes out we are probably going to be talking about 20% and maybe 30% in the construction industry. This is going to help. It is putting our workers back to work, but it is not going to solve all the construction industry's problems. The recession has affected the plants and situations like that. We, as construction workers, have not seen the recession yet.

The Chair: Thank you very much for your presentation.

BOARD OF TRADE OF METROPOLITAN TORONTO

The Chair: The next group we have here is the Board of Trade of Metropolitan Toronto. Are they ready to proceed? I know we are a few minutes early.

Mr Meinzer: We are actually 20 minutes late.

The Chair: Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget review. You will have one half-hour totally, if you can save some time at the end of your presentation for question and answer period. Would you please identify yourselves for Hansard.

Mr Meinzer: I am Gerry Meinzer. I am the vice-president of the board of trade. Health and everything else permitting, I am its next president. With me also I have Don McIver, chairman of the board's economic policy committee, and Kate Phillips, its vice-chair. We will be pleased to respond to any questions the committee may have afterwards. Let me tell you at the outset, though, I appreciate the opportunity on behalf of the board to make our case.

Just by way of background, the Board of Trade of Metropolitan Toronto has approximately 15,000 members. It is the largest community chamber of commerce in North America. We represent a broad cross-section of the Metropolitan Toronto business community from self-employed business persons to major corporations. Our membership encompasses manufacturing, service and financial sectors.

We have reviewed the 1991 budget and, as you can well imagine, we are greatly concerned about the $10-billion deficit and the projected four-year $35-billion debt increase it contains. While it is true that the government can blame much of this year's deficits on shrinking revenues, soaring welfare rolls and cutbacks in federal transfers, where is the long-term deficit reduction strategy? The government acts as if it had no power to roll back programs or civil service staff increases initiated by its predecessors. Its only concession to the concept of cost control is to "ask the people who work in the public service to help us meet the targets of our fiscal plan." Talk about putting the foxes in charge of the hen-house.

However, the budget has been come at from all kinds of different angles and we want to pick a new one that perhaps goes somewhat in line with the previous presentation. Rather than dwell on debts and deficits we want to confine our remarks to budget paper E, the discussion paper on structural change and competitiveness—for your reference, it is beginning on page 85 of the budget—for in the pursuit of competitiveness that the 1991 budget will have its most negative impact. I listened with quite some interest in the previous presentation on the German and Japanese example, and I know both of them very well. One key difference in their position is that they take preventive positions rather than reactive positions, both in labour management and in industrial strategy.

I also operate in the field of high technology, one of the very successful Canadian corporations in that field, and I know that the best technology in the world is not going to buy you a thing unless there is somebody at the other end who, for your price, wants to buy it. So in terms of the presentation, one needs to keep in mind that unless you can compete for a price somebody else cannot match, you are so much better in a cost-benefit analysis, you are not going to succeed. In our view the budget discussion paper is somewhat of an offensive attempt to blame Ontario's current industrial crisis on the policies of the federal government and on industry itself.

It expresses no vision about Ontario's industrial future and contains no ideas for addressing the current crisis beyond urging business to "invest" in Ontario and talking about strategic partnerships. It ignores high unit labour costs, rising taxes and payroll levies, labour and environmental legislation as the chief causes of the flight of industry from this province. In an appalling omission, it makes no mention whatsoever of the Ontario tax burden, which only shows the government's total indifference about its own responsibility in turning Ontario into what we are looking to head for, a fourth-rate industrial economy.

It proclaims that Ontario's low crime rate, low infant mortality and long average life expectancy are somehow sufficient to make firms increasingly interested in locating here. Why are they locating in Mexico and in Tennessee if there was any truth to this? It implies that Ontario employers have somehow exploited their workers since it says, "Ontario workers have seen their weekly earnings decline by 1.1% in real terms from 1979 to 1989." But this is almost entirely due to the inflationary effects of government taxes, payroll levies and government-regulated prices and I can cite you examples and you can bring them under questions after.

It proclaims that federal policies of high interest rates and unrealistically high value of the Canadian dollar are impeding investments. In doing so, it conveniently ignores the provincial government's own role in maintaining high interest rates and inflation by proposing to nearly double provincial debt over the next four years. It preaches partnerships between business, labour and government at a time when the government refuses to consult meaningfully with business on a wide variety of policy issues ranging from employment standards to rent controls, from minimum wages to labour laws. In fact, it pronounces that the only way commitment from employers to invest will be won by introducing such measures as pay equity, employment security and a fairer minimum wage. Can the government provide us with a single example, just one, of a company which has decided to invest more in Ontario specifically because of these policies?

It makes the heroic assumption that Ontario will somehow gain a competitive advantage in marketing the products and services of environmental industries by imposing stricter standards, which will act as a spur to technological innovation. At the same time the government ignores the movement of garbage in the province, eliminating the prospects of developing a viable recycling industry. It attempts to defend the role of the civil service by pronouncing that Ontario cannot afford the rigidity induced by policies which focus on cutting wages and eroding public contributions, an attitude which proclaims that not a penny of government money is misspent and every penny of expenditure is fully justified. But do Ontarians have grounds for anything other than cynicism in view of the 5.8% civil service pay settlement earlier this year and the increases of up to 11%, costing $17 million, for 2,200 civil servants?

The budget discussion paper clearly demonstrates that the government's idea of industrial strategy is to load as much tax, with as much burden, on to business in what is already North America's highest-cost jurisdiction and wait to see who will survive, let alone remain in the province. The entire orientation, in our view, is perverse and retrograde. How much proof does the government need to demonstrate that both its and the federal government's policies—and I include both—are driving industry out of the province to the tune of 250,000 jobs last year? Free trade cannot be blamed for the flight of Canadian-owned industries, since Ontario employers were both actively courted by US jurisdictions and were quite free to leave long before the free trade agreement was signed. In fact, the reduction of tariffs on exports to the US can only have prevented an even more rapid pace of deindustrialization.

One thing we can agree with in the discussion paper is the statement that there is a clear distinction between federal policies on competitiveness and the alternative approach supported by the Ontario government. We submit that both have indeed been extremely harmful to the economy: the federal government by letting deficits and hence interest rates get out of hand; the Ontario government by proceeding with a social agenda that takes absolutely no account of the plight of industry in the provinces, presents no coherent policy for preserving our industrial competitiveness, and by tabling a multi-year deficit plan that promises to repeat every mistake made by the federal government in recent years.

Where, I ask you, are Ontario's manufacturers going to find the resources to invest in retraining, in new technology and in R&D and innovation when the government brings down a four-year fiscal plan that the Treasurer says will require at least $500 million in new taxes just to meet future deficit targets? In fact, we think it is going to be substantially higher. And how will $35 billion in new debt result in government investments which will spur the private sector's ability to create wealth? The discussion paper provides no clues in this regard. The discussion paper shows that the government has no conception of Ontario's place in the global economic firmament and inescapable reality of integrated markets and free international movement of the factors of production.

If the government really believes that unit labour costs are unimportant, that taxes do not even merit a mention in a serious discussion paper on competitiveness, that environmental legislation is a spur to industry and that commitment to invest in the province will be won by introducing burdensome labour and minimum-wage legislation, then one can only conclude that the government has formulated an industrial strategy based on ideology but certainly not international reality. This apparently being the case, there is probably little point in our presenting detailed recommendations to the government until we see some clear sign of its willingness to engage in a serious debate on competitiveness. We have seen nothing yet emerge from the new Premier's Council on the Economy and Quality of Life in this regard.

I do want to quote from the Premier's speech on that, where he says: "My message is simply this. This government recognizes the fact that there must be a marriage and an understanding between those who are involved in the creation of wealth and those who are preoccupied with the issues of social justice." We agree with that. It is a two-way street, and we are suggesting to you that in our belief it has so far been a one-way street. We believe that a strong and viable economy may be achieved in a high-cost economy if all parties will co-operate in pursuit of this goal, but it will not be achieved if the government continues to focus obsessively on its labour and social agenda to the detriment of the wealth-creating capacity of the province.

This is where the German and Japanese models differ substantially. They do get together. They do it together. Unless we get ourselves into that same position, the direction we are going in will lead us straight downhill. With that, Mr Chairman, I am open to questions, together with my two colleagues.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Meinzer, I was interested in your comments and I would like to get a reaction from you. Unfortunately we did not have enough time to talk to the previous presenters, but I was a little disturbed to hear Wally Majesky say, "Yes, I understand about Japan and Germany but unfortunately we can't compete with them, so let's worry about these other things."

At the present time, the trade between Canada and Mexico is negligible. It is of no impact whatsoever on our economy. As I say, all these people who are really getting quite excited about it are worrying about something that is statistically unmeasurable. The trade between Canada and Mexico is less than $2 billion, which is absolutely nothing, whereas our major competitors are really Germany and Japan. To listen to Wally Majesky, we should just go home, pull the covers over our heads and say, "Forget it, we can't compete with them." Do you have any reaction to that?

Mr Meinzer: I was tempted to react while he spoke, because there is absolutely no point building buildings if we do not have any use for them. Unless industry is competitive worldwide and within the province of Ontario, we cannot just bury our heads in the sand and say, "Let's ignore them." Germany and Japan—and I am somewhat more familiar with Germany—are two of the highest social-cost countries I have ever been in, but what they do have is a sense of co-operation between labour and management, where they settle things in a preventive way, as I said at the outset. In the computer industry you have preventive maintenance so the thing does not break, rather than our model where we react once it is broken. So there is labour peace. There is no loss in their time. When they work, they work. They do not walk around on picket lines. We cannot ignore that.

Mr Phillips: You did not talk of a capital fund today. I would really like the board's opinion on the capital fund. There is no question that this government is going to try to bury capital and say, "We've got a deficit next year of $4.5 billion instead of $9.5 billion." I would like your opinion on it if you have it today.

The other thing I had is just because it is the Toronto board of trade. Unemployment in Toronto has worsened and is the worst of any place in Canada, I think. A year ago it was less than 5%; today it is over 10%. That is what worries me about the budget, personally. It is not so much the spending side as it is the revenue side and the job side of it. I am wondering whether the board has any analysis of what the cause of this is. There is a lot of talk about moving to other jurisdictions. Have you actually seen any of that? Just your thoughts on the cause of the high growth in unemployment. Also, you have touched on some solutions, but what are the things we might look at fairly quickly?

Mr Meinzer: We have done some extensive research and I would defer to my colleague, Don McIver, who is the chairman of the economic policy committee, to answer your questions.

Mr McIver: In answer to the first question, the issue of dividing the budget of the province into capital and operating, philosophically one can make a fairly straightforward case that any business organization has a capital budget which in essence is not intended to be funded within any one given period within the calendar year or fiscal year. There is some underlying sense behind that, but what worries me to a considerable extent are two things really: one, the sense that the capital budget is comparable to that in a corporation, which I would argue is not the case; and two, that you can continually run a capital budget in deficit. I say it is not comparable to that in a corporation because the reason you have a capital budget in a company is that you are investing in some production-generating equipment, machinery, a plant or whatever, which is going to give you a revenue stream over time.

Mr Phillips: Plus depreciation cost, and there is depreciation cost.

Mr McIver: Exactly. I think the difficulty with applying that to the province is where you say that hospitals, schools, particularly hospitals, to use a very good example, when you consider that to be a capital cost, patently, that is not going to be a revenue stream generated within the hospital against which you can offset the carrying cost of capital over time. Conceptually the idea is reasonable, when you start to pull it apart I think it becomes quite questionable. Then you are left with the implication, at least in the budget, that you can continue to run a capital deficit. Somehow a capital budget deficit is okay and you can run that continually without any constraint. I find that objectionable. I simply ask, at what point in time can you envision a situation, under this type of accounting, where the capital budget could possibly be in surplus? If not, then you are going to continually run in deficit.

Mr McLean: I have a couple of questions. For your information, we have been meeting for three days this week. We have met approximately 25 or 26 delegations. Of the 26 delegations, we probably had 2 that were opposed to the budget. The rest of them were all in favour of the budget and perhaps spending more. That shows you what kinds of hearings we have been having and the balance that has been arranged to make good input into the budget.

I want to talk about the commercial occupancy rate in Metropolitan Toronto a bit. The other issue I want to talk about is whether the Minister of Labour or anybody from the ministry met with your group to discuss the government co-operating with business.

Mr Meinzer: I will answer the second question first and the answer is yes. I am not convinced we got a hearing, but we have met. The first part maybe Kate will—

Mr McLean: Is the commercial occupancy rate increasing or what is happening with regard to that?

Mr Meinzer: Don, you are more on that side of the world, I suppose.

Mr McIver: Yes. Can you just refresh me on that question?

Mr McLean: Is the vacancy rate of commercial buildings, commercial businesses and space that are rented in downtown Toronto, continually increasing? You see kinds of signs.

Mr McIver: Yes, but I think you have to put that in the context of the recession. Certainly Toronto, unless I am mistaken, of the major financial capitals or centres in major business sectors in North America, has one of the lowest vacancy rates in the central core. I am not familiar with the city as a whole, but I think the centre of the city is not as severe as many others and it is very definitely recession-related.

Ms K. Phillips: Maybe I could respond simply saying that the recent study done of major business centres around the world shows Toronto to have the third highest cost of occupancy rates anywhere in the world. We are a very expensive city to walk right in. When you compound that with things like the corporate concentration tax a occupancy tax, you are forcing firms to find other places outside of the major business cores. It is creating new business cores, if you wish, as people spread out and build new homes. That is simply a factor of economics.

Mr McLean: Then are some of the ones who are finding new homes moving elsewhere in Ontario, or are they moving south of the border?

Ms K. Phillips: Quite often because of the number of other factors, typically taxes, they are being driven south of the border or to other jurisdictions. Simply to take the case of companies finding other homes, we will see that in Quebec firms are finding they are moving some of their taxes to homes such as Alberta, where they can take advantage of some tax holidays.

Mr McLean: So we are not going to see a reversal. The vacancy rate is going to increase.

Ms K. Phillips: That is correct. That is again compounded with the number of firms that are being forced to close or merging for competitive reasons, and therefore that is decreasing the number of head offices that used to be located in the downtown core.

Mr McLean: So the recession is going to get worse in Ontario before it gets better.

Ms K. Phillips: That is correct.

Mr B. Murdoch: At first you mentioned how many members and I missed that. How many members are in your organization?

Mr Meinzer: There are 15,000 members.

Mr B. Murdoch: I wanted that on the record so that everyone knows there are quite a few people out there who agree with you. As Al said, we have had hearings for the last few days and it looks as if everyone wants more rather than less money in the budget. I do not think we are getting a clear picture here. Maybe today we will get one that is a little clearer.

Ms K. Phillips: I guess we really cannot stress enough the fact that has to underline any budget or fiscal decision made here in this province. If you do not have revenue-creating positions, whether that is companies or jobs in one form or another, you have nothing to support your social policies with.

Mr B. Murdoch: I think somebody has missed that point and I am glad you pointed it out.

Mr Jamison: As you have been made aware, we have not heard many opposing presentations. Thank you for taking the time to come in.

Of course, being opposed to the budget, as you obviously are, and the level of deficit that is there, is understandable in some cases. No one likes a deficit. I would pose a question to you, because when I was brought up, my father used to say, "If you don't agree with something, then be specific about what you don't agree with and be able to point out very clearly what you would have done instead."

I think it is very important, and I will give you an example. Would you be opposed to the transfers to municipalities, in relationship to the Conservative theory from Ottawa that really froze and capped those funds? How would that affect your membership, in fact, in a municipal base and so on? Really, I guess my question would be, if you were going to limit the deficit, have you done your own personal homework in coming here today? Are you able to point out clearly the areas where you would have restrained your spending and by how much? Would you identify clearly the areas and the amounts in which you would have restrained spending, keeping in mind of course that by standing still, by not doing anything, there was a potential of an $8-billion deficit in this province.

Mr Meinzer: To us, a deficit is a deficit; it does not matter what political stripe it came from. But I want to answer also philosophically that we represent the business community, and in corporate life you just cannot keep operating on a deficit. You would just simply go bankrupt.

Mr Jamison: I am asking you for specifics.

Mr Meinzer: We have a philosophical issue, but we also have some specifics to answer your questions.

Mr McIver: I am going to try and avoid naming too many specifics, because this is an oft-asked question in sections such as this.

Mr Jamison: I think this is the crux of the debate, really, though.

Mr McIver: Give me a minute, please, because the difficulty in responding to that type of question is that in general the person responding simply does not have the full agenda, the full figures, the full costs, the understanding. It takes not just one individual but many individuals and various treasury boards or various levels of government. It requires a full understanding of the programs and how they are funded, and in many cases there are expenditures which obviously seem capable of being cut tomorrow, but it turns out that there are contracts written around them which would take a long time to unwind.

Again, I am trying to avoid giving specifics, because I will claim, and I think most people in this position would claim that they simply do not have the competence to do so. However, I would echo Gerry's philosophical comment that says: "Look, if you're running a company, it doesn't matter. It's not sufficient to say: 'Hey, listen, I don't know who we can fire. I don't know where we can cut the costs, which contract we can cancel.'" I know we cannot continue to run a business if we continue to do this.

The one specific I would suggest to you right off the top, because it is in marked contrast to what has gone on at the federal level and with many of the provinces, is an effort to constrain wages at the provincial public sector level. That is in very marked contrast.

Mr Jamison: How much would that have saved?

Mr McIver: I cannot give you a number. That is the difficulty you put me in, "But how much would it save?" At a guess, a couple of billion.

Mr Jamison: No.

Mr McIver: No? How much?

Mr Jamison: It was much less than that.

Mr McIver: You could be right.

Mr Kwinter: What about the private sector, which gauges its wages on the public sector?

Mr Meinzer: Can I just quote you one example? The senior civil service level that we quoted was $17 million. That is just for 2,200 people. Let's say we would have kept them at zero; there is $17 million right there.

Mr McIver: This is public sector, parapublic sector, all different levels of government, where there is a demonstration effect, and indeed the private sector, where there is a tremendous demonstration effect.

Mr Sutherland: You commented earlier about governments causing inflation and that leading to high interest rates and the recession. Yet if I look at what John Crow said—and with me not being from Toronto, John Crow used to bug the hell out of me—he would say the inflation rate was 6.5%. Here in Metro it was 6.5%; in the rest of the province it was 4%. He is sitting there saying, "The economy's taking off in Ontario, so we've got to try to control the inflation rate before it gets out of hand."

You are saying here that the government is causing it. What he was saying at that stage of the game was that your members, who were probably benefiting from the economic boom that occurred here, the end result—what was going on in Toronto was actually causing him to force up the high interest rates.

I guess I am trying to put that all together, why we had a high interest rate policy that dealt with one specific area of the entire country, but seemed to create a recession across the entire province, put people out of work, and now, when a government tries to deal with that in terms of maintaining levels of service and in terms of trying to provide some stimulus—not enough to make up for the losses, no doubt about it—to get people back to work, we are receiving a great deal of criticism for that.

Mr Meinzer: From a deficit point of view, the deficit was not a Toronto deficit and it was not an Ontario deficit. Ontario has been a net contributor to equalization for I do not know how many years, if not for ever. What John Crow is coming after with a high interest rate policy is a national issue, because we pump money into regional development and all kinds of things.

We have just done some very recent studies. In Hibernia, with the amount of money that is going in there for regional development, it would probably be easier to triple unemployment for any Newfoundlander and still be less than half the cost—if you tripled the unemployment insurance benefits. That is where a lot of the deficit comes from, but Kate may want to add to that.

The Chair: Make it very short because we are running out of time.

Ms K. Phillips: I think maybe we will just want to wrap up by saying we want to focus this government back on the issue of competitiveness. You cannot expect industry to compete with the burden you are placing on us with this budget and this deficit. You have increased the social costs through new payroll taxes. You are talking in a variety of other areas.

Mr Sutherland: Sorry, there are no new payroll taxes in this budget.

Ms K. Phillips: There are things on the table now that are going to influence in the next very short—

Mr Sutherland: Okay, but nothing has come in as yet.

Ms K. Phillips: You have enough new taxes, like either in your proposed plan or in your budget, that are going to cripple industry and are going to influence the competitive position that we take here. We are not denying the fact that we have been knocked by the recession by manufacturers, but we are simply saying: "Let's fight to get our heads above water. Don't hamper us further with any new taxes you might come up with." You are putting in place policies, whether they be environmental, whether they be employment equity, whatever factor you wish to look at, that are going to make us uncompetitive, and that is going to drive us to other jurisdictions.

The Chair: I would like to thank you very much for your presentation.

ONTARIO SECONDARY SCHOOL TEACHERS' FEDERATION

The Chair: The next group to come forward is the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation. Would you please come forward? Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget review. You will have one half-hour for your presentation. Included in that time, try to save some time at the end for some questions and answers. Would you identify yourselves for Hansard, and you can start with your brief.

Ms Barkley: First of all, I would like to say we are very happy to be here and that we represent 42,000 members. We are not just teachers. We are secretaries, custodians, psychologists and psychometrists, among others, within the educational community, so it is not just the teaching staff itself. Certainly they encouraged us to make this presentation.

I would also like to indicate to you that this particular brief has had a very wide distribution. We were at the Canadian Teachers' Federation convention last week, representing the teachers across Canada, and they all wanted to take the brief back to their own provinces, particularly those in the west might underline, in British Columbia and Saskatchewan.

I will start the presentation. I will read some to you and then I will try to highlight other parts that I think might be relevant for you. If I go on too long, please stop me. I try to do that, but I would rather save time for questions because I know you can all read.

When the Ontario budget plan for 1991 was unveiled, the reaction of the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation was gently favourable. Our support for the social and economic measures unveiled in the plan was somewhat diluted by our inability to perceive any move to increase the provincial share of the financing of local education. The transfers to school boards were set at a 8.1% increase over 1990, while the previous government had increased it, as you can see, by 8.3%.

However, now that we have seen the budgets from other provinces, ours shines by comparison, and we are told that continually. It is virtually the only responsibility counterattack by a province on the federal government's parched-earth social and economic policies.

We have already commented that it is the height of irony that the Ontario budget has been energetically attacked for having rejected the approach of Wilson and Mulroney, whose policies themselves had been discredited by the majority of commentators and people prior to the release of the Ontario budget. The source of the storm of protest surrounding the Ontario budget, its acceptance of the necessity for a recession-fighting deficit, was itself caused in major part by the cut in transfers to this province from the federal government—downloading.

Since 1989, in effect, the government of Canada has deliberately implemented policies made outside of this nation by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. These international bankers' monetarist policies deliberately aim at destroying our social and health care safety net through the reduction of transfer payments for the targeted programs.

We are in total agreement with the approach of the provincial government in budgeting for a made-in-Ontario program that will maintain and strengthen our system of social justice and equity.

I will not read this next part on downloading, except to say that last week I had a confrontation with the tax coalition people and they do not understand the downloading. It is very important that this be stressed; for example, the fact that what the transfer payments do to provincial governments and to municipal governments and of course, finally, to the property taxpayer.

I will turn now to page 4. Again, we were always opposed to the downloading of the provincial government, and I think the past Liberal government can tell you that. We spoke very strongly against that. But now, faced with a massive downloading of the federal government, we are really in dismay and our concern is much more with what is happening federally, affecting us all. The Ontario budget, with that in mind, is a beacon of light.

In 1991, the cap on transfer payments to Ontario in established programs financing (post-secondary education and health) and the Canada assistance plan (social assistance) will result in a cumulative shortfall of $3.6 billion. That goes back to 1986. This shortfall alone makes up nearly one half of the notorious Ontario budget deficit.

Over the next five years, it is estimated that the total accumulated shortfall for Ontario will be an astounding $15,066,000,000: established programs financing, $11,209,000,000, and Canadian assistance plan, $3,857,000,000. See figure 1. This is an unconscionably heavy burden to settle on the shoulders of the beleaguered Ontario taxpayer, and future Ontario budgets will have to cope with its impact.

There is little likelihood that the needs met by these programs, especially in the area of social assistance, will diminish as long as the federal Conservative government is in power. The unilateral cap placed on these transfers by the federal government is an irresponsible violation of the federal-provincial social contract that helps hold this country together. When one considers that unemployment insurance benefits have been cut at the same time, the federal government is indeed abandoning those Canadians least able to protect themselves in hard economic times. The government of Ontario had little choice but to make up the shortfall to sustain the victims of the same federal government policies, and its budgetary deficit, in light of this, became inevitable.

What we have on the next page, page 5, as you can see, are the transfer payments for all the provinces. You may want to take a look at that later. I think that is very pertinent and something we should publicize much more, because it has created so many of the problems we face.

If you turn to page 6, it is interesting. I think you all remember that when the Quebec budget came down, it was lauded by papers such as the Globe and Mail. We all read that. So we researched that and we talked to our colleagues in Quebec as well. If you take a look at Quebec, and if you go to the second paragraph there and read through that, in terms of social health and education vitality, Quebec is not doing at all well. Restraints have been imposed on school boards since the early 1980s. Unemployment and poverty levels have increased—and now look at this one—at a dismaying rate. At this moment, Montreal has a higher rate of unemployment than St John's, Newfoundland, and you know how high that is. School dropout rates have risen dramatically. Between 1979 and 1991, the dropout rate in Quebec increased from 26% to 39%. In Ontario, retention rates continued to improve. Between 1975 and 1986, our graduation rate increased from 62.4% to 75%. Clearly, any proposal that Quebec be the model Ontario should emulate must be viewed indeed with scepticism.

I think we should read this too, because it brings some compassion into the debate, which I think the NDP government has shown. That paragraph at the end says, and it is a quote, as you see: "Educators have become increasingly aware of the effects of poverty and the associated problems affecting school performance: lower attention span, truancy, poor attendance, erratic behaviour, hyperactivity, aggression," etc.

If you look at the top of the page, an article from the Globe and Mail, and you read about the second sentence there, the effects of poverty in east end Montreal, they did 37 schools where there are nutrition programs and they can do no testing after the 15th of any month. The children just cannot cope with it because they are not properly nourished. That is astounding. And this is an ideal budget, helping the people? Hardly.

If you look at the bottom of page 6, again we are talking of transfers to school boards, which we think is an investment in people and an investment in our future. As indicated above, despite the fiscal squeeze exerted on Ontario by federal government cutbacks, the provincial government made the courageous decision not to reduce its transfers to its junior agencies. Colleges and universities received a 7.3% increase, health care 9.5%, municipalities 5% and school boards 8.1%. For purposes of comparison, we outline the latter transfers across Canada.

Take a look at that graph on the next page. That says it all, really. If you value education and you think it is something that is one of the cornerstones of your community, just take a look at that graph. Look at Quebec. Look at Ontario.

I think Ontario did the best it could to retain an excellent education system in comparison, and as has been outlined to us, right across Canada, from all the teachers whom we have met recently. Again, Ontario is a shining example of fiscal responsibility compared to the other provinces.

If you will look at the next paragraph, there has been little mention of this, but the provincial government has also inaugurated a $100-million pay equity fund that will help school boards and other agencies meet this important—contrary to what the last presentation said—social priority. In addition, it has followed the example of the previous government and extended the approximately $300-million capital grant to school boards. The Minister of Education, Marion Boyd, has on more than one occasion assured school boards and teachers that the future cost of new mandated innovations like curricular restructuring will be paid for from provincial coffers. This is good news and signals a potential end to the practice of downloading that has been widely rejected.

Choosing a path for Ontario: a high-wage or a low-wage society? I think you know that is a discussion that is now global. In fact, the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank are discussing which route to go. What we are doing now is that we are entering a free trade and global economy. We have choices of which way we go, and budget paper E indicates the route Ontario is going to go. I will not read it; you know it. We agree with budget paper E in that direction.

If you turn to page 8 and go to the very bottom paragraph in the first column, we had an opportunity to go to a transborder conference in Halifax with our colleagues from the United States, and we had a presentation from Jeff Faux, president of the Economic Policy Institute in Washington, DC. It was chilling. It was fascinating, but it was frightening. In any case, I would like to read a little bit of it, because I think this is something we are all going to face.

Faux outlines a choice that is referred to in paper E: "Under these conditions, high-wage nations such as Canada and the United States face a choice. One option is to compete in the global economy by lowering wages, and therefore lowering the living standards of the majority of the population. The alternative is to compete on the basis of higher productivity and innovation, which will improve living standards"—which they have done in Germany, for example.

"But prevailing laissez-faire economic ideology has been moving both nations down the low wage path by defining competitiveness in terms of low labour costs; ignoring the economic value of the public sector. There is a catch-22 at work; we're not competing so we cut back on public investments in people, and because we cut back on investments we can't compete.

"The proposed North American free trade agreement between Canada, the US and Mexico is an example of the low-wage path.

"Continuing to follow this low-wage path will produce prosperity for the top 30% of the population and falling living standards for the bottom 70%. In the long run, the gap between the very rich and the rest of society will grow.

"The new global economy requires a new economy for North America, one in which nations compete against each other not on the basis of cheap labour but on the basis of expensive labour, ie, labour that produces innovative products and services.

"A high-wage strategy involves a transformation of the organization of work from traditional 'top-down' management to management by teamwork. This in turn requires a new emphasis on a high-quality general education for all.

Then there is something Bob Rae has mentioned: human capital, the importance of it:

"Investment in people is the key to a high-income strategy. People are now less mobile than technology and capital. People are the source of national adaptability and flexibility. Education and training shapes job content and the organization of work"—and shapes people.

"A high-skill, high-wage strategy transforms the problem of educating the disadvantaged. It is no longer a question of charity; everyone's lives are diminished when the education system loses a child.

"...or loses an adult. The accelerating pace of economic change requires opportunities for learning throughout life.

"Money does matter. So does the capacity of public education to change, which is essential if it is to be the engine for the further social and economic development of North America."

Now we are facing that choice: to maintain our present standard of living, the high-wage standard of living, or to move to a low-wage society on a Mexican model. Of course we support the first direction as outlined, again, in budget paper E.

Again on that page—I will not read it to you; I will just try to highlight it—when we talk about taming the recession we certainly agree with the 58 wise persons, the economists who made the presentation and should have been much more highly, I think, highlighted in the press. Of course we agree with Galbraith's analysis and his approach to how you tame the recession and how you economically deal with it. I would suggest to you too that this is the only place where there has been any kind of humanity shown to the vast majority of the populace by this government.

If you turn to the very last page, page 10, you do have to read that. Galbraith makes one more intriguing suggestion regarding the financing of this public investment, "A bow to fiscal conservatism, perhaps we should finance the process with a tax increase in higher brackets." In other words, we have to revamp the tax system. I did not read that out to you, but I am sure you have heard that before. We have to tax the higher earners. We have to look at the whole tax structure, because it has been very clear since about 1985 and before that the loopholes for the rich have increased and the taxing of the middle class has increased as well. We think the whole tax structure has to be looked at, and we think that is one of the major problems and one of the major difficulties of getting out of this recession, it is not highlighted.

As with probably everybody in this room, we fought very hard against the fiscal policies of the Tory government, particularly the GST. When the government says it has no money and has to form a committee, for example find out how to dispose of an income that is now being generated by the GST, we think the massive part of the problem of this recession lies in the fiscal policies of the federal government, and again, that is what should be attacked, not this very fair budget the NDP has put in place.

I will read the conclusion for the record. The Ontario government has chosen to maintain its investment in its institutions, and most important, in its people. In light of its commitments that the New Democratic Party has made in its Agenda for People, it would have been difficult, if not impossible, to do otherwise. The Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation supports this direction. Furthermore, we are convinced that there is broad public support for the budget's responsible anti-recessionary strategy that will nurture the long-term strength of this province.

The Ontario Institute for Studies in Education poll on attitudes to education was released in April. A significant majority, over 90%, thought that the spending on local education, job retraining and adult literacy should be increased, even in this recession. Post-election polls conducted by Environics and Insight Canada also indicated the same broad support for increased spending on education and other social programs: health, social assistance, etc.

The taxpayers of Ontario will support a government that invests in socially valuable programs, as they are the key to Ontario's economic future. However, the government must aggressively explain—if there is any fault that I could give it would be the following: It is that we did not explain this budget well enough when it came out. We did not defend it well enough and we were not aggressive enough in indicating to the populace that big business does not like anything that does not feed its coffers. It does not care about the people and the community needs. We do, and this government does, and I know we have to work with business, but it has to take a lesson that it has to be socially responsible as well.

I say in conclusion to you that across this province—it is not just the OSSTF, by the way. The Ontario Teachers' Federation, which represents 135,000 teachers, was going to make a presentation. I do not know if they are on your agenda, but they were going to try to make one in Kingston. The Ontario English Catholic Teachers' Association, which represents the Catholic teachers, wanted to make one, I believe, in Ottawa, or I have it reversed, but I know that was the plan. So when I make this presentation on behalf of the OSSTF, I know that I am talking in a much broader context about the educational community and its allies.

We thank you for allowing us to make this presentation and we certainly hope the government continues on its pathway.

The Chair: Thank you. We have about four minutes for each party, starting off with Mr McLean.

Mr McLean: The question that I have for you, the long-range budgetary policies of the government to increase the debt to about $76 billion by the year 1995, what is your answer to that? Do you agree with that policy?

Mr French: Actually, I think the government is in a real bind, and the debt it is incurring through the cumulative deficit is serious and has to be addressed very seriously.

One prays that the recession will diminish as quickly as it can. We think the Ontario government will help that, so that the cost of the debt servicing does not become a strait-jacket for the Ontario government the way it has become federally. We think it is still under control. It is about 12% of the Ontario expenditure. The federal government is around 34%. So there is a little room there, but I think we would have to agree that the faster the deficit is whittled down, the better.

Mr McLean: Do you think that the federal government should continue to increase its debt? It is $400 billion now.

Ms Barkley: No, I think there has to be a total restructuring of the tax system, a total restructuring of who is taxed, how they are taxed and what is taxed. Look at how corporations are taxed in Canada; there are less taxes paid by our corporations here than in the United States, which is astounding to me. I think it was something like one third of our corporations here in Canada, through loopholes and other things, end up paying no taxes at all—some of the most powerful ones, like the Power Corp, and that should be addressed, for example.

Mr McLean: Have you met with the Fair Tax Commission?

Ms Barkley: No, I have not.

Mr McLean: I thought I had heard something. I guess they are operating now and I am sure you will be making a presentation to them once they get in operation.

Mr French: Ms Barkley is chairing a very high-level task force of our federation to prepare a submission on property tax reform. We will have that ready by the end of the summer so that, when the Fair Tax Commission meets, we hope to make a major presentation.

Mr Christopherson: I want to thank Mr French and also Ms Barkley for what is always an interesting and stimulating presentation. I would like to focus on one area in particular that you referenced twice in your presentation, and it also ties into comments made by the previous presenters; that is your heading Transfer to School Boards: Investment in People. When you read it out, you added, "and investment in the future." Then also, in your conclusion, the first sentence of your last paragraph is, "The taxpayers of Ontario will support a government that invests in socially valuable programs as they are the key to Ontario's economic future."

Obviously, our decision to provide the money that we did to the transfer partners was twofold. One was not to lead to the regressive property tax system which you have already very thoroughly addressed. The second was the whole issue of investment in the future. We believe that fundamentally. The previous presenter, when talking in answer to a question from Mr Kwinter, I believe, on the capital budget, said that "Government investments in capital, per se, are unlike that of business, because when business does it, there is something that is produced positively at the end." I am paraphrasing and I hope I am not wronging him in doing so.

Mr Kwinter: Just for the record, it was Mr Phillips who said that.

Mr Christopherson: It was Mr Phillips? Thank you. It was a good question.

Now, if we invest in capital structures—for instance, schools or hospitals—we believe there is an economic return in that investment. I would like to hear in your own words, for Hansard, for the record, in as plain language as possible, taking that rather esoteric thinking and telling us how you believe that an investment in the school system—the capital part of it and, if you can relate that to hospitals also—is truly an investment that will give a return to the people of Ontario.

Ms Barkley: I think there is no more powerful investment, no more important investment—being a teacher all my life—than the human investment. I would call that human capital. The best example we have is in Germany where retraining programs have resulted in the most highly trained workforce in the world; and they are among those with the highest wages in the world, the shortest work-week, and the most competitive, because what they have done is invest in the thing that makes the gadgets. They have trained their people to deal with the new technology. They have become more competitive than we have become, because we have not got the workforce—and we have a better workforce than many—that the Germans do, because they invest much of the new technology because of their investment in human capital. The Japanese do much the same, but I know the German experience better. I think that investment in human capital is the most important investment that any government can ever make.

Mr French: Could I add one thing? We have added, for your information, in case you had not seen it before, and I think maybe some of you had, the earning power study from Princeton that came out last year. It is very revealing. This was before the knowledge-based economy, where investment in human capital is the critical factor, and a longitudinal study. They studied a generation of students and compared earning power after their school treatment. The variables were teachers' salaries, the amount of expenditure on instructional salaries and class size, and they did it in increments of five in the classroom: a class of 30, a class of 25, class of 20. And then they did the long-term earning power.

The people who had the best educational investment out-earned their peers, who were at the other end, by 3.6% over their lifetime. This is significant enough so that their federal income tax in US terms, which is not onerous, will more than pay back the original investment in improving the learning conditions.

I would think that kind of investment is now going to be more critical as our industries move into the knowledge-based industries. Our lifeline, our hope will be that our education system can cope and produce citizens capable of competing in the global economy the way Germany and some of the Asian countries are succeeding.

The Chair: We go on to Mr Kwinter.

Mr Kwinter: I assume the OSSTF has finished its salary negotiations for next year in most school boards.

Ms Barkley: In most school boards, yes.

Mr Kwinter: Let us take, for example, Scarborough. What kind of wage increase did you get for this year?

Ms Barkley: It was a two-year contract. I believe last year it was what, 5.5? That is right.

Mr Kwinter: But for the two years coming up, it is my—

Ms Barkley: No, we have not got a contract. We are still negotiating.

Mr Kwinter: It is my understanding that the settlement in the next two years is going to be considerably less than what you are talking about now.

Ms Barkley: Well, we are in negotiations and we never predict what the conclusion is going to be. You have a problem in Metro because of the cost of living. If we pay very low salaries we cannot draw teachers because of the cost of housing and the cost of living here. We have a major problem within that context which I think our school boards understand. For example, in North York where we come from, the director tried to have some of the schools turned into dorms because we could not draw the teachers because they could not afford to live, particularly on the beginning teacher's salary.

I would hope they are not considerably less or we are not going to be able to maintain the excellent teaching staff we have.

Mr Kwinter: I have a vested interest in this; my wife is a school teacher, so I am very current as to what has been going on. I can tell you that the teachers in her particular school were quite upset, and she said that for the first time since the last strike there are people talking strikes because the feeling is that, while the government gave the civil servants an increase of 5.8%, the indication they have been getting from the OSSTF representatives is that the increase for teachers is not going to be anywhere close to that.

Ms Barkley: I would say that the negotiations that we know of, because I am the Metro liaison for the provincial executive, have not even touched on salary yet. We are now at fringe benefits and we are dealing with working conditions but we have not even touched the question of salary. It is not on the table. If you know anything, and you do, about Metro negotiations, it will probably be well into January before we even touch on what the salary is going to be.

I have not heard strike. I was in the Metro strike and worked to rule in North York twice, and I do not think there is anything the teachers would try to avoid more than a strike.

The Chair: Mr Phillips, for about two minutes.

Mr Phillips: I was, I guess, disappointed to hear the OSSTF say—just because it causes me an uneasy feeling—that business people do not care about anything that does not line their pockets. I do not lump people like that because business people are no different than any other people; you have good people and you have bad people. But if OSSTF feels that way, I am afraid we are starting to really polarize things in our society. This is what we are ried about in the budget, frankly, not the spending side, the revenue side. How are we going to generate?

When you talk about German jobs, they are there for reasons. One is that the workforce is very talented, but creation and investment have been made in those jobs that take advantage of those skills. Both things, believe me, had to happen.

My worry from your comment is, if the OSSTF really believes that business people care only about lining their pockets, we have some real problems, because if that is the attitude we are not going to build the consensus we need. What really what you believe?

Ms Barkley: I overstated it a bit—he is a business person and I would not say it is him—but I certainly feel the same way about many of the multinationals. I do not feel they have a personality, and within the Canadian context they have been somewhat disappointed that they have not been taken hand in hand and become partners in retraining to the extent that we think they should and could, in trying to give a helping hand to the problems created by this particular recession.

Mr Phillips: Are not some of the best models in these things like General Motors?

Ms Barkley: I said I did overstate it, but still, with the free trade agreement, I think my fear is that the personalities go, the multinationals take over and they do not have a personality and you tend to have a feeling that they are not really concerned about the social equity of the society. It is true of all, that is true.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for appearing before the standing committee on finance and economics. We have exactly one half hour for each brief.

Ms Barkley: Thank you for the opportunity.

The Chair: The Chiefs of Ontario are not here yet. Maybe we will take a five-minute recess and come back at 11:35.

The committee recessed at 11:30.

CHIEFS OF ONTARIO

The Chair: We would like to welcome the Chiefs of Ontario, Mr Gordon Peters, for your submission before the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on its budget review. You have one half-hour. In that half-hour, try to leave some time at the end of your presentation for questions and answers from the three parties. You may proceed. Identify yourself for Hansard's purposes, please.

Mr Peters: My name is Gordon Peters. I am the regional chief of the first nations in Ontario.

This morning I come here in a lot of ways thinking about how we fight as a people to continue to survive. We are constantly in a mix of emotions dealing with specific issues. This morning I find myself in the same situation in dealing with how we survive as a people and talking about the rights that we have and about how we deal with each other as a people within the province of Ontario and knowing what those impacts mean to us in terms of our lifestyles.

As you may be aware, we have just been handed a decision this morning by the Supreme Court of Canada dealing with the Bear Island situation. The response is not a positive one in the least for the aboriginal people in Ontario.

Right now we are talking in terms of finances and economics. I think this is at the heart of the problems that we face in dealing with all of these matters. I know people are concerned about the high deficit of government and about the rate of unemployment in Ontario, and people are concerned that there is not enough money being allocated to specific areas of programs for certain interest groups.

We look at those things and we think that if our unemployment was only 10%, we would be happy. We are consistently having to deal with unemployment that runs at, right now, the current rate of 61%. We experience that in terms of seasonal work. When we are talking about those conditions where that seasonal work is unavailable, our unemployment figures run as high as 95%. That is something we have to deal with, and we have to understand why our unemployment runs at those kinds of levels.

I think the major issue we deal with in those particular areas is the fact that we do not have sufficient land within our midst to be able to deal with the economics that we need in order to provide for our people, nor do we have access to our own resources to be able to provide sufficient development for our people. In terms of how we deal with ourselves and what that means to us, this is found in the kind of decisions that we are faced with this morning, that we are restricted to dealing with only where we live, the province of Ontario. Right now, in terms of the figures that we derived from your own people, we currently occupy about one tenth of 1% of the land base in Ontario. As a means for economic survival for our people, it is virtually impossible.

At the same time, we know the necessity of having to survive by other means. Those other means currently have been through programs and program initiatives that have been sponsored by both the federal and provincial governments. Our dealings with those program initiatives leave us in quite a lurch as well in terms of our accessibility to those particular areas.

We find ourselves in a situation where we are trying to deal with the government of Ontario on a government-to-government basis, and yet we are disadvantaged in all the areas that we need to deal with. We are disadvantaged because we do not have the kind of human resources available to us to be able to come to the table to negotiate. We are disadvantaged because we do not have the financial resources to be able to come to the table to negotiate. We are disadvantaged because the legal system in this country decides what and how the interpretation of our treaties and of our land issues are.

We are disadvantaged in this process now because of the climate that surrounds the activities that we are involved in—from our own people. By that I mean that because of our past history and because of the surrounding society, it is very difficult for us as a people to continue to struggle with our relationship. Because of the high influx of thinking that has been brought to us by another society, those things that we have as a value do not exist. We have become subsumed under federal and provincial laws and citizenships. The only thing available to us as a means of survival is being able to utilize the programs that are available. So in terms of our capacity to be able to deal, we are limited.

The limitation is further expounded upon us as a people because that leverage for us to be able to negotiate the things we need in order to adequately deal with the situation does not exist. So I wonder how we can talk about a government-to-government relationship in this province. I wonder how those things are going to be dealt with as we move down the road. I wonder when things are going to change in terms of our existence in the very short term in dealing with programs, our accessibility.

There are many times that we come before a variety of committees to express our concerns. A lot of times we come to crunch numbers on what is actually being allocated within a provincial government budget towards aboriginal people. I do not think I come here this time to crunch numbers with anybody about what is being allocated under a budget. I come here to talk about what we need, what is at the heart of the issue for our survival. Only when we begin to talk about lands and resources and resource sharing will there be any equality in our relationship as a people.

I know that right now, initiatives are being undertaken by the provincial government in trying to resolve some of these issues that are outstanding, and I recognize that those things will not change overnight. But I guess it is difficult—I do not guess; I know it is difficult—to come here today to talk about changing the system. I know it is very, very difficult to understand where things go from this point.

I know clearly in my own mind that the status quo is changing somewhat in Ontario, and I guess that changing status quo still has to be fuelled somehow. It still has to be fuelled in terms of human resources by our own, and somehow or other we are going to need the capacity to be able to finance those human resources in order to continue the struggles that we have. So I can sympathize with the fact that this government does have a deficit that it has to deal with, because we know what those deficits are every day in our lives. And I know that initiatives are there to try to make some changes.

That is all I can say at this particular time. I think we can better spend our time in a dialogue discussing what kind of changes we think are possible, where we think we can meet some of the objectives that we have, and what those mean in terms of a government and the kinds of relationships that are being expounded at this particular time in relation to your financial status.

Mr Chairman, that is the end of my remarks this morning.

The Chair: Okay, Mr Peters. We go on to the government. Mr Christopherson.

Mr Christopherson: I thank you very much, Mr Peters, for your presentation. I apologize for missing the beginning; I was attending to another matter.

I certainly heard the last half of your presentation, and I think, just from the quiet in the room and the complete attention that you had of everyone here, that it underscores the importance to us of the issues you raise. I do not profess to have any of the quick answers that you acknowledge you do not have. I do not think anyone does. But I would like as a member of the government to express to you personally that the initiatives and the desire of the Premier of this province are supported by each and every member of our caucus. The desire to reach out and find those solutions is heartfelt and sincere. I can only truly hope that at the end of this term we will have made some of the concrete changes that you rightly deserve, as opposed to just words.

In terms of a practical question, I would ask if, to relate this to the budget directly, you mentioned some of the funding needs you have in order to talk to the government of Ontario on a government-to-government basis. Could you ask you what kinds of programs in practical terms and the dollar figure attached would you have in mind? I am not asking for a specific detailed run-down, but an example and some idea of what that might cost, a couple of the priorities that we ought to be looking at, of things that need some financial addressing.

Mr Peters: In our discussions of the past, we have had two major items on the table at this point in time. One, we have the statement of political relationships that needs the implementation process—how we move from signing the document to implementing the document that we are just beginning to deal with now. We are trying to put some cost-related figures to those. We do not have any actual costs that are related at this point, but we know that the costs will be substantial.

That is one facet of that statement of relationships. The second facet we have to acknowledge is there are a number of things in the implementation process that must be dealt with if it is going to become a reality, besides the costs that is associated with processes of negotiation.

One thing I think we will have to be cognizant of is that the same process you just went through with the rescue of Kapuskasing as a town is the same kind of thing that we are talking about as a rescue of our people and the same kind of economic conditions that we are surrounded with. What it may mean is buyouts, and areas that we are talking about are fishing licences, for example. It may mean buyouts in terms of places where you have your timber permits, those particular areas. It may mean buyouts of lands that we are going to have to deal with and it may mean in some ways those costs will be borne by the federal government in terms of the costing of market value of lands in relation to land settlements. It is difficult to put a figure to those.

If you look at the kind of work that is being done right now, there were somewhere in the neighbourhood of 68 claims that were filed against the provincial government in the past. Those 68 claims people filed simply as a method of starting the ball rolling. A lot of people would not file under the existing terms of the, federally, specific claims policy, and they would not file in Ontario because there was no claims policy in Ontario at all. There was an ad hoc policy that existed under previous governments, so that the people would not apply. But in terms of the process that are looking at as a beginning point, I think only one m has been resolved. There are a number in the works, there is only one claim in the history of the Ontario ernment that has been solved with aboriginal people in province. If we are going to look at resolving some of se in short order, there is going to be an associated cost h that.

But something that we put on the table constantly is t there might be some areas of compensation that have e paid in dealing with those lands. But we are looking land enhancement, and that is something that the pro- cial government can bear in mind as we enter these cussions, that our preference would be to have our lands rned to us, as opposed to being compensated for those ds, so we would have access again to an enhanced land e in some particular areas.

As well, I think we are going to have to start dealing h, under that statement, not only some of those policy as and dealing with those particular areas, but we are ng to have to begin to come to terms with such things he 1924 lands arrangement that is here, and as well, the 36 legislation that provides for an ability to negotiate. ain, we are dealing with the whole underlying question ownership of lands, whether, in fact, there is ownership lands in this province of Ontario by aboriginal people.

Mrs Sullivan: Thank you very much, Chief Peters, I ow it is a difficult day for you to be coming before us in s kind of interview/discussion situation, but I wanted to k about some of the issues relating to economic devel- ment. You have talked about some of the areas where u feel the capacity of people from the first nations is ited, one of them being on the economic and financial le, the other being on the human resources side.

I am interested in knowing what areas you specifically e through your own leadership as being the areas of the eatest potential for economic development, and the kinds initiatives that could be taken by your people them- ives to reach some of the goals that would be set, and ere the government must take initiatives to work with u, whether it is a monetary or other kind of initiative.

I would also like your comments on the activities of e native business council, which I gather is a kind of onomic development co-op, and if that kind of initiative ould fit into some of your economic development priorities.

Mr Peters: It is a lot of questions. In terms of our uman resources at this point, I guess one of the things we ed to define is how we deal with each other as a people, d that is not trying to evade the issue. I am saying that e have human resources, but they are not recognized as uman resources to the extent that you have human re- sources, and for us to be able to start discussing those ings, we need to be able to come to some arrangement as how those things work.

I will give you an example. Some of the areas that we al with, for example, fishing, as an economic endeavour at we undertake: All of our people who live on the land nderstand fishing as a resource. They understand the stock; they understand the waters; they understand all of the things that are necessary, that surround the ecosystems of being able to fish, but they are not recognized in any capacity.

When we come to the table to talk about whether those areas can sustain fishing and what kind of levels, we hit head-on with the biologists and with every other person who has degrees in being able to determine whether we can fish in those waters. For the most part, those people come to study those waters, and they do not live with them; they do not function with them, and so our human resources do not interconnect, first of all. So because we have to come to the table under your rules and under your procedure, we lack those human resources. We do not have those kinds of biologists and all those kinds of people to meet your criteria of how we should negotiate.

Yes, we do need those human resources, but we also need to come to terms on our resources and what value our resources have, and that is something I mentioned before. Our value is not recognized, or what we contribute in terms of our own human resources to this end product that we need.

We need to be involved in a lot of those areas, but one of the things that our people have said very clearly to us is that we want to be involved in issues that do not take away from our responsibility to the land. In other words, we are saying, yes, we can be involved in some areas where we are talking about a small hydro development, as an area in the waters that surround our communities. As long as it is a renewable resource that does not damage the environ- ment, yes, we can talk about that kind of development, and some of that development goes on within our communities at this particular time.

But, again, to deal with that same kind of process, we need resources, human resources, to be able to do that. The human resource question is a major one for us because every time we get involved in the discussions the first thing we come back to is the legal understanding, whether we have that capacity to enter those economic fields. We are brought back again to a system where we have to bring back in human resources, and those human resources are lawyers.

The Chair: You have one minute. Do you have an- other question?

Mr Phillips: Chief Peters, in your opening comments you said the finance and economics were at the heart of the issue. I have kind of a feeling that maybe there is an even bigger issue, which is just an understanding of the heritage of the first nations and that sort of thing. I wonder whether you feel there is an understanding of your issues by gov- ernments and whether that is an important issue, as I hy- pothesize it might be.

Mr Peters: There is an attempt to understand, but I do not believe there is any understanding. I think the answer I gave to Barbara Sullivan is one where you see the discrep- ancies in understanding about the human resources we have that we can bring to the table to deal with. I think the misunderstanding we have is that the whole system we evolved from, our responsibilities we have as a people to ensure our protection, none of the things we currently attempt to deal with are we able to deal with. If we could maintain a very strong political dialogue between us, we may come to an understanding that there is a need for those separate systems we are talking about.

Right now there is an understanding that there is a difference, but there is no acknowledgement of what that difference is. It is simply put that there is a difference in terms of us as a people, saying, "Yes, we can understand you were here before we got here and, yes, your rights flow not from our Constitution or our legislation but from the Creator". But what does that mean and how does that get translated in terms of our differences so that we are able to live together and those things can be respected?

Mr McLean: Chief Peters, I enjoyed your comments this morning. The issues you touched on certainly enlightened most of the people here with regard to some of the statements you have made and the values you indicate will not exist if things are not done. I guess when you speak about the buyout of the fishing rights, the timber rights and the land rights—68 claims filed against the government—there is certainly a lot to be done to right some wrongs. But the one issue I want to talk about is the leverage to negotiate you indicate does not exist. Is there not some type of funding you require to do your negotiating available through the federal government?

Mr Peters: When I talk about the leverage not existing, there are dollars that we do receive from the federal government for negotiation purposes. But what I am talking about, a leverage to negotiate, comes back to some of the questions being asked by Barbara Sullivan and Gerry Phillips in regard to whether people understand what we are dealing with and how do these things relate.

When I am talking about leverage, what is the leverage you have when you are able to negotiate? You have the leverage of the power of the House, of being able to pass laws. You have the courts as a vehicle to deal with. You have the enforcement mechanism of the provincial police. You have the enforcement mechanism of your MNR officers, and as we saw and experienced last summer you are also a part of the Dominion of Canada which has the right to call in the army to resolve issues.

When I am talking about leverage, what leverage do I have as an aboriginal person in this country to be able to bring you to the table to have you resolve issues? If you do not want to resolve issues, what leverage is there for me to force you to do that? I am saying we have no leverage at this time. The only leverage we have in this country right now is civil disobedience as a method of being able to bring people to the table.

As I said earlier, the other thing we have had as some kind of leverage in the past is that we saw a changing attitude of the courts in dealing with our rights, but that is not necessarily a leverage we can utilize because we know leverage takes years and years. The process of Bear Island, for example, what has it taken; 17 years to this point. That is not a leverage we can count upon. That is what I am talking about in terms of any capacity we have to get people to conclude arrangements. People are willing to come to the table, but to conclude arrangements is a different thing and that is where we lack the leverage.

Mr McLean: So the statement of a political relationship is basically a statement, but how are you going to get them to the table?

Mr Peters: It is a statement to bring people to the table. We are depending absolutely on the trust of the Ontario government, again, to conclude some of those agreements with us. At the heart of the matter we are talking about is the jurisdiction for our communities, the jurisdiction of our people, that we continue to claim has never been taken from us in any form.

Mr McLean: Have you had a chance to determine what your priority would be once you get to the table?

Mr Peters: We have our own list of things that have to be worked on. Number one is lands and resources as an outstanding issue; two is treaties; three is jurisdiction and four is protection, whether it be through the Constitution or whatever vehicle you can provide as protection. We think those things combined will be the area we need to be able to deal with effectively and to be able to see some change in that will signal a change in the status quo in Ontario that we have a direct political relationship with the government of Ontario and that there is a willingness to resolve some of the outstanding issues.

Mr McLean: How long do you think it will take before the first discussion around the table will be?

Mr Peters: I think we are into discussions now. The preliminary discussions have started and I think we are at the point right now that we are starting to look at ourselves and to understand what those priorities are that we are going to have to deal with. It is clear to us that we are not looking at 130 arrangements for 130 communities in Ontario. We are saying that if there are areas we can deal with that we can break through on, particularly in the area of jurisdiction, those will become a priority. We will focus on those and we will deal with those.

Mr McLean: I appreciate your comments very much.

The Chair: I would like to thank you, Mr Peters, for coming before this committee. It has been very informative.

Mr Peters: Thank you for the opportunity. I say again, our struggle is one of survival now, and I hope people are able to come to terms with the fact that survival depends a lot more to us based on ourselves as a people, as opposed to what financial resources are available to us from the governments. That is a positive step we can both look forward to in the future. Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you for attending. Okay, we are going to be recessed until 1:30.

The committee recessed at 1214.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1334.

ONTARIO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Chair: Would the Ontario Chamber of Commerce come forward, please. We will resume our hearings on the budget review. I would like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. Before you start, would you identify yourself for the purposes of the record? You have one half-hour, and at the end of your presentation, within that one-half hour period, try to leave time for questions from the three parties, and it will be going off with the Liberals on the first set of questions.

Mrs Matthews: My name is Linda Matthews. I am a member of the board of the Ontario Chamber of Commerce, and with me today is Mr Don Eastman, who chairs the economic policy committee. Once again, we would like to thank you for having the opportunity to meet with the committee this afternoon.

The Ontario Chamber of Commerce represents, as I believe most of the people here know, 65,000 businesses in the province through 165 local chambers of commerce and boards of trade, and our membership encompasses both the small entrepreneur and the large multinational corporation throughout this province.

I believe it will come as no surprise to this group to learn that the business community has been apprehensive of this government. We have a very deep concern that the government's intentions, without a fundamental appreciation of how the market economy works, will result in lower standards of living for all of us.

The Ontario chamber approached the budget process with a number of basic questions: Does the government understand that we live in a market-driven economy? Does it understand that it is the market-based side of the economy that generates the wealth that makes quality social programs possible? Does it understand that because this province's economy is based on manufacturing and services, it is far more mobile and therefore more fragile than resource-based economies of most of the other provinces in this country? Does it understand that the province's economic success depends critically on business believing that this is a good place to do business? Is the government prepared to work towards developing a meaningful consultation process on the budget?

We were not able to find a positive answer to any of these questions in the April budget. Perhaps today we can make a start at finding at least one positive response.

I would like to ask Mr Eastman to carry on with our presentation with respect to some of our specific concerns.

Mr Eastman: Very early in his budget, the Treasurer spoke about ensuring that the costs of adjustment are shared fairly. He then presented a budget that placed all of the burden on the market economy while those in the public sector shared none of the pain.

This government was faced with a very difficult budget environment. It walked into a severe economic recession that was not of its creation. It also faced a situation where the business community's confidence in this province was already low as a result of a series of costly legislative initiatives, tax increases and new taxes at both the federal and provincial levels.

When we talked to the Treasurer in advance of the budget, we identified two major challenges for him: The first was to reduce the inflationary pressures in the province and help permit a sustainable economic growth and the employment opportunities generated, and second, to restore business confidence that Ontario is a good place to be in business. We did not, under the circumstances, call for a balanced budget.

In a recession, the government's social spending responsibilities increase at the same time that revenue shrinks. Balancing the budget would have required a damaging increase in taxes and a tragic cutback in social services. The circumstances did call for a large deficit. A good budget would have had a smaller deficit, but it still would have set a provincial record. That record should have been financed from the surpluses generated during the previous good years. Unfortunately, during the good period, we continued to add to our debt.

With the current budget, the deficit we get is not large; it is immense. We see no meaningful restraint in other areas to help free up the funds needed to alleviate recession-driven social hardship. We did not see priorities set and choices made consistent with the economic difficulties that we face. For example, we note that in other recent provincial budgets there were plans to curtail public sector wage settlements.

One of the major messages that we tried to convey to the Treasurer was an understanding of the factors that lay behind this recession. Inflation has played a major role in the process, and much of that inflation arose with the provincial government. The provincial government has added to inflation with new and increased taxes that show up in higher prices for goods and services; it has added to inflation by increasing business costs; and it has added to inflation with relatively generous, high-profile settlements in the public sector.

Sustainable economic prosperity demands more government attention to how it impacts on costs and inflation. Those concerns were not reflected in this budget. Ontario has both deepened and lengthened the recession by aggravating the inflation problems that the recession should have cured. Recovery will be weaker and will not generate the number and quality of jobs that we would normally have expected.

The budget relies on the damaging myth that government spending creates jobs. If that were really true, given the federal deficit, where did this recession come from? Spending your way to prosperity does not work. If it did, we would not in this country have seen any recession. No government can continue to spend more than its taxpayers can afford. The lesson from the federal experience is that persistent large deficits result in a socially and economically depressing combination of higher taxes and reduced government services.

One of the additions in the budget was the addition of a three-year fiscal plan, and we welcome that. However, that addition is only useful if it becomes an active planning tool. There is minimal action on the deficit over the three-year fiscal plan. Deficits are projected of $8.9 billion in 1992-93, $8.4 billion in 1993-94 and $7.8 billion in 1994-95. For us, those deficit projections are even more disturbing than the size of the current $9.7-billion deficit, and we are not even sure about the $9.7 billion.

One of the major problems that we have with this and with previous budgets is our concern that we are not getting the full story on the government's financial position. For various reasons, the province does not use normal business accounting practices, but provides its accounts on a cash basis. On this basis, it is irrelevant when you get the bill; the only thing that counts is when you pay it. "Gee, honey, we've got a surplus this month. I didn't bother paying the mortgage." This cash approach provides a lot of room for window-dressing budgets by pre-paying or delaying bill paying. It also leaves some very major unfunded liabilities, such as pension obligations and Workers' Compensation Board shortfalls, out of the budget process.

The other major problem in looking at the budget numbers is the split between operating and capital expenditure. The concept is good, but unless it is done properly, it is terribly misleading.

The budget presents the capital expenditure numbers as though they represent a net increase in the province's capital assets. The implication that we are encouraged to read into the numbers is that it is only the operating deficit that we need to worry about. It invites the misinterpretation that if we actually did manage to have an operating surplus, we would be increasing our assets, and our children's assets, more rapidly than our debts. That is not true.

This particular presentation of operating and capital expenditure pretends that there is no obsolescence or deterioration of the existing capital stock. You count the bright new bridge, but forget that it simply replaces the one that fell in the water. Without the concept of depreciation, there is no way of knowing whether capital spending is even keeping pace with deterioration and obsolescence, let alone exceeding it. Until the government is willing to develop a meaningful measure of depreciation for its capital assets, it is irresponsible to present operating and capital numbers in this fashion.

The net result of the accounting practices is that we really do not know what the real budget deficit is. We suspect that it is probably larger than the $9.7 billion that is indicated. It is even possible it might be less. We simply cannot tell, based on the information available to us, and neither can you.

Mrs Matthews: Overall, this budget reinforces our concerns about the economic environment for business in this province and its long-term future, and aggravates the deterioration in business confidence that was unfortunately under way. This budget and its accompanying future fiscal plan are bad news for this province's taxpayers. Government deficits are merely a promise of future tax increases.

In his concluding remarks, the Treasurer wrote about finding a new consensus for the future. He went on to indicate that Ontario is prepared to play a constructive and positive role in this endeavour. We believe that consensus is desperately needed. I would like to read the quote we have included in our presentation as well because I believe it says it best:

"You cannot bring about prosperity by discouraging thrift. You cannot strengthen the weak by weakening the strong. You cannot help the wage earner by pulling down the wage payer. You cannot help the poor by destroying the rich. You cannot establish sound security on borrowed money. You cannot keep out of trouble by spending more than you earn. You cannot build character and courage by taking away man's initiative and independence. You cannot help men permanently by doing for them what they could and should do for themselves." Compliments of Abraham Lincoln.

Our recommendations are addressed to the development of future budgets. To foster a healthy economy, it is necessary to maintain business confidence in this province. To that end, we recommend:

1. Maintain a stable and predictable tax environment which in part could be achieved by finding more ways of opening up the pre-budget dialogue.

2. Refrain from taxes that penalize job creation; where personal income taxes approach 50% marginal rates, they do become counterproductive because of their negative impact on the incentive system.

3. Ensure that public sector wage settlements are responsive to the anti-inflationary pressures that the private sector is subjected to; the current environment called for substantial restraint.

4. Do not undertake costly and unnecessary new programs. I certainly bring to your attention the rally that occurred at city hall today where 4,000 insurance industry employees were rallying against a government takeover of automobile insurance.

5. Provide the public with the province's full financial picture. Showing capital expenditures in the context of depreciation figures would assist.

That ends the formal part of our presentation. We are ready for questions.

Mr Kwinter: Thank you for your presentation. I am really pleased with your comment at the top of page 5, because I think it is important that it is put into the record and that everybody understands exactly that problem. A budget is a road map of where the government thinks it is going. Whether it is right or not no one will really know until the end of that road.

It is interesting when you say "by pre-paying or delaying bill-paying." In this budget there was a common feeling among economists that the magic figure for the New Democratic government was $10 billion. No matter what deficit they brought in, they were going to be in trouble, but if it went over $10 billion they would really be in trouble. That was sort of the brick wall that would bring body's wrath down, not just 90% of the community's.

As a result, you suddenly see on page 48 in the budget they discharged the Urban Transportation Development Corp loan guarantee. No one was asking them to do it had to become due in this next fiscal period. They had $407 million. No one asked them; no one said they had to do it; they decided to do it. They decided to write it off. Stadium Corp, the dome. Nobody was pushing them to do it. But they knew it was an obligation they would have to carry forward next year and that it would show up in the budget, so they wrote that down. They made a special payment to the teachers' pension fund that they would have had to make anyway, and they wound up by attributing $925 million to last year's budget. The main reason for this was strictly political. First of all, they thought they had got away with blaming it on the previous government; and second, if they did not include it in the budget, the total would not go over the $10 billion, and that is the problem we have.

The budget allows for any kind of manipulating the economists in the Treasury department can come up with to put the best face they can on this, but this is what I think we have to do. You make a comment but you do not elaborate. You say the $9.7 billion is bad enough, but even worse are the other projections of the three years coming. Could you just explain why you consider that to be worse than the $9.7 billion?

Mrs Matthews: Just from its cumulative impact, we are now looking at doubling the debt of the province in the space of four years. As we explained in our presentation, what that is going to do is further exacerbate business in being able to compete in this province. It is going to have a very bad impact on the business community from the standpoint of recognizing that future tax increases are the way we are going to be able to pay for that debt.

Mr Phillips: I really appreciate the chamber's brief. I said to many groups, the problem we are having here is that the groups are coming forward and it is almost like predicting the weather a year from now. One group says it is a great budget and another group says it is a terrible budget. The reality is that if it is lacking in something, and I certainly think it is, it is in the economic creation. Our country is deadily worried about the future economic growth of the province and, as you rightly point out, the deficit is going on for ever with the $7 to $8 billion we think is going to inhibit growth.

I really do appreciate your comments on the operating and the capital thing. I am of the opinion that the Treasurer will try to say next year, "We have a deficit of $4.5 billion," when they will be spending $5 billion, just like depreciation. If this were a business, you would show a depreciation cost of $5 billion every single year. I appreciate very much the chamber's position on this. I urge you to stick to it because I think the budget next year will trumpet a $4.5-billion deficit, but we will spend $5 billion on capital every single year and maybe only show $200 million worth of costs. I think that is part of your window dressing on the budget.

I understand the recovery is well under way now; at least as I read the papers it is well under way. In terms of the kind of future investment in Ontario and what we are seeing from the chamber, are you seeing in your chamber members, if there are any, who may have been thinking of leaving the province? Are they reconsidering now? Are you starting to see that turnaround and therefore the light we are reading in the paper now?

Mrs Matthews: I think perhaps that is a two-pronged question: One relates to recovery from the recession; the other relates to business confidence in the province. I agree. I think the signs are there that the recession is abating and that we are coming out of it. I am not convinced that business confidence has been restored in the province of Ontario.

Unfortunately our members are still talking about some of their clients who have withdrawn capital from the province, some of their clients who are leaving the province and some of their clients who are not making the capital expenditure decisions we would hope they are making.

Mr McLean: I have sat for three or four days now listening to presentations. Of about 30 presentations we have had, about three have dealt with the budget in the manner you have, indicating your concerns with regard to the deficit. This morning we had the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation in here. They think it is a super budget and they blame business for not paying their fair share. When I look at the empty buildings all over this province, when I talk to business people and their concern about all the deductions and all the payments they are making now—and the reason some of them are leaving is that—we are in a real problem here in Ontario. Business fears are very real. We read that in the paper. I think they are very real and the economy of this province is really in a problem. Everybody is saying business has to pay more taxes. I do not know where we are going to get off. I have not any specific questions. I appreciate your brief, but I am sitting here all week listening to these presentations. It is not a very good feeling.

Mrs Matthews: Could I make a response to the point? Certainly the business perception in this province is that Ontario's tax structure is already less competitive than that of Alberta, British Columbia, Quebec and the five bordering states. If that means business is not paying its fair share, I beg to differ.

Mr B. Murdoch: I was going to carry on with what Al was saying: With the deficit funding for the next four years, do you feel that business will be able to pay that? I do not know where else they are going to get the money. You basically answered that when you answered Al, so it is okay.

Mr Sutherland: Thank you for your presentation. I want to talk about point 5, particularly about a meaningful consultation process. It seems to me your organization was before this committee in the pre-budget hearings. I take it you also met with the Treasurer beforehand.

Mrs Matthews: Yes, we did.

Mr Sutherland: We are going to have to establish a definition of "consultation" in this province and with the government, because I do think that is a meaningful consultation process.

Mrs Matthews: Could I respond to that? We certainly have had discussions with the government about the meaning of consultation. It is not simply "meeting with." What we are trying to establish is a way, a model, and in fact we made representations on a model that did work in the past of how we could "consult with" as one of the participants—not just business and government; business and the other interested stakeholders, if you want to use that term—in a meaningful way where the input was more than just listened to and disregarded.

Mr Sutherland: You also talked about the reasons for the recession. You blamed it on government spending and talked about taxes. You must note that there are no increases in corporate taxes in this budget for this specific year. I see no mention in here of two other things: a free trade agreement which I believe your organization supported which has allowed capital to move that much more quickly to the United States; combined with what I would call a somewhat misguided policy by the Bank of Canada in terms of a high interest rate policy, that is to slow down the overheated Toronto area economy. The Bank of Canada governor has said that on several occasions.

That combination of factors has created the worst recession in over 50 years and called for the most significant adjustment in our economy in that much time. If we are going to carry out an adjustment in the economy and be in a good position to recover, I would like to know how people think we are going to do that when we cut the services people are going to rely on to get them through the toughest period in our history in 60 years.

Mrs Matthews: I guess we alluded to some of those suggestions in our presentation. We could go back over them again. I do not know whether you want to add some new material.

Mr Eastman: There are a couple of points I would like to make. The recession was well under way before this government took office. It had nothing to do with this budget; it had a lot to do with the things that happened previously to that, but they were largely related to what the governor of the Bank of Canada saw as a disturbing rise in inflation and his belief that he had to control it.

Whether that philosophy of tight monetary policy was appropriate is another topic. I personally think it was not, but in terms of his responsibility and what he was looking at, which was a dramatic increase in inflation, he had a legitimate concern. I think it is up to all of the rest of us to then have a look and try to understand where that inflation came from and if there is not some way we can help to keep it under better check than simply deciding that we have to increase unemployment. I think that is a fundamental issue and one we really need to address.

The Chair: Mr Jamison, you have one minute left.

Mr Jamison: In your public submission, you say: "The circumstances did call for a large deficit. A 'good' budget would have had a smaller deficit." You go on from there to explain vaguely your case.

We are here to talk about more specific subjects in budget: transfer payments to municipalities, which your members, and so on. Most people who have I opposed to the budget and speak about a smaller level what should that level be and where should the cuts be taken place? Have you spent any time in figuring out what types of cuts there would have had to be to achieve the level you are talking about? Obviously you talk about a smaller level. What is it and how would you get there?

Mr Eastman: We deliberately did not quote a number, and that is not a surprise. I think that first you have to look at the areas where there were actual increases, and the extent that you—

Mr Jamison: I had a reference here that you did have a smaller number in mind. You did not?

Mr Eastman: No, I am talking about increases in areas where the government spends money. I think that is the first place that you address. So you have increases in pay for increased wages for the public sector. Increases also flow through to help finance public sector wage increases at the other end of the transfer process. Do you know what I am saying? This is all occurring at the same time that we are in a recession and we have negative growth. There is actually a smaller pie.

Mr Jamison: So what you are saying—

The Chair: I am sorry, time has run out.

Mr Jamison: Just a clarification for my own understanding, because I am rather confused.

The Chair: You can talk to him out in the hallway, Mr Jamison. Time has run out. It is fair that between all the parties everybody has equal time.

Mr Jamison: You are saying that the reduction in numbers would have been—

The Chair: Mr Jamison.

Mr Jamison: —that the public service wage increase would have been an acceptable—

Mrs Matthews: I do not believe that is what we were saying.

The Chair: You can ask them out in the hallway.

Thanks for coming to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs.

PEOPLE AGAINST THE NDP BUDGET

The Chair: The next group we are to hear from is People Against the NDP Budget. Would you come forward, please? I would like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget review. You will have one half-hour. In that period of one half-hour, present your brief, and at the end of your brief save some time for questions and answers. The time will be divided equally among the three parties to ask questions. We will be starting off with the third party, over to the government and then to the Liberals. That is the order in this particular session. Would you please identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard. You can begin.

Mr McBride: My name is John McBride. I am a co-organizer and spokesman for People Against the NI udget. I am chairman of Great Lakes Minerals, which is a mining company listed on the Toronto Stock Exchange. Beside me is John Slattery. He is also a co-organizer for People Against the NDP Budget and is a pension investment marketing officer with Great-West Life. He has an economics background.

People Against the NDP Budget: We wanted to first tell you who we are and then give you a brief overview of the way we see things. We are a group of ordinary Ontarians with no political affiliation. We believe we are unique in that regard. We do not represent a special interest group. We are not here asking for money. We basically formed to provide a forum for the vast majority of Ontario voters to speak out in dissent of this government's economic policies. As you may know, we conducted a poll through Enbridge, the results of which stated that 65% of Ontario voters favour a balanced budget over the next four years. We believe we are representing the majority view.

We are people who want to remain in Canada and in the province. We conducted our first rally on May 16 because we wanted to create an opportunity for people opposing the budget to be heard.

We are speaking out for ourselves, not the organizations we work for. Although many of us are self-employed, there is more a philosophical thrust. We are people who feel that in the April 29 budget, the bottom line is fiscally irresponsible. Our goal is for the Ontario government to write the budget before it becomes law and to reduce anticipated deficits. In our assessment, this budget is shortsighted and will lead to lost jobs, lost investor confidence and a corresponding exodus of talent and business from the province.

It is not our intent to instruct the government in detail on each and every issue. For government to ask that of us would be an abdication of its inherent responsibilities. We do believe, however, that we are entitled to provide government with parameters of acceptable behaviour. One such parameter is to manage the provincial economy in a prudent and responsible manner.

A government intent on shaping society must recognize that the most effective social policy is intertwined with an industrial policy that encourages an economy to grow at its maximum non-inflationary rate. A prospering economy provides opportunities for individuals and resources for governments. The government has a role in achieving these goals; however, a government that over-regulates, burdens its producing sector with excessive taxes and is inflationary will cause economic growth to fall well short of its full potential. We believe this is a failure for society and for the individuals who comprise it.

Again, at the core of our group, we believe the following: Government's role is more that of a facilitator than a provider; a prospering economy provides an opportunity for social change; individuals should have maximum choice and freedom; social support should be effectively targeted; efforts should be directed at the cause, not the results, of problems.

I think it is important to highlight our actions to date. We have held two successful rallies at Queen's Park. We have appeared on most public-interest shows on radio and television. We have logged over 2,500 names and numbers of people who have phoned in our support. We have received over 15,000 letters from people across the province. We have participated in all committee hearings to date on the budget and in roundtable discussions set up by the NDP. We have been generally active in the public press as advocates of fiscal responsibility. We have distributed information throughout Ontario to various supporting groups, and we have served as a liaison with other groups adversely affected by the budget. We have supported other groups at various rallies and discussion groups, and we have met a host of economists and experts in finance to discuss the budget.

Again, we have conducted two polls. One indicated that two thirds of those polled strongly agree that the provincial government should balance its budgets over its term. Some 80% of participants believe the foregoing should be included on the ballots for the forthcoming municipal elections.

That is just a brief overview of who we are, what our goals are, and some of our activities to date. I will now turn it over to John Slattery, who will go into a little more depth—as I said, he has an economics background—as to the direction we see the economic policy of this government should take.

Mr Slattery: I am going to make a number of points. I have six points on the next page that we are trying to address here. All the points are consistent with our core philosophy that John articulated: that government is a facilitator, not a provider; that individuals have as much choice and freedom as possible.

We think the way in which that could be brought about is through controlled government spending resulting in a balanced budget over the term of a government. Running deficits that will burden future generations is, we think, irresponsible. We think it is unfair. We are basically ensuring a diminished lifestyle down the road for our children and grandchildren, and we think that is probably a little selfish. We think one way of achieving that is by reducing the tax burden, thereby enabling the producing sector to produce.

A great deal of emphasis is placed on the expenditure side of the budget. Probably not enough emphasis is placed on the other side of the budget, the revenue side. We believe this budget will retard the ability of the economy to produce, thereby limiting the sources available for government programs and for individuals' own expenditure. We think that will frustrate the government's programs and social change. We think it will also limit their success in said programs.

We believe job creation and skills development should be emphasized to a much greater degree. There again, that is giving individuals the skills necessary to enter the workforce, thereby enabling the producing sector to do what it does best.

We believe the tax structure is, to a certain degree, prejudicial against small business and the development of that particular sector. Small business is responsible for the lion's share of job creation over the last 10 years. We think that is an area that probably is not getting enough support through government programs.

We sincerely believe that one of the best ways to ensure social equality is through promoting non-inflationary growth. Inflation steals from people and gives to other people. It distorts asset allocation. It is negative for all concerned, meaning excessive spending. Debts rising in real terms to GDP is inflationary, and as a consequence will limit the province's ability to produce and to live a lifestyle that we would like to live.

On the government spending side, we are somewhat sympathetic, I suppose, to this year's problems. Certainly the deficit is largely a result of adverse economic conditions. The total of $9.7 billion probably is higher than it needed to be. There is probably $500 million to $2.5 billion of additional spending, but we acknowledge that limiting the deficit to $3 billion would have been very difficult and probably unrealistic. However, not uncommon to others, our concern is the size of the deficits in the next three-year period, resulting in the doubling of our outstanding debt.

Government is forecasting a period of growth, yet there is no contraction in the amount of expenditures. The government, when it talks about expenditure cutbacks, is really saying, "Well, it'll grow less quickly." We are still talking about real growth over the next three years in expenditures, and we do not think that is responsive to the economy and to the future wellbeing of the province.

Getting on the revenue side, which is the other side of the equation, we are a little concerned about what the budget tells us. There are figures of an average real growth of about 3.7% and inflation of about the same, totalling 7.4%, in nominal terms, of growth over the next period. Revenues are expected to grow at 9.8%. There is a gap there. The government also acknowledged in the budget that revenues tend to grow at a rate of 90% of the underlying economy. That makes for a differential which will have to be funded, we suspect, by taxes. In fact, the budget, I think, has an interesting quote: "Revenue moves may be required to achieve this [revenue] target." Simple translation: higher taxes.

We have a situation where we are in a recession. Taxes were raised this year, which is a little unusual in a recessionary environment. The prospect is for higher taxes in the future. Business and individuals already feel quite heavily taxed. We are at a disadvantage on a competitive basis versus our trading partners. We are not living in a vacuum or a closed economy. We have to be responsive. We have to be aware of how we can and cannot compete against our trading partners. This prospect of increasing taxes is very discouraging for all concerned.

It was certainly demonstrated in the early 1980s that an effort to try to spend yourself out of a recession—and this is certainly the federal government's effort—is very shortsighted. It is just delaying a day of pain. With the federal government's situation, almost one third of its revenues are going to interest payments. Continued deficits of this magnitude, as was talked about in this budget, will result in an increase in the share of our revenues going towards interest payments, largely to foreigners, thereby reducing the government's ability to exercise any kind of fiscal management on the economy, thereby frustrating any kind of effort the government may have in trying to direct economic growth and social change.

We think the budget was a little lax in trying to establish a tone for future deficit reductions. There were really no documents or discussions beyond the budget to make people aware that we are living beyond our means, that we are going to have to have an adjustment in our priorities. We are going to have to recognize that we cannot maintain an artificial lifestyle, as much as we may enjoy it. It is beyond our current means. We either have to produce more in order to justify our expenditures or we have to reduce our expenditures. You cannot really have it both ways. What we fear about this budget is, it is going to end up increasing the expenditures and retarding the productivity side of the equation, further distorting future policy.

I talked about the importance of small business and I think this really needs to be emphasized. The current structure is somewhat prejudicial against small business, more and more taxes are being collected through payroll means. That is putting a disproportionate strain on small business. We would like to see greater effort made at stimulating that kind of activity.

Fiscal and monetary policy—and of course, this is an interesting one. Everyone is blaming everybody else for high interest rates, inflation, GST, whatever you have. We would like to see a concerted effort between every level of government to bring down inflation, thereby enabling interest rates to come down. One of the ways, of course, is to spend less than you are earning. We believe that this budget, with its high deficit load, will be inflationary. Debt is going to rise to the share of GDP and that is going to increase rates in real terms. We are going to have higher inflation and higher real interest rates than we would have otherwise, and that is going to be painful to business and the consumer alike. It is positive for nobody, other than the foreign lender of funds to this province.

We talked about productivity, and I think that has been sort of bantered around somewhat excessively—productivity, competitive edge. Many of the people of our organizations are spending a great deal of energy trying to improve their own competitive structure within their own activities and at whatever level of business they happen to be at. Increasing the competitive edge, as it were, does not necessarily necessitate a reduction in labour wages. Wages for labour is a major input in the cost of production, but it certainly is not the only one. Other major costs which the government does have direct control over, of course, are taxes and the cost of capital. We think a concerted effort made by every level of government to bring down these two components of production cost will enable business to grow, will enable the pie to be shared in a more effective manner, will do more to make the plight of the poor and unemployed more enjoyable. They will be in a position to enter the job market.

In conclusion, we are concerned about the future. We recognize the government has some difficult situation, that it inherited an economy that was somewhat burdened by debt already, that had social structures in place that re raising costs beyond any control it had. We are concerned that there is no long-term recognition of the structural changes that are ongoing in the economy at the moment, that little to no effort is made to address these. It seems to be spending as if we are just enjoying the 1970s when things were tremendous for us. They are not. We are in a different world today and I think we have to recognize that. I think policy has to be designed accordingly to that reality. That concludes our formal presentation.

The Chair: Mr McLean, about four minutes.

Mr McLean: I appreciate your input into the deliberations we are having on the budget. Of about 30-some, you are about the fourth who has given us a full review of what the deficit is going to mean in about four years' time. Tax freedom day is about August 5. With doubling the budget, do you have any idea when tax freedom day would be in four years' time?

Mr Slattery: Further down the road, of course. I suppose you have to make an assumption of interest rates and a variety of other factors. Certainly it will not be less. I think that is a given.

Mr McLean: Do you have any members in northern Ontario, in Thunder Bay, Sault Ste Marie or Sudbury?

Mr McBride: Our core group is made up of about the same people here, but there is an effort in Sudbury that was organized during the summer. I went up to visit with some people up there who support us. I have had telephone conversations with supporters from Thunder Bay and many other areas across the province. I am not sure what the last count of letters is, but well over 10,000 letters have come from across the province and certainly a lot of them are from those areas. We are not a well-funded group, so it is not like we can go to a lot of these outlying areas and mobilize.

Mr McLean: The chamber in three of the areas we were at were the only ones that gave much of an indication of how you have with regard to the business aspect. This morning we had the OSSTF here praising the budget and how great it is and saying that perhaps they should have spent more money.

Mr McBride: I actually noticed when I looked at the list of those who requested to appear and those who are appearing, it is somewhat of a forgiving group that is smattered with a dose of people like ourselves, but I am not surprised.

Mr McLean: We got that from northern Ontario quite a bit. We even had spouses of NDP candidates telling us how good the budget was, so I would not really have expected much else from that type of indication. I really do not have any other questions for you at this time.

Mr McBride: It would be helpful for me to know, not being that politically astute or aligned, what parties you people are—

Mr Christopherson: Since my microphone is on— You will know at the end of it, I can assure you.

Mr McBride: We can guess from your comments.

Mr Christopherson: Up to the middle here on this side is the government. My two colleagues who just asked the questions are PC and our three friends on the other side are the Liberal Party.

Thank you, gentlemen, for an interesting, well-presented point of view, one I do not, obviously, entirely agree with. However, you have obviously done your homework and you have brought forward a sincere concern you have and I respect that and appreciate you participating in these hearings.

A couple of things I would like to mention and then a direct question. One is that it is interesting, when one talks about tax increases, that this government's first piece of legislation was not to stack the GST on top of the provincial sales tax in the middle of a recession, keeping $500 million in the pockets of consumers. That was our first measure, and I just think that needs to be stated.

I will move on to an acknowledgement that in the paper yesterday there were reports that Mulroney's federal Tories, who are sort of juxtapositioned as the alternative to what we have done and are supposedly the fiscally responsible party in the political sphere, their projected deficit of $30 billion may now be miscalculated to the point where their miscalculation is greater than our entire deficit. They are projecting a possible $40-billion deficit, as opposed to $30 billion projected, over ours, which is $9.7 billion—

Interjection.

Mr Christopherson: Let me get my thing out and then you can respond, sir, and I hope you will.

I just think it needs to be pointed out that no one has a corner on sanctimony, nobody has a corner on fiscal responsibility, and I think we ought to be looking at that. Bear in mind that this economy is 40% of the Canadian economy, so there is a relevance there.

I would like to talk about a statement that one of you made, and I am sorry, I cannot remember which one, that there is this perception that people feel the government takes the approach that we are spending beyond our means, and that we need to recognize we are in a different world, not the spending 1970s.

There are some economists who are supporting what we have done. One of them has said that it is not so much the dollar deficit value that matters in a province but rather the ability of a province to pay it, and when it is only 12% of all the revenues collected to pay the debt, we are maintaining, and are supported by a number of economists, that it is not unreasonable for us during a time of recession to support that kind of debt payment.

My question to you is, when we talked about living beyond—

Mr McBride: I am sorry. Who is the economist you were referring to?

Mr Christopherson: Oh, I do not have the name. I can get you the name. We can get it, probably before you leave here.

My question is directly to you. If we are living beyond our means and you really believe we should not have spent the money we did and we should cut back, what would you say to the disabled in Ontario who have always felt that they lived in a different world? They were not getting support when there were boom times; to be told they cannot have them in recessionary times is very difficult for them to accept, many of them living below poverty level. What would you say to families that need housing; construction workers who came here this morning and said that if it were not for the measures in this budget, the $700-million anti-recession invested in capital projects which will return something to society, a lot of their members would have been out of work; to municipalities who, if we flatlined as the previous government did in good times, would be passing on higher property taxes to small business, which you are as concerned about as we are; to boards of education which would be in the same circumstances? What would you tell all those people, in the context that this debt is at least arguably manageable, who are in need and who look to the provincial government to be there?

Mr Slattery: Before I address those point by point, I am curious. For example, your case of the handicapped: when they were making their presentation to you and were asking for more money for a variety of reasons—and I think they are legitimate—did you ask them where they thought the money would come from?

The Chair: Excuse me, but we are running out of time here. I would appreciate if you wound up.

Mr Slattery: Certainly I think it is a little unfair to place that responsibility on us.

Mr Christopherson: But we have that responsibility and we think it is unfair to ignore that. I am sorry, Mr Chair.

Mr Phillips: He did not say to cut the spending.

Mr Slattery: I did not say that. I did not say to cut the spending. I was wondering whether you asked those people who were requesting additional funds where they thought those funds were going to come from. I suspect not. So you are putting that burden on us, and not necessarily asking other people to make that allocation choice.

Mr Sutherland: You mentioned your Environics poll and you said that 65% wanted a balanced budget by four years. Did you also ask the question, would they want a balanced budget in four years if it meant a drastic cutback in social services? Because I think that is the crux of the issue. People say they oppose a deficit, but they also want the services.

Mr McBride: Listen, there is no question that everyone says, "Well, yes, we'd love a balanced budget," and then when everyone says, "Well, we're going to cut you and cut you," everyone starts to backpedal a bit. But the whole point is that someone has to make these tough decisions and you are not making them.

Mr Kwinter: I have three observations I would like to get your comment on. One borders on the last question. The NDP claims that most people, and we have certainly seen it in our travels in the north, are supporting this budget. They say, "The people who've been appearing before us all support the budget." If you take a look at who they are, you can tell before they even say anything where they are going to be. Your poll shows something different, and I would like to get your comment on that.

Second, we have had many people who are supporting the budget claim that business and the wealthy are not paying enough and that they should be paying more. I would like your comments on that.

Mr McBride: Well, that is misguided.

Mr Kwinter: Finally, I would like your comment where in the very first line you say your goal is to rebalance the budget. What do you think your chances are?

Mr McBride: I will just address the goal. All you can do is give it your best shot. It is not law yet. We have been keep hammering away, we have to keep showing up on these things, we have to keep in front of the press, we have to harness that support that is out there, just keep hammering away at them.

The poll suggests, and the less scientific demonstration of that is these letters that we are receiving from across the province, thousands of letters, that we touched a raw nerve. People out there are upset. All we can do is try to appeal to the government to adhere to what the majority of Ontarians are telling them.

We are hoping that as a result of the backlash that they receive they will be more responsible in years 2, 3 and 4. So we think there is an opportunity for them to rewrite. We do not necessarily have great hopes for this year, but for the future years. All you can do is give it your best shot. Keep hammering away, try to effect damage control. At the very least, make people aware so that they do not get in again.

Mr Slattery: I enjoy the concept that business and the rich should pay more. It has in it the idea, "I shouldn't pay more, it should be somebody else, somebody else's responsibility." "We need prisons, but not in my back yard, somebody else's." Dumps—the same sort of thing: everyone else is going to have to carry the load for this individual. Unfortunately, that is not the reality. It is a collective cause we are supposed to be working towards.

In that whole idea that business should pay, the problem seems to be a belief that business is some third party that is unrelated to the population at large. People invest in business. It is people who own business. It is people who are employed at business. Business is just made up of a collection of people. I do not really think that you should be discouraging your producing sector with excessive taxes because if it cannot produce competitively, it will not be producing. That means those people who invested will lose money, those people who had jobs will no longer have jobs, and they will have much less.

So I think you should be encouraging your producing sector to produce, not disadvantaging it with heavy tax burdens. Ontario is already one of the most taxed jurisdictions in North America. To further burden them with taxes, you further reduce their ability to maintain wages and do those other things. I would rather see production less burdened and maybe more taxes collected in a fairer, user charge kind of manner.

Mr McBride: I just wanted to address that quickly.

The Chair: I am just going to give them one more minute for a quick question.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate many of the comments and do not necessarily totally agree with all of them, but I think present a good view and I would agree with you that there is at least $10 billion worth of new taxes built in here in order to hit numbers of $8-billion to $9-billion deficits. I think you are right in those respects. I think you have based on the next three years as a big problem.

One way I think the government is going to try and solve the deficit is with the capital account fund—I do not know whether your group has had a chance to look at it or not—but essentially put all that into debt. If you are serious, you have $5 billion worth a year of what I would call depreciation. They are going to hide all that in the next year they are going to say, "The deficit is $5 billion." Have you had a chance to look at the capital account?

Mr Slattery: We have looked at it and we tend to agree with you, but whenever you are looking at government documents it really is a frustrating process because we are never certain as to what the numbers are really saying to you. They all add up and that looks pretty sharp, but what is the meaning behind the numbers? Because of the process, because of the secrecy, because of the way they do their accounting on a cost basis, there are all sorts of possibilities for some smoke and mirrors involved.

Mr Phillips: I would welcome your comments on this.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for appearing before the committee. Have a good day.

The group that was coming on at 2:30 was unable to appear, so the next group, which will be the Ontario Nurses' Association, will be coming on at 3 o'clock. This committee will recess for 25 minutes.

The committee recessed at 1433.

ONTARIO NURSES' ASSOCIATION

The Chair: We will call on the Ontario Nurses' Association. I would like to welcome you here to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget review. You will have half an hour for your presentation. In that half an hour, try to save some time for a question and answer period which will be divided equally among the three parties. Would you please identify yourself for the record and you can begin.

Ms O'Neill: Good afternoon. My name is Shelley O'Neill and I am a registered nurse employed at Women's College Hospital. I am the president of Local 80 of the Ontario Nurses' Association for Women's College Hospital. The Ontario Nurses' Association has established a legislative committee and I represent Toronto.

I am here today to discuss my views of the current budget. I intend to show you documentation which will demonstrate clearly that nurses in this province were on the leading edge of cutting health care costs. When Michel Wilson brought down his federal budget, he prided himself on saving $5 billion because of his reduced transfers to the provinces. This strategy of divide and conquer and putting the responsibility on to the provinces is at its finest. The federal government gets off the hook for fiscal mismanagement and the province is left holding the bag. On closer examination, there are no savings to the people of this province. Five billion dollars of our current debt is directly related to a decrease in revenues—you cannot collect income tax when 250,000 people are out of work—and federal savings as they cut back dollars from health care, education and social assistance.

In Ontario, the health care budget consumes one third of the total provincial budget. So when the media and opposition parties demand that we cut government spending, are you saying to the 55,000 nurses that once again we should have been patient, that it is a recession and we should be grateful that we even have a job? Nurses heard this song and dance back in the early 1980s. My compliments to the current government for recognizing my worth.

There are no stories about a nursing shortage now, and in fact there never was a shortage—only a shortage of nurses working. When the Ontario Hospital Association comes up with 103 ways to improve my work life, you know something is dreadfully wrong.

My expertise is health and I have brought a 1977 newsletter that the Ontario Nurses' Association produced in response to the government's determination to introduce a constraint program. The Minister of Health was Dennis Timbrell. He now heads the Ontario Hospital Association. He did not listen to the nurses in the province in 1977, so I doubt that relations with the OHA are going to improve in the near future.

When you look at the recommendations, it will be déjà vu for some of you. For some, it will be in a speech you read last week, and free of charge to those of you who wish to use it in upcoming speeches. I had considered selling these recommendations to the Honourable Mr Bouchard for a nominal fee. You have a copy of the recommendations in the brief that I gave you and I just want you to look at a few of them.

In 1977, we recommended funding for a nurse practitioner. It is well documented that nurses can do 60% of what a doctor does. According to the College of Nurses of Ontario, we do not have a nurse practitioner program. We recommended increased funding of the home care program and establishing long-term home care programs throughout the province. That was in 1977, and we seem to be close to implementing some of that now. We recommended that the government commission and finance a comprehensive study into manpower and productivity in nursing services. I believe the ministry is now planning to establish a health planning/resource planning agency. We also recommended that we look at communities managing their own health care and that we look closely at Quebec and the way it does it. Quebec has decentralized its health care system by making 11 regional authorities and 160 community health and social services centres. I caution you not to have another layer of bureaucracy.

In conclusion, it said that we should be a part of the planning process. In 1989, regulation 581/88 was introduced whereby nurses were to be involved in hospital planning. It is now 1991. The success is moderate, but I would not say completely successful.

There is something very wrong when constraints are brought in and costs still keep rising. I would suggest that a public inquiry be done into hospital spending and, failing that, the Provincial Auditor should have greater access to how hospitals spend their money. For example, in a March 1986 article in Hospital News, Vickery Stoughton said that the merging of the Toronto Western Hospital and the Toronto General Hospital would save approximately $10 million: "We know this merger can save both institutions money. That money can be redirected to the programs doctors want for the patients they serve."

The operation budget in 1986 was $230 million, and four years later their budget is $323 million. That is an increase in spending of 50%. You do not blame this on salaries, because there were no significant wage increases in that time frame. The media have been reporting that hospitals are crying the blues and closing beds as a result of the nurses' contract. Bed closures are too easy and hospital administrators refuse to look at what is going on internally.

Do any of you remember the ad that the Ontario Nurses' Association had in the paper when it found that hospitals were paying $37.50 an hour for agency nurses? Are you aware that hospitals in Metropolitan Toronto have their own nursing agency? The company is known as Carcor Health Services Inc and it charges $28.95 a hour, but it pays the nurse only $18.40. This company is operating on taxpayers' money. There is more to this company than just a nursing agency. They purchase bulk equipment, among various other things. The concern I have now is that this company is facing financial difficulties.

Nurses worked for agencies because the salaries were slightly better. They could work shifts according to their lifestyle and could work more hours than the hospital would allow them. How many dollars did hospitals waste when all they had to do was treat their staff with respect and understanding? I would recommend that the Ministry of Health audit this company and find out exactly what is going on.

As president of a local, I can remember that a member was refused steady evenings, and then I found out the administrator was on the nursing committee of Carcor. I was not a happy camper. There is a new nursing theory out there called case management; that is, we manage patient care from start to finish. Pretty novel. The previous government gave the Toronto Hospital a $500,000 funding grant to implement this program. Their current vice-president of nursing was the consultant brought in to implement the program, and as of the end of 1990 she was still listed as the president of the Center for Case Management in the United States.

Think back to our recommendations in 1977. Nurses have always had the capability and knowledge, but hospitals have done little to recognize or build on our cost-effectiveness. This government, despite what the media have portrayed, has taken some very positive initiatives: taking away perks of judges, giving native people the right to discipline their own, the OMA agreement; looking at out-of-country health spending; and laying a timetable for social reform. The setting up of the Fair Tax Commission and the Treasury Board are long overdue. The real challenge is how to spend the public's money in the most effective way.

Does the debt make me nervous? Sure it does. Cutting government spending has not worked to cut the federal debt, so why is it assumed that it would work in Ontario?

The Chair: We will start off with the government's question from Mr Sutherland.

Mr Sutherland: I have a couple of questions. There has been a new agreement with the nurses in terms of salary, and I think the general consensus, at least I hear that it has gone a long way to rectifying some past injustices in terms of what nurses feel they should be paid.

I was wondering if you could give us some comments in terms of overall participation in the health care process in the decision-making process, in the process of planning and priorities, whether you are seeing progress in that area as well, for nurses being at the table.

Ms O'Neill: I would not say that the progress has been satisfying. I can speak from experience for Women's College Hospital where we went through a major shift in management. The management is beginning to recognize what I can do, and we are involved in committees. I know that in the States they have nursing community centres where we do a lot of things that are done in a general GP's office. I still think we are a long way off. I think it has to be legislated.

I think hospitals can service their communities far better within. When you say community-based programs, it is not airy-fairy, with all due respect. You do not say what you want to do in the community, and when I think of northern Ontario where the hospital is the hub of the community, there is nothing wrong with that hospital providing programs within its institution, and I think institutions have to change their mindsets.

Mr Sutherland: Maybe we could pick up on that. You talked about community-based health care, and it was quite interesting looking through your publication from 1977.

Ms O'Neill: You should be shocked.

Mr Sutherland: They seem to be all the same issues. This committee and governments as a whole hear a lot of ideas of how we can save money, and there seems to be a consensus that we can save lots of money in the health care system. But it is the process of getting there, because you cannot tear down the current system one day and get the new system the next. The process of getting there can be very costly in the meantime and the government's resources are limited. Do you have any thoughts on that? Do you think the process of getting to where we can save money can be done more effectively and cheaper?

Ms O'Neill: I am going to pull you back to 1977. There was an opportunity then to start the process, and it was not. You have to start somewhere and I think short-term pain is long-term gain. You have to start. When you hospitals to get funding for expanded programs, then expanded programs should spell out exactly what government or any government wants, and hospitals to comply. Give them an inch and they will take a You have to set it out clearly.

Ms M. Ward: You work in a hospital setting but I am you are fairly familiar with what is going on in the s and doctors' offices too. A woman in my riding works in a medical clinic was speaking to me a few s ago about the lack of movement towards preventive rather than treatment. Do you have any comments on yourself, that there has not been much movement to s that? It is something that she is very interested in. ou think there has been any change in emphasis towards ntive programs in the community clinics and so on?

Ms O'Neill: We are starting. I think the boards of n in the municipalities have a large role to play in that. n I say expanded programs, hospitals have to get on l the preventive. Nothing stops hospitals from doing it ell.

Ms M. Ward: It does not have to be in a clinic or that of thing. We tend to think of the hospital for the nent of serious—

Ms O'Neill: I know you do.

Ms M. Ward: That is probably the wrong mode of ght, though.

Ms O'Neill: That is what they traditionally have been. ow at Women's College Hospital and other hospitals are doing well-baby clinics, and that is preventive h care. That is just a start. So there is some role for itals and there is some role for programs in the community.

Mr Jamison: We have had a number of presenters ate that they would have liked to have seen a broad e on public service wages, including nursing. Could tell me what you would have seen as the effect of a e freeze in the nursing sector, beyond of course a lab-disruption?

Ms O'Neill: I think we would have continued to ser- Carecor and expanded its budget. I put in another bill SRT, where they were charging $37.50 an hour. So I k we would have seen their revenues expanded and I k you would have seen more nurses leave and not stay. hen what do you do? It would not have been cost-ef- ve to say to me "Five per cent, that is all you get, and have to live with that."

Mr B. Ward: As in a wage freeze.

Ms O'Neill: Yes. I would have been gone.

Mr Phillips: I was interested in ONA's feeling that of the good things that has happened is the Ontario lical Association agreement. I gather that ONA thinks is a good step forward.

Ms O'Neill: It is a start.

Mr Phillips: What elements of it particularly pleased you?

Ms O'Neill: They were back at the table. When extra ng was stopped, I think you can look at the figures and that fee-for-service costs for the Ministry of Health ut up considerably. I think you had to have the doctors back at the table, because they do control to such a large extent. So in that sense, ONA was happy that at least somebody is talking, and that is a start.

Mr Phillips: The joint management committee you support?

Ms O'Neill: Yes.

Mr Phillips: The thing you mention in your brief that does seem to be happening—and I will be interested in seeing the final numbers—is that quite a number of beds are closing around the province, many of them permanently. Maybe many of them should close. Maybe we have too many hospital beds.

Ms O'Neill: Possibly.

Mr Phillips: Does ONA have a point of view on the real impact of those bed closures?

Ms O'Neill: Not a position paper or a statement. When we talk about it at the legislative committee of ONA, it is: "Yes, maybe we do have too many beds out there. How can we use them more effectively?" I know we are starting to see a very fast turnaround in surgery beds. We are doing laparoscopic gall bladder surgery and patients are in and out in two days rather than five or six. That is an improvement. We still feel there are too many chronic care beds in acute institutions, that acute beds are being used by too many chronic care patients, and that is a concern. We support long-term care reform. It has got to get going.

Mr Phillips: So, as we see in the fall more beds closing, ONA's feeling is that is—

Ms O'Neill: I did not say it was okay. I think ONA's position is that we will be monitoring the bed closures themselves and take each situation on its own merit. The Wellesley Hospital cut back on a large deficit and did not have to close a great number of beds. Women's College came through with a deficit and did not have to close a great number of beds. Toronto East General has decided to go the route of shutting down 70 beds and that takes care of its deficit. ONA is saying, if you are going to close the beds, make sure you are doing it for the right reasons.

Mr Phillips: Is it monitoring it?

Ms O'Neill: Yes, we are watching it.

Mr Phillips: In a formal sense?

Ms O'Neill: Yes. I, as the local president, send in reports to ONA when I have notification of layoff. I have had one layoff at Women's College.

The Chair: You still have about two minutes left, Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate your thinking in terms of how we manage the health care budget, because it probably will not get any easier. I know the feeling is the feds should give more money, but frankly, the feds are broke. They are bankrupt; they have no money. It would be nice to try and get it out of them, but—

Ms O'Neill: Yes, but then Michael Wilson listed it as a saving. As much as this government has to look at how it spends its resources, so does the federal government. I do not think spending $100,000 on a speechwriter is appropriate. Everybody has to look to themselves.

Mr Phillips: Sure. I just wanted any thoughts you have for us. I realize your suggestion here is a more formal investigation of hospital spending.

Ms O'Neill: I do not know whether ONA would like to see a public inquiry into how hospitals spend their money. My personal view is I would like to see a public inquiry into Carecor.

Mr Phillips: My last question is: the nurses were supposed to be represented on hospital committees across the province. How well has that happened?

Ms O'Neill: Until the former Minister of Health, Elinor Caplan, threatened the issue of money, "If you do not behave, I won't give you any money." That is when things started to move, but until then, there was not much movement.

Mr Phillips: Has it happened now?

Ms O'Neill: To some extent. There are still the odd occasions when you have people called up for a meeting and the meeting date has been changed and no one has been notified.

The Chair: I will have to go on to Mr McLean.

Mr McLean: I have how many minutes?

The Chair: Six minutes.

Mr McLean: That will give me more than enough time. The first question I have is the fact of chronic care wards. Almost every hospital in Ontario has a ward full of chronic care patients.

Ms O'Neill: You are correct.

Mr McLean: For many years I have been advocating to get those people out into a homey setting, into a nursing home or some type of place where they feel more like living.

Ms O'Neill: So is ONA.

Mr McLean: I have been at that since Dennis Timbrell was minister, and I did not get any further than you have, I guess.

Ms O'Neill: Or Dennis.

Mr McLean: It disturbs me to see those people lying there looking at a roof and not seeing a green tree or anything. I cannot, for the life of me, understand why the Ministry of Health is not saying we have to have more homes for these people. Do you know why? I do not.

Ms O'Neill: ONA came out with that position in 1977. It is now 14 years later, and we have had a number of ministers of Health, so to turn around and say this current one or even the Minister of Community and Social Services—it has been there and everybody knows it is there. Let's just get off, start doing it; stop whining and do it.

Mr McLean: I do not know why they do not. I wish they would.

The other question I had, and I have been for some years indicating the same thing, people go to the medical profession whether it is an office call or wherever and they have a health card, which they have now, that they could get a receipt for what the cost of that visit was. Do you think that would be an advantage if the patient knew what their services were costing them? You might say, "Well, why?"

Ms O'Neill: I can tell you a personal story. I dropped a window on my hand and I went into emergency and I knew, from my background, there was not going to be anything wrong with my hand, but I thought I would check it out. I got a bill and it was $80, and I will never, never waste an emergency visit again. I do not think you have to send it to each person personally. We do not have to tell people like they are children, but I think that if we let the public know exactly what the costs are, then that would be appropriate. That is another layer of bureaucracy. I think it is a waste of money.

Mr McLean: Yes, if people knew.

Ms O'Neill: If you gave the general public an indication what emergency services cost, that would be to some degree appropriate.

Mr McLean: Right. I meet people in my area, so I am pretty well up on what you are talking about. I appreciate your brief today.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for coming forward to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs representing your organization.

ONTARIO MEDICAL ASSOCIATION

The Chair: I will call on the Ontario Medical Association. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget review. You will have a half-hour for your presentation. In that one half-hour, try to save some time near the end for a question and answer period which will be divided equally among the three parties. If you would not mind identifying yourself as Hansard, then you can begin.

Dr Linton: Thank you for allowing us to appear. My name is Adam Linton. I am a professor of medicine at the University of Western Ontario and I am the president of the Ontario Medical Association.

Analysis of government's fiscal policy is, thank goodness, not generally within the mandate of the OMA. Comments therefore do not address the general economic issues this committee is addressing, but only those we believe are pertinent to health care funding. The OMA has, necessarily, focused much of its attention on this topic in some years because we believe previous constraint measures have begun to impinge upon the delivery and quality of health care. We therefore commend government's commitment to the maintenance of our health care system and the tacit recognition that this will call for continued fiscal support.

The background to this is that Ontario, in common with all the other provinces and indeed with all industrialized nations, faces the intractable difficulty of health care costs which are rising faster than most other economic indicators. Health care, as I am sure you all know well, accounts for about one third of Ontario's budget and over the past decade spending has increased by an average of 12% a year.

The principal driving forces, not only in Ontario but in other provinces and all other developed countries, appear the rapid expansion of technology, which seems to be sustainable, and the increased demand for services, both of which promote continuing increase in the utilization of the health care system. Clearly the resulting fiscal problems have been exacerbated by the recession.

Although these upward pressures on cost have been mounting for some years, I believe the Canadian provinces have been relatively successful in sustaining a very high quality of health care system which is much prized by the public. Indeed, I selected it to practise in myself and I think it is much appreciated both here and abroad. The effects of its universality and accessibility attract international attention, and in the United States many authorities view this system as something at which they should be aiming.

There is, however, now increasing doubt whether the standards we presently maintain can still be maintained in the face of the mounting fiscal pressures. We have estimated that in Ontario the combined effects of increased health care costs, lower provincial revenue and cuts in federal transfer payments would have resulted in a health care fund deficit of close to $1.8 billion in the current fiscal year.

If such a deficit were passed on to the health care system, the consequences would obviously be devastating. I have provided you with some examples of manipulations to the system which would result in savings of $1.8 billion. For example, you could save that by closing 1,600 hospital beds, which would be more than one one fifth of the province's total. You could achieve the same saving by closing 130 of the acute-care hospitals in smaller communities or you could save the same amount by reducing medical services by one half.

Obviously none of these options is acceptable or likely, but they illustrate the fact that the degree of reduction in health care costs could be achieved only by very significant reductions in the level of service and likely the withholding of some needed medical care.

Government has a responsibility to manage its resources effectively and health care costs require special attention because of their magnitude and sustained growth. Although we still spend less than the US on health care—about 11.1% of goods and services produced in the province versus about 11.1% in the US—we now spend per capita on health care more than all other countries which have comprehensive health care systems. We spend about $1,680 per capita, more than anyone else with the exception of the US, which of course does not have a comprehensive system.

We do not believe that support of the health care system, or lack of support, has yet produced a fiscal crisis in the province. We believe society will eventually have to determine the share of resources it wishes to devote to health care. Before that happens, government and the medical profession have a shared responsibility to ensure that the right care is provided to the right people in the most effective way possible. I have no doubt that increased effectiveness in the delivery of health care has considerable potential to reduce the rate of growth of costs, and at the same time to maintain or improve accessibility and quality.

The recent milestone agreement between government and the OMA offers an opportunity for a co-operative approach to promoting the effective use of scarce resources. We believe we are now in one of the few jurisdictions where the medical profession and government are in a position to collaborate over these very tricky issues, and collaboration is certainly more likely to succeed than was the adversarial and confrontational mode we previously saw.

You should not, however, be unaware of the difficulties which will have to be overcome if we are to do this. The large savings which can be achieved are undoubted and the primary areas to target, in our opinion, will be physician resources, technology control and the development of optimal practice policies.

The issue of the number of doctors, as you know, is a very complex one. It is confounded by a lack of knowledge of what the need is and by the issue of maldistribution both by specialty and by geography. For example, in my own region in London, in the city there is one physician to 350 people, whereas in Huron county there is one physician to 1,300 people. That was the subject of a recent large piece in the London Free Press, finding out the difficulty which the people in the rural areas are having in finding family doctors and specialists.

The issue of addressing this is a difficult one and I believe it will require input not only from the medical profession, but also from other health care groups and from the public in general.

Control of technology is also required and it may be even more difficult because we have no system to control it at all at the moment. New technology, if you include new drugs as technology, simply sweeps on to the market driven by the usual market forces, by the manufacturers, by researchers and by the increasingly sophisticated public, and we have no system of trying to decide before a new technology hits the street whether it is in fact an improvement or even as good as previous technology.

Finally we have now begun to recognize that much of what we do in medical practice is not supported by solid proof of benefit. This is in large part due to the lack of strong data on outcomes of medical treatment, and also from the increasing and really quite severe complexity of modern medical decision-making.

I think these things have made it clear to the medical profession that we must now try to rein in these expenditures, preferably by the profession itself developing and promulgating practice policies aimed at the cost-conscious provision of high quality care. We can only do this if we are in a co-operative situation with government in order to devise methods of controlling the diffusion of technology. Only by mutual effort can we hope to promote mechanisms that will steer medical practice into patterns which will be both frugal and effective and of high quality.

We are aware that medicare remains the most cherished of all our social programs and that the challenge we all face is to keep it working. The Ontario Medical Association would like to work with government in pursuit of this end.

Mr Phillips: Thank you for the thoughtful presentation. I think you identified some of the really thorny issues we are all going to have to wrestle with, such as technology, even at what stage one continues to apply all the technological advantages we have.

The one I want to chat a little bit about is the OMA agreement because it is a milestone and I want to make sure I am clear on it. The first part is on the financial side: My understanding is that after two years—it is a seven-year financial agreement—everything is subject to arbitration, the threshold not in the fee schedule, but in the size of the fee pod. Is that correct?

Dr Linton: Yes, that is essentially correct. I do not have the agreement with me. I did not realize it was a topic for discussion.

Mr Phillips: I think it is important because two or three years from now there perhaps could be arbitration and it is the arbitrator who will make that decision.

The joint management committee, which I think is the other big thing in it: What issues do you see being taken there? My understanding is that it requires three of the five OMA representatives to agree to things before they can be passed; that is the way I read the agreement. What items would you see being resolved at the joint management committee?

Dr Linton: We have discussed it in some detail in the light of what we hope will go there and also in the light of the experience we had on the Scott task force, because that was in a sense a kind of mini joint management committee which did not work too well but taught us some lessons. I think the joint management committee will have to operate in four domains.

The first of these domains is that it will have to supervise the care and maintenance of the agreement. We hope that can be done, the nitty-gritty of the funding and the implementation of the agreement over the years, by a small, technically qualified committee without perhaps too much intervention by the JMC itself.

The second topic it will have to address is physician resources. This is a prime concern of government and it is a prime concern of ours. Up until now we have all pussy-footed around it but never produced any satisfactory solution. I think that is domain number two.

The third one is technology control. As I have mentioned, we have no system. It has been advocated for years that a system be developed, but no one has ever done it because the difficulties which surround the development of a system to control technology are substantial. Just as one example, clearly if you develop a system which inhibits the fusion of a new technology, then you are going to be interfering with a pharmaceutical company or something which is engaged in the legitimate pursuit of trade and all sorts of complications of that nature. But it has to be addressed. We think technology control is number three.

Number four, we think, is the development of optimal practice patterns, because there is no doubt we spend a lot of money at the moment on procedures which are unproven and maybe being provided to the wrong people at the wrong time. That is perhaps where the biggest potential for savings exists and optimal practice patterns simply have to be developed.

Mr Phillips: I happen to think one of our big challenges is how we are going to manage the health care field. In terms of your best cut at where the opportunities are for being more economical and more efficient—I do not want to quibble about the definition of that—do you have an intuition of where that may be?

Dr Linton: Yes. I think it is in technology control and practice patterns because that is where most of the money goes. As simple examples, with collaboration between the profession and the government on the joint management committee, you might decide to produce a list of drugs which were approved. Britain has a thing called “the national formula” which identifies those drugs that are of proven efficacy, lists their prices, recommends them and so on.

There are a lot of drugs used at the moment that are more expensive than equally valid alternatives, but you do not have a system to promote the use of the cheaper drugs, as just a simple example. There are hundreds of these in the practice of medicine.

Mr Phillips: The thrust for many of us is to move to community-based care. I realize that is tough to define, but it is to move away from as much institutionalization as we can. Is that something the OMA has a point of view on? Are we on the right track there?

Dr Linton: Yes. We agree with that entirely. I think it has to be modified a little bit by the fact that as beds are cut, the severity of illness of the people who are occupying the remaining beds increases, and the extent to which one can move these patients out into the community is restricted. But as was said in a previous presentation, there are a whole lot of patients at the moment who are, in our view, in inappropriate accommodation for their degree of illness.

Mr McLean: Northern Ontario, my understanding is has a hot pilot project in place.

Dr Linton: I am sorry. I missed that.

Mr McLean: The Ministry of Health has a pilot project in place. Can you give me a little detail on that?

Dr Linton: A pilot project on what?

Mr McLean: I understand there is a community in the Fort Frances area where they want to use a form of care whereby the people know exactly what the services cost them.

Dr Linton: In Fort Frances, there are the beginnings of what is called a comprehensive health organization which is simply a different way of funding the entire provision of health care within a region. It appears to be something that might be suitable for small areas in the north. That is the basic structure. Within that, I believe—I do not know very much about this—there is a pilot project of a smart card, which contains more information than the average health card and with which it is hoped to improve prescribing habits and documentation of drugs taken and so on. I have seen no preliminary report on the effectiveness of this in Fort Frances.

there are a raft of these projects which have been done in other countries. I do not think there is any doubt that we can improve the delivery of health care by this kind of data collection, and if there is one thing I have not mentioned up to now, which is critical to improving the health system, it is better data.

Mr McLean: The last witness we had here very clearly indicated that if the same thing had happened to her, she would not have gone to the emergency, which cost some $80. Do you believe in the theory that if a person knew what the charges were and what the costs were for health care, he would be more susceptible to paying it in a manner that he felt the need was most important to him.

Dr Linton: Unfortunately it does not seem to last. Five or six hospitals in southwestern Ontario tried to send out dummy bills, as it were, to patients who had received care, but we were never able to prove we had done anything to change the demand. I think you could look at the bill and say, "My God, it's expensive," and then in a couple of weeks' time, they have forgotten about it.

Mr McLean: Teaching hospitals: I have a niece who is going to specialize in skin cancer. What percentage of a hospital's administration or cost would be for teaching a specific specialty—ears, nose and throat or what? What percentage of the hospital's budget would go towards that?

Dr Linton: I have not the faintest idea because the teaching of academic medicine is another aspect of the health system which badly needs to be re-examined. It is a smash of sources of funds and often they can hardly be identified. In my university, the medical school receives funds from the Ministry of Health, Ministry of Colleges and Universities, the hospitals, funds generated by the doctors themselves, the Medical Research Council of Canada, all sorts of research agencies, the community, name it. There is a list as long as your arm.

The source of funding for teaching is really hard to identify, but it is another major problem for the health care system because as the funds generated by physicians from their service have diminished, as they did in the universities at least, the money available for these teachers to pass on to support the schools has diminished. In fact, we had two departments that went bankrupt this year as a result, so academic medicine is in a state of potential collapse at the moment as a result of this completely unsustainable funding system.

Mr McLean: What would you believe to be the area of health care that could be the most helpful in trying to solve some of our budgetary problems, and what category would you put hospital administrators in?

Dr Linton: That is a tremendous opportunity. The area in which I think the biggest realistic savings to be made is in the hospitals, and it is in the control of technology and drugs. I believe that is something the JMC should begin to do now which could produce significant benefit. One of the few things the Scott task force did was to produce recommendations about who should be tested for cholesterol and who should be treated. Had we been able to get those recommendations accepted, and they were scientifically accepted around the world, we would have saved something like $1.6 billion dollars; some enormous sum, I cannot remember how much it was, but a large sum. Where that failed was trying to get it actually incorporated into clinical practice, and that is something we have to get at.

Hospital administrators are obviously very important people. I hope the government remembers that physicians have to have some input into hospitals as well. Hospital administrators seem to be gaining in numbers and strength all the time. There is no doubt we need management of the system because the Canadian health care system, and in Ontario in particular perhaps, is almost unmanaged.

Mr Sutherland: It is a pleasure to see you here, Dr Linton, coming from such a fine medical school as the University of Western Ontario; it certainly has a good international reputation.

I wanted to ask you several questions. You heard the presentation by the nurses, and they were supportive of the OMA agreement. Mr Phillips asked them about the joint management committee and I just wanted to ask you this: I have had a few people come to me and indicate that somehow this joint management committee will mean that doctors will take the leading role, or for some people who feel they already have the leading role, will continue to have the leading role in decision-making and planning. What is your sense of how this will bring in some of the other people who are health care providers?

Dr Linton: I agree with you entirely. Indeed, I have been severely assaulted by my daughters, who are strong and powerful nurses, about the whole thing. We are very well aware that not only the nurses, but many other health care professionals are anxious about the fact that doctors appear to have regained the position of pre-eminence in the system. We are in the process of developing a system of advisory committees which, we hope, we will be able to build into the system, either on our side or perhaps even in a combined way with the government's side. The JMC has not met and the government members are not identified, at least not to us as yet. So we have not been able to discuss that, but we already have had preliminary talks with some people about advisory committees which will, we hope, give these people the feeling that they are involved. The JMC allows each side to take anyone it likes to meetings, so it would not simply be a case of sitting in a back room and advising. With relevant issues, these people could go to the meeting.

Mr Sutherland: I have another question regarding hospitals and transfers. I have talked to some of the people who work in my local hospital—there are three in my county, actually two in my riding—and through their professional groups they interact quite a bit with some of the people in the community of London. They have indicated to me that in some cases there are certain pieces of equipment the small hospitals have that are not fully utilized, yet in hospitals in the larger communities they have waiting lists.

It would seem, in some cases, that it may be cheaper to even have a shuttle to transfer them to the smaller hospitals to have routine-type testing done rather than purchase new pieces of equipment. Is that something you are familiar with, or you have heard a great deal about? I am just wondering if this is, in effect, one of the ways we can look at better management of the system and of the resources already allocated.

Dr Linton: I cannot comment on specific instances since I am not entirely certain what kind of equipment you are talking about. But there is no doubt that across the system in general, in the small hospitals, medium size hospitals and large hospitals there is far too little co-ordination of activity. There is no doubt that by moving people around you could improve efficiency.

Mr Jamison: Welcome and thank you for your presentation. It has been a major theme of the government to try to consult and build partnerships. I wonder, in your own opinion, do you consider this step as a good beginning point? Considering what you have said today, in as far as tracking and accounting for the moneys that come from the province is really a tremendously difficult thing to do, do you see that being beneficial both in the short and the long term?

Dr Linton: Yes. I have worked in health care systems in the United Kingdom, the United States and here. I have studied health care systems in many other countries, and I do not have any doubt that the situation we have in this province at this moment has the greatest potential for a sensible solution—perhaps not the solution, but a sensible beginning of the solution—to these problems. Hopefully, if we can continue to work together in a collaborative sense, we will get better data. Once we get better data, we get better tracking. Once we get better tracking, we get better planning. Once we get better planning, we get better health care.

Mr Phillips: My question is on the joint management committee. You answered part of it when you said it has not yet met. I gather the government's side has five members, one being the deputy or his or her designate. What kind of budget do you see the joint management committee needing to operate?

Dr Linton: I make it clear, once again, that this is our view; we have not had a chance to discuss it with the government. I can tell you that one of the lessons we learned from the Scott task force, and one of the reasons it was less effective than it might have been, was the lack of a significant supporting structure to do the work that was required. It is our belief that if the JMC is to realize its full potential, it will require a large supporting structure which will encompass the people who have the specific expertise to produce the kind of recommendations that are required.

I told you at the beginning that none of this is going to be easy. It is not easy to write guidelines for medical practice, and it is not easy to write guidelines for technology control. That is what McMaster and the Centre for Health Economics and Policy Analysis do all the time. The difficulties are substantial, so there is no doubt that it will require a supporting body of significant size. I am no expert at gauging how much that might be, but I am quite certain that it is in the millions, and perhaps $10 million, $15 million or $20 million. I have no idea.

Mr McLean: Do you think Roger Sherman's policy is going to work with regard to the three basic principles? Has he got sources of money for hospitals?

Dr Linton: I am sorry, you have got me there. I will have to tell me more.

Mr McLean: Mr Sherman is the president of the hospital that puts in hips and knee joints. He has a contract with the Workers' Compensation Board to evaluate workers. You are not aware of that?

Dr Linton: No, I am not.

Mr McLean: Okay, thank you.

Mr Jamison: Where do you feel that there is potentially—again I am not sure whether I have picked it properly or not—a major cost saving if we get our mutual acts together?

Dr Linton: I will give you three for example: number one, if we could stop people using inappropriate drugs for non-hazardous medical conditions. As you are probably aware, many people prescribe antibiotics for viral infections, which is of no value, and indeed is a clinically inappropriate practice. That is a lot of money. In the same category is the use of highly expensive third-generation antibiotics for simple conditions. So that is one group of things where there are substantial savings to be made.

Number two would be if you looked more carefully at new drugs and technology as they come down the pipeline and instead of just demanding, as we do now, that manufacturers prove that these things are efficacious, that they do what they are said to do, you must also ask manufacturers to prove how they operate in practice, that not only do they work, but do they work better than the gadget we used before? Many times the answer to that will be no, but the price will often be higher.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for appearing before the standing committee on finance and economic affairs and the budget review.

CANADIAN FEDERATION OF INDEPENDENT BUSINESS

The Chair: The next group is the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. Would they come forward, please. I believe you have a handout for the clerk to hand out. It looked like it took about three of you to carry the brief in. I would like to welcome you here to the standing committee on finance and economics affairs and the budget review. I hope it is in bold print there, because you have one half-hour for your presentation totally, and perhaps you can save some time at the end within that half hour for a question and answer period between the two parties. Before you start, would you just identify yourselves for the purpose of Hansard. You can begin.

Ms Ganong: My name is Linda Ganong. I am the director of provincial affairs for Ontario of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. With me are Catherine Swift, our vice-president, research, and chief economist; and Judith Andrew, our director of provincial policy.

will do our best to keep our presentation to about 15 minutes and leave about 15 minutes for questions.

Mr. Swift: Hopefully we can keep it shorter than 15 minutes.

We appreciate the opportunity to present the views of the small business community on the Ontario budget today. As you probably know, the CFIB is a non-partisan, non-political action organization representing about 88,000 small and medium-sized businesses across Canada. We have almost 40,000 of our members, almost half of our membership, in Ontario. We have members in all sectors, all regions, and represent firms from the single proprietorship right up to mid-sized firms with 400 or 500 employees.

As you are aware, small firms are major contributors to not only the national economy, but naturally to the Ontario economy. In 1989, for instance, the entire private sector in Ontario, about 97%, had less than 50 employees, and that is the pretty standard definition of small business. Small businesses in Ontario account for about one third of the labour force, and that compares favourably to national figures as well. The most notable numbers, however, are in the job creation area. Over 80% of net new jobs, that is even accounting for job losses and firms that go bankrupt and so on, over the last decade or so have come from small firms, so the job creation area is where the small firms really distinguish themselves. We find that in recessions as well as in periods of relatively strong economic growth.

The 1991 budget was viewed very much as a water-boarding exercise by small firms in this province. I think after the election of the new government last fall, small business and industry groups, naturally, were watching the government's development, and the 1991 budget really was a very bad omen to the small and medium-sized business community. There were many elements in it that were perceived very negatively.

Naturally the deficit was a major one, but I think it was even worse than that. Everyone expected the deficit to increase this year. I think that was something everyone expected, because we were in recession. Small business owners were certainly well enough informed to realize that tax payments and so on would have to increase considerably. The real concern was that these high deficits would tend to prevail for the duration of this government's term. That is a major concern.

We have heard a lot of justification of so-called Keynesian types of policies which involve spending in bad times, but of course what we have seen in Canada is governments that spend lots in good times and spend even more in bad times. Naturally, that is a recipe for fiscal disaster that we are seeing very profoundly at the federal level right now and we will arguably—not even arguably—see at the provincial level in Ontario if the projections in the budget do not come to pass.

What is interesting, I guess, is that high deficits lead to high interest rates and the need to raise more capital. They also lead to high taxation, of course, as well.

The unfortunate result of these policies is that the very sectors they are trying to help, presumably, are the ones that end up getting hurt the most. I think this is something that governments maybe do not see in the long-term sense; they just see short-term gains. Unfortunately it is the middle class and the lower-income people who end up paying for large deficits. The people who have investments benefit, and they are the well-off. So these kinds of policies have very perverse social impacts, even though they may seem to create some short-term jobs in a tough time like now. Naturally the small business sector, as one that pays a great deal of taxes. It also has a major punitive impact on that sector.

I think one thing we have seen on the part of many provincial governments, and Ontario has been no exception, is that things like high interest rates and the value of our dollar, which are very unfavourable right now, are pointed to as federal policies that have nothing to do with provincial policy. Of course this is absolutely false. Ontario, representing almost half of the national economy, cannot assume that it is not a part of the greater problem of higher national interest rates and as a result the requirement for a higher dollar to finance capital and so on. I think all provincial governments, and of course notably Ontario, being the largest, have to take a share of responsibility for monetary policy nationally, and things like high deficits at the provincial level in any province do not have a favourable impact on our national picture.

We have done a lot of surveying on these types of issues, of course, and we recently surveyed about 6,000 of our Ontario members for their views on government deficits. A full 97% believe that the elimination of deficits should be a major priority of government. More than 70% indicated that spending cuts are the measure of choice to eliminate the deficit. There of course is no support for tax increases, partly because we have just come through a decade of massive tax increases at all levels: personal, corporate and payroll taxes. We see that over half of the members surveyed favour eliminating government deficits with quick and drastic cuts, whereas a smaller proportion opt for a slower rate of deficit elimination. The highest priority area for spending cuts that we get in all our surveys is government funding of industry essentially, government funding of megaprojects, grants, subsidies for business and industry.

This may sound counterintuitive, coming from a business group, but what we typically find with our constituency is that these programs are set up and small firms rarely get the grants. They are the ones that effectively pay for them via taxation. It is the large firms that get the grants, and of course there are many firms where essentially their greatest expertise is the getting of government grants, not the conducting of their business. We have seen far too much of this, naturally, and I think some of the ones that are going down now, the Magnas, the Algomas and so on, are cases in point. There are more problems than that, but I think when you look at these firms that are having problems, most of their problem is that they should have faced reality a few years ago and it was forestalled by government grants.

One of the major deleterious impacts of the high deficit is that all this will mean is high taxes down the road. There is no question small businesses realize that they will be one of the major recipients of these tax increases, as has been the case in the last little while. We find the total tax burden of all the taxes small firms are faced with is an ever-growing concern, but in the past few years this has really been notably the case.

We have conducted quite a bit of research over the last year on various aspects of this. One of the studies is included in your package. It is called Taxing Ourselves to Death: The Small Business Tax Burden in Canada. We look at four different Canadian jurisdictions, Ontario being one of them, and we look at a number of US states as well to try to get a bit of a comparative picture. It used to be that Quebec was the high tax culprit for small businesses in Canada. It is not that way any more; it is Ontario now. What we find is that it is not simply that the level of taxes is so high in Ontario, but that the composition of those taxes is especially punitive on small firms.

One thing we did was compare the burden for a small, a medium and a large firm, just to see the differential impact, and what you find is that profit-insensitive taxes, notably payroll taxes, and local taxation such as property taxes, account for over 70% of a small Ontario firm's tax burden and just over 50% for a large firm. In other words, in a downturn, when those taxes do not move because they do not change when your revenue changes as a company, you are getting hit much harder than a large firm, so naturally there is quite a punitive effect. Things like the small business tax rate go some way to offsetting this, but they by no means completely offset this differential.

We did a survey last summer where members were asked which provincial and local taxes were the most harmful to the operation of their businesses. Number one was workers' compensation. This is something we have seen in a number of provinces. Again, it is not exclusive to Ontario, but in Ontario over half the members surveyed selected workers' compensation as the most harmful tax. The employer health tax was a close second, and almost half of the members chose that one. The third culprit, if you will, is municipal property and municipal business taxes, which over a third of members surveyed chose. The common factor of all these taxes is that they are fixed taxes that just do not vary in good times and bad. Naturally governments love them, because they are a nice constant cash flow stream, but if you are killing the small business community as a result, I do not think in the long run it is beneficial even to governments.

Workers comp is, as we said, a growing problem. We think it is high time this was looked at. It is not just our opinion. When you have unfunded liabilities in the $9-billion range and increasing, you know we have a very serious problem there. Ultimately everyone will suffer, workers and employers, if the policies continue.

One thing we recommend in this area is that a value-for-money audit be conducted provincially of the WCB system. This type of audit is designed to assess the system, how efficient it is, and effectively see how economic it is. This would ideally assist in achieving a higher standard of accountability on the part of WCB management. This is something the Ontario Legislature could request that the Provincial Auditor do, but the results of these findings hopefully would come out with some recommendations to improve the WCB burden on businesses in this province.

The employer health tax was a relatively recent tax that we found in our surveys nearly 60% of CFIB's Ontario members found has reduced their firm's profitability. Just under a third had to resort to changes in their staffing as a result of the employer health tax. These are things like layoffs, not hiring people they had otherwise planned to hire, shifting workers from full-time to part-time positions. Naturally another payroll tax is a disincentive to employment and the employer health tax is a notable recent example that we have heard a great deal of negative feedback about from our members.

What is interesting is that if you look back at some of Premier Rae's previous quotes, when he was in opposition he himself had very bad things to say about payroll taxes.

One thing we have recommended several times and I will reiterate here is that we believe that the first $400,000 of all firms' annual payroll should be exempted entirely from the employer health tax. This kind of exemption has worked successfully in other provinces, and although it does not cost the Treasury an awful lot of money, it is a major burden relief on small firms.

The number three most damaging tax is personal income tax. Naturally this hits in a number of ways. We have done some studies, one of which is included in your package, on the income levels of small business owners. What you find is that they are basically the average income of any employee across the country. Of course, there are people who make a great deal of money and there are some who barely get by, but on average, the income of a small business owner is roughly the same as the income of your average employee, and as a rule they have a lot of personal assets up as well, so if their business goes down, they do not collect unemployment insurance or they lose their house.

What we have been paying quite close attention to recently is the federal government's discussion paper on the reform of the personal income tax system. There is a clipping in your package by Leonard Shifrin of the Toronto Star which notes that this lays the groundwork for what should it come to pass—it is just a discussion paper at the moment, but it lays the groundwork—for a massive tax grab for the provinces. We are keeping a very close eye on this, not just from a tax-grab perspective, although that is the major negative impact from the small-firm viewpoint, but also the incredible complexity that now we have the problem of having two sales tax systems in most provinces. This raises the spectre of possibly two personal income tax systems, which is absolutely unbelievable in the paperwork department.

to have all kinds of evil and weird things implied by really it does not mean at all. I think our problem, we look at tax changes and other changes in standards and what not, is that basically if we as a province get totally out of whack, not only with other Canadian jurisdictions but with American states since they happen to be geographic neighbours, we are in major trouble. We have our members seriously looking elsewhere right now. We have heard a lot about movements to the US, but one that has interested us is that we are getting a lot of total evidence about movements to other provinces as because they are concerned about the future of Ontario. There are a couple of charts in this brief which show information on how many are thinking of moving here. I might note that the chart on page 10 was prepared before the budget. We are actually conducting a survey currently to try to get some post-budget reaction, since we realize the budget was a major watershed in the eyes of a lot of our Ontario members.

Something that we have seen in many jurisdictions, but especially in Ontario is the growth of the government sector. The Ontario government's own The State of Small Business 1990, publication, which came out fairly recently, talks about the "funded sector," which seems to be a new buzzword that people do not maybe read as government, but of course it is the government services sector. Its growth has been incredibly dramatic in Ontario during the last 1979-88 period. We are looking at almost the same as fast growth, and this kind of expansion of the public sector, which is not a productive sector in the competitiveness sense—you do not survive by having big government as an economy, as we have seen elsewhere in the world these days in spades—is naturally something where the more room government takes up, the less room is left for the private sector.

Finally, we have a number of recommendations here. The health tax one, which I already mentioned, is one that I feel would not cost an awful lot to government coffers, but in these times when small businesses are really struggling, every dollar means an awful lot to them. It would make a significant difference to them and would not be one that would be terribly difficult to absorb for the Treasury. One that we made in our pre-budget submission which has obviously not been really taken into account was basically worsening of the burden. We reiterate that one here, especially in this provincial tax reorganization potential that we have seen coming out of this federal discussion paper. I know the small business community will have very strong negative views about that should it come to pass.

The deficit: The deficit in and of itself is not the important thing. The important thing is what it does in terms of increasing costs, how it cuts into other programs, notably social programs, which are the largest part of the envelope, and what it means for taxation down the road. I think Canadians are taxed to death right now, or so we keep hearing, and it is not just small businesses that are telling us that.

We would like to see a spending level freeze. All the economic data indicate we are over the worst of it. Hopefully we can see some control brought in on spending. We saw the federal government, through the 1980s, get us into the pickle we are into by spending like crazy when times were good. Now that we are re-entering a period, hopefully, of a little more stability in government revenues, we should be able to see some control over spending. We would like to see a long-term—five years is one possibility—financial plan adhered to—the federal government has had quite a lot of them lately and it has not been able to stick to one yet—something towards which we could see some kind of planning. I think that would give some kind of confidence, because right now there is a crisis of confidence in the business community. If we saw some types of objectives and some kind of plan laid out, it would go a long way towards that.

The highest priority areas as seen by the small business community for spending cuts should be things like government funding of megaprojects, bail-outs, which are usually just spending bad money now for more money later, and the very targeted stuff that we find benefits only one firm and disadvantages its neighbour or competitor.

We would like to see some pressure on the so-called funded sector to be more efficient in its delivery of services. Perhaps some rationalization there would be in order.

We have seen some major problems with municipal spending growth. We have seen some tax revolts at this level across the province lately. I suspect we are going to see more of them. We see that as a growing problem for our business. Provincial governments can have a hand there in keeping that under control. We also think that any windfall revenues that do come in should be used for deficit reduction and not additional spending.

Finally, there is the audit of the Workers' Compensation Board that was recommended earlier.

I have gone on a little longer than I thought, but I would be happy to take questions at this time.

Mr McLean: To date this week, we have had about 40 presentations. Yours is about the fifth one we have had that has recommended looking at the deficit over the long term. Most of the others have indicated that business is not paying enough and that they are not getting enough money. Most of the people who are before us—we have had defeated candidates, NDP candidates, their spouses—are all saying what a great budget it is. We have had about five who indicated the concern they have for the long-term debt. The long-term debt will be probably well over $70 billion by the time 1995 rolls around. August 5 now is taxation freedom day. When do you think it will be in 1995?

Ms Swift: Obviously it is not going to be any better.

Mr McLean: I appreciate your presentation.

Mr B. Ward: I appreciate your coming before us to present your views. I have trouble with your view that we should not be offering any assistance to any business in the province. I am sure that if that was followed through, the recommendation of the CFIB would lead to the destruction of the community of Kapuskasing and the community of Elliot Lake. As well, other businesses that have received financial assistance through loans or loan guarantees may or may not be in existence. I know of five in Brantford that have received some assistance through the Ontario Development Corp. I think the people of Kapuskasing and Elliot Lake would strongly disagree with that view.

I have a question about the benefits of the budget. I think if you talk to the private sector, which has received contracts through the $700-million anti-recession package for work of a capital nature, it would strongly support that aspect of the budget. My question to you would be, from the position of taxes and the fact that there was very little business tax increase in the budget as well as no increase in the provincial sales tax—in fact, there was a tax cut for some low-income people, which may or may not have an effect on the CFIB membership—what is your view pertaining to the fact that there were no new payroll taxes and that existing payroll taxes were not increased? You mentioned the employer health tax. I was just wondering if, when that was brought in by the previous government, the CFIB condemned the previous government at that time. I cannot recall.

Ms Swift: Oh, yes. Where were you?

Mr B. Ward: If they did, I just want to hear it again.

Ms Swift: Were you off this planet somewhere? Oh yes, there is no risk of that. We are very egalitarian in our criticism. We criticize everybody equally. That is our job. Our position on funding generally is that we probably do not think it is realistic that governments are never going to fund businesses, but the ones we are bailing out now are usually in trouble because of past policies. Our view is that you are benefiting one. There are other ways to help communities than to keep unviable businesses. We have seen the Atlantic region of Canada as a notable example of an absolute disaster. You are just forestalling the inevitable.

Our businesses feel that an overall reduction in taxation is much more equitable. Then all businesses start from the same jumping-off point. What we would prefer to see as opposed to the preferential types of policies which benefit one firm over another is, why do we not have a more egalitarian policy where we have lower tax levels for all business?

Mr Jamison: The figures you put forward are interesting, because they prove to be almost increasing in nature in the numbers of jobs that small business is creating as compared to other sectors.

Ms Swift: We do not have the recession stuff in yet, mind you.

Mr Jamison: My figures were that 75% of all new jobs created are related to small business, and now your figures show 80% or better. I think it may be indicative of two things: the manufacturing decline, where there are hardly any jobs being created through the recession; and certainly the importance of small business. It is an area I have been given added responsibility for lately and I look forward to the challenge. It will be a challenge. I know that as far as you are concerned, the struggle goes on every day.

The Chair: Mr Jamison, I have to cut you off.

Mr Jamison: I would just like to make the state that it is interesting to hear those figures.

Mr Kwinter: I want to commend the CFIB. I can tell you that in the years I have been in the Legislature, I always looked forward to its reports because they are always very extensive and informative. I have had the benefit of talking to Judith over the years and getting input from her group.

Your report, and you talked about it when you testified about the tax problem, was in November 1990. You predicted that if we go into a recession, things are going to get worse. We are now into the recession. Some people tell me we are out of it. I predict we are not out of it, that we are not getting any deeper, that it has sort of levelled off. How badly has the situation changed from the figures you have in your report? Do you have any idea of that?

Ms Swift: The only notable tax change has been the GST, and that has been a real whopper. If you had to choose one incredibly punitive tax change, that was it, of course the associated problem in Ontario and some of the other provinces of administering two tax systems. Of course the fixed taxes always become worse when revenues are nowhere. We know now that many firms are operating at a major loss and hoping just to hang on, which is the case in the trough of a recession.

We have not actually done any studies. We are currently collating some results from our first follow-up survey and they are incredibly depressing in terms of the impact of this tax is costing business to administer. One of the problems provincially is that there are two taxes to administer and that just worsens it all the more.

It has got worse, I guess, though the Ontario government to date has not done a lot. There have been signs but there really have not been an awful lot of developments. I guess we and other groups like us are looking for this fall for a lot of activity to take place. Really it is not in expecting things to worsen over the next few months that we present a case here today, because the Ontario government notably has not done a whole lot in the past year.

The budget was viewed as a very significant sign and one in the wrong direction, by the business community. I guess we cannot make that point strongly enough.

Ms Andrew: If I could add something on the work compensation side, there are elements in the offering to increase costs tremendously under work compensation. The whole definition of what is compensable under the act is being reviewed by the board. They are considering compensating for chronic occupational stress. Gerry Phillips will be familiar with these issues. All this will roll into a far bigger demand for financing for the Workers' Compensation Board, which is already under a credible strain with the $9-billion deficit, and that will exacerbate our members' number one payroll tax problem, which is workers' compensation. The signals are there that it is bad and it can only get worse, as far as we are seeing it.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the thoughtful presentation and assure the new members that when CFIB saw a wrong signal, it spoke out strongly against our government as well. It is a kind of problem with all this, as I have said to other os, is like forecasting the weather a year or two from I think CFIB has some severe reservations about the et. Mr McLean said a whole bunch of groups came aid it was great. We will not know probably for a year year and a half. But I agree with you; I think we face its for ever here. Sure there are no new taxes in here use the deficit went up; it did not raise any money to or the spending.

seems almost like an anomaly that business is coned about all these things and yet if you read the papers, oks as if we are on the way to a strong economic very. How is this possible?

Ms Swift: I would not agree with the "strong"; that is sure with all the data we have seen so far. I think in forecasters have gotten more optimistic than others have been proven wrong before, so you have to take with a grain of salt. What we are seeing with our bers is an incredibly mixed performance. I think this here the role of confidence and expectations cannot be stated. We hear from our members that there is a good for a couple of weeks and then things go down for a ple of weeks. It is very spotty.

We have levelled, but we really have not seen a lot of rovement. It is not getting worse, that is for sure, and ome sectors we are seeing a bit of improvement. We not seeing consumers spending a whole lot more, and n they do they are not spending it in Canada. That is a or problem. Border measures do not do anything. You e to make people want to shop in Canada. You do not them over the head. The stick approach never works ept for a very short time.

I think what we are going to see is nothing like 1983, re the economy did pull out of the recession quite quickly, notably in Ontario. Ontario was way harder hit this time than in 1981-82, so we have a lot more recovering to do than we had then: things like the manufacturing sector, with 87-cent dollars, relatively high levels of taxation and all the other problems we are seeing. Naturally some of our core sectors are extremely badly hurt.

There is no doubt that this recovery will be harder and longer. I do not know if I subscribe to the double-dip recession theory where we are going to go up a bit and then down again. I do not think it is quite like that, but I think we are going to have a long, slow climb out of the trough of this recession. Whatever governments can do to improve peoples' confidence levels, consumers and business will go a long way because I think there is still money out there. People are contemplating investment and where to invest and right now Ontario is not at the top of their list. Anything that can change that would be very beneficial.

Mr McLean: I have spent $60,000 myself this year to help the economy. If people are in the mood to purchase, they will do it if they feel they have the confidence of the government behind them. There are many people out there who feel now is the time to make these purchases. If they do, I think you will see the economy change. But the attitudes of people have to change and the leadership has to make people feel they are comfortable. I think things are available to turn it around.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for appearing before this committee. This committee will resume in Windsor at 9 am sharp on Monday. We have next week's schedule. This committee is dismissed for today.

The committee adjourned at 1628.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

MONDAY 19 AUGUST 1991

The committee met at 0900 in the Hilton International, Windsor.

Resuming consideration of the 1991-92 provincial budget.

The Chair: I would like to bring this committee to order. This will be the beginning of our third week of the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget review hearings.

WINDSOR AND DISTRICT LABOUR COUNCIL

The Chair: This morning we are starting off in Windsor. What I would like to do is welcome the first group to appear before us, which is the Windsor and District Labour Council. You will have one half-hour for your presentation and question period. After your presentation, allow some time if you can for a question and answer period from the opposition parties, which will be divided equally. We will be starting off with the official opposition, going to the third party, then over to the government and rotating with each party coming in. Please identify yourself for the purposes of the Hansard and begin.

Mr McLean: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: I am wondering if we have a quorum here. It is important that a quorum be present at these meetings. I do not think we could be totally ignored by the NDP. I know they want to hear this presentation.

The Chair: I just saw Mr Sutherland and Mr Jamison walk in and walk back out again. We will recess for a minute or two.

Mr McLean: I think they should be here.

The Chair: Since I see a quorum, we will be begin.

Mr Parent: I would like first of all to introduce my colleagues here with me this morning. Ken Lewenza is the vice-president of Local 444, Canadian Auto Workers. Frank LaPosta is the secretary-treasurer of the Windsor and District Labour Council, as well as secretary-treasurer of Local 195 of the CAW. My name is Gary Parent. I am the president of the labour council and also financial secretary of Local 444, CAW.

I would like to welcome the committee to Windsor and thank the government for the opportunity to make a submission on behalf of the labour community of Windsor and surrounding areas. We have, in affiliated members to the Windsor and District Labour Council, over 42,000 members. We have seen in this country a recession that has not been experienced since the depression of the 1930s.

The number of manufacturing jobs lost in Ontario has escalated to over 97,000 last year, compared to the drop of 100,000 in 1981 and 1982. The difference now is that the majority of the job losses we are experiencing are lost forever. In Windsor we have witnessed the closure of plant after plant, and if this committee wants proof of this, it should take a recess from these hearings and go out and take a firsthand look at what the federal government's economic policies have done to our community and many more communities across this country.

I would like to stray from my text right now and have Brother LaPosta give you an example of the flavour of the job loss we are experiencing here in our community.

Mr LaPosta: The following is a partial list of Local 195 units that have most recently closed their doors. These jobs have left this area for ever:

Arnold Manufacturing representing 100 people; Brant Castings, 57; Charles Laue, 20 more people; Advanced Gibson, 30 more people; Freedland Industries, 78 more people; Windsor Machine, 40 more people; Reflex, 90 people; International Playing Card, 30 people; International Robotic, 8 people; Newcor Canada, 30 people; Sheller-Globe, 419 people; Welles Corp, 180 people; Wickes Bumper, 320 people; Fruehauf, 13 people, and most recently Kelsey Hayes, 450 people, but at its peak it was well over 1,000 good, high-paying jobs here in the city of Windsor.

This is the type of devastation we have had to face here in the city.

Mr Parent: While you are out and about, the other thing you should take notice of is the number of small retail businesses that have also been closed. The reality of it is there has been a drastic increase in those types of closures as well.

As a matter of interest, on my way driving here this morning I took a look at our downtown area, on another street, Pelissier, which is one over from Ouellette Avenue, and I counted 24 small businesses that have gone out of business. This is another example of what is happening in this community and, I would imagine, other communities as you travel across this province, and what is happening in the real world.

During this current recession, business and personal bankruptcies in Ontario have soared, with business alone experiencing an increase of 73% in 1990 compared to 1989. Surely this indicates a major downturn in our economy, and implications for the future are considerable in terms of levels of employment, living standards and much-needed social services.

Having previously explained the problems many people have experienced, we must look at how the federal government has responded. Further cutbacks on program spending will cost the people of Ontario over $1.6 billion this year alone. In Windsor, these cuts have meant people drawing UIC for a much shorter period of time, thus an escalation in our welfare rolls in both the city and the county, with no decline in sight. And yes, the municipal-provincial taxpayer will have to pick up this slack.

Other areas affected by the reductions of transfer payments from the federal government are health and education. In Windsor, this strengthens our concerns over whether more schools will have to close or whether our much-needed health services, such as a cardiac care unit, will ever become a reality for us in this community. A further concern to us would be the death of the medicare system as a national program enjoyed equally by all Canadians.

One must look at what the federal government is now planning to do by negotiating a North American free trade agreement. Has there not already been enough damage done to Canadians by the US-Canada free trade agreement? As Nick just alluded to, those are some of the results of the current US-Canada free trade agreement and some of the casualties.

As the previous Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology, Allan Pilkey, stated, the FTA has not worked for the people of Ontario, and we have proof of that, as we have just outlined. We fail to see how the extension of a deal to Mexico can possibly be of any benefit to our industries and our workers.

When one looks at Windsor, is it not evident that we are suffering enough? I guess not, because our federal government has put in place a new tax, the GST. We invite this task force to ask the retail business community of Windsor how this tax has affected it. Better yet, we invite them, as I suggested earlier, to go and look first hand at the empty storefronts that have become commonplace in our community since this regressive tax was implemented.

There has been an outcry from this provincial government's opposition parties for a balanced budget. Let's just examine what a balanced budget would do for Windsor.

First, people would be faced with a 14% overall provincial tax hike which would be sucked up by the government instead of buying goods and services and maintaining jobs in this community.

Health spending in Windsor would be cut by $33.8 million, which of course would then mean more loss of hospital beds and, in turn, nurses' jobs would be lost. Just what we need in this community—more unemployment.

Education spending would have to be cut by approximately $18.2 million, which would mean more schools or classroom closures, which would put teachers out of work, not to say the devastation that would take place in this community and surrounding communities as it relates to disrupting students, having students going from one end of the county to another. It is just absolutely ludicrous.

Then we look at social services spending, which would be cut by approximately $14.3 million, and we ask, is the city of Windsor able to pick up this slack? We all know of course that the answer to this question is no. We dare say these issues would not be readily addressed by these same objectors to this government's new provincial budget.

The ultimate question that has to be asked of those demanding a balanced budget is, how many classrooms and hospitals would close? How many kids and families would be cut off welfare? How would they raise taxes to provide needed services for Windsor and our surrounding communities?

Contrary to the federal government's economic policy of cutting programs during this recession, we in the local community of Windsor applaud this provincial government's courage to fight the recession by sustaining and creating 70,000 jobs; by creating the $700-million anti-recession program whose total expenditure, when combined with contributions of local government and agencies, will exceed $900 million, and maintaining our health care and education systems despite cutbacks from the federal Tory government in the form of transfer payments.

We see this government putting spending power in the hands of the people of Ontario by not imposing the PST, the GST, instead of taking it away like the federal Tories have done.

When we look at the $215-million social assistance reform package designed to provide benefits for those who are in the greatest need, we need only ask our social services commissioner here in Windsor, who we feel would agree, that this package will provide further relief to our already burdened municipality and ultimately the overburdened city of Windsor taxpayers.

Also, by providing tax relief for the poorest Ontarians by initiating the largest enrichment in the history of the Ontario tax reduction program, in the amount of $100 million, the number of low-income earners whose Ontario income tax will be eliminated or reduced will increase by 700,000 for the 1991 tax year.

This government has also shown a positive attitude by allocating an additional $12 million for new shelter beds and enhanced services for those who are victims of domestic violence. In addition, there has been an increase of more than $8 million to expand and enhance services to women and children who are victims of sexual assault, which we feel has been escalated in both instances during this current recession because of the economic climate we are in ourselves in.

This government has also shown it is addressing the needs of the province by supporting an additional 10,000 non-profit housing units at a cost of approximately $100 million. We in Windsor and surrounding areas certainly can relate to the need of such housing and are eternally grateful for the present projects which are currently under construction and in the planning stages.

The business community of this province has criticized the budget because of its deficit. We would like to add that we do not like deficits either, but as we asked earlier in our presentation, what service funding would they like cut to help offset this deficit: funding for schools; funding for hospitals; funding for community care for seniors; funding for training of our unemployed; funding for our increased social service case loads and needs? We do not believe they would choose any of the above.

We also believe it has to be stated that if none of the things proposed under this budget occurred and everything remained status quo, the reality is that the deficit would have increased to over $8 billion anyway. This Ontario government has, in our opinion, received a bum rap for this budget, and we ask this task force to talk to the people the closed Kelsey Hayes plant, the closed Wickes per workers, the closed Sheller-Globe plant workers agsville, the Wayne Bus workers, and the list goes on n. Ask them whether in fact they would want a bal- l budget or whether they would rather have money in pockets to feed their families and money put towards ning so they can be better prepared to go to work this economy gets on its feet. Obviously we feel answers would be the latter.

our view, this budget is taking a major step in the direction by investing in the people of Windsor and est of Ontario and, in essence, laying the foundation sustainable prosperity in the 1990s. We say to the busi- community of Windsor and this province, "Don't fear ew direction this Ontario government is taking, but r join with it to lead this country in economic growth 92 and for the betterment of all in this province." We to believe it is well worth investing in.

Mr Lewenza: I would just like to add that obviously / Local 444 put in for submissions, but because of the per of people who put in for submissions and time aints, it was not appropriate for us to have an official ng or an official time to be allocated. We have obvi- / left it up to the president of our union to talk on lf of the CAW, but unfortunately we did spend quite a nderable time putting a brief together in case we were ted. With the Chair's indulgence, I would like at least ve you the brief for your reading and hopefully, if you something done or written in terms of questions, you d certainly direct it to our local union. Thank you.

The Chair: Yes, thank you. They will be distributed ng the members.

Mrs Sullivan: I appreciate your being with us today submitting a brief to the committee. One of the things is very clear, of course, in the Windsor area is the station from closed plants, some of them short-term, e long-term, lots of layoffs and so on. One of the gs we do not see in this budget is long-term job creation fforts that will attract the investment to create those -term jobs in the longer term. I am interested that the ur council has been so euphoric about the budget when ct those very significant details are lacking. I wonder u could comment on that.

Mr Parent: If one looks at the budget totally, I think ave done that by the retraining dollars they are put- in place. I think they are looking. Also, there were ts available to businesses that are suffering and having e difficulty sustaining a viable climate of operation. So nk they have done that.

What you have to do first, if you are looking at getting economy going, is to put the confidence back in the nness community. I believe the confidence is there, first ll, by the people having the money in their pockets o are going to keep this economy going. You cannot do y cutting back the spending power of the people of ario. I think they are doing that in this budget and the g-term effects will be well received. When one looks at e of the economic advisers who are coming out in our of this budget—

Mrs Sullivan: Who are they again? They are those you like to quote from usually, are they not?

Mr Kwinter: No, they have all been warned not to use that name any more.

Mr Parent: Anyway, I believe there is confidence in this province and that this government has had the courage to look forward for Ontario and get this economy going. You cannot do it by cutting services; you cannot do it by cutting programs that are necessary for the people of Ontario or the rest of this country, for that matter. The federal government certainly has done a good job of trying to dissuade people from really putting forward economic growth to this country.

Mr Kwinter: Thank you very much for your presentation. I was really taken with the comment that the opposition parties were calling for a balanced budget. I do not think anyone has ever called for a balanced budget. As you said, there is no way. How could you have a balanced budget given the economic situation? The revenues are declining and the kick-in automatic welfare payments are going up. What the complaints have been about is not even so much the deficit this year. We understand we are in a tough time. Where most of the criticism is coming from is that over the life of this government it is projecting deficits in the $8-billion range every year, so that by the time its mandate is over—from the time it took office to the time it finished—it will have doubled the provincial debt. That is a problem, because that is deferred taxation. Someone is going to have to pay for it. That is the concern that has been expressed by a lot of people.

The other thing I would really like to get your comments on, because I find it very strange, is that in all of these programs that have been announced—the $700-million anti-recession program, the program to help manufacturers—I would say at this point in time that less than 10% of it has been allocated. When I said to the minister in the House, "There's no money in the budget for MITT for this program," he said, "We don't need it this year because we're going to spend this whole year just taking a look at who needs it." So by the time this money comes around, we will be into a recovery program.

The Prime Minister has already declared the recession over. I do not believe that. On the other hand, we have a situation where there are tough times now and all we are getting are promises of programs that will be put into place. But at the present time very little of that money has been spent. I would like to get your comments as to how that is going to affect Windsor today, where there really is a problem, and we appreciate the problem.

Mr Parent: I guess these hearings are part and parcel maybe of why some of these programs have not been implemented. If the budget would have got approval in the Legislature when it should have had approval, I believe maybe some of these programs would have been on their way. Quite frankly, maybe some of the tie-up is a bureaucracy we are now tied into, when we look at the hearings we are taking part in today.

I think also when you look at the training programs we are talking about, there are programs that have been started in a community such as Windsor. First of all, you have to assess what the needs are in this community. When you look at the plant closures Brother LaPosta named off to you, the makeup of that workforce is predominantly, first of all, of ethnic origin, so you have to look at what their needs are. Obviously, possibly in all probability, the most important need for them is basic literacy skills that have to be looked at. You are looking at an older workforce that has been affected by these plant closures, so you have to look at what their particular needs are in this community.

If we are looking at some long-term future for these people who have been affected through these plant closures, you have to assess what their needs are. I do not have any problem with the way the government is handling it as far as what it is doing up to this point, because we have to accept responsibility for our future, unlike past governments of this province and of this country where they would throw money at Band-Aid approaches, as far as we are concerned, in trying to give people a false sense of security.

I think this government is looking at trying to put what you are asking for, really, and what the other person asked for earlier. I think you are looking for long-term gains for this community and other communities by first assessing the needs and what the needs are in each community. You have to find out what the needs are. You cannot just throw money out at Band-Aid approaches and hope everything is going to come out in the recovery. I am not as optimistic as the Prime Minister of this country that everything is going to be hunky-dory in a very short period of time.

Like I say, Windsor historically has always continuously felt any downturn in the economy first. We are usually the first to come out of the recovery, but the recovery is not as blatant and is not as forthcoming as some people want to express it is, because it is not there. Look at our unemployment rate in this community—

The Chair: Mr Parent, I have to cut you off. We have to go on to the next party. The official opposition has run out of its time. Sorry I have to do that.

Mr Parent: That is fine.

Mr McLean: I believe gas went up by 1.7 cents July 1, the gas guzzler tax went into effect August 1, cigarettes and booze went up the night the budget was introduced. Could you tell me when you think the budget was or should have been approved? You said it has not been approved. Why are all these taxes in place?

Mr Parent: Obviously there are certain parts of the budget that had immediate implementation. I am talking about the longer-term projects that have been outlined in the budget.

Mr McLean: Could you name me one that is not approved because of the budget?

Mr Parent: Some of the training dollars are still not forthcoming, obviously waiting for the conclusion of these hearings to make sure everything is okay, as far as I know.

If I can make a comment about the price of gas, the gas guzzler tax, tax on cigarettes and tax on the alcohol, as you alluded to, working people in this province obviously do not like to see taxes go up. But at the same time, if they see some results of where their tax dollars are going, if they see the results of how the taxes are helping people in Ontario, I do not think there is a problem with the people of Ontario accepting those types of increases.

Where the problem comes in, if they see these rising, no results, no programs implemented and no programs put forward to help this province get going, that is when the people of Ontario will be more upset than they currently are.

Mr McLean: The basic question was that the budget was not approved, and it has been approved because of these hearings. I am here to tell you it is approved. The budgetary process is in place and will be proceeding through the normal channels.

You mentioned in your brief the retail business community. It is unfortunate that in this whole list we got not see anybody here from the retail business community appearing before us. I think that is a shame, because we should be listening to those people out there to find out what the retail business community's problems really are.

I do not know what I can say. You spoke about a balanced budget. Mr Kwinter asked a question I was going to ask, so I will pass to my colleague.

Mr Carr: I am pleased to be in Windsor here. Thank you very much for your presentation. It was very well done and interesting.

You talked about some of the things with the federal government. I had a poll in front of me that was commissioned and that talked about the government introducing new laws to increase government spending during the federal budget. The question was asked, "Do you agree or disagree strongly that the Ontario government should pass a similar law?" and 77% of the people who voted for the NDP said there should be some controls on spending.

I was just wondering what your thoughts were on such a large proportion of the people feel there should be some spending control and yet you say there should not be. How do you jibe that with the statistics here?

Mr Parent: Obviously people do not want to see the government that is frivolously spending money. But when you look at what is being proposed in the budget, as far as their spending, I do not think it is frivolous spending. As we say in our brief, we think they are spending money on the people of Ontario and to get the economy in the province going. I do not think, quite frankly, they view this as frivolous spending.

Mr Carr: Some things have been pointed out, you may have read about them last week. The chairman of TVOntario has nine TVs in his office, he has a chauffeur who is paid $51,000 and they spent $2,000 to send a Japanese businessman to Cleveland to watch the Blue Jays games, things like the Minister of Community and Social Services, Mrs Akande, spending $54,000 for a new carpet in her office. There are areas where spending can be controlled and I think they are saying they want controls.

When I look here you people are saying, "We have to spend all this money." Do you not believe there is any control in this budget where we can be controlled? And if we w constructive, is there anything you can see, some where we can control spending, to offer in a constructive manner to the people on this committee? Are there any areas you see where we can control spending?

Mr Parent: Not knowing the intricacies of the bureaucracy in the Legislature of Ontario, I cannot really comment as far as where I would see who gets carpet and who does not get carpet. As a citizen of Ontario and in the community of Windsor, I can see where the need is of injecting money to help people pull themselves out of this recession. We find ourselves in and the economic climate around ourselves in. That is where this money from the government in the province should be spent, and I believe this budget that is exactly where the money is coming from and going to, to help the people in Ontario.

Mr Jamison: Thank you for your presentation this morning and for taking the time and making the effort to be in front of the committee. I have been sitting in the hearings for two weeks now, and most of the detractors from the budget really are saying one thing to the government. They are saying: "You have spent too much. We would like to see a lower level of deficit." At the same time, I have had a very difficult time having people who could take the budget and explain clearly where these cuts that are being talked about should be made.

There was $1.5 billion in new spending; $700,000 of that was the anti-recession fund that has gone to work in the community, including Windsor. It is interesting that you would talk in your presentation about the effects on the small business community in Windsor. I want to give you an example and I want you to answer as best you can: If we had taken the same position as the federal government and had actually frozen transfer payments to the municipalities, how would that have impacted here in this community as far as municipal taxes are concerned—probation services? How do you feel that would have impacted if the government had taken the same position as the federal government and frozen transfer payments to the municipalities in particular?

Mr Parent: It would have been absolutely further assistance for our community. When one looks at the highways that were put in for the infrastructure that was also a part and parcel of trying to keep the economy going, and if the moneys were not there, we would see that we would not have the sewers; we would not have, thus, construction to provide those sewers. We would have further layoffs in the construction industry. If one looks at the affordable housing area, as we alluded to in our brief, that again construction people back to work. I mean, you cannot have an economy going in a community like Windsor if there is not some help from the senior levels of government, both provincially and federally. Unfortunately, the federal government has not been there. The provincial government, thank God, in its latest budget at least, believes that Ontario municipalities do deserve some help and it has provided it, in our opinion, in this budget. We thank you for that. I wish, in $700,000; I wish it was $700 million.

Mr Jamison: It is $700 million. I may have misquoted, but it is $700 million. That is right.

Mr Parent: And that is what we need. We need money in this province to keep the economy going and to get it going.

Mrs Sullivan: Yes, but the takeoff is not nearly that high.

Mr Parent: We cannot do it if we are going to reduce payments to the municipalities from the senior levels of government, like I say. We only hope that sooner or later the federal government changes in this country so that we can have a government that is responding to the needs of Canada as a whole and to the rest of the provinces that are in need of the money in the form of transfer payments.

The Chair: We have run out of time for the government. I would like to thank the Windsor and District Labour Council for its presentation.

UNIVERSITY OF WINDSOR STUDENTS' ADMINISTRATIVE COUNCIL

The Chair: The next group is from the University of Windsor Students' Administrative Council. Would they come forward, please.

You have one half-hour for your verbal presentation. Leave some time at the end for oral questions from the three parties and, if you would not mind, identify who you are for Hansard. Welcome to this committee.

Mr Papa: Thank you. My name is Nino Papa. I am the president of the students' administrative council at the University of Windsor. Along with me this morning is Dr Paul Cassano, the senior vice-president of the University of Windsor. I will jump right into my presentation this morning.

It is with great honour I take this opportunity to speak on behalf of the students of the University of Windsor and students across Ontario.

In reading the press and watching news broadcasts, I have found that this budget, more than many others, has been scrutinized. This, of course, is due in no small part to the fact that this is Ontario's first-ever New Democratic budget. This also should be welcomed by all bureaucrats and citizens for two main reasons: Not only does it show that there is a vested interest in government actions by the people of Ontario, it also shows the great cruciality of this budget. It is a strong fact that this budget, because of the seriousness of this recession, will have implications on this and future governments' fiscal and economic policies.

This budget has endured great criticism. This criticism has come in areas ranging from, of course, the deficit to the funding of programs and not cutting their services. I plan to touch base with many areas included in the budget in my presentation today, but because of the lengthy contents of it, I will concentrate on the areas that are of importance to all Ontarians and that are directly related to my current situation as a student and resident of Windsor.

First, allow me to address the recession and how this government is taking initiatives to fight what I am sure all communities from business to labour are fed up with.

As of April 1990, Ontario has faced its worst economic downturn since the Great Depression. In the past year 236,000 jobs were lost. Almost half of these jobs were in the high-paying manufacturing sector. As a matter of fact, the loss of manufacturing jobs in this recession is almost equal to the total job loss of the 1981-82 recession in itself. A scary realization for all Ontarians is that many of these jobs are now lost forever. Partial or complete plant closures contributed 65% of permanent layoffs. Needless to say, Windsor was especially hard hit due to its large dependency on the manufacturing plants that make up a large portion of its employment capabilities.

On a more severe scale, 59% of layoffs in the first five months of this year were for the same reasons. These statistics are in severe contrast to those in 1982, where only 24% of permanent layoffs were due to partial or full plant closures, the remainder due to companies temporarily cutting their workforce.

This recession has, without a doubt, been more unfair to Ontario than any other province in Canada; 52% of all jobs lost in Canada were in Ontario. Again, this was extremely detrimental to our community because 60% of all manufacturing jobs lost in Canada were in Ontario. This can only contribute to cross-border shopping and poor revenue incomes for business people in Windsor.

We must also look at this recession and be compassionate towards members of our business community. The severity of this recession has caused a 73% increase in business bankruptcies in 1990. Personal bankruptcies were up a staggering 83% in 1990 over the previous year. It is these statistics that caused a $1.4-billion cost increase to social assistance. This beast that we all face and must deal with called the recession will cause as many bankruptcies in the first two thirds of 1991 as Ontario businesses faced in all of 1990. It comes as no surprise to any of us here today when I say this recession has had its day in the sun and now it is time to put an end to it.

James Frank, chief economist and vice-president of the Conference Board of Canada, said the Ontario budget should be praised and that it is a confidence builder that will help Canada emerge from this recession.

I share the sentiments of so many who say this government took the right course in fighting the recession. The government's anti-recession program is a step in the right direction for many reasons. This program includes the creation of jobs for the maintenance of many areas that I strongly feel have been neglected by all political parties and governments. As Ontarians we should welcome with open arms the 14,000 jobs that this program will create in 1990 and 1991 in such tough times. These jobs are intended for the maintenance and improvement of facilities in the public sector, such as hospitals, schools and the very needy colleges and universities. This is a commitment made by this government and its first-ever budget that we, as the citizens of Ontario, can hold it accountable for. This $940-million program should come to municipalities throughout the province with great acceptance as it is a direct investment in their economies.

In choosing to fight the recession, I am sure you are all aware that it is inevitable that the deficit is increased. It also means that by not cutting back on schools, hospitals, colleges and universities, municipalities and social services, approximately 70,000 jobs will not be lost in Ontario would have been lost with a zero deficit.

Two initiatives taken by this government to fight recession are very crucial to a large sector of citizen Windsor and Essex county. Due to plant closures, many employees in Windsor have suffered the crunch of having to compensate their situation and create an income. As mentioned previously, bankruptcies have never been higher in Ontario. Through the employee wage protection program, workers are guaranteed vacation pay, termination pay and severance pay for such situations.

It seems as though many of us take the importance of farmers, for granted. Not only must they accommodate the situation granted to them by Mother Nature as far as floods and droughts are concerned, but they also face what many others are rapidly growing very tired of: government underfunding of programs. In my own opinion, it is reassuring to see that this government has kept farmers in mind by providing $97 million in financial support, $50 million of which will be in interest rate relief.

Essex county entails large numbers of farmers including areas such as Kingsville, Leamington, Harrow and Amherstburg to name a few. It is vital that these ever-important people begin to be recognized by governments of all parties.

It seems to be a plan of this government to contribute to the already existing number of non-profit housing facilities in Ontario. This contribution will be to the tune of 10,000 new non-profit and co-op housing units, which will create some 20,000 short-term jobs. I stress the "short-term" because it concerns me that when these units are completed, the employees revert back to social assistance. This government needs to find alternatives to these short-term solutions that will inevitably have long-term ramifications.

The Treasurer of Ontario, Floyd Laughren, stated: "As a New Democratic government we have a choice to make to fight the recession or to fight the deficit. This year we decided to fight the recession and are proud of that choice." This is also a choice which I feel the people of Ontario can be proud of. It clearly illustrates the type of leadership that is desperately needed at this point in the province's existence.

Not only do I feel compelled to speak on the $9.7-billion deficit, I also welcome the challenge of speaking on such a sensitive issue that affects every human being and community in our province. Needless to say, this has been the largest criticism of the budget. Let's look at it in perspective. Not only was the government working with an already existing $2.5-billion deficit, it was faced with, again, Ontario's worst recession since the great one. This forces any government to manage taxpayers' money with more compassion, which should be done even in the best of times. In reality, most of the deficit is automatically incurred by the recession, namely the increase in spending on social services, the non-cutting of education, health care and the decrease in government revenues due to high unemployment. Ontario will pay $3.6 billion for established programs financing, which includes health and post-secondary education, in 1991-92 alone, due in large part to the federal government's cutbacks in such programs. As more people on social assistance last year, government revenues Welfare costs have doubled in the last three years. I d like to ask those who do not appreciate the welfare m what should be cut first, the more than 50% of le on welfare who are single mothers? Or do we cut 12% that goes directly to the province's future, our ren? Without this deficit, what would the Treasurer's slash first? Would it be schools, hospitals or community for seniors?

Not only does this deficit have a protective element for dy existing programs, it also absorbs the introduction ew programs that are direly needed in Ontario. Some million will go to the municipalities for such programs e 3Rs. This will encourage a quality recycling pro- h throughout our province and ensure that our planet is s best possible condition for our subsequent generations. million will go to stopping wife abuse and sexual assault, ething that is becoming more and more prevalent on ersity campuses across the country.

n my opinion, the only way sexual discrimination will nimized is by creating programs that entail men and en working together to face this brutal problem. As it ds, Canada is at the bottom of the list when the list erns wage comparisons between men and women. Is ossible that we, as a nation, still have such a long way o? I am glad that finally a government at least made an mpt to cure this problem by allotting $155 million to equity, ensuring that 420,000 well-deserving women paid fairly.

These are the types of things that must be dealt with so we in Ontario have a more fair and just society that all ks of life will be able to take advantage of. It is, however, duty of Ontarians to pressure this and future governments allocate these moneys to the proper areas so that all munities will benefit. To the people of Ontario: ether it be an NDP, Liberal or Conservative government, us not let them forget that it is us they are accountable to, we hold them responsible for their actions.

It is time to realize that voters who are directly related he post-secondary education facet of government funding d to be directly recognized, for they are future builders. ese women and men are librarians, administrators, todians, researchers, and most importantly, students. hough $1.7 billion of the $6.3-billion spending increase l go to health care and the education system, the decrease unding to post-secondary education has proven drastic.

More educators are being put on unemployment lists l students are suffering as a result of overcrowded class- ms and not being able to enrol in required courses. This ously erodes the quality of education a student is paying esome amounts of money for. This is all coming at a d time. Because of high rates of unemployment, more ple are returning to college or university to enhance ir skill levels. It is blatant the universities have become ess prioritized item of governments. Not only is this presented in the federal government's cutbacks in transfer yments, but also in the decline of its share of provincial dgetary expenditures from 1977-78 to 1991-92.

There is something definitely wrong when, since 1978, e provincial government has not accepted the advice on funding given by the Ontario Council on University Affairs, which is not only an advisory board to the government, but also a board that taxpayers fund to be in existence. It should be used to the fullest capacity.

I have enclosed a couple of graphs and figures in my presentation today, but unfortunately I did not make enough copies for all the task force to see, so maybe I could distribute the ones I have.

The Chair: I would appreciate it if you would give it to the clerk there, and we will make copies for all members of the committee.

Mr Papa: Figure 1 and table 1 of my presentation will show that government spending has decreased from 5.92% in 1977-78 to 4.09% in 1991-92. This past year alone saw a government decrease of 0.23%, or in other terms a loss of nearly $108 million. More than $870 million has been the cost to universities in operating grants a year since 1977-78.

Another issue I wanted to address today was that provin- cial governments' expenditures have consistently grown faster than government grants to universities. This is simply unfair for students, who are trying nothing more than to better themselves.

I have also included figure 2 and table 2 which show that although grants to universities have increased some 8%, total provincial budgetary expenditure was to rise a projected 13.4% in 1991-92. I also must remind everyone that tuition is up 8%. Government expenditures have increased a third faster than grants given to universities.

Other public sectors have had increases in support for each individual they serve; for example, correctional institutions. These rates have all been higher than the rate of inflation. After the inflation rate, hospitals spent 38% more each day per patient in 1988-89 than in 1977-78. Universi- ties, on the other hand, spent 14% less each day for each full-time student enrolled in 1988-89 than in 1977-78.

I do not feel any government deserves to be praised when the issue is post-secondary education. It is a sector of govern- ment funding that has taken its share of abuse, and unfortu- nately the ones losing the most are not the investors in this sector but the province itself, for not investing in its future.

If this trend is to continue, then the article published in last week's Windsor Star, entitled simply "Universities Élitist?" will become cold, hard fact. Let us not forget that a university is a place where a person has the opportunity to interact with all denominations, races, nationalities, be- liefs and philosophies, which is an education in itself.

I have heard the old cliché, "You've got to help your- self before anyone will help you," many times. The students of the University of Windsor have helped themselves. Not only is a $1-million contribution from alumni hoped for, but the current student body has committed to financing $10 million of a $14-million expansion to our university centre. These are clear-cut examples that the University of Windsor students are pulling their end of the line. It is time that it gets reciprocated.

It is my deepest concern that this budget brings not only economic stability to our province but also high levels of employment to our community, Windsor. I am also con- cerned that a person be able to obtain a quality education if so desired. Most important, however, I hope this budget is the beginning of a restructuring process that will create an economy that is representative of all and allows the benefits of such an economy to be shared equally by all citizens of Ontario.

Once again, thank you for allowing me this great opportunity to express my concerns not only as a resident of Ontario but also as a student representative.

Dr Cassano: I would like to thank the committee through its Chair for the opportunity to enter some observations on the importance of the home university to this community. I am confident that the Ontario universities' case for enhanced funding and the documentation concerning historical university underfunding in this province have been fairly riveted into the memory traces of committee members by sister institutions.

I forget who it first was who made the slippery slope comment, "Just because you're paranoid doesn't mean the whole world isn't out to get you." Let me recast and say just because my observations here today do not bear on the underfunding issue does not mean that the University of Windsor is not underfunded. But I want to take a different tack.

Four years ago we decided to patriate our faculty of education, located at a four-and-a-half kilometre remove, to the main campus. Our faculty of business was bursting at the seams, so we decided to construct a new business building and move the education faculty to the vacated business building, or old business building, as it has become known. This move is taking place even as we speak. As it turned out, the province could only see its way clear to paying approximately one half of the $18.9-million figure required to construct the new building. We had to raise the other half in the private sector. We prepared the summary I am about to give in order to appeal to the business sense of the corporate community and in order to highlight the considerable economic impact of our university on its community.

The University of Windsor was established more than a century ago to meet the educational needs of Windsor-Essex county residents. Founded in 1857 as Assumption College, then nurtured by the Basilian Fathers from 1870 to 1963, the university has produced more than 50,000 alumni, the vast majority of whom live in Windsor and Essex county.

Today the university offers its 15,426 students the opportunity to study at an internationally recognized university that offers more than 124 undergraduate and 45 graduate degrees, including such professional areas as business, nursing, engineering, law and the sciences. At the same time, the university has maintained its historical legacy by offering a large number of programs in the arts and humanities. Nearly 700 faculty members offer instruction and research, 528 full-time and 149 part-time.

The university granted 2,885 degrees in 1990-91, 2,556 at the undergraduate level and 329 at the graduate level. A large percentage of the university's graduates are part-time students drawn from the community at large.

Professors annually attract $7.2 million in research grants. In 1990-91 the University of Windsor's professors had over 1,000 research grants on file, approximately value of $7.2 million. The academic staff conducts world-class research for a number of major international organizations and companies, as well as assorted Canadian and non-Canadian government agencies.

University facilities provide a focal point for the community. The university's 125-acre main campus on the banks of the Detroit River provides a focal point for the community. Its 41 buildings are home to the university's 27 academic departments, six schools, four libraries, and athletic facilities providing Windsor and Essex county with an academic city containing almost three million square feet of space for teaching, research, cultural events and athletics.

Thousands of jobs depend on the university's activities. As Windsor's fourth-largest employer, only after the City of Windsor, Three, with a staff of 1,636, the University of Windsor plays a major role in the region's economy. Out of the university's total 1990-91 expenditure of $126.5 million, 71%, or $89.8 million, went to salaries and benefits for faculty and staff. The balance of approximately $36.7 million was spent on goods and services. Analysis using methods developed by the American Council of Educational Policy reveal that the university is responsible for injecting $5 million a year into the local economy. This represents the combined local spending of the university ($16.2 million), employees ($48.7 million), students ($31.3 million) and student associations ($1.1 million).

Economists use a term known as the multiplier effect to describe how a certain policy or expenditure can create economic growth. In a local context, the multiplier effect means that the University of Windsor's spending boosts the Windsor-Essex county area's overall rate of economic activity, creating a total of $207 million of spending for local businesses and the equivalent of 4,597 jobs.

Quite apart from its economic impact, the university offers a variety of important services to the community. Its library collections, which house 1.4 million volumes, are open to the public and provide an invaluable source of reference material for residents of Windsor and Essex county. The university also provides research, consultation, information and translation services that have been widely used by area businesses, as has its Canada Employment Centre.

The university provides arts and entertainment. From film showings to theatrical presentations, from art exhibitions to public concerts and lectures, the university acts as a link between the community at large and the world of the arts.

Last, the university promotes sports and athletics. Its recreational facilities and sports medicine clinic are open to the public.

The university's faculty members serve as advisers to governments and international agencies, including NATO, the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund, the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development and others. University scientists have made advances against such diseases as multiple sclerosis and muscular dystrophy. The university's physics department has an international reputation in atomic and molecular physics and graduate studies and research.

A key ingredient in the university's rising status has been its belief in the importance of establishing contact institutions around the world. The university's faculty business administration, for example, has international projects ongoing in China, Indonesia, France, the Philippines, Kuwait and Singapore.

Serving the community: The university has also devoted itself to the needs of the city's industrial base through its innovative swing shift program, which makes university courses accessible to rotating shift workers.

The university offers a large number of programs away from its main campus, a service that has been used by thousands of students to date. It annually offers 50 courses in Wainfleet, 77 in Chatham and 12 in Wallaceburg. There are a number of courses offered to Windsor students and to students from all over the country who wish to study in Windsor, including a very large and successful program in France.

Professor Gary Becker, an internationally renowned economist at the University of Chicago, has written that the sum total of an individual's knowledge should be counted as an economic asset inasmuch as one can readily identify its impact on his or her earning power. This principle, known as the theory of human capital, is traditionally used by economists to explore the economic effects of training and education.

The university's economic impact is therefore far greater than the sum of its expenditures. Any calculation of the University of Windsor's economic effects must take into account the value of human capital that is produced. If one assumes that a university graduate will have an average lifetime earning advantage of $8,400 per annum and that he or she will work for 40 years, then without even taking inflation into account, a university degree increases its holder's earning power by $336,000. Many of the university's graduates are in the upper-income brackets of computer-related businesses, management, law, engineering or other professions with high higher lifetime wage differentials.

Approximately 60% of the university's 50,000 graduates live in the Windsor-Essex county area. In terms of human capital theory, the university's graduates represent considerable additional lifetime income for the region.

But universities do far more than conduct research and educate their students. They provide a centre for community life. From film showings to theatrical presentations, from art exhibitions presented by faculty and students to public concerts and musical series, the university serves as a link between the community at large and the world of the arts. During the school year thousands of Windsor and Essex county residents attend athletic events, banquets and other special events at the St Denis Athletic and Community Centre at the university.

The university also provides research, consultation, information and translation services that have been widely used by area businesses, as has its Canada Employment Centre. La Maison Française, for example, is a bicultural and bilingual community resource on the campus of the University of Windsor providing expert technical and general translation services for the residents of Windsor and Essex county.

The community has also been culturally enriched by the presence of a number of noted authors on campus. For example, W. O. Mitchell, who first gained national acclaim with his novel Who Has Seen the Wind?, was writer in residence from 1978 to 1987. As well, Joyce Carol Oates, one of North America's most acclaimed authors, wrote several of her novels and short stories while she was a professor of creative writing in the department of English.

I have not detailed the further economic impact of the university's capital expansion projects, which are ongoing, on the economic life of the community. I think it fair to observe that this community would be much diminished by the University of Windsor's contraction or zero growth, since the university is a major cultural, educational and economic force in this area.

The Chair: Thank you. Your presentation was very informative. We have one minute for each one of the three political parties. Could you ask the question quickly so you can get an answer from the presenters, with a short preamble.

Mr McLean: Thank you for your brief and the statistics you give. It is very enlightening. The 8% increase in student fees: There was a commitment in the last election that they would be frozen; now there is an 8% increase. What is your opinion with regard to that? The other question I have is, you said the farmers got $97 million in help. When does that take effect?

Mr Papa: To address your question about the 8% increase, I said in my presentation that it is simply unfair to do something like that to students who are trying nothing more than to better themselves. As far as the issue of the $97 million with farmers is concerned, I do not know when it is to take effect. In researching my presentation today, I came across the information and I thought it was important because there is a large portion of Essex county residents who are farmers.

Mr McLean: The important issue here is that if it had been brought in this year, it would have got effected this year, but it was not.

Mr Dadamo: On behalf of our delegation here, we thank you very much, Mr Papa. I had made several presentations as far as money is concerned to the University of Windsor in the last year. It has indeed been a pleasure to have given several million dollars on behalf of our government.

As a young individual and as president of the student council at the University of Windsor, in contacts that you have with your colleagues on a daily basis, I am sure, and some of the dialogue that you have had also, what kind of avenues should the government be looking at as far as setting aside some money is concerned? What kind of avenues are you looking at to better education?

Mr Papa: I mentioned previously that other sectors of public funding have enjoyed increases in funding per individual they represent. I am not saying these areas should not be a priority of government; I am simply saying that I think it is time education also becomes a priority of governments.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for your presentation. The official opposition have no questions.

Mr Kwinter: I did not say that.

The Chair: Oh, okay.

Mr Kwinter: There's just not enough time to ask them.

The Chair: It was a very well detailed brief, and I believe that is the reason there were no questions on it there. I would like to thank you for your attendance here at the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget review.

Mr Sutherland: Before we continue, Mr McLean's question to the presenter talked about the $97 million for farmers and wanted to know when that money is out. I just wanted, for the record, to let people know I have been talking to some farmers in my riding who have actually received their cheques already for the interest rate relief, so some of that money is out in the farmers' hands.

CANADIAN AUTO WORKERS

The Chair: The next presenter is from the Canadian Auto Workers, Mr Bob White. I would like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget review. You have one half-hour. In that period of time, leave some time at the end for questions and answers from the three parties. If you would identify yourself and your colleague for the purposes of Hansard, you can begin immediately.

Mr White: I appreciate the opportunity to be here this morning. With me are Frank McAnally, who is the president of Local 200 in Windsor and also a member of our national executive board, and Sym Gill, who is a member of our staff in the research department. We have a number of other local union people who are here with us this morning as well.

We will read the statement. I think we will probably be about 15 minutes, and it should leave another 15 minutes for some questions.

Budgets are about choices. They are statements about priorities and direction, about who will benefit and who will pay. They occur in a particular context, which sets some limits on what can and cannot be done.

The economic context: The economic context of the Ontario budget was the deepest recession since the Great Depression. More than a quarter of a million jobs were lost during this recession, almost doubling the numbers unemployed, leading to an explosion of welfare cases and accelerating growth in the dependence on food banks in this, Canada's wealthiest province.

An especially frightening aspect of the recession was the parallels to what had occurred in the United States in the early 1980s. At that time, the high US dollar and the deep recession devastated American manufacturing. Today, however, it is our dollar that is overvalued, and more than three quarters of the lost jobs have been in manufacturing. Some 200,000 jobs, almost one manufacturing job in five, have been lost. Ontario's job losses in manufacturing have been proportionately higher than those that occurred in the United States in 1981 and 1982, and compared to any past recessions, a very much higher percentage of the jobs being lost have been permanent jobs; ie, as you have heard earlier today, jobs lost through workplace closures rather than lost due to cyclical changes.

The fear was and remains that the development of the rust belt in the United States a decade ago may now be spreading into Canada.

The political context: The political context of the budget was that the 1990s began with a reversal of trend during the 1980s. A left-of-centre government had been elected in Ontario with a mandate and a commitment to do things differently.

Political analysts will debate why the NDP government was elected. One critical factor was, I believe, a reaction to the increasingly close ties between governments and business elite and the resulting impact on the rest of the province. People were asking, "Who speaks for us?" In Ontario, this was expressed in a mini-revolt and the election of an NDP government.

The hostility of the business sector was there well before the budget. The attacks on the budget by the Business Council on National Issues, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the chambers of commerce and others were articulated in terms of the deficit. There is good reason, however, to argue that their real concern was that the government was daring to move in a different direction than the federal Tories and other provincial governments.

In previous times, this government's response to a collapsing economy and the resulting suffering would have been described as relatively mild. In this period, however, where business arrogance had grown through having things very much their own way, the refusal of the NDP government to toe the line was viewed as a challenge. The suggestion that there might be an alternative to the Tory business agenda. This threat, much of business seemed to be saying, had to be stamped out.

The budget and the deficit: Contrary to the misleading information put out by the Liberals during the election campaign, the new government inherited an almost $3-billion deficit rather than a balanced budget. The consequent expansion of this deficit can be broken down into three categories.

The most important piece is the collapse of revenue due to the collapse of the economy. Even with some of the tax increases, government revenue actually fell during the recession, something that had not occurred in recent memory. This was compounded by the $1.6-billion reduction in the federal government's transfer payments. Second, and without considering any improvements in social assistance, the rising welfare case load caused by the economic collapse added another $1.4 billion to the deficit. These two factors, along with other normal, ongoing increases in spending such as those for education, health, roads and so on would have led to a deficit of about $8 billion even without new initiatives.

The third factor, which accounts for the rest of the $9.7-billion deficit, was new government initiative in areas like social assistance, the wage protection fund, equity, support for research and development and the expansion of municipal projects in communities like Windsor.

A group of 59 economists, primarily university professors, recently responded to the budget's critics and argued that in the context of what is happening in the province, relative to the federal government's approach, "The Ontario budget is much to be preferred, and is the one which should be pursued in concert by both levels of government."

earlier, as was mentioned, the Conference Board of Canada's chief economist—somebody I do not usually like to quote—had stated that if Ontario had taken measures to reduce the deficit at last year's level, "We could easily have ended up with a much longer recession."

Budgets and choices: It is ironic that so much of the discussion in Ontario and Canada has been on the deficit, when in the United States even right-wing and establishment economists are talking less about the large deficit in the federal budget and more about the more fundamental issues of where the money goes and who pays.

Business in Ontario cannot hide behind the deficit. If business wants to reduce the budget, they have to tell us what they would like to see increased and which programs they would like to see cut. If the Treasurer were to announce that in the name of balancing the budget he was introducing a new emergency tax on business and the wealthy, I do not quite expect he would wake up the next morning to find he had become a pariah among the well-to-do.

Where does business stand on tax reform?

Do they want more of the health care costs shifted to the private sector, thereby reducing the government deficit?

Is business arguing that we should spend less on education? Whatever reforms our educational system might need, it is difficult to imagine that investing less is consistent with the improvements that are necessary.

Are they arguing for cutbacks in research assistance?

Are they suggesting that collective agreements signed in good faith should be ripped up, as other provinces have done?

Do they deny that our physical infrastructure needs to be maintained? Americans are now generally feeling and regretting the real costs of the Reagan years with the underinvestment in the nation's cities, environment and transportation system.

Do they think we should aggravate the recession and the shortage of affordable housing by cutting back on housing?

Does business think it was a mistake for the government to maintain some 70,000 jobs by refusing to take money out of the economy at this time, or for it to advance needed municipal and other projects to create 14,000 desperately needed jobs?

Is business saying that individuals laid off because of Canada's insane monetary policies, the goods and services trade agreement and the Canada-US free trade agreement, and then compensated by cuts in unemployment insurance that force them to live on welfare, should be denied welfare cheques? Do they consider it overly generous to provide workers who face workplace closures with some guarantees that they will at least get what they are contractually owed?

Future budgets: I would like to raise before this committee a number of issues regarding future budgets.

The first one is consultation. The expansion of the tax on fuel-inefficient vehicles highlights a concern we have with improving budget consultations. We were not contented about this tax, nor was the industry, and the tax, in its original form, did not seem to make anyone happy. To the credit of the government, it was flexible enough to modify the tax when the constituencies reached a consensus that was consistent with the government's intentions. In the interim, however, there was a great deal of perhaps unnecessary aggravation. I am not sure of the answer, but there must be some more open and accessible mechanism for involving people in the budgetary process without undermining any legitimate concerns there might be with confidentiality.

The social agenda: As we emphasized earlier, the social initiatives taken in this budget were relatively modest. The budget indicated directions rather than comprehensively addressing reform, and future budgets will have to focus on completing the government's mandate on expanding child care, welfare reform, training, worker adjustment, more substantial commitments to co-op housing, assistance to the disabled and on addressing the environmental crisis. There are also, of course, a number of social issues of particular concern to the labour movement, like anti-scab legislation and other labour reforms, that are not budgetary items.

Social programs must be paid for. Although the deficit was absolutely appropriate for the times, expanded programs require more tax revenue. Yet there does seem to be a tax weariness among the population. Does this undermine the government's future programs?

I think not, as long as the issue is put in the broader context. Canadians are generally prepared to pay higher taxes if the benefit of the tax is clear and if the tax load is equitable. For example, polls have made it clear that Canadians would accept a green tax if the revenue was in fact targeted to the environment, and they accept taxation to maintain a viable health system.

Support for social programs could therefore be sustained by actively mobilizing support for these programs, as has been the case for the environment; economic growth and rising real wages to ease the tax burden on otherwise stagnating incomes; including progressive tax reform alongside any expansion of services; eliminating the waste in government, which also undermines the credibility of legitimate programs, through a task force that includes public sector workers. Here, savings could be used to provide expanded services.

Economic development: The budget dealt with the immediate crisis facing Ontario. There were some useful signals regarding economic policy and some supportive investments in infrastructure, but there was no comprehensive economic strategy.

The development of such a strategy does not have to wait for future budgets, though ultimately it will mean major financial investments. Such a strategy would have to address fundamental trade issues—managed trade versus free trade—would have to focus on sectoral strategies, and would have to create funding sources for the policy.

One government proposal for accumulating the necessary funds is through worker-financed venture funds. We want to get a clearer sense of what the government has in mind here, but at this point we are not enamoured of a solution that depends on workers, who are already seeing their incomes squeezed, to transform the economy by investing money they do not have in ventures that bankers and capitalists find too risky.

In discussing provincial industrial strategies, it is critical to address the relationship with the federal government.

The policies that Ottawa has been pursuing are undermining and will continue to undermine anything the province can do.

The issue, I want to emphasize, is not whether the province should have more power to pursue its agenda. We are committed to the vital importance of a strong leading role at the national level. The issue, rather, is the direction Ottawa has chosen. The solution is not the devolution of power to the provinces, but to reverse the destructive policies of the federal government.

Let me conclude. The election did not radically change the nature of power in this province, but the electorate has spoken and the rules have been changed. Business can ignore the new reality and simply work to defeat or sabotage this government, risking that its input will likewise be ignored, or it can attempt to develop a working relationship to address the economic needs of the province.

The problems in our provincial economy were there long before anyone contemplated the NDP would become the government. The well-known weaknesses in our economic structure, such as low levels of research, development and training, are failures of past policies and past and current business practices. The issue today is, what does business have to offer in the way of ideas to reverse this weakness?

What are the positive interventions governments can make to strengthen the economic base? Is there a need for financial assistance or new institutions to provide technical and marketing expertise? Can business itself, with government help, develop partnerships among groups of firms to do research, develop new products or work on specific components and subsystems? Is there a role for an import-replacement office to audit companies in order to assess the potential to buy domestically what is currently being imported and then to find firms or groups of firms that can work to satisfy these opportunities?

This particular budget was only one element of the provincial changes the election of an NDP government will bring. The debates over direction and the pace of change will continue, but it is not good enough, and certainly not constructive, for business and its spokespersons to simply call for less rights for working people, more rights for corporations and cuts in our social standards.

For the labour movement, the starting principle is that the solutions of the society's elite are neither the best nor the only possible direction open to us. We have experienced the false promises and the harsh realities of the Conservative business agenda at home and this direction has been similarly exposed as a failed solution to improving the quality of life in the UK and the United States.

The great strength and potential of democracy is that other alternatives can be developed. As the process of change continues, the labour movement is determined to play an independent but aggressive and positive leadership role in helping to develop alternatives and shape the kind of society Ontario can become.

Mr Jamison: Thank you, Mr White, for taking the time to make the presentation to the committee. I found it very interesting. I would like to touch on a topic you broached in your submission, one that has bothered me up to this point, and again, it is one where the detractors of the budget are indicating that this government should have cut back in the time of recession. I would like your opinion on that. Furthermore, since you have talked to a wide and diverse range of people in the position that you hold, I wonder if, in talking to any of the business community, they have indicated to you where they would have cut back.

Mr White: I think what we have going on in Ontario today is a debate about whether or not the economic policy this government has adopted in a time of recession is the correct one, or whether the economic policy of slash and cut is the correct one. I think it is a fair debate. We come down on the side that thinks the economic policy as indicated by this budget is in fact the correct one. When you have a program of high interest rates, high dollar, mass job losses and free trade, and unemployment insurance cutbacks and welfare case load increases in the community, you cannot throw those people to the wolves and say "It's survival of the fittest time." You have to have some kind of monetary and fiscal policy, as well as compassionate speeches, which a lot of business people have, but you have to put something there.

A lot of the business community I notice are lining up for large grants for failing businesses, and saying to the government of Ontario: "We need some help to get through this time. We need some help because our business needs modernization. We need some help because of the downturn in the economy." It seems to me that those arguments are just as properly made by people on welfare, unemployment insurance, etc., "We need help." Therefore I think the direction is the correct direction for the government to take. I do not think it is a wrong debate to have, but it is the correct direction.

As I point out in our presentation—we will not have time to pursue it—if you look at the economies that have pursued this sort of cutting at times of great economic difficulties, you will find a vast widening of the gap between the rich and the poor. You will find a lot of people who are struggling through our society, and I think the government has the correct approach.

I think Mr Kwinter said to an earlier presentation "There's no indication that you're going to turn things around." There are some figures that say, if the economic recovery takes place, you are back to almost a $3-billion deficit, which is where you were when you took over, so I think this is the correct approach. When you have the GST and all these other things, when you have massive unemployment, what do you say to people, "Survive by yourselves; there is no help coming"? I think this is the direction to go.

Mr Sutherland: Mr White, thank you for being here and giving some positive suggestions on what can be done. I wanted to focus specifically on the CAW. Could you give us some estimate of exactly how many CAW members have lost their jobs in the last three years?

Mr White: We are certainly talking well into the thousands because of the significant restructuring going on in the auto industry, caused by free trade and the move to Mexico. You are seeing an enormous change in the auto parts sector. It has just been devastated in Ontario; we have lost thousands and thousands of jobs. In Windsor, the Chatham the Metro Toronto area, it is auto, but it is all over the place. There is no question our country has gone through a recession; we are going through a massive restructuring which is really part of an economic policy. For our Prime Minister to announce the recession is over—there are a lot of people who do not see much difference today, quite frankly.

Mr Sutherland: In terms of your members, are we talking about members who are losing their homes, that sort of thing?

Mr White: Of course, because of the fact that a lot of auto parts companies, etc., are concentrated in communities in Ontario: places like Collingwood where people have been laid off from auto parts jobs that were not high-paying, but they were getting $10, $12 an hour, and now are trying to find jobs in restaurants or motels at less than minimum wage or whatever. Those people cannot keep their families together. I think about the incidence of family violence, the increase in health care costs, people losing their homes—we talk a lot about business bankruptcies, but personal bankruptcies of workers losing their homes have been on the increase dramatically in the last two years.

Mr Hayes: I have talked to presidents of corporations that have closed in Ontario and moved out. The argument they have given me was that free trade, high interest rates, an inflated Canadian dollar and the GST on top of that, made the issues that kept them uncompetitive. You deal with a lot of different corporations. Are you getting this message?

Mr White: There is no question that a lot of the jobs that have been lost in Ontario are because of free trade, the high Canadian dollar, high interest rates. The high Canadian dollar wiped out about 20% competitive advantage for a lot of the Canadian manufacturing sector. No businessmen have ever told me they were leaving Canada because of the deficit or leaving Ontario because of the deficit. In fact, they are leaving because the economic policies of high interest rates and a high Canadian dollar have wiped out an enormous competitive advantage to them here. I think that is very obvious for anybody to see.

When you introduce free trade with a giant, that is bad enough, but then you tie people's hands behind their backs. You even have people like my good friend John Crispo going to the Conservative convention in Toronto and saying, "What we did is shoot ourselves in the foot after free trade because of the economic policies we brought into place in this country." I guess what the Ontario government is trying to do is plug some loopholes, put a finger in the dike. But businesses are not moving because of the deficit.

Mr Kwinter: Mr White, I always enjoy listening to you and I want to thank you for coming. I have a couple of observations about your comments and then I would like to ask you a question. I find there is an absolute antibusiness bias to all your remarks. I think everybody would admit that all the wisdom does not rest on one side. Labour has made some mistakes too. Any objective observer looking at Algoma and de Havilland would see that labour played a role in those problems.

On page 3, you say the new government inherited a $3-billion deficit. There seems to be a lapse in memory that when the government took over, it was six months into that fiscal period, so it had half the responsibility. The election was in September; the fiscal period ends March 31. When they found the books and the quarterly report in October, there was a $750-million shortfall. Decisions were made—and you are now trying to pull out one of them, on the SkyDome, to write that off. There was a decision to write down the UTDC exposure, and the government made a conscious decision.

The Treasurer appeared before our committee and I asked him what the deficit was going to be. He said it was going to be $2.5 billion. About five weeks later he stood in the House and he said it was now going to be $3.5 billion. That was the government's decision, it was not the previous government's decision, and I think you do everybody a disservice by saying it inherited that deficit. There is no question that there were systemic problems that created it, but it was a government decision to do that.

The other thing I would like to talk about is the gas guzzler tax. You state on page 6 that it was consistent with the government's intention, that it made an adjustment. The intention and the rationale—I was the one who raised it on day one. I have to say in all modesty that I was the one who pushed the government to do something about that gas guzzler tax. You were in favour of the budget, and it was only after your members started to give you some flak that you put pressure on the government to change it. That tax was hailed as an environmental issue and that is why it was there. When they restructured it, it became a tax revenue measure, because they put the tax on virtually every single car in Ontario, with very few exceptions.

Those are just some of the comments, but there is one question that I would love to get your response to. I attended the World Economic Forum in Davos and I was on a panel with the American undersecretary of commerce and the chief of staff of the President of Mexico, discussing the North American free trade agreement. The chief of staff of Mexico, Mr Cordoba, stated that by the year 2000 they would be building 4.5 million cars a year in Mexico. I met with the president of General Motors and he tells me he has four engine plants, one in St Catharines, two in the United States and one in Mexico. The most productive, most efficient and highest quality engine they turn out is being turned out in Mexico.

Interjections.

Mr Kwinter: This is his statement. Do not give me a tough time. I am telling you what he told me. I am just asking for your comment. How do you and the auto workers respond to that? I am not being judgemental, I am just repeating what he told me. I am not saying I believe it or I do not believe it. I just want to get your response.

Mr White: Let me try to deal with some of the comments you made. First of all, let me put the de Havilland thing in perspective. I just talked to somebody who is in de Havilland. Boeing will tell you that 80% of de Havilland's problems have nothing to do with labour, they have to do with the organization and management. I cannot speak to Algoma.

Our brief is not antibusiness. The reaction of the business community to this government and to this budget has been terrible. It has been vitriolic, it has been unnecessary and terrible, and I for one in this province am not going to sit quietly and take no position on that. Quite frankly, it has much more to do with stopping an agenda. We are not antibusiness. I deal with business people every day of my life, but I am going to speak up on behalf of working people whether the business community likes it or not. It does not matter to me, quite frankly.

You raise the SkyDome issue. What you ignore is that your government signed cheques for up to $565 million to go into the SkyDome. You talk about fiscal planning and budgetary restraint. We are trying to solve the problem. When you talk about UTDC, those are things we talked about. When a business is in trouble, people have made those kinds of decisions. So those things are bound to happen. We are not talking about being antibusiness. We sit down and work out business decisions all the time. Chrysler Corp in the United States has made a decision to invest most of its North American car production in the Bramalea plant. They have decided they will put three shifts on in the Windsor plant when necessary to build mini-vans, the best mini-vans they build in the world. Those were decisions made by business people whom we deal with every day.

Let me get to your question about the North American auto industry. One of our great concerns, of course, is that under the Canada-US free trade agreement, we gave up an important part of the North American auto industry in terms of protection for Canada by giving up the Canadian content requirement. Now we are into a North American content deal.

Of course, the concern for us in the future is that Mexico is a place to which the next wave of auto investment can go. It is not just a question of quality, it is a question of cost structures in Mexico, and we have to be concerned about that. But what is our government doing today? It is saying the auto pact is not going to be on the table, when in fact we know it is. You are not going to sit down and work out a free trade agreement with Mexico without discussing autos. I had a meeting with the President of Mexico when he was in Ottawa. He asked for a meeting with me and I went and met with him. So our concern is how we address this auto thing within the Canada-US-Mexico discussions. It seems to me the best way we have to get at it, but nobody seems to be listening, is to get back to some kind of requirement for Canada in terms of investment and content for the United States and for Mexico.

The facts are that those kinds of discussions are on and businesses are making those kinds of decisions. I do not think it is good enough just for business to say, "We're going to take our employment from Canada and put it into Mexico because we can make more money." Where is the commitment of the business community to this country? It is not happening in Germany. The West Germans are not taking investment out of West Germany and putting into East Germany, they are putting investment into East Germany and keeping the jobs in West Germany as well.

Mr Carr: I want to say, just off the bat, that I think even though all three parties would disagree with you on some issues, there is a tremendous amount of respect for you personally. I want to thank you for coming here today. In fact, I agree, I think the Liberals were bad managers, well, so we are agreed on one thing.

I had our friends in legislative research—independent research. I might add, because they do not work for any of the political parties—put together a cost of what the debt will be. As you know, at the end of the mandate we will be spending about $7.8 billion just on interest alone. That is not for health care, the environment or any of these other programs; it is just to pay the interest. That works out to $583 million a month, $134 million a week, $19 million a day, or $800,000 per hour. In fact, I have five minutes to talk to you here in my questioning, and during that period of time the interest on the provincial debt alone will be $65,000, which is more than your average worker makes in an hour and in the amount of time it takes—this is a one-minute sand clock—we will spend $13,000 just on the interest alone.

I was wondering what your feeling is with the average person out there, who says that is a total waste of money to pay just interest on the debt alone of $13,000 a minute.

Mr White: You cannot ask a person, "What would you think of spending $13,000 a minute on interest?" You have to ask him what is the alternative. With great respect, the best we can do is make an argument on the difference between what the deficit would have been if they had done nothing and what they did in terms of the extra programs. So the deficit has gone up to about $1.3 billion.

A lot depends on interest rates. When the Tories were running around this country talking about a deficit, they kept backing up John Crow on interest rates and the deficit was going higher because of interest rates. A great deal depends on the interest rate, and you have to look at what it is going to be in terms of economic recovery.

What I do not understand is business communities making major long-term investments and going out on a limb with the hope of getting a return. If you take the aerospace industry, for example, that Mr Kwinter raised, Boeing will make an investment of probably a billion dollars or more investment to get in place a 747, much more than a billion dollars, and go into debt to get it. It will take 10 years to get the return on that because it takes a long time to get that into production and start to sell the plane and start to get them back. That is how the business community does it every day. Some of them fail. The Dofasco investment in Sault Ste Marie where they wiped off $100 million—they are the same business people who are lecturing the Ontario government about fiscal responsibility.

You have to put the deficit into perspective. If you say to people "Is this bad?" they might say yes. You say: "Is it better to cut back on health care costs? Is it better to cut back on welfare?" They will say "No, there has to be some other choices." So I guess the question is, what are the choices?

Mr Carr: We all are aware of the interest rates, because in fact in the early 1980s I had to renew my mortgage when Mr Trudeau was in power—21%. Many people live in their homes there, and people like even Robert Trudeau, who has gone out on a limb, knows about interest rates and what happens when you overextend yourself. That is what we are saying is the government did the same thing. My next question relates to the commitment made by the government. I guess a lot of people would say if the government said it was going to do this last year in the middle of the election campaign—I have the Agenda for People, where it talks about what it was going to spend in terms of money and what it said to the people, notwithstanding the fact that it got only 38% and 25% of the vote from people who actually were eligible to vote. But people say, "They won the election, they can do whatever they want." Their costs, they said, were going to be net $1.8 billion over two years. Then we ended up, of course, that over two years we are going to have an $18-billion deficit. What do you say to people who said, "If you were going to do this last year at this time, you should have had the political courage to say that you were going to do it?" Well, really all that you did was say one thing during an election campaign and then, whammo, we ended up with an $18-billion deficit instead of the $1.842 billion that you had in the Agenda for People, which I have in front of me. What do you say to people who say you should have done that last year at this time that this is what you were going to do to us?

Mr White: You have to put in perspective what they are entitled, with great respect to Mr Kwinter, as to what the economy looked like and what the numbers were. The government has to defend itself, and I guess that is what it is attempting to do in terms of what its program is. I think the Treasurer of Ontario has been very up front in terms of what the problems are. He did not try to hide the deficit from some other governments have done. He said, "This is the problem and this is what we are trying to do." I guess the people in the next election will make their determination as to whether this is the appropriate way to go or not.

The Chair: I would like to thank you, Mr White, for your presentation.

ONTARIO SECONDARY SCHOOL TEACHERS' FEDERATION

The Chair: Would the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation, Mike Walsh, come forward. I would like to welcome you here to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs, and the budget review. You are from the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation and you have one half-hour to make your presentation. At the end of your presentation, within that one half-hour, try to save some time for questions and answers. If you would identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard.

Mr Walsh: My name is Mike Walsh, and I am the president of District 1, Windsor, Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation. With me is Tom Henderson, the district treasurer of the same organization. Tom is going to begin our presentation, and we will certainly be within the time limits and hopefully leave plenty of time for questions.

Mr Henderson: Sixty years ago the cold-hearted policies of Prime Minister Bennett in Canada and President Hoover in the United States squeezed the poor and less fortunate, all in the name of fiscal responsibility. Unfortunately for most of us, the government of Canada has copied a page from their book. But on behalf of the members of the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation in Windsor, we applaud the Treasurer of Ontario for taking a different path from the federal Tories and other provincial governments by not slashing back in these times of recession.

We are aware that criticism of any provincial budget is an integral part of the political process, but both the Envoies and Insight Canada polls taken since last September indicate public support for social spending. We believe that a fair test of any society is how it treats its most unfortunate citizens, and we are troubled by what happens when the federal government decides to walk away from the support programs.

The Ontario government has dared to be different by striking a balance between fiscal responsibility and caring for people. By cutting payments to hospitals and other agencies, the NDP would have shown the same meanness of spirit that the feds aptly demonstrated when they trimmed back $1.6 billion over two years in transfer payments to the province of Ontario.

With regard to downloading of costs on municipalities and counties, needless to say our federation has always been opposed to it. Previous provincial governments have unfortunately made this a common practice. This budget, however, increased provincial grants to school boards and our own Windsor Board of Education did very well as a result of the increased grants. Locally, the education mill rate was pegged at 3.8% for public school ratepayers, which was the lowest in many years. The higher grants provided improvements to school buildings and school grounds and we are happy to report that no classrooms or programs were closed because of lack of money.

However, we would ask the government certain things. The first recommendation is that we realize that costs go up when efficiency goes down. In a 1985 Decima poll, 78% of Ontario residents supported unified school boards between separate and public. These unified school boards, we think, offer a solution to costly duplication of services which a double school system brings with it.

Mr Walsh: Education costs are borne primarily by local taxation. In 1975 the province of Ontario paid 60% of the actual costs of education. By 1986 the provincial share had fallen to 34% and has been dropping ever since. The government should restore the provincial share to the 1975 levels. This budget does not restore to the 60% level, last achieved in 1975.

The 1986 Macdonald Commission on the Financing of Elementary and Secondary Education reported to the last government that we recommend a higher rate of provincial support, such as a co-ordinated move towards 60% of the approved costs in the near future. Macdonald also recommended that provincial grant ceilings should be set at a realistic level, keeping pace with inflation, and "additional provincial grants should accompany any upward adjustment in the ceilings." We still wait for the full implementation of this recommendation.

Macdonald did recommend the pooling of commercial and industrial assessments and this is being implemented, but his suggestion that coterminous boards develop co-operative service units has seen little development. The OSSTF's proposal of a unified umbrella board promises to save Ontario taxpayers millions of dollars if it is implemented. The savings would come from reduced administration costs and reduced capital requirements. We suggest that this be vigorously pursued in the future.

It is clear in Windsor that the government's anti-recession capital grants, which have meant $2.5 million to the Windsor public board, will bring direct benefit to a large number of Windsor schools. The money is to be used for roofing a number of school buildings, both elementary and secondary, and replacement of furnaces and the like. These improvements will also have spin-offs for local construction companies and their employees. As you all know, Windsor's economy is in very poor shape and any help is clearly needed.

We also applaud the allocation of funds for pay equity. We represent a group of English-as-a-second-language instructors employed by the Windsor board. They are almost exclusively women. They are trained as teachers. They work as full-time teachers, but they are paid, for full-time work, between $16,000 and $18,000 a year. We are hopeful that this group will directly benefit from pay equity adjustments.

We are certain of wide public support for the budget's anti-recession strategy, an effort that will strengthen our province over the long term. If some critics are too narrow-minded to see the far-reaching dividends of this approach, then the government will have to carry on despite their opposition and threats.

Mrs Sullivan: I was interested in your brief, and I know there have been some issues on the philosophical side of the delivery of education that are problematic. But I want to go back to the time when the Minister of Education, having come out of the election campaign with a promise of 60% operating transfers to local levels, came before our committee and indicated that the promise she had made publicly for 60% operating included teachers' pensions. It included all capital, it included ceilings on expenditure and it included operating. I want to know if that was your understanding of what the New Democratic Party's promise was in relationship to 60% of funding.

Mr Walsh: Our understanding of return to 60% funding did not include payments for teacher pensions because those payments were not included in the original 60% rate in 1975. So to this point, that promise has not been achieved.

Mrs Sullivan: The operating transfers have decreased.

Mr Walsh: That is not information I have, but it may be so. When we compare the response of this government to the funding of education with the responses of every other provincial government in the country, we can only get a sense of relief that it has not implemented the kind of savagery on education budgets that the other provinces have.

In our presentation to you, I think I made it clear we still believe that a 60% level of funding is something that ought to be achieved because that should be borne by the provincial level of government and a smaller proportion should be on the backs of the local taxpayers. But at least this budget has led in Windsor to a mill rate increase of 3.8%, as my colleague indicated.

We have a group of trustees on our board who are of the tax revolt group and it is pretty hard for them to be excited about that measure of increase, which is below the level of inflation. I think this is to the credit of the government in the grants that have come forward to our board.

In the long term, however, I would like to say again that the 60% level is something that we hope this government lives up to its promise on over the term of this government, perhaps in happier economic times a year or two down the road.

Mrs Sullivan: And that 60% is not to include teacher pension funding.

Mr Walsh: That is correct.

Mr Solá: I would like to go back to what Bob Walsh had to say in the previous delegation, because your presentation seemed to be similar to his. He stated budgets about choices, about who will benefit and who will pay. It seems to me this budget has avoided the choices, because they have pinpointed who will benefit and they have allocated the benefits, but they have ignored the other side of the equation about who will pay.

You have yourself mentioned in your statement that there is an anti-tax group here, a tax-fighting group. The one thing I have noticed both during the election and especially since, that taxation seems to be the number one priority of practically every member of the public in my riding at most of the functions I attend. How do you address the fact that the people who pay the tab have been ignored by this budget?

Mr Walsh: In reference to the tax revolt at the local level, I think it is reflective of anger at the amount that is paid by local taxpayers through home ownership taxes through paying rates on businesses and properties. I think this needs to be addressed and I think I commented on that on the last question.

As far as the tax revolt generally is concerned, it would be my suggestion to you that the thing that struck the nerve on taxes more than anything else is the GST. The GST has just sent people into orbit. I have heard a number of people talk about Americans coming over to Windsor and picking up the bill for their being in a restaurant. They usually want to pay their 15% gratuity, unlike many of us Canadians, then on top of that is the provincial sales tax and on top of that is the GST. They just make statements like "We're not coming here again." It is amazing the number of conversations just this week among friends I have heard this from. I think it is the GST that has really caused a lot of the anger you see out there on taxes.

It is quite clear that at some point in the future all of us are going to have to pay for any deficits that are rung

But I think Mr White answered the question very fully and clearly when he said that any major corporation makes major investments on the basis that at some time in the future it is going to reap the rewards from that. Going into a deficit now at a time when the economy is in a recession—what else can a responsible government do?

Mr McLean: In your remarks with regard to the extra funding for the separate school system, I believe you indicated it would be better with one school system. Would I be correct in saying that you had kind of intimated that in your remarks?

Mr Walsh: Actually, you reflect on my personal belief, that is not the position we are putting forward. We are putting forward the concept of an umbrella unified school board where you would still have elected separate school trustees, elected public school trustees, but you would not have the sort of situation we have in Ontario now where we have an administration structure for each of those school boards. We have support services for those school boards, transport services for those school boards.

Mr McLean: Under the British North America Act under the Constitution that we have here in Canada today, that Constitution says there shall be two fully funded school systems, a Roman Catholic system and a Protestant school system. How do you expect the government of Ontario or anywhere in Canada to change its funding system when that is in the Constitution?

Mr Walsh: We are not asking for the Constitution to be breached and we are not asking for the separate schools to be funded. Those decisions were made in the wisdom of the electorate and it was an all-party decision, so we are not asking for that to change. All we are suggesting to the government is that there is a good deal of duplication and waste because there is not more co-ordination of the activities of school boards. All taxpayers, I believe, would support the efforts made in that direction without breaching the British North America Act.

I do not think it is a Protestant school system, is it?

Mr McLean: That is what the Constitution reads.

The 60% funding for schools, which has been mentioned earlier, was a commitment that was made. As a matter of fact, a year ago today the Agenda for People was published and it became a public document where they were berating the Liberals for not keeping their promise of 60%. Today, I understand that the percentage has gone down even from that it was when they took power. What are you saying to the government today with regard to the funding?

Mr Walsh: I thought I was pretty clear in my presentation and in response to an earlier question when I said we all expect this government to honour its commitment to the 60% level, and in the definitions we discussed when Mr Sullivan was questioning me. We expect that commitment to the 60% level to be lived up to during the life of this government. We understand that in the present economic climate they have probably done as well as we could have expected, and we thank them for not cutting it back even further, but over the long term, we want to see the 60% lived up to.

Mr McLean: Last Thursday the OSSTF in Toronto made a presentation to us. They indicated very strongly they support the budget and they blame business for not paying its fair share. Do you have those same views?

Mr Walsh: I was not privy to the remarks they made in that regard. I think the whole tax system does need to be looked at. I would not want to be sharing that sentiment without seeing very clearly what it is that they said, so the answer, I guess, is no at this point.

Mr McLean: That is your own personal observation.

Mr Walsh: Yes.

Mr Dadamo: Mr Walsh and Mr Henderson, thank you for appearing before the committee here this morning in Windsor. I want to make a couple of observations, then I will lead us into the question I want to ask either one of you.

First of all, the Prime Minister of this country has designed a grant scheme to withhold about $1.8 billion in transfer payments to Ontario, and most of that money, we know, was earmarked towards education and health. The social programs have to continue. We obviously have had to go to the taxpayers of the province to make up that $1.8 billion.

I also want to say that the past Liberal government left this province in a virtual fiscal mess. They said there was a surplus during the election last year; we found, of course, a massive deficit.

What I would like to ask is, how can this current government best help your organization to fulfil your mandate?

Mr Walsh: In relation to the cutback in the transfer payments from the federal government, actually it has grown. In our presentation it was only $1.6 billion, you said $1.8 billion, but whichever, it is a major cutback in support for the social fabric of our society. I think I made and my colleague made remarks which covered that.

I would say at this point in time the government has not lived up to its 60% promise, but we understand that it has not because of the circumstances that it has been placed in, circumstances that clearly were not foreseen by the present government or by the Liberal government prior to this, because certainly during the election the Liberals were indicating that the province was in surplus, and it did turn around very dramatically, too dramatically for your government to have had any impact on it. Speaking for our organization, I would say the budget does as well as we could have expected in the present economic circumstances.

Mr B. Ward: I am pleased to see that you support the direction our government is taking. We have been up north, Thunder Bay, Sault Ste Marie, Sudbury, and we have heard from a broad cross-section of the communities in the north. By and large, I have to say there is strong support for the direction our government is taking, particularly with this budget. Whether they are social groups, whether they are environmental groups, whether they are small business people, whether they are educational groups, across the board there is strong support for the direction we are taking. However, there are some critics for this budget.

Mrs Sullivan: Come on, come on.

Mr B. Ward: Primarily the critics are attacking the deficit and are suggesting that we should be cutting back on our social programs, on our educational standards, on our commitment to providing quality education for the people of Ontario—

Mrs Sullivan: You have all heard those arguments. Point of order, Mr Chairman.

Mr B. Ward: How do you answer that criticism that we should be cutting our educational standards, our educational system, which is the prosperity through the future?

The Vice-Chair: Mrs Sullivan.

Mrs Sullivan: I have a point of order, Mr Chairman: The member is providing information to witnesses and to the public here that in fact does not reflect much of what we have heard through the province in our hearings so far. I think that, to be fair, if we are going to proceed in these hearings, which in fact have been less than successful throughout our tour, we should at least be honest with the people who are appearing before us.

The Vice-Chair: Mrs Sullivan, that is not a point of order. Mr Ward, your question?

Mr B. Ward: My question is, what answer would you have to the critics who would like to see a more balanced budget? In fact to achieve that balanced budget, suggestions have been made to cut our education standards and the quality of education which is supplied in this province that we tried to maintain during these tough economic times.

Mrs Sullivan: Point of order, Mr Chairman: Not one person has made those suggestions.

The Vice-Chair: Mrs Sullivan, that is not a point of order, that is a point of information. Mr Ward, you have asked your question. Could we have a response from the presenters, please.

Mr Walsh: Clearly, one of the things that seems to be at the top of the public agenda, it is in the media all the time, is the competitiveness of the Ontario, indeed the Canadian economy with respect to the rest of the world. We hear a lot about a lot of pressure to become a much lower-wage economy so that we can become competitive with the Mexicans and so on and so forth.

I suggest to you that is a model your government should indeed resist, and I believe in this budget has resisted, because the approach we should be following is one that I think is modelled better by some of the Western European countries, which is to remain high-wage economies for the people working in those countries and to have economic success on the basis of a competitiveness which is driven by technology and by higher productivity. The only way I know that you can achieve that is through investment in education. There is no better investment. There is no better way to spend your money.

I think at the same time that we need to be careful. We can spend a lot of money on education and not become more competitive and not get leadership in technology, so we need to spend carefully and we need to evaluate closely how we are spending the money, but there is no better investment.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for your presentation and for appearing before this committee.

AIDS COMMITTEE OF WINDSOR

The Chair: The next presenter is the AIDS Committee of Windsor. Please come forward. I welcome you to standing committee on finance and economic affairs on budget review. I see that you have a presentation. You have a total of one half-hour for your presentation. In that half hour, try to keep some time for questions and answers from the three parties here. If you would identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard, you can begin your presentation.

Mr Lough: My name is Steve Lough. I am the executive director of the AIDS Committee of Windsor.

From the viewpoint of the community-based AIDS education and support movement, the 1991 Ontario budget is a progressive response to the challenges facing this province. This period of serious recession and the epidemic of HIV infection necessitate increased, well-planned government spending to avoid stalling the important developments in our society.

As I see it, there are basically two options open to government if it wants to cut its spending: it can cut spending in corporate or capital support, or it can cut spending in social support. As we are told every day, competition is fierce. Capital today is international, and it moves quickly if it finds a better home. So if a government does not want to scare away capital, it can only cut social programs. Unfortunately, cutting spending on social support is the simplest solution, and, like all simple solutions, it is near-sighted and doomed in the long term to failure.

The central elements of a community-based response to AIDS are the building of individual self-esteem and creation of co-operative and comprehensive structures rooted in the communities affected. Individual self-esteem is a prerequisite to an individual avoiding risky behavior and taking responsibility for his own health. Government programs of legal, health and social support are vital to the creation of an environment in which people have the value as a human being recognized and supported by major structures around them.

Cost-efficient and effective health care and social programs can only be achieved through comprehensive and co-ordinated action. It is the role of the government to provide the resources and facilitate that co-ordination. The government follows through with its commitment, stated in the budget, to build partnerships, the answers to the problem of burgeoning health and social service costs will be found in the community by the people who are directly affected and involved.

The fact that the government chose to fight the recession rather than fight the deficit with its 1991 budget is a progressive move that will, in the long term, save lives and bring a higher quality of life to the citizens of Ontario. The response will only be cost-efficient and effective if the community is supported in developing the programs that are necessary.

To expand a little bit on the importance of individual self-esteem in terms of primary prevention of HIV infection in the 10 years since the discovery of the human immunodeficiency virus—HIV—several strategies for stopping the spread of HIV have been advocated and attempted around the world. Legal sanctions, quarantine, mandatory testing and restrictions on immigration have all been proven to fective and costly responses. They have been ineffective because they have attacked and blamed the communities affected by this pandemic rather than working with them. National advertising campaigns have not been cost-efficient because they are remote and do not involve people directly in taking responsibility for their behaviour and assist them in changing that behaviour. Behaviour change is the only way that the spread of HIV can be reduced.

Experts now agree that education must be targeted and must involve the group the program is attempting to reach. These communities that have been hit first and the hardest by HIV infection in North America have been social outcasts: the gay community and injection drug users. The community of people with haemophilia too suffers from stigma of rejection and the resultant secrecy. Social and legal support for these individuals and the development of their communities is necessary if we hope to gain their involvement in prevention efforts to stop the spread of HIV. If one does not belong to a socially and legally recognized and accepted community, it is unlikely that the person will see society's prevention messages as legitimate. If, however, one is accepted legally, supported socially and invited to share his expertise and involvement to the issue, behaviour change is more likely.

It is also recognized that there is a hierarchy of needs for an individual. One is not likely to change years of learned behaviour in sexual expression, substance use or social interaction if basic needs for food, shelter and employment have not been met, nor can one successfully overcome years of social and economic abandonment if the world around one does not support that struggle. Civil rights, social assistance programs and low-cost housing are requisites to successful AIDS education. These programs have a direct impact on HIV prevention programs. The social environment must be there for prevention messages to be integrated into people's behaviour.

Secondary AIDS prevention: We now know that not all people who are HIV-positive go on to develop AIDS, and those who do progress to AIDS at different rates and in different circumstances. A key to preventing the onset of AIDS after HIV infection is, again, behaviour change. Changes in lifestyle, such as nutrition, exercise and stress reduction are resulting in growing numbers of people living without AIDS/HIV infection. Access to experimental drugs and complementary therapies are also vital to this process.

Again, though, we run into the wall of economic poverty and social abandonment. Social assistance levels are too low for an individual to even afford nutritional supplements, let alone decent housing and complementary therapies. Active involvement of individuals in taking control of their health is impeded by the demands of everyday life with no discretionary income. How can one confidently investigate and evaluate new treatments that are government-funded when rent is not paid and there is little food in the house? When good nutrition costs more. How can one participate in the alternatives to what is now government-supported? Where does the self-confidence come from to challenge the established hierarchical medical system that now exists?

Again, discrimination and lack of legal and social recognition for the communities most affected by HIV/AIDS is impeding the successful management of AIDS/HIV infection. In Windsor, as in many other cities across Canada, gay-bashing is increasing, with little or no response from governments and their law enforcement agencies. All people with AIDS/HIV infection suffer indirectly from the lack of social, legal and political support for these minorities. The advantages of early detection of HIV infection and intervention with preventive therapy for AIDS are lost in many cases because individuals will not come forward for fear of disclosure and social and economic ostracism.

Leadership in implementing strategies for the management of AIDS/HIV infection have come from the community groups across the continent who have worked together. Combination drug therapy, the importance of complementary therapies and reform of drug trial and approval structures have all come from the communities most affected by AIDS/HIV. These and other improvements have repercussions for progress on many health and social issues.

In conclusion, how can the government overcome this myriad of forces operating in Ontario? The answer is in building community. The government, as the ultimate representative of the community of Ontario, has a responsibility in this process. Recognition and support for initiatives that come out of a community affected by an issue are the key to solving problems in that area of the community. It is now increasingly recognized that the government cannot carry out community-based programs. It must provide the resources and co-ordination to ensure that all affected parties are involved in initiating and implementing programs.

Two years ago in Windsor a group of affected local organizations submitted a proposal for an AIDS/HIV outpatient clinic. The previous government sat on that application for a year without any further consultation. Then when the ministry did begin negotiations, the primary question was, "What is the role of this committee who submitted the proposal?" For some time they did not recognize that a coalition of the involved communities would build a better clinic than medical experts in one institution alone. The present government, to its credit, recognized and funded the clinic. This is the first and, I believe, only AIDS/HIV clinic in the country that has the active participation of all the major stakeholders in the community.

Now there is the possibility of co-ordinated and comprehensive programs of care and support with maximum volunteer contribution and no duplication of service. Should the government slash its spending in support of community initiatives such as this, an important opportunity to develop an alternative to the present health care structure would be lost, and it would be a long time before it could enlist the support and co-operation of the community to build effective alternative programs.

A successful response to AIDS and HIV infection must address education, counselling, practical support, research, drug approval and funding, social assistance, housing, civil rights, drug addiction, violence, acute and chronic care, complementary therapies and hospice services. The community-based AIDS/HIV movement has proposed innovative and comprehensive strategies but does not have the resources or the power to implement these without government approval.

and support. If the standing committee is concerned about the deficit, I suggest you look to the community for the answer and not abandon the community by taking the simple path and cutting programs.

I apologize for some of the typos in the presentation.

Mr Carr: Thank you very much for that presentation. One of the concerns that has been voiced is that presently—and I think that is an indication about what the perception is out there and I mentioned it earlier—about 77% of the people, close to 80% if you include the people who voted for all three parties, believe there is a tremendous amount of waste in government, in particular when it comes to the health care field. There has been talk of some of the abuses. You may know that the former Health minister, Evelyn Gigantes, had to resign when she mentioned somebody's name, and that person was spending, I believe the figure was, $438,000 for drug treatment, close to half a million dollars.

As you well know, the health care field has been the biggest-growing expenditure over the last few years. Do you believe there are areas where we can control spending in the health care field? If so, maybe you can just give us an indication of some of the areas where you would like to see us, for the want of a better word, spending a little bit smarter.

Mr Lough: As I said in my presentation, I think a little more effective use of the dollars could come from consultation and involvement of the communities. To use an example that came up earlier this year at the national conference on AIDS, which was the first national conference in three years, I attended a workshop on clinical trials and to my horror found out that they were still arguing over open arms to clinical trials.

Approximately two years ago there was a meeting held in London where the researchers and institutions had apparently agreed to try open arms to clinical trials. By the way, for those of you who do not know, open arms to clinical trials means an individual can have access to an experimental drug outside of the restrictions of a clinical trial, and very many experimental drugs are only available through clinical trials.

The same old argument was being made that if people were allowed the drug outside of a clinical trial, then the trial researchers would not be able to recruit the number of people who were necessary to carry out the strictly scientific clinical trial. Well, this had been proven false. In Toronto, a clinical trial was organized where the community was involved, where the people were given full information, where their representative organizations were involved in the design of the trial and there was an open arm. They had more recruits than they could use.

Yet these other trials that are going on do not have that kind of community involvement and therefore are not even fulfilling as effectively their original scientific mandate because they are not able to recruit as many people, nor do they get input from the people directly affected in the design of the clinical trial.

I do not have a simple answer as to what you could cut from the budget and what you could not, but I think you will find that if the principle of community involvement is instituted across the board, then the cheaper alternatives will present themselves. I use that as one example.

Mr Carr: As you know, in fact it is in these polls that people in Ontario, which is the highest-taxed province in Canada and the highest-taxed jurisdiction in North America, are saying, "We're overtaxed, and that includes all taxes. That includes municipal, provincial sales tax and federal GST." People are saying: "We're fed up with taxes at all levels and from all politicians." Then we have hundreds of groups coming through and saying, "We need more money for our particular group," and so on. Of course, that is a difficulty.

You have the average Joe out there who says, and I agree with him, "These deficits just mean that somewhere down the road I'm going to have to pay more taxes, already I'm paying too much taxes versus the rest of the country and the rest of North America." What do you say to those people when you come before a committee and say, "We need more money"? How do you alleviate some of the fears of the people out there who are saying, "Your cause is very worth while"—and I think most of them will come here definitely are—"but there is no money out there for us to give as taxpayers"?

Mr Lough: I look at it in two ways. What I am seeing from the polls that are being conducted is that people are strongly in support of the medicare system we have. They strongly support the medicare system we have and so any serious cuts to that are not going to meet with the approval of the population.

In terms of taxes, I go back to my basic university economics. I personally believe in Keynesian economics as opposed to the monetarist policies that have been instituted in the last decade. So it does not in the least bother me, as a taxpayer, that we have a deficit during a time of serious recession. That makes sense. That is what the whole Keynesian theory was based on, that you spend during the time of a recession and then you recoup that loss during periods of recovery.

What I am concerned about is that if cuts are made now in areas such as health care, where some cost-effective alternatives are being developed, then the opportunity for those alternatives to be instituted in the future is lost. It will be another 10 years and into another recession before those alternatives are recognized again, and again we will not have any money to institute them. So I think it is important to stick with the process that is developing in the community, the alternatives to the expensive health care that we have now. More cost-efficient alternatives are being built in the community. We will cut those programs at our peril. When we get to the good times we will not have the community base nor the alternatives that we have tried to implement.

Mr Sutherland: Thank you for being here. I believe you are going to be the only AIDS committee group that is going to be hearing from during these budget hearings and I think it is important that we do hear from the AIDS committees dealing with this issue.

It seemed to me the message you wanted to get across is that not only in terms of dealing with AIDS services but in health care services in general, you see the government's role becoming more of a provider of resources and a facilitator.

that the community-based organizations actually will be ones operating. That is what you are seeing as a future model and, if I gather from your comments correctly, a model that should already be in process, that it be the model for delivery of certain services and certain health services.

Mr Lough: Yes, I think some examples are already arising, both within the AIDS movement and in other organizations as well. Community-based alternatives have entered themselves and they are less expensive than a government-operated program. What I fear is that cuts generally mean that the organizations outside of government are the first to be cut. We see that at the municipal level. Recently, the city's budget support to outside groups dropped substantially. I worry that the Ontario government would have to go the same route.

Mr Sutherland: I was wondering if you could give us some sense, from your perspective as the executive director of the local AIDS committee, of how you feel the provincial government is doing on the issue of AIDS—I am not talking so much in terms of ours versus the last but in the generic sense of provincial government—and what advice you might give the committee in terms of recommendations for the next budget in dealing with the issue of AIDS.

Mr Lough: I think the announcement a few months ago by the Minister of Health to institute anonymous testing was a very important initiative. The community-based movement has been saying for a long time that people are only going to come forward under anonymous testing. We know that as well as anyone here in Windsor, because anonymous testing is available in Detroit and people go there in large numbers for testing. Therefore, our statistics mean virtually nothing in terms of HIV infection in this area.

One thing I would like to see the provincial government do, and this is something it inherited from the previous government again, has to do with the Ontario AIDS Advisory Committee. There is no representation of people with HIV on the Ontario AIDS Advisory Committee. When it was originally set up by the Minister of Health under the Liberal government, there were only three community-based representatives out of 16 or 18 people involved in the committee. I do not think this is adequate community representation. If we want to build alternatives to health care, the people who are building the alternatives to the community have to be represented. That would be a piece of advice, for what it is worth, that I would pass to the present government.

In terms of the next budget, I think moving ahead with social assistance reform is important. Some changes in social assistance that would allow people with HIV infection to work and claim some kind of social assistance would be a lot more practical. Right now, people with HIV infection are forced really to go on disability benefits because the process is so complicated and lengthy to get on to benefits that they cannot afford not to be on benefits. If they were able to go to work and face periods of illness, because HIV disease is a very up-and-down syndrome, are feeling well one working and a period of illness comes along, bang, they are out of work and it is months before they can then get back on adequate social assistance. So I think some reform of social assistance is necessary as well.

Mrs Sullivan: I wonder if you could just describe for the committee something more of your own operation. How much do you receive in capital funding and in operating funding from the province on an annual basis, and how many people do you serve?

Mr Lough: In the last year we received $7,000 in capital funding. In operating funding we received $201,000. The province funds four staff people. With that money we get a little from the federal government and the Ontario Trillium Foundation and some private sector fund-raising.

We have a broad range of education and support service programs, including a speakers' bureau, a resource centre and a resource database of treatment information and AIDS education and prevention materials. We have information tables at various events, go out to the schools and such and various community groups, speaking about the issue. We have support service programs and a buddy system, which is common among a lot of community-based groups, to match volunteers with people with HIV for practical and emotional support. We have emergency financial assistance that is funded exclusively from private donations. We also have support groups for people with HIV and for care givers. We have a seminar program for health care workers and research mailings out to physicians who are treating people with HIV that contain the latest treatment information. We have also a series of seminars for people with HIV infection on how to handle the issues that arise in HIV infection.

Mrs Sullivan: Is there a group home in Windsor for AIDS patients?

Mr Lough: We did have a house, in co-operation with the Windsor Housing Authority, which we had to close, mainly due to lack of funding for staff.

Mrs Sullivan: I want to really move on, because one of the things the government has done in terms of health care is to move very strongly away from the long-term care proposals which were on the table and which were being implemented by the previous government. It seems to me the long-term care aspect for AIDS patient is a singularly important part of caring for your own clients. I wonder what emphasis you put on insisting that the government move back into that long-term care program so that there is an integrated approach to long-term care for people, no matter what their illness is.

Mr Lough: Well, I am no fan of the long-term care process that was instituted here in Windsor and Essex county. I agree with you that long-term care is an essential element of support for people with HIV and a proper response to the disease. We had a proposal in to the long-term care committee. The process was very secretive. It was not consultative and had no element of negotiation involved. I can say the community-based AIDS education and support program of the Ministry of Health was miles ahead of the long-term care initiative, which was supposed to put things back in the hands of the community, as I understand it.

With both the federal and provincial programs, it has been a very interactive process. We have worked with the ministry people, we have negotiated, we have developed programs together. That long-term care initiative was not carried out that way at all, so I am not surprised the new government has put that on hold.

Mrs Sullivan: The long-term care program was to integrate community-based care in an attempt to move people out of the institutional base and to deliver services in their homes. That has been completely put on hold.

Mr Lough: As I was saying, I do not disagree with the principle of the long-term care initiative, but the way it was being carried out, I believe, needed to be put on hold. I do not think it was an effective or fair process.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for appearing before the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget review.

GORDON CHRISJOHN

The Chair: I am going to call on Gordon Chrisjohn. I would like to welcome you here to the standing committee on finance and economic on the budget review. You will have one half-hour for your presentation and you could leave some time at the end of your presentation for questions and answers which will be divided equally among the three parties. For the purposes of Hansard, would you please identify yourself. You may begin your presentation.

1130

Mr Chrisjohn: Good morning. My name is Gordon Chrisjohn. I would like to thank the committee for this opportunity to express my opinions on the Ontario government's economic policies. As a member of the aboriginal community, I would like to elaborate on that. I am a native community development worker here for the Can-Am Indian Friendship Centre of Windsor, but I am not here in that capacity. I am here as a member of the aboriginal community. I am here as a member of Oneida first nation, not as a representative of any organization or any political body.

The present recession is hitting hard at most sectors of Ontario, and when the entire province is involved with those kinds of hardships, aboriginal people, to say the least, are not exempt. Whether they have remained on the reserves or come to urban areas, they cannot help but be affected by unemployment, business closings and inflation.

Speaking only as a person living in this part of the world, I find that the more abstract issues of economic theory have far less meaning to the people with whom I have been speaking, aboriginal or otherwise, than the problems of facing daily life in these hard economic times. As such, I find it difficult to embrace policies which are long-term in nature and are directed at the economy itself rather than the people. Herein lies the controversy between federal economic policies and those of the present government of Ontario.

The federal government has instituted a number of measures which have had a dread impact on the daily lives of the average Canadian. Free trade and the GST seem to be the policies most often singled out as the culprit: businesses relocating to the United States, a downturn in tourism, high prices at the store and unemployment. However, we are told by the federal government that these policies will prove in the long term to be good for the economy. The government does not say that these policies will be bad in the short term for the people.

The NDP government, I believe, recognizes that the long-term policies for the people will be the short-term result of the current policies and has created people programs to bring Ontario through an inevitable crunch. I was disappointed there to hear federal criticism of the NDP for not doing its job to reduce spending and lower Ontario's deficit. With such action, the people of Ontario would be suffering worse effects from the federal policies. It is as if it was intended all along that the people suffer while the aboriginal economy improves. I disagree with sacrificing people for a part of economic policy.

In the area of economic policy for aboriginal people, the NDP has shown leadership, sensitivity and a determination not to let momentum be lost. The province and aboriginal peoples have been moving rapidly toward a political understanding of mutual respect over the last few months. It is important that this ground gained not be lost through any reluctance on the part of the province to meet its support tangible. Real political progress must be reflected in real social progress. As such, old programs must be continued and new programs implemented to cement our new understanding.

The NDP budget demonstrates that aboriginal people have not been forgotten, not been sacrificed to economic expediency. For instance, the budget for the native affairs secretariat has been expanded—in fact, more than doubled. This expansion reflects a commitment to ongoing talks in the area of aboriginal self-government and the resolution of outstanding land issues. There are a number of ongoing initiatives through the Ministry of Citizenship which are creating community infrastructure capital projects. I will not dwell on these except to say that the benefits of community creation and community development are obvious products of these initiatives.

The budget also includes $1.15 million for aboriginal education projects. I note with interest that this program includes both on-reserve and off-reserve projects. The practice has been to view self-government and institutions of self-government from a purely on-reserve perspective. In this case, not only does the announcement reflect a more open view, it attaches a sizeable amount of money for implementation. Off-reserve institutions have been struggling in the formative process. I can foresee that this funding can be utilized to make these institutions a reality.

The anti-recession program has created a number of aboriginal-directed initiatives. With the Ministry of the Solicitor General, I am aware of funding to create jobs and promote aboriginal awareness. In concert with local police authorities, aboriginal institutions can arrange awareness training, adapt educational material, conduct liaison and promote recruitment.

Within the Ministry of Health, opportunities are to be created to promote community and agency interaction. While these positions are only temporary, their effects will be further-reaching. Employment will be created within the original communities, and during these times even short-term work is highly valued. The tasks accomplished will have impacts in the social fabric of those communities.

In conclusion, I do not wish it to be taken that aboriginal people are receiving special treatment. I am aware, though marginally, that employment initiatives are being implemented within the greater community as well. It is significant in my daily contact with aboriginal communities, I have become more aware of what the NDP is doing regarding these communities. I believe that social programming for aboriginal people, and in fact all people, cannot be reduced to a time when fiscal policy is diminishing the people's capacity to provide for themselves.

Mr B. Ward: The gist of your brief is, you are here as an individual, however you have perceived the budget to be heading in the proper direction as far as dealing with the native population is concerned.

Mr Chrisjohn: Yes. In fact, I would say that from my contact with a number of communities—and I should point out also that I come from an aboriginal community. I am living in Windsor and I have relatives who have roots in another urban community as well, and they all seem to endorse the NDP policy as far as aboriginal people are concerned.

Mr B. Ward: It is very hard to project how things would be, but if these initiatives had not taken place in this budget, could you perhaps discuss what you perceive would be happening without these initiatives?

Mr Chrisjohn: To be as frank and honest as I can, I expect that there would be more situations—and I do not want to be alarmist here—along the lines of Oka. I believe that people have been quite dissatisfied for some time. They have heard different governments, Ontario governments, federal governments, that have made promises and have not backed up those promises, that have instead dangled apples in front of our faces, and when we decided to take them, they withdrew them and simply kept their promises as castles in the air.

There is a great deal of cynicism rampant within the original community about governments that behave in that way. A concrete example would be the way the aboriginal people are entertaining the idea of the national task force commission to look into aboriginal affairs. In the past, during the Meech Lake Accord, it was dangled in front of them as a prize—"If you agree to this, then you will have this commission"—and at that time the feeling was that it was a good idea. "If it was a good idea before, it will be a good idea later. Let's not have our participation in the Meech Lake accord coloured by this potentiality." When it was turned down, the same initiative was withdrawn, perhaps as a punishment for not going along with the Meech Lake accord.

As we have seen, the federal government has seen the overall wisdom of such a thing, and Meech Lake accord or Meech Lake accord no, it has decided it is time for such a commission. This was our attitude during that time. We are cynical about promises that are not going to be kept.

I have to say in all frankness, the aboriginal people with whom I have been talking endorse the NDP's proposals and they see real results and the real effects of those policies as a "window of opportunity," I believe is what they said. They realize that federal and provincial politics are written in water and the next government may not have the same obligations or feelings towards those policies. But for the present they believe that what the NDP is talking about in these areas is real and that the gains that can be made in association with and in co-operation with both the federal and provincial governments now are real.

Mr Lessard: I want to thank you for coming here today and making your presentation. I know you are not speaking on behalf of the Can-am Indian centre, but that is a centre you play a role in, and I know that centre itself plays an important role in the Windsor community, to provide information and education for aboriginal Canadians.

In your brief you mentioned initiatives the federal government has introduced that have, in your words, had a "dread impact" on the daily lives of average Canadians, and you mention a couple of examples and the impact those have. I wonder if you could tell us whether these policies have had an impact on the aboriginal community. What sort of impact have those policies had?

Mr Chrisjohn: As I have also said, it is the same sort of impact as on the people at large, where we find our demographics, on-reserve and off-reserve, are the same. Within the cities our unemployment is always a little bit higher, our health is always a little bit worse, those sorts of things. We seem to mimic the society at large but exaggerate the negative aspects of what is going on within the communities.

As a concrete example, we often do inventories of community resources and resource people. As you know, Windsor had been a very stable economic community for a long time, and just recently it has had the highest unemployment within the province and there is a great deal of upheaval within the Windsor community at large. We did an inventory—this is something that would seem would have no relation whatsoever to economies and such—on people within the community speaking aboriginal languages who could be called to hospitals and who could perhaps even teach to our children within our own L'il Eagles program and such the aboriginal languages.

We have this resource that is only two years old and the hard economic times have upset our stable population to the point where 60% of those people are no longer in the community. As you say, could I tie that to the GST? Probably not. I do not have those kinds of skills in the area of analysing economic policy. But something has changed in the way the population is being made up in Windsor, and it has been over the last two years, and our people are moving around. I would suggest, knowing that aboriginal people have known for a long time the wisdom of migrating habits, that you go where the fish are plentiful and you go where the game is plentiful.

In Windsor the employment opportunities are not plentiful, and they have moved on elsewhere looking for where the employment has gone. I can draw that analogy and I can make that implication, but I cannot exactly prove that through economic means. We have some knowledge that some of the people did move to find jobs elsewhere; that is a fact.

Mrs Sullivan: We have had some very poignant testimony before the committee from Chief Gordon Peters, among others, who spoke about the capacity of land that the aboriginal people were seeking in terms of negotiations with the province, treaty rights, and of the lack of capacity in both human and financial resources in terms of coming to terms with the implementation of any agreements which have been signed. He made it very clear that at this point in time there has been no impact of this signing of the agreement, that the steps have yet to be taken indeed in all of the agreements that have been signed.

We are particularly interested, of course, in the economic development future for aboriginals. That is one of the things I would like you to speak of in terms of co-operative community development and so on.

The other thing is, we have also had a very passionate presentation from the Metis community, whose members say they have been left out of all initiatives this government has put forward in terms of aboriginal affairs and indeed that they will not benefit from one of the initiatives included in the budget. I wonder if you could comment on those two areas.

Mr Chrisjohn: Only slightly can I comment on those areas, because they involve both political issues as well as looking at them from a macro scale. I am working simply within this one community. You note in one part of my presentation I talked about my knowledge of capital projects, but I did not want to go and dwell on them to any degree, simply because no community with which I have had contact has had those. Those have been at Akwesasne, and other areas as well. I did not really want to pretend to any expertise in that kind of area.

As far as what the economic policy impact is within the friendship centre and the communities that I know of, yes, you are right in that we have not accessed these programs as yet. I got a couple of submissions in and we will see how they turn out as well. We find there are dollars attached to that and for the first time they are saying, "Here's the paperwork you have to do in order to get at that." That step has been missing from other promises and other programs. We find we are going to benefit if we can bring some of these things within the Windsor community. I have had instructions from my board of directors to pursue that.

I have only been temporarily here in Windsor for five or six months now, but in the past at other boards of directors with whom I have worked and other councils of chiefs, I have been told to ignore those kinds of things, because they do not believe there is anything behind that; that is a public relations ploy, or what they are looking for will benefit them much more than it will benefit the aboriginal community. They will be able to make a check in the box that, "Yes, we did some consultation," or, "Yes, we did some native awareness training." They find that the way these new programs are designed, they will have some impact on our community and will be of benefit. I guess that is about all I could say in that regard.

Mrs Sullivan: Do you have any comments on the Metis question?

Mr Chrisjohn: I also am aware that the Metis have their own political organization to speak for them. A friendship centre, such as I represent, is accessed not only by the Indian community but the Metis and Inuit communities as well. We also, we believe, provide service to the non-Indian community. We think what we do is beneficial to everyone, plus our programs can be accessed by anybody who comes through the door, non-Indian as well.

As an example, we get referrals from the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission for people with learning disabilities because of our BEST program; that is basic education starts today. We have one-on-one tutoring in skills upgrades which these people can access for free—let's say at no cost—through our programs, for which they do not qualify within other government programs. They do not have the language skills or they do not fit the right category, whereas ours are so open that we have people without English skills coming in to learn computers. As they are also improving their English skills, they will be able to access the pre-entry programs for universities and colleges. Those kinds of things are what we have available.

It seems to me that within the friendship centres, if we institute some of these new programs, they will have access to them as well and they will also derive benefits from them. Other than that, I would not argue with any of the statements made by any of the representatives of their political organizations. I feel they would know far more about their membership than I could anecdotally.

Mr McLean: Thank you for appearing here this morning, Mr Chrisjohn. I have enjoyed your presentation. I have a couple of questions. You indicate in your presentation that the budget for the native affairs secretariat has been expanded. Do you know how much it has been expanded by?

Mr Chrisjohn: Yes. Actually, I had a list of that. It is almost by three. Let me take a look at that.

Mr Carr: From $6 million to $23 million.

Mr Chrisjohn: To $23 million; it is from almost $7 million to $23 million. That is just in the operational area. In the capital expenditure area there is another $21 million.

Mr McLean: I see you are well versed on it, and that is great. Can you give me your view on how you feel self-government should work?

Mr Chrisjohn: This is a good one because I am also working and living off-reserve and I think, as I have said in the past, policies have been directed more with on-reserve in mind. I would particularly like to talk about off-reserve government. It seems to me that—

Mr McLean: Is there a difference between off-reserve self-government and on-reserve self-government?

Mr Chrisjohn: We should diminish any concept of the difference between that. I think the people on reserve have had the benefit of the recognition by the crown, whether it is in Upper Canada or the federal crown or the provincial crown. They understand the reserve system because they have instituted it as an administrative structure. But when you consider that we have first nations with more than one aboriginal nation living there—the Ojibway and Potawatami living at Walpole Island and at Saugeen—the idea that an urban community with different aboriginal nations making up its membership should not also be considered for self-government as an aboriginal group does not seem completely logical.

It seems there is so much that is true about the urban group that is also true about the reserve group that it is conceivable they could both maintain their institutions of self-government, not necessarily through a chief and council, but perhaps through boards of directors or almost—and I hate to say the word—in a municipal-like fashion. The same kinds of ways as other sovereign provinces—I almost said sovereign cities—but with recognition of some of their right to self-government, very much like the municipal style of government. It could be a style for the cities as well.

Mr McLean: So you are saying the reserve self-government would be more important than the off-reserve self-government.

Mr Chrisjohn: It has been considered more important right now by the crown and the agents of the crown, but I do not consider that would be the case. Such concepts should be considered co-equal in the future.

Mr McLean: Is there any draft or suggestions in writing of how the native community has some points it would like to see in any agreement with regard to self-government?

Mr Chrisjohn: In the area of off reserve, which I really feel I should be responding to, we are virtually maintaining many of the structures of self-government. Administratively we are moving into the areas of education. For aboriginal people within the cities we have been the number one social service provider. So in some respects we are used to doing things that way.

To go the next step and ensure we have some capacity to not only provide the service but direct, it I think, is a logical extension of where we are going in the area of service delivery within the urban communities.

Mr McLean: The political understanding, a mutual respect over the last few months, the agreement that was signed, what effect does that have on what is taking place here in Windsor in your community?

Mr Chrisjohn: Actually, that is one of the reasons I would like to stress the urban community. I think that agreement is a good agreement in principle, but it does—let's not say "exclude"—it does not include urban organizations where it really ought to. I have been asking for that document to be forwarded to me. They simply could not get it to me in time for me to speak authoritatively about it here.

My own provincial organization has not provided me with analysis in time to speak about it here, except to say it is more reserve-directed and more of the older mentality and that anything we can do to try to expand the thinking of people into the areas of urban self-government institutions should be done at every opportunity, and here is an opportunity.

The Chair: I thank you for appearing before the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget review. This committee will recess until 1 pm.

The committee recessed at 1154.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1304.

The Chair: We will resume our hearings on the budget review for the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. A few members are going to be coming in maybe about halfway through the presentation.

UNEMPLOYED HELP CENTRE

The Chair: Would you state your name before you start? You are from the Unemployed Help Centre. I would like to welcome you.

Ms Pons: Thank you. My name is Pamela Pons and I am the executive director of the Unemployed Help Centre here in Windsor. We had scheduled for this afternoon a client who has been a recipient of our food bank. It is with great distress that I advise you she is unable to attend. At this point she is waiting for our local children's aid society to come to her family's rescue. They presently have three children. Her husband has been a victim of a plant closure and unfortunately, with the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, he has run out of unemployment insurance benefits. They are hoping the children's aid will take care of their children since they are unable to do so with UI benefits. I still am pleased to be here this afternoon before the committee to comment on the budget as it relates to the unemployed and the underemployed workers whom we service here at the help centre in Windsor.

For some, memory serves us only too well as we recall Windsor's worst recession since the depression of the 1930s. In the late 1970s and the early 1980s the auto industry plant closures, severe cutbacks, indefinite layoffs and business bankruptcies caused the unemployment rate to escalate far beyond 26%. Thousands of workers who had once held secure jobs were now faced with the cold reality of standing in long unemployment lines. Financial difficulties led to the foreclosure of thousands of homes, which subsequently contributed to the increased number of family breakdowns, drug and alcohol abuse and suicides. Multitudes of dispirited community members made a westward exodus in search of a second chance, while their families were left behind waiting for news of employment. Still others gambled and chose to stay behind, looking for that pot of gold at the end of the rainbow, a job.

The centre's ideology has been to assist in the re-employment process of the disadvantaged. In doing so, we continue to evaluate and investigate services provided to the long-term unemployed. Indeed, because of the expertise in developing new employment strategies and counselling techniques, the help centre in Windsor has itself become a model for other centres across the country.

One of the programs instituted by the help centre was in 1988, when we opened our food bank. This contains not only the services of a food bank, wherein we distribute food to other food service providers, we at the centre are also a food service provider. In this cause, we recently received a grant of $13,000 from the province to aid us in our administration of the food bank and the food service program. We would like to thank the provincial government for being the first government to aid us in this endeavour. Our annual budget to fund these two programs is in excess of $75,000.

We understand that the funding provided to us is only one of many items that are responsible for the current provincial deficit. I would, however, be remiss in my responsibilities as director of the Unemployed Help Centre if I failed to make a plea for additional moneys. While this government has been the first to recognize the need, the value and life support we provide to our clients, the job is not done; $13,000 is only a small portion of those moneys that we need to keep that program in place. We must continue to depend on our community for the balance of our support, a community which at this point is very hard pressed to continue to make that missing link between our community and the moneys we have available. We urge the government to respond to this need.

In support of our community's continuous and generous financial contributions, we also respectfully request a change in the provincial taxes. Unfortunately, this request would increase the deficit; it would add to it. However, it would be a recognition of charitable giving. Unlike the federal government, which has systematically destroyed the deduction for those who aid groups such as ourselves, non-profit charitable organizations we ask the province to institute an additional Ontario tax credit similar to the workings and benefits of the political tax credit system.

I am also here today to speak to you about the effects of plant closures. These victims are part of the cause of Ontario's deficit. No longer are the victims able to continue to pay tax dollars. They are the same people who are in need of services this province can and should provide. I name a few of those victims: A&P in Windsor, 156 victims; Ford Motor Co, 1,228 victims; General Motors, Windsor, 255 victims; Brant Castings, 114 victims; Clay-Mill, 114 victims; Dominion Forge, 200 victims and our list goes on and on, unfortunately.

Our community and the surrounding area have been torn apart by plant closures and downsizings. Since 1980, in the latter part of the year and onwards, our agency has had occasion to meet with the provincial government through the Ministry of Labour. Our plea to that minister has been to come to the aid of our community and allow us an opportunity to service those very victims. The only way to service them is to continue to provide them with counselling services and retraining. We went to the province, we expressed our case and as a result were the recipients of a pilot project which provided to the Unemployed Help Centre some $200,000. Such a pilot case was also repeated in three other areas in this province: London, Kitchener and Cambridge.

While this is a terrific expense and is again another factor in the deficit, those funds have not gone far enough. We need to increase the dollars that are going to service the victims of this recession, and it is not beyond the capacity of the province. We know we have a deficit, but the only way to get workers back to work is to re-educate and continue to provide them with services. If we fail to do that very important task, we fail the people in this province. I would urge you to bring a message back to the government that these are not small issues. While there is recognition of the damages of closures, we need to increase services to them.

The federal government has destroyed many of the programs our unemployed need to fall back on. We know employment insurance benefits last a far shorter period than they ought to and that the insurance system was ripped apart. To recognize that it was ripped apart is not enough. We need to continue to provide those services and that causes a continual deficit of the province, then the province needs to take that challenge. We need to take on the federal government, despite the recent rulings by the Supreme Court of Canada. We need not allow the feds to continue to put a cap on the Canada assistance plan. Those dollars were sent to the government in good faith and they must respond to the needs of our workers.

I urge you to bring back the message to the government that while there is an appreciation for some of the efforts that are made, there is truly a recognition that there is a deficit. The only way to bring our people out of it is to continue that deficit until this recession starts to ease the pain in this area. Thank you.

Mr Carr: Thank you very much for a fine presentation. As you are probably aware, education is a provincial responsibility. It has been, going back to the British North America Act. One of the concerns I have is that if you take somebody who is on social assistance right now, whether it is a single mother or somebody who has lost his job in a factory, an older male who is close to retirement age—these are those who have said that in this budget there has not been any money directed towards helping those people through apprenticeship, retraining or skills development programs, and that really the long-term solution to the problem is to give people the skills and training that are needed. A lot of people have said this budget did not do it; it did not put any money into those areas.

I was wondering if you could comment on what you would like to see in the area of skills and education and the whole retraining thrust. What would you like to see the provincial government do?

Ms Pons: In terms of education and basic skills, those who claim that this budget did nothing are uninformed persons. We received a phone call on Friday that, through the Ministry of Education, Windsor and Essex has its first verbal approval of a grant that was submitted. This grant will allow this area to look at the basic skills needs of workers, and that will be through the educational process. There will be a staff of four who will co-ordinate and do assessments on workers. Through that endeavour there is that both the school board and the college system have aimed to be very recognizable financial support to put additional classes into place.

But those are the worker-centred, not traditional, educational processes. They may not have worked for workers in the past. This is a new way to look at it, and we in Windsor are very excited with the types of programming that we will be able to put into place as a result of this new initiative. It was spearheaded by the Ministry of Labour.

Mr Carr: You are right, a tremendous amount of people throughout the provinces are losing their jobs. One of the occupations where you do not lose your job is in the public sector, if you work for the Ontario government. There have been those who have said that every company has to look at making itself more efficient and cutting costs, but when it comes to the government, they are not like individuals and businesses who have to watch their pennies and so on; they can spend because they can add it to the deficit.

One thought was that if we restricted the increases to everybody, and there are I guess 90,000-odd civil servants in this province, we would be looking at a saving of around $1 billion, and that is with a "B" not an "M" as in "million." I just wondered if you would comment on that. What would you say to those people in the public sector who are getting wage increases of 6% when you have so many people who are unemployed? What would you do with it?

Ms Pons: I certainly would not want unemployed workers to be seen as taking away something from another set of workers. In any set of contract negotiations or at any time of an annual wage increase, someone is certainly not going to say, "Yes, I will take concessions, but I want the money to come from another business." That simply is not feasible. For those who are getting wage increases, we applaud that. The cost of living has gone up in Ontario, and for the government to make a statement and say, "We do not believe in a wage increase," where other corporations have their workers asking for the same, would certainly not be a clear message.

Mr Carr: One of the concerns that has been voiced out there is where the government is spending money. There are a tremendous amount of areas where there can be some cuts made. I do not know if you were here earlier today, but we talked about some of them, whether it be wage restraints for the workers, the $54,000 spent for new carpeting for the minister, the $1,500 that the Ministry of Community and Social Services workers were going to spend to go to the SkyDome. There is a perception out there that the government can find the money internally. I was just wondering what your thoughts were, whether you believe that, or whether you think the Ontario government is run so efficiently that there cannot be any money found anywhere else in all these massive programs that we have. Maybe you would like to comment.

Ms Pons: Any ship can be made somewhat leaner. However, I am not going to comment in regard to some spending that took place. I do not know the details of the carpeting you mentioned. Perhaps it was due to be replaced 10 years ago and was not. So, without having full details, I think it is not fair to make comments on that.

Ms M. Ward: Thank you for your presentation. The current recession is recognized by most as having begun last April, which is over a year ago now. Given the changes in unemployment insurance over the last few years, do you think that you have in Windsor a large number of people who will be forced on to the welfare rolls when unemployment insurance runs out?

Ms Pons: It is the unfortunate prediction of our local Canada Employment Centre that come the first week in September we will have the displeasure of having 300 to 500 people fall off unemployment insurance benefits every week.

Ms M. Ward: And I understand that Windsor, according to the information I have, will receive about $21.6 million in grants and funding under the anti-recession projects. Certainly this must have helped to keep people off the unemployment rolls and subsequently off the welfare rolls also. What do you think would be the effect here if that funding were not in place, not just the anti-recession funding but also the increased grants and help for municipalities? Could you comment on what you think your situation would be if that had not been done?

Ms Pons: I do not think I would want to face a city in that condition. We have suffered terribly from this recession. One of our difficulties is that Windsor is going through a different type of unemployment than we have in the past. In the past it was cyclical, we went through our downturns, other municipalities followed behind in the types of suffering we had. While we were the first into the recession, we were also the first out. This time it is structural. Those plants are not here for our workers to go back to, so it will be very difficult, and we face a significant challenge in trying to diversify this local economy so that there are jobs for our workers to go to.

Ms M. Ward: You commented about the new unemployed and foreclosures on family homes and so on. This is a group of people who have not been in that situation before; if they are forced on to welfare when their unemployment insurance runs out, it would be a totally new experience for them. Is that what you were speaking of in your presentation?

Ms Pons: For many the idea of going on to unemployment insurance was devastating for the family. However, to be faced with the reality that one may have to face the roll of social services is extremely difficult.

Mr B. Ward: A quick question: I admire your courage. You are on the front lines, I guess, experiencing the recession firsthand with the people coming in and using the services of the Unemployed Help Centre. I think some people do not appreciate the extreme hardship that is out there for working people, whether it is in Windsor or my community of Brantford or anywhere else in Ontario. What would you say to the critics of the budget who suggest that we should be cutting back on our social programs at the time of extreme hardship? What would you say to them?

Ms Pons: I would suggest that cutting back on expenses is not the answer. In fact, it is our position that those expenses should be increased.

Mr B. Ward: And that those critics perhaps should come and visit the Unemployed Help Centre to see firsthand what is going on in the community with working people?

Ms Pons: We have had such critics visit our office, and I dare say their position had changed dramatically from the point before they walked in that door until the point at which they exited. People unfortunately have a misconception that people are unemployed because they want to be unemployed. There are very few people in that category, although to say there are none is also a gross mistake; there are people who make that choice. But I would suggest strongly that the expenses are increased and that in order to bring people back to work we have to make additional expenditures. That is the message I would like to see brought back.

Mr B. Ward: That is good to hear, because I anticipate a delegation further down the list that will be suggested that the deficit should be cut back. Perhaps an invitation could be extended to them to visit the help centre.

Ms Pons: Consider it so extended.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for attending the budget review hearings.

If it is agreeable with the committee, I would call for recess until 1:30, when the next group comes in, which will give the opportunity for the official opposition to be heard. They said they would be here at 1:30.

The committee recessed at 1326.

ROLAND MARENTETTE

The Chair: We will resume our hearings. The next participant is Roland Marentette. You will have 15 minutes to make your presentation. Try to leave some time at the end of your presentation for questions from the three parties.

Mr Marentette: I have a very short presentation, but there will be a lot of time. The portion of the Ontario budget that I would like to comment on deals with the environment. So that you understand why this area is of specific concern to me, I would like to enlighten you as to my involvement locally in this issue.

Since 1987 I have been very active in Windsor and Essex county on transboundary air pollution problems, the Fermi II nuclear plant issue, reforestation projects, a member of the binational advisory committee for the Detroit River remedial action plan and involved in the elementary and secondary schools, working with students and teachers on environmental concerns. Lately, I have also been involved as a volunteer with the Essex waste management committee in its master composting program. As you can see, the emphasis has always been on personal involvement and, most importantly, public outreach.

I must say that I was particularly pleased to see the budget directing Ontario Hydro to implement a more comprehensive conservation program. The Canadian consumer has long been identified as one of the greatest wasters of energy in the world, and to build new generating stations for anticipated future demand without first exploring the impact of research and development and new energy saving products and public education in wise energy use is simply irresponsible and would in fact be encouraging this type of wastefulness.

The other area is the increased funding for the municipal 3R programs, which I find is also very important. In Essex county, the recycling program has seen an 85% participation el. The expansion to include apartment buildings has yet been achieved because of lack of funding. The hazardous household pick up days is another successful program that has seen an increase in participation every year. According to the Essex waste management committee, this one program alone costs over $200,000 to run. The master composting program I mentioned previously is a new volunteer project and is designed to get the public more involved. Without an increase in funding for these activities you would be discouraging any progress that we have made and also undermining the little confidence that people seem to have that governments are committed to the environment.

The awareness and concern of the people of Ontario is reflected in poll after poll and I think, rightfully so, they are looking for leadership and responsibility on behalf of the government. I know it would have been very tempting to fall into the trap that other governments have and use the recession as an excuse to neglect that responsibility. I therefore must applaud this government for its continued support for these initiatives and look to this as a sign of commitment on this very important issue.

Mr B. Ward: There is some discussion or thought that, by paying attention to the environment, it may make businesses uncompetitive because of the added cost. But in fact, through recycling and becoming aware of what waste is being disposed of from a corporate standpoint, savings could be implemented. Do you agree with that thought, that by becoming more environmentally aware of the policies and direction that society seems to be taking, corporations have an opportunity to save money and become more competitive?

Mr Marentette: I will give you an example of a corporation that implemented a very good recycling program—changed processes—and that is 3M Corp. They saved over $500 million globally just by changing processes and getting involved with recycling programs.

Mr B. Ward: So that could be a selling point for convincing businesses to pay more attention to the environment.

Mr Marentette: Exactly. I work for Chrysler Corp. As a person who works on the line, I could probably identify our parts we deal with that could be sent back to the supplier to be reused. It would be saving Chrysler the problem of having to pay somebody to take the waste out; also the supplier would not have to buy the replacement part. You would not only be saving money at Chrysler Corp, but also for the suppliers. I think it is a worthwhile venture for them.

Mr Sutherland: Picking up on Mr Ward's point about how it can help business to be environmentally friendly, I want to ask your opinion as to how a government should be responding to environmental issues among the corporate sector; that is a), do you feel we should be doing it from an incentive standpoint, or b), should we be doing it from the hammer standpoint, in terms of legislation forcing the private sector to come forward on environmental issues?

Mr Marentette: I think you will always have some industries that will not deal with it, but you have a lot of industries out there. If you used the carrot-and-stick approach, when they can get involved in a program without being seen as the bad person, without damage to their image, they are going to see the advantage of what it will do in reinforcing our feelings toward them, because some people are very critical of industry and in some cases, that is necessary.

I think it is warranted because some out there, regardless of what type of program the government puts in, do not want to take any part in it. They see this as an area the government should not get involved in because it is a power thing with them: "It's my business, I should run it the way I feel regardless of the cost." We are at the point of saying now, when it comes to the environment, "Listen, if you can't deal with it, is your only purpose in being in business just to provide profit at any cost, or do you have a social responsibility that impacts on a community, affecting everybody's quality of life?"

Obviously, you cannot portray a corporate image as: "I'm a nice person, therefore I'm there to provide this." There are going to be some problems with some corporations. But I think the carrot and stick have to be used first. I do not see any problem with that. It is like my son. Obviously, he has to see an advantage to himself, but if he does not, I am not afraid to come down with the hammer. Not literally.

Mr McLean: I have a couple of questions for you and I hope you are up on this, because I am looking for some answers. It has to do with waste management and a lot of municipalities in this province. Their sewerage systems are loaded to capacity. I do not know about this community, whether they are letting it out into the river or not, but I know in Toronto, an hour after a rainfall they close the beaches down because of the pollution. It is mainly coming from the sewerage systems that are not up to date and are overloaded. I am wondering what is happening here in this community. I know from the contractors who are paid to haul the sludge away that the farmers are now, in some cases, not accepting it. There is no place for it to go. Are you up on this aspect of waste management and what do you see as the solution to the problem?

Mr Marentette: Are you talking about the sludge composting programs? Windsor had a very good program at one time. Unfortunately, they did not fund it to the extent of a proper ventilation system for the air mixture and everything else like that, which would have eliminated a lot of the odours. So the people in the community who lived around that area complained mainly about the odour. But from what I understand, the compost that came out of it was very useful. I know there was some concern about the heavy metals that accumulated in some of the sludge so instead of using it on farmers' fields, they were in fact using it in the city parks and for fill in that type of area where they did not have to worry about producing a crop. But it is a viable operation. I have a lot of confidence in it. That is why I am also involved in this home composting program because I think there is a lot of misunderstanding out there.

Mr McLean: When I was coming to Windsor this morning I noticed a big hill and I presumed it is a hill of garbage. Is that where the disposal site is for this area?

Mr Marentette: It must be what they refer to as Maidstone mountain. Yes, that is our current landfill in Maidstone.

Mr McLean: How many years will it be good for?

Mr Marentette: I believe it is going to be extended until 1995.

Mr McLean: Has there been a ministry order on it to extend the time?

Mr Marentette: I think there has been. I am not sure.

Mr Carr: You may have been here earlier when we talked about this. It is one year ago today that the Agenda for People was written, August 18, 1990. On page 7 it says, "The New Democrats would pass the safe drinking water act right away...." It was interesting that they put in the "right away" portion. We are now coming up on, I guess, 10½, almost 11 months. They were sworn in October 1. Are you concerned that the New Democratic government has not passed the safe drinking water act right away like it said it would?

Mr Marentette: I think it is like everything else. I guess, when you are a new government, you have to start looking at putting a program in place and making sure that it is going to work. Just to put a program in place to say you have a program, without consultation, I do not think is the proper way to do it.

WINDSOR AND DISTRICT CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Chair: The next group is the Windsor and District Chamber of Commerce. You have half an hour and would you please leave some time at the end for the question and answer period. If you would identify yourselves for Hansard.

Mr Roberts: My name is Stephen Roberts and I am the president of the Windsor and District Chamber of Commerce. If it is of assistance to you, I do have a copy of the text of what I will be saying. There should be about 15 copies here. I will just get a glass of water.

Interjection: Are you sure it's water?

Mr Roberts: I hope it is water.

Background: The province of Ontario, for the last few years, has been operating with minimum deficits, and in some years, surpluses. However, by the third quarter of the 1990 fiscal year it became apparent that the recession was causing tremendous harm to the economy and that a substantial deficit was being projected. In the last year, Ontario has lost approximately 250,000 jobs, at a rate of close to 700 a day. Two thirds of all the jobless workers in Canada come from Ontario, the province which generates 40% of Canada's economic production.

Facing this economic background, on Monday April 29, 1991, Premier Bob Rae and Treasurer Floyd Laughren announced the new budget for the province of Ontario. This free-spending pair immediately entered the record books with far and away the largest deficit ever recorded by a province in the history of Canada, at $9.7 billion. Unfortunately, at the same time they mortgaged the province, they may have caused irreparable harm to future generations who will have to pay for these excesses. The new deficit will be nearly triple the last highest deficit in Ontario's history, which was $3.18 billion in the 1982 fiscal period. The provincial debt, in one stroke, will increase by one third to a total of $51.7 billion. This is more than $5,000 for every person in Ontario. In addition, the Premier and the Treasurer are forecasting high deficits for the remainder of their term in office, which will substantially increase the provincial debt in Ontario.

Although revenues are expected to decline during the 1991-92 fiscal period, the government has proposed to increase spending by 13.4% over last year. With the execution of a program to provide loans and loan guarantees to small- and medium-size businesses having financing problems during the recession, and increasing investment in research and development in new technologies, the initiatives and money being spent in the budget are not directed towards business or adding any incentives for investment in Ontario, or to increasing the competitiveness of business in Ontario.

The budget contains numerous tax increases, and a number of them have been directed at businesses; for example, the removal of the small-business deduction. In addition, taxes on cigarettes, gas and alcohol were significantly increased. The Treasurer has added 48 cents to each pack of cigarettes and 1.7 cents to each litre of gas, with another 1.7 cents due next year. The rate of tax for gas-guzzling automobiles applicable on new purchases was doubled and a greater number of vehicles were included under this tax. This was done without consultation with the automotive industry or labour representatives and resulted in widespread criticism which forced changes to be made.

These tax increases will only further reduce the disposable income available to consumers who are already either not spending their money or spending it across the border. The government totally ignored the devastating economic hardships being incurred by border communities and made no mention whatsoever of any measures to combat cross-border shopping. In fact, to the contrary, the substantial increases in taxes on gas and cigarettes will only further increase this problem.

Concerns: 1. The substantial increase in the deficit to unprecedented high levels will only lead to further increases in taxes. In addition, the burden of carrying the debt will be passed on to future generations, which will affect significantly the social programs and other benefits that the government has been able to provide and that should be provided in the future.

2. Increased government spending will also add to inflation and lead to higher interest rates and an elevated Canadian dollar. This has the effect of hurting businesses in Ontario and reducing the province's ability to come out of the recession. The current government in Ontario is the only jurisdiction in Canada which has not introduced a program to control spending.

3. The increase in taxes will reduce consumers' disposable income, which will further reduce their spending habits. Consumers are already struggling with high consumption loan and mortgage rates and there will now be additional costs incurred in purchasing cigarettes, gasoline and alcohol.

As a result, businesses will continue to see their ability to compete being eroded and there will be a further loss of jobs in Ontario.

4. If the current pace of government borrowing continues unabated, more and more of our tax dollars will be spent paying interest costs. In addition, this problem will be compounded as the government is called upon in the future to fulfil the needs of our aging baby-boom generation or as new problems arise, such as the need for environmental protection.

5. The budget did not contain any initiatives to attract business investment and new jobs in Ontario. Furthermore, the budget was lacking in new initiatives to assist in the training and retraining of Ontario workers.

6. The budget contained nothing to combat cross-border shopping and to reverse the damage being sustained by businesses and border communities. In particular, the budget contained no assistance with respect to the reduction of gasoline taxes in border communities and, in fact, increased taxes. This will further fuel—no pun intended—cross-border shopping.

7. The Treasurer also announced that the provincial Fair Tax Commission should expedite its review of a minimum corporate tax and a tax on real estate speculation, and appears committed to follow through with these additional taxes against businesses. The proposed announcements, along with other proposed legislation by the government, do not send out promising messages to anyone interested in investing in Ontario and will have a detrimental effect on existing businesses in Ontario.

8. The government is committed to high deficits throughout its term and appears very willing to continue its current spending levels. This will only result in further tax increases and substantial borrowing and interest costs.

Our recommendations: 1. The government should immediately reconsider its decision to increase substantially the deficit and debt in this province.

2. The government should immediately reconsider and consult with business and other interested parties to determine effective initiatives to stimulate investment and the creation of new businesses and jobs in Ontario.

3. The government should immediately reconsider its position regarding the substantial increase in gasoline and cigarette taxes, and in particular should immediately consult with business and other interested parties to determine an appropriate method to allow for the reduction of gasoline taxes in border communities.

4. The government should immediately reconsider its decision to substantially increase its spending levels and immediately consult with business and other interested parties to determine a program to control spending and reduce expenditures.

5. The government should immediately reconsider its position to announce further tax increases, including a minimum corporate tax, and should consult with business and other interested parties to determine alternative initiatives to raise the revenue necessary to balance the budget.

6. The government should seriously consider its decision to maintain high deficits for the remainder of its term in office and should consult again with business and other interested parties to determine the serious consequences to the province and its economy of maintaining high spending levels and increasing taxes, as same will impact upon its ability to attract investment and to maintain its competitiveness.

As a concluding statement, we at the Windsor and District Chamber of Commerce strongly believe that the government's decision to increase the deficit to $9.7 billion and to further increase the total debt for the province is wrong. We feel that continuing on this course of action with continuous high deficit levels will put the province further and further into debt, thereby increasing substantially the amount of interest being spent to sustain these debt levels. As a result, less and less money will be available to fund the basic programs and initiatives necessary to sustain the current standard of living in Ontario.

It is up to all of us to take action and tighten our belts whether we are from business, special interest groups or individuals. If not, we are creating an unacceptable burden for our children. Therefore, it is incumbent upon us to use our resources more wisely and conservatively.

The business community is more than willing to consult with government to discuss these issues and ideas. We feel strongly that our goals are the same and that we should work together on this issue. Only if we all expect a little less today can we guarantee a bright future for our children tomorrow.

Mr Kwinter: Thank you very much, Mr Roberts. Could you give me, very briefly, a profile of the membership of the Windsor and District Chamber of Commerce? Who are you?

Mr Roberts: Our membership contains approximately 1,000 to 1,200 businesses in the community. We extend beyond the city of Windsor and include most of Essex county. Our membership is primarily—I would say 70% to 75%—small businesses with under 10 employees. The remainder would be components of the larger corporations that have head offices in Windsor and in the area.

Mr Kwinter: Thank you. The reason I asked you that question is that earlier today one of the government members suggested there was widespread support for this budget, and he included small business. I just wanted to make sure—I knew, but I just wanted to get into the record—that you represent primarily small business.

Mr Roberts: Correct.

Mr Kwinter: Do you subscribe to their feeling that small business is supporting this budget?

Mr Roberts: Not wholeheartedly, no. I think the only portion of the budget which would have been of benefit to small businesses would be the financial assistance and loan guarantees being proposed for those small businesses that were undergoing hard times. I think, all in all, especially in border communities such as Windsor, the effect of this budget is going to be devastating. In terms of the comments that I made about gasoline and cigarette taxes being increased, basically, those increases act as a loss-leader for many consumers in Windsor to head across the border to fill up their tanks with gasoline or to buy their cigarettes, which then leads to other purchases. If you are not a gasoline station, or a corner store selling cigarettes, that does not necessarily mean your business would not be affected. There will be many other small businesses that are affected.

The recent figures that we have now for Windsor and this area, in terms of the amount of revenue that is being lost across the border, are now close to $200 million, based upon the small border collections that came across the bridge and the tunnel. This is not something that we can ignore any longer. I realize that a lot of the problems are not necessarily incumbent upon the government of the province to resolve. Our position is that it is no longer the time for finger-pointing between federal and provincial and municipal levels; it is time for all of us to work together to try to come up with some positive solutions to this problem.

Mr Sola: On page 2 of your brief, you state that "the budget was lacking in new initiatives to assist in the training and retraining of Ontario workers." Most of the delegations we heard this morning seemed to have the opposite point of view—that there were initiatives for education and retraining of workers. There seems to be a clash between your point of view and theirs. Could you specify what you see lacking or what you would like to see in the budget to initiate this sort of training?

Mr Roberts: Again, I think perhaps the operative word is "new" initiatives. I believe some of the money allocated in the budget was for initiatives that had already been ongoing. Of particular concern, I think, to a lot of small businesses are local programs. Again, and I do not want to keep harping on the issue, but of course one that affects the hearts of us in Windsor is cross-border shopping.

What we were hopeful of was perhaps announcements in the area of retraining. Service is one of the areas that people are complaining about being lacking in Ontario and that may affect our competitiveness. Perhaps we should have programs available for educational purposes, to retrain service sector people in those areas.

It has always been the position of the chamber, and I think in any well-meaning community, that your success in business and your success in operating basically comes down to your labour force. I think we in Essex county have a strong labour force and one that is generally well respected in terms of training and abilities. But there is still a need for an improvement in programs in that area, to help some areas of their economy to diversify into new areas.

Mrs Sullivan: The Treasurer of Ontario, in this budget and just recently, has indicated that the province will start labour-sponsored venture capital funds, where people who work in a company can invest risk capital in the development of that operation. This morning, the CAW, when Bob White was here, indicated that they are very sceptical of that kind of an approach to investing in the future of business. I wonder what your view would be of the labour-sponsored venture capital plans?

Mr Roberts: I have to admit that I am not familiar with the program or the details. I would probably need to have a little better idea of what was involved. Am I to understand that the employees of the corporation would advanced funds to take it over for themselves?

Mrs Sullivan: No, they would receive a tax credit—think up to $1,500 annually—for investing in an equity position in the company.

Mr Roberts: I would need to hear more about the program, but generally I do not see a problem with that. It is a common business theory that when you can get your employees involved in the company, that can help increase your productivity. Productivity appears to be on the increase in Canada. To the extent that the labour force could become involved in an equity investment with a company, it may be a good idea. Again, the details of the program would have to be made known.

Mr McLean: Mr Roberts, I would like to know if you are here today representing the hotel and motel industry, the construction industry, the real estate industry. Are you representing tourism here today?

Mr Roberts: Inasmuch as we have members of the Windsor and District Chamber of Commerce from those areas that you mentioned, I would have to say, Yes. I am not here as a particular advocate for any one of those groups. But to the extent that the chamber of commerce advocates the ideals of our membership, and those groups are represented, I would have to answer, yes.

Mr McLean: We have had a great deal of discussion with regards to working with business and industry in order to get the economy rolling again. I cannot understand, in the life of me, why the Essex development commission, the construction industry, or the tenants' association would not be making representations to this committee.

Mr Roberts: The development commission in Essex county would probably rely on an organization like the Chamber of Commerce to make representations. This is not to say that they would not benefit by being here today, but perhaps they are relying upon us to represent their interests. The other groups that you mentioned, I would have to agree with you. It would not hurt for them to be here to emphasize those particular portions of the budget that relate to their particular industries.

Mr McLean: We are not hearing anything from the tourism industry. I would like to know what is happening with tourism in this town. I would like to know what is happening with the construction industry. What is going on? I mean, there is not one of them on this sheet, and I am, at the least, disappointed that we are not dealing with those very people.

Mr Carr: Thank you very much for your presentation. I think it was the Canadian Federation of Independent Business when they put their surveys out—and as you know, they do it very democratically where every member gets to vote on something and send the reply back—they said that the number one concern that business has is taxes, even ahead of the cost of financing. Number two was actually government regulation, but number one was taxes.

The big concern that a lot of people have with the deficit is that it will mean there will be no opportunity for relief as a result. In fact, a lot of economists are predicting, for example, that the provincial sales tax will have to go pay for it. What a lot of people are concerned about is there will not be any opportunity for tax relief, in spite of the fact that we are now the most heavily taxed province in Canada and jurisdiction in North America. Is one of the concerns with the deficit just the fact that there will be any opportunity to reduce any taxes for any of the small businesses in the future?

Mr Roberts: Definitely. It always follows, certainly, the heels of creating deficits that you somehow have to make up with the revenues to accommodate those deficits, to raise the necessary funds to pay for the interest. It certainly negates the possibility of having further tax reductions. It is our position that rather than having higher taxes, efforts should be more creatively spent on reducing expenditures in ways that would enable the government to maintain those basic social programs that are part of the quality of life we have come to enjoy in this province and country. At the same time, they should allow for the balancing of budgets so that we do not lend ourselves to borrowing at the expense of future generations.

We do not need to have any more taxes. There are enough tax problems for potential investment in this province. And there are other taxes in the last few years that have been passed on to business—the employer health tax and others; I do not need to mention them—that have already added to the fixed expenses of businesses. To add a minimum corporate tax and other taxes is only going to compound these problems.

Mr Carr: This morning I outlined the cost of the deficit. You might not have been here. I had the fine people in legislative research prepare data. They, of course, are independent, and they used the actual government figures from Treasury people. The interest on the provincial debt alone in 1994-95 will be $19 million a day, or about $800,000 an hour and $13,000 a minute. By my calculation—we have been here since 9 o'clock this morning and it is now a little after two—we are looking at about $4 million spent, not to pay for hospitals, health care, education, environmental programs, but just to pay the interest on the provincial debt.

This morning Mr White said that amount was acceptable to him. I think even David Christopherson, when he spoke about it in the Legislature, said it was like getting a mortgage on your home, although I do not go out and get a mortgage on a home in Rosedale if I cannot afford it. But my perception is that this is an acceptable amount of debt, vis-à-vis the revenues and so on. As a business person who has used to taking a look at debt, do you think the amount of debt we are looking at could be considered reasonable?

Mr Roberts: Not at all. I am actually very glad that you provided these figures. I have figures for Canada as a whole, and they are totally shocking.

Mr Carr: Anybody who wants them can have them.

Mr Roberts: This is amazing as well. As we know, when you are operating a business, or whether it is your own personal finances, if in one particular year you happen to spend more than you raise, your banker might let you get away with it. But try doing it two, three, four, five years in a row. The country as a whole has been doing it for 22 consecutive years, and that is not a very good record. It is not a record which I would like to see this province follow, because as I stated, this province generates 40% of the economic production for the country. If we start to bankrupt this province, it is only going to lead to the eventual bankruptcy of the whole country. It is totally unacceptable.

Again, I do not want my harsh comments to be taken as simply a criticism. I think the business community and the Ontario and Canadian chambers of commerce are very, very interested in being involved in the consultative process. We want to be a part of your discussions. That is why we are here today. We want to be able to work towards solutions that are needed to balance our budget. It has been accomplished before. We need to stimulate investment in this province to be able to raise the revenues to balance.

Mr Lessard: I want to welcome you to the committee, Mr Roberts. I can tell that you have benefited greatly from a good University of Windsor education.

Mr Roberts: Exactly.

Mr Carr: Did you guys go together?

Mr Lessard: Yes, a former fellow classmate. You seem to be a very strong proponent of the balanced-budget philosophy. You understand as well the difficulties of projecting these sorts of things into the future. I wonder what you thought of the last Liberal budget, because they seemed to think they were going to have a balanced budget last year. Did you think that was all right?

Mr Roberts: They projected a balanced budget but unfortunately the province and the country entered into a recession. Those are factors which we cannot always predict accurately. Certainly in the third quarter of 1990 the recession became a public fact, an economic fact, though I think many of us realized we were well into a recession before that. Then is the time you grab hold of your financial statements and your expenditures and begin to take a real good look at them. It is not the time when, instead of maintaining yourself in a $3-billion deficit, you triple it and go into a $9-billion deficit.

Mr Lessard: Just carrying on with the programs and policies of the previous government, we would have ended up with a deficit of $8 billion, according to the information I have. We would have had to take some pretty drastic measures to reduce that. You are a strong proponent that the government should consult business, so let's consider that we are here today to do that. What sort of suggestions do you have for places where those sorts of drastic cuts could be made?

Mr Roberts: It is certainly not my place to sit down, at this time anyway, with your complete list of expenditures and start slashing.

Mr B. Ward: If you could.

Mr Roberts: If I could—

Mr Carr: Freeze civil servants?

Mr Roberts: It is like any business—and we are certainly not suggesting the government has to be operated exactly like a business—you would have to have all the facts and figures in front of you with regard to the amounts being spent on particular programs. I am not going to say to you that certain social programs should be slashed. I think it is a matter of sitting down and looking at the whole picture. It is like the city of Windsor has done. It is like our boards of education have done. It is like many public organizations have had to do. You realize there are problems in terms of raising revenues and that it is a matter of taking a creative look at what you have and reducing those expenditures.

Mr Christopherson: Mr Roberts, I thank you for your presentation. The responses and presentations we hear from the chambers are always very interesting and articulate.

I think you used the words—I jotted them down as you spoke them—“shocking” and “amazing” when listening to Mr Carr’s statistics. I would suggest to you that some of those tactics really amount to nothing more than scaremongering. The reality is that our deficit will take about 12%, 12 cents of every revenue dollar, compared to the feds, who are now paying 34 cents. We are not suggesting that is the right thing to do, and neither are we trivializing our deficit. But we are saying what we have done is very manageable. It is very much in control, and from where we sit, very necessary.

I think it is also important to note that in last week’s papers it was being suggested that the Tory deficit for this year, rather than being $30 billion, is now possibly going to be as high as $40 billion. This means the miscalculation by the feds is greater than our entire deficit. I would also point out that the projections so far made in our budget are almost dead on. Now it is still early in the game, and I acknowledge that, but they are accurate and they are dead on. I think that says a lot about who has a real good sense of fiscal management and who does not. Because it is the NDP, there is this sense that somehow it is disaster looming. We would argue quite the opposite.

In your presentation on page 1, it talks about tax increases only further reducing disposable income. The very first piece of legislation this government put forward in the Legislature was to prevent the provincial sales tax from being put on top of the GST. That kept a half billion dollars in the pockets of consumers. It is a tax that we felt was not appropriate at a time of recession. So the case you are arguing is exactly what we did. Yet there are very few people who are acknowledging a tax move that benefited a lot of working people.

My question to you is in regard to the opposite approach that one would have to take if you did not go down the road we did. In other words, you would have to take the Mulroney-Wilson approach to budget setting and priority setting. Rather than, as Mr Carr has suggested, purchasing a home in Rosedale, the mortgage, quite frankly, was taken out to try and provide for affordable housing in many cases and to provide some basic needs and to put food on the table for an awful lot of people who are hurting very, very much through this recession.

I would ask you, what if we had gone the route that would have put us into a balanced budget and had looked at the necessary cuts and slashes, though there is not that much fat in the system, as much as some might like to argue? What would you say to the construction workers who still would not be employed as a result of the recession because there would not be the anti-recession money?

And to the employees who lost wages because the p closed and their wages were not protected? And to municipalities who told us, if they had not gotten money from us that they did, property taxes—an expensive item for small business—would have gone up? And the disabled?

You mentioned the burden on future generations “which will affect significantly the social programs and other benefits,” and then your last statement talks about “only if we could expect a little less today can we guarantee a bright future for our children tomorrow.” We have disabled groups coming in and telling us they were told they had to wait in good times; now they are being told they have to wait in bad times. How do we answer that to the people if we are not there to help them now?

Mr Roberts: If I may, I want to address some of the comments you made and I will answer your question at the end. I am glad you were able to identify how many cents of each revenue dollar you are projecting will be going towards interest costs. It is interesting to know that 10 years ago Canada was only paying 12 cents of every revenue dollar towards interest costs too, but we have now tripled that in the intervening period.

Second, with regard to the miscalculations which the Conservative government has made, I am sitting here just optimistically hoping that your fiscal responsibility is correct, because indeed if you have erred at all in the calculations you have made and that $9.7-billion deficit is going to be tripled or doubled as a result of not having accurately forecast the revenues you are anticipating, then we are in very deep trouble, and that 12 cents is going to be escalating as well.

With regard to your decision to add the PST before the GST, I thank you for that and I am sure a lot of consumers will thank you for that as well. However, if we were to have embarked upon the road of harmonizing the collection of the PST with the GST, we would have probably seen billions of them drop a point or two.

Finally, you asked what we are going to say to the construction workers, these employees who are looking for their wage protection, as well as the disabled groups. My question to you is, what are we going to say to those people in five years? What are we going to say to them 10 years when we are spending 30 cents and 40 cents of every revenue dollar towards paying for the interest costs of the benefits we are giving to them today? That is the question.

I would like to spend every cent I make or even spend two or three times what I make, but what am I going to have to my child in a generation from now? That is the problem. I am just asking you simply to look forward, look ahead. I am not stating that there are not certain social programs that you have—

The Chair: Your time has run out. I would like to thank you for appearing before the committee with your comments and presentation.

NATIONAL FARMERS UNION

The Chair: Could we have the National Farmers Union, Mr Pearce. If you would identify yourself for the oses of Hansard, you have one half-hour totally for presentation and question and answer period.

Mr P. Pearce: My name is Perry Pearce. My assistant is my wife. I think she handed out a rough outline of what we are going to speak on today. It will be quite brief. I think I will perform better in a question-and-answer atmosphere than by preaching. We will get started with the text.

As a farmer and a National Farmers Union member I thank you for this opportunity to voice our opinion. This situation is seldom heard any more in this so-called democratic society. The NFU is an organization which represents farm families across Canada. Our policies address the means of becoming a viable sector in Canada and include long-term plans. As farmers we have been faced with many obstacles and, more recently, the free trade agreement, GST and the recession. These obstacles have not only affected farmers but the average Canadian. We have all lost jobs and income.

As a taxpayer, I am pleased that the Ontario government has decided to address the problems of its citizens caused by the effects of the recession. We realized that a deficit was not a situation a new government wished to begin with and that tough decisions needed to be made. With regard to agriculture, it is encouraging to note that the federal allocation has been increased by about 14%. The provincial budget has recognized the urgent need at the farm gate and the importance of agriculture, which is the second-largest industry in Ontario.

The pre-budget announcement of the $50 million for farm interest assistance program greatly assisted those in need. Historically, it has been a problem, with April-announced budgets, for the farm community to react in a situation where we have already spent possibly some of our money and are going to the field a week or two after the budget. So these pre-announcements were a real benefit. I really appreciate that.

The high interest rates which this program was directed at are the result of the federal Conservative agenda. This summer the FCC rates, which is the Farm Credit Corp, are 10% higher than bank rates. The bank rate on borrowed money has not followed the Bank of Canada's downturn in interest rates either. Therefore the province, in my opinion, is the only group with a clear plan to assist farmers with this problem. It will enable them to make projections for their farm cash flows. We hope the program continues until the province introduces a complete farm finance package for Ontario farm families.

With regard to the gross revenue insurance program—which we call it in the industry, GRIP—$40-million allocation, the NFU recognizes the tough decision which was made regarding this program. We did not agree with the federal agenda, the third line of defence proposed, as it still is short and does not address the problem of stable and low cost of production. Already other farm groups and commodity boards which agreed with the federal proposal are confused and have concerns that they may have been misled. This concern was previously pointed out by the NFU and recognized by the Ontario government. In the future, we believe this program must address the cost of production and may need stronger fund support. Having been forced into this program, we appreciate the Ontario budget allocation of $40 million pending a better program.

We understand the Ontario government currently has a task force on fair taxation. We applaud this move and hope they will recognize the unfairness of the farm tax reduction program. Ministers from several departments need to address the reason for this program and recognize that it is not a subsidy to the farmer but an unfair education tax which needs to come from somewhere else besides farm families' pockets and perhaps the Education ministry.

Research needs to be addressed by this government. When allocating funds, our ministers need to be concerned that our tax dollars are being used to enhance agriculture for grass-roots farm families and not for the benefit or profit of the corporate sector. We do strongly urge the need for more on-farm research without corporate intervention. The agricultural economy needs a rebuilding phase, and this should be emphasized. The environment has been given an overall budget increase as well and this is appreciated. Again, on the farm side, research has to be done on the farm so that as responsible farmers we can co-operate with any decisions or findings.

The NFU, which has been in existence as a national organization for 20 years, has much to offer this government and we hope that through co-operation we can work together to build a better Ontario.

Mr McLean: How would you like to see the farm tax rebate restructured?

Mr P. Pearce: Presently it is a burden on the people who own the land. Maybe that was fine when land owners were wealthy people of society, but it needs to come off the land and it needs to be a fair tax across the entire society. Whether it is eliminated completely, as an education tax on the land, and is moved to a different arena of assessment, whether it is on housing or whatever, I am not really sure, other than the fact that it is an unfair tax presently. I would like to see some different sectors of the government sit down and discuss where we can obtain this. I know it is a tough one to iron out.

Mrs J. Pearce: Maybe I can add a point. Right now we are having to fork out money which we do not have to pay this unfair land tax. What happens is it goes to the local government and then the provincial government, in turn, refunds it to us. There is just an unnecessary step there. It would be a great help if the government paid it directly to the municipality.

Mr McLean: The question I wanted to ask was, what is the policy of your organization with regard to the tax? Do you have a policy?

Mr P. Pearce: Yes.

Mr McLean: What is the policy?

Mr P. Pearce: It is an unfair tax. If you want to examine history, members of the National Farmers Union started this whole procedure because our membership refused to pay our tax at one time. We were threatened with jail terms because we were not going to pay our land tax, and the government of the day brought in the farm tax rebate, with a promise that it would reform it. That promise has been going on ever since. So I guess we have great hope that a new government may have new ideas on how to solve this problem instead of just postponing it.

Mr McLean: Thank you, but you have not answered my question. The question was, what policy does your organization have to restructure it?

Mr P. Pearce: What solution?

Mr McLean: Have you got a restructured policy? I am a farmer, so I know a little bit about it, but I do not know of anybody who has come forth with a policy. Do they want just to pay on their house? Do they just want to take the education tax off? Do they want to continue to pay in and get 75% back? Does your organization have a policy that would solve it? That is what I am asking.

Mr P. Pearce: The direct answer is no, because the minute you start changing it, it is going to be a burden to somebody else. We would like to consult all sectors, instead of just saying, "Well, look, I don't want to pay it; you pay it." That is not a very fair system. We would like to see it go through a consulting process. Whether this task force on fair taxation addresses it, I do not know. We will see in the results.

Mr McLean: There was a commitment made in the Agenda for People in regard to tax rebate for farmers. Have you seen that? The government would bring in a policy that would help small business, would help the farmers through these tough economic times with an interest rebate.

Mr P. Pearce: Have we seen the results of it? No.

Mr McLean: The other question I have is, the $97 million that was programmed to help crop subsidies, which was announced in June some time, I believe, what year is that for?

Mr P. Pearce: I am not sure because part of that is GRIP, which is 1992.

Mr McLean: That is right.

Mr P. Pearce: But there is talk of an initial payment in 1991, so to a certain extent we are robbing Peter to pay Paul under that scenario, which the farm community has trouble with because we are going to need that money in 1992 also.

Mr McLean: But we need it in 1991, and we are not getting it in 1991.

Mr P. Pearce: Yes.

Mr McLean: That is the problem.

Mr Carr: I noticed that page 2 and 3 of the Agenda for People talked about relief for farmers. The relief for farmers that was promised last year during the election campaign has not come through—the interest rates they promised at government borrowing rates and so on. As I look at the amount spent last year in terms of agriculture and food in absolute terms and the amount that has been spent this year, it is one of the few areas that has not had a big increase. I assume, then, that as a result of that you are not pleased with the amount that is being spent for farmers in this province. Is that correct?

Mr P. Pearce: We have mixed feelings. We greatly appreciate the interest reduction, but we also realize the problem is not a provincial-based problem. It is a problem of passing the buck under that scenario. The GRIP, once again, is a federal agenda that the province has been made part of. Yes, we would like a cash bail-out, but so would everybody else in Ontario who is having financial trouble. As farmers and as taxpayers, we realize that it is not an open chequebook, so we appreciate what we got. We would always like more, but the reality is, is it there?

Mr Sutherland: I was just wondering if you could give this committee a little sense of what the farmers are going through here in Essex and Kent county. There have been reports on the news, and certainly those of us who have driven down here, even on the 401, could see how the crops, certainly on this side of Chatham, are very hard hit. Is the problem as severe here in Essex as well?

Mr P. Pearce: The Essex county region, I would say, is probably the hardest hit area of Ontario, maybe Canada, from what I hear. On my particular farm—those who are familiar with farming practices can appreciate this—I received an eight-inch rain at the end of May; seven inches of it just washed right away and down the ditch and was gone, and it makes the soil about as hard as this floor and then no rain until last week. There are some crops that should be destroyed because there is nothing there. There are crops that will be half a yield. Some of the irrigated crops may get close to being 80%, but the bills keep coming in.

We need this problem addressed. The farm community is in the process of discussion right now of how to address it, which avenue, which is healthy, because sometimes the farm community does not always get together and discuss these things. All I can say to this committee is that there will be something coming, a proposal from Essex county. Be open-minded with it and be quick about it. In the past, with the 1988 drought program, it was too little too late. By the time we received the money, we had already spent that money in interest for carrying the extra cost, so we would rather have $1 now than $5 next year.

Mr Sutherland: You mentioned the GRIP program. The sense we have been getting from some farmers and people there is that they are still going to remain open-minded, with a wait-and-see attitude on GRIP and the income stabilization account; but what we need is some type of bridging until payments come on GRIP and NISA. Is that your sense of what needs to be done, or do you feel that GRIP and NISA are not going to work in the long run?

Mr P. Pearce: The National Farmers Union has serious concerns with GRIP, because it does not address the cost of production. The way we like to think about it is as an open-ended subsidy, which is always a dangerous tactic because if it is a healthy program today, do you increase production? And in the future it becomes an unhealthy program because it is just overloaded.

The GRIP program is written for 1992 as far as income coming back is concerned. So what do you do for 1991 and 1990? Right now I am living on the profits of 1990 which were very slim. The feds had claimed during the ussion that they would take care of us. Well, they are and that is a problem.

What the province can do, I have mixed feelings. Sure would like a nice big cheque, but if you write a very rich program for 1991, that sort of belittles the GRIP program, because farmers will say, "Why should I join GRIP when these guys are going to bail me out anyway in tough times?"

Mrs Sullivan: I have just been reviewing the list of year average prices for corn, soya beans and wheat. What we are looking at for corn, in 1991 dollars, the 15-year average price is $167. This year the price is estimated to be about $90. For soya beans, the 15-year average is $137 versus $207 for this year.

Mr Pearce: Yes.

Mrs Sullivan: Wheat, $202 versus $75 for this year. Even those pressures on your product prices, given the interest rate pressures and the requirements for capital expansion, whether it is for environmental matters where you have to put new capital investment into your operations or whether it is for other initiatives, do you not find it outstanding that the government has not yet turned and looked at the realities of farming right now and agreed already and given farmers an indication that there would be advanced interim payments coming forward to carry them through this fall?

Mr P. Pearce: The 15-year average prices I think really meet cost of production. If you look around Ontario farms today, there are very few with new equipment, new tractors and new toys in the machine shed. So obviously we are way below.

An interim payment would be nice. In fact, I think a lot of people are just simply accepting that it will be there, because if it is not, those GRIP cheques are going to burst like rubber balloons, the ones that were issued and dated for November 1. I hope this government hears the loud and clear on this point. Those cheques will not fly without an interim payment before then. That leaves us in a spot where in the first year the program is not going to work. Yes, we need an interim payment badly.

The problem is, if you structure that interim payment to borrow from 1992, what are you going to do in 1992? It is not a simple answer. If it was, I guess we would all be lobbying for the same thing. Really, what we need is a flow of money to address the problem of 1990 and 1991 commodity prices, whether that is federal jurisdiction or provincial. I guess the NFU position is that much of it is federal jurisdiction where the federal government has done a very good job of washing its hands of responsibility for resource industries, whether it is farming, mining, forestry, whatever.

Mrs Sullivan: I think there is a substantial responsibility at the provincial level. The province has certainly agreed to participate in the GRIP and the NISA programs for next year, not for this year. Many other provinces have agreed for this year. Producers could have paid in and received an output this year. But there are also other stabilization programs and there are other things that the province can do, including ensuring that the entire $50-million interest rate reduction is disbursed, including ensuring that the beginning farmer assistance program continues so the young farmers are not affected. They have cancelled that. I just—

Mr P. Pearce: If I may interrupt for a second, we were not extremely happy with the beginning farmer program.

Mrs Sullivan: A lot of people were not happy with it, but now it has been totally cancelled and that money is not going out to the farmers. It is not going back to young people who are starting out. There has been no indication that interim payments are going to come forward under grain stabilization plans. There has been no indication that the producer premium is going to be waived this year under Ontario programs.

Mr P. Pearce: The province has announced an interim payment under the provincial grain stabilization.

Mrs Sullivan: Not for this year.

Mr P. Pearce: Within a week, a week and a half ago. At least, I was notified of an interim payment and it has been in the farm papers about interim payment. I agree it does not amount to much, but at this stage I will take whatever cheque I can get. The problem we had with the beginning farm program was we were assisting young farmers to get in. In the meantime we were assisting farmers beside them to get out, existing farmers. It was a double standard.

Mr Kwinter: Throughout your presentation you talk about cost of production. How is that going to relate to things like GATT and free trade? Do you see that coming along as a problem?

Mr P. Pearce: No, I do not, because the Americans clearly do not see it as a problem.

Mr Kwinter: You mean they do not see it in doing it for their farmers?

Mr P. Pearce: Exactly. What is fair for them should be fair for us.

Mr Kwinter: And what about GATT?

Mr P. Pearce: Up until this morning I was not sure whether GATT was going to survive; and after this morning, with what is going on in Russia, I do not know where it is going, because the whole issue of GATT centres around the European common market. If eastern Europe opens up, does the European common market still need the so-called world trade, which really is US-based trade? Do they need it? I do not know. They may walk right away from the GATT table. In the meantime, we have sat here twiddling our thumbs worrying about GATT and have done very little. So I am very confused over GATT.

Mr McLean: I really appreciate your being here today. It is nice to have a point of view from the farm. It always bothered me that people are prepared to pay $150 a ton to get rid of their garbage and are hesitant to pay the farmer for what he produces and what he works for, and it always bugs me.

The Vice-Chair: We would like to thank you very much, Mr Pearce, and Mrs Pearce—sorry, I did not catch your first name.

Mrs J. Pearce: Julie.

The Vice-Chair: —for coming forward and making your presentation today. We will take a short recess before our next presentation.

The committee recessed at 1442.

1449

MARGARET ROUSSEAU

The Chair: You will have 15 minutes for your presentation, and would you leave some time at the end of your presentation for a question-and-answer period?

Ms Rousseau: My name is Margaret Rousseau, and I welcome the legislative committee to Windsor. I am particularly pleased to be included as a speaker and I am delighted, as an employment equity activist, to be able to express my views on the Ontario budget. I would also like to thank the Conservative caucus for the number of letters that I received inviting me to speak today.

Mr B. Ward: What's this?

Ms Rousseau: I am very pleased to be doing that, and I thought I would just add that.

Mr Carr: We always want to hear from the people.

Ms Rousseau: The shape that my brief will take will be one of viewing this budget with respect to how women, visible minorities, aboriginal persons and the disabled have fared. The many problems faced by the groups I have mentioned are rooted in the historical discrimination that being a member of these four groups has engendered. The ongoing battle for fairness and equity has been lessened by a major victory. This victory was the election of a majority New Democratic government in Ontario. This was the beginning of many victories, from the fairness and equity expressed in the throne speech to the fairness and equity expressed in the government's first budget presented by the Honourable Floyd Laughren.

To term the throne speech and the first New Democratic budget victories, we must look at the battle as a whole. The present Tory federal government has waged a war of privatization, competitiveness, taxation, free trade and general budget chicanery, all of this at the expense of working people across this country. All of the provinces have been affected, none more severely than Ontario.

The federal Tories in the past nine years have committed a number of violations of the public trust. The Tory agenda as seen through the eyes of women, for example, has seen the Tories reneging on their promise for a national child care system; has witnessed the Tories regaling themselves for the half-cent reduction in the wage gap as a major victory; has seen thousands of women's jobs in the textile, electronics and food processing industries free-traded away. Women have witnessed the Tories' decrease in 1990-91: $1.6 million, a full 15% of the women's program budget of the Secretary of State of Canada. The previous year's budget, 1989-90, was cut 15.3%, to the tune of $2 million.

The Tory government illustrates its concern for 52% of the Canadian population with funding of a mere 75 cents per woman in moneys to be used for battered women's shelters, aboriginal women's centres and minority women's centres. Compare the total budget of the women's program spending with the $14.2 million spent promoting the universally reviled goods and services. An even better illustration of Tory concern for women's issues is to compare the $9.4-million budget to the government's loan of $17 million for strip club development. That alone, simply put, shows the low regard the Tory caucus holds for women's issues.

The Tories' headlong pursuit of a trilateral free trade deal with Mexico is indicative of the corporate agenda of corporate government, not a government concerned with its constituents.

We know that in a market economy resources are not equally distributed. We also know that it is the role of a responsible government to redistribute those resources to assist those less advantaged so that they may participate fully in society. The present federal government has shown no such responsibility. Through inflated interest rates, losses due to the free trade deal, cutbacks to the Canada assistance program and a proposed freeze on established programs financing, the federal government has left the Ontario New Democrats no alternative but to bridge the gap created by the Tory made-in-Canada recession.

When one looks closely at how the Ontario budget is crafted, one cannot miss how fairness and equity is carefully threaded throughout its fabric. Beginning with the anti-recession plan, $700 million is being kept in circulation in Ontario by the creation and continuation of projects to keep Ontarians working. The creation of the $215-million social assistance reform package provides those hardest hit by the recession an opportunity to re-enter the workforce and increasing participation in the Ontario economy.

This budget provides tax relief for the poorest segment of Ontario's society through the Ontario tax reduction program. This will further raise the quality of life for the working poor, single-parent-led families, visible minorities and disabled, those most affected by inequitable tax levies.

The budget provides $125 million to transfer agencies so that they may provide more equitable working environments for women through pay equity raises. This, along with the creation of 5,000 child care spaces, will allow more women and working-poor parents to continue to contribute to Ontario's economy. Add to this the $20 million, a one-third increase in budgeting for women and children who have been victims of domestic violence and sexual assault, which signals clearly to myself and others the provincial government's concern for its constituents.

One must address the $72 million allocated for 1990-91 in answer to aboriginal Ontarians' demand for the equalization funds formerly denied them. These moneys will be well spent to raise aboriginal people to their rightful place in this province. Add the $7.5 million proposed for the anti-racism strategy to be implemented province-wide. This campaign comes at a particularly most critical time to Ontario's visible-minority citizens. History has shown that racism rises during times of recession, despite the federal government saying that times are improving for working people. When one totals up expenditures proposed, one is left to consider that, yes, the Ontario New Democrats are a responsible government in this market economy.

In conclusion, I thank the committee for giving me the opportunity to applaud the Ontario New Democrats for ageous and humane budget. However, I would be re-in not commenting on the roles of the opposition and parties in the budgetary discussions. To the opposition and otherwise, the tactic of likening the macroeconomics of running a province to the microeconomics of running a household is one that wears poorly on the work-people of Ontario. This scare tactic is not one of democratic truthfulness but smacks of autocratic zeal.

The courage and leadership shown by the provincial government in investing in all of its people, not just a select few, bodes well for the future of Ontario and of Canada. John Maynard Keynes, in the General Theory of Employment, Interest and Money, stated: "Of the maxims of orthodox finance, none surely is more antisocial than the fetish of liquidity. It forgets that there is no such thing as free liquidity of investment for the community as a whole."

Mr B. Ward: Thank you for your presentation. Did I hear you say at the beginning that Mike Harris invited you to attend?

Ms Rousseau: He was one of the individuals. That letter was supposed to have left in my file at work, but I have a letter from Leo Jordan, MPP. He ends the letter: "Today the government agreed to have public hearings across the province. Please plan to attend the one in your area."

Mr B. Ward: I am sure they are appreciative of your presentation in support of the budget. My question is, we have had some concern from business people that they cannot absorb costs to remain competitive. How do you answer those people when the issues of employment equity pay equity come into discussion and they feel those costs they cannot absorb? How do you answer that?

Ms Rousseau: Very simply. I am faced with this quite often in my job when I have managers tell me, "This is really expensive." I think it is a time in this country when one has to consider that it is an awful shame that business has a cost. If it has a cost, that leads me to believe perhaps that cost is incurred to ameliorate some past problem. Very often that is the way employment equity in this country has been dealt with. They have just simply thrown money at it, whereas in this province we have seen employment equity legislation is proposed. There has been an equity commissioner appointed. We have seen these sorts of things speed up, so they are going to put their teeth in that, rather than just simply decide where corporations file what I refer to as a flight plan for the next few years in regard to equity.

Mr Carr: I talked this morning about a poll which asked people basically if they would like to see any new taxes limiting the increase in government spending. During that poll they asked people who they voted for last time, NDP, Conservatives or Liberals, and overwhelmingly, 75% of the people, said they would like to see some type of controls put in place.

You may have heard about some of the spending that has gone on—$438,000 to send that one chap down to get rehabilitation in the United States; the TVOntario chairman has nine TVs in his office, he has a chauffeur at $1,000; all these things that are coming out. Very specifically, do you feel there are any areas in the government where we can reduce spending, or do you believe the government, as we sit here today, is running efficiently?

Ms Rousseau: I can easily see one: these budget hearings at the Conservatives' insistence. I believe they are costing the province $250,000. That would have been a ready clip right there. Apart from that one, I would have to spend some time looking at it.

Mr Carr: I sit on the Sunday shopping committee going around the province. The Premier and the Solicitor General have said, "We are not changing anything anyway," and this budget probably will not change. I think I was there the day 4,000 people were yelling at Floyd Laughren on June 20 and he said, "We're not going to change it anyway." But at least the people will have had an opportunity. The clerk informs me we have more submissions to this hearing than we have to any others.

My next question would be this—

The Chair: I am sorry, Mr Carr, we have run out of time.

1500

CANADIAN UNION OF PUBLIC EMPLOYEES, LOCAL 543

The Chair: Laura Moore, please. I guess we have your brief here. You will have 15 minutes for your total presentation. Try to keep some time at the end so each party has a chance to ask one question.

Ms Moore: The Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 543, welcomes this opportunity to offer our comments on the provincial budget. It is encouraging to see that this government is putting forth a true effort to address the needs and concerns of the people of Ontario.

Our local union is comprised of four bargaining units and represents over 1,200 members employed in both the public sector and the private sector. Our largest unit is the city of Windsor municipal inside workers covering a wide range of jobs including clerical, technical, recreational, maintenance, health care, child care and social workers. We also represent workers of the Windsor-Essex County Health Unit, the Windsor Occupational Health Information Service and the ABC Day Nursery, which is the largest private day care centre in Windsor.

Due to the nature of our work, the vast majority of our members are women. Therefore, the focus of this brief will be on the effects of the provincial budget on the women of Ontario.

Ontario has been struggling through the current recession with enormous plant closures, bankruptcies, high interest rates, job loss and unemployment. The federal government has played a major role in the creation of this recession. The Canada-US free trade agreement is directly responsible for the loss of thousands of jobs, as plants and factories close their doors and relocate their businesses across the border. Despite the obvious damage to Canada's economy, the Mulroney government has failed to learn from its mistakes and is at it again, integrating Mexico into a free trade agreement.

The GST is yet another Tory-made factor in the current recession. Combined with the artificially high Canadian dollar, consumer spending power has been drastically reduced. The retail industry, especially in a border community such as Windsor, is suffering the consequences. Jobs are continuing to be lost daily with the ripple effects of permanent job loss devastating to the entire economy.

The recent Supreme Court ruling with respect to the 5% capping of the Canada assistance plan is yet another Tory attack on Canadians. Mulroney's deficit-reducing strategy is merely a pass-the-buck scam. The federal government stands to save over $2 billion a year while Ontario stands to lose $1 billion in 1991 and 1992.

Despite the actions of the federal government, the provincial government has not abandoned the people of Ontario. The Ontario government's courageous attempt to fight the recession with increased spending is applauded. Spending money now is critical to stimulating economic growth and is a positive step in the right direction. This budget clearly indicates the government of Ontario's intention to fight the recession head-on. The willingness of the government to accept a $9.7-billion deficit resulting from this budget is evidence of its courage and its conviction to protect the interests of working people and the majority of Ontario citizens in a time of economic hardship.

As a largely public sector union, CUPE Local 543 is pleased to note that the budget did not introduce any overt forms of public sector wage controls. In recent years, we have been barely maintaining our wage adjustments comparable to the rate of inflation. Year after year, little by little, we tend to lose purchasing power. Fiscal restraint should not be at the expense of public service workers and Ontario should be proud to be one of the few provinces in Canada not imposing cuts to the living standards of its employees.

As the majority of Local 543 members are women, we were particularly delighted with the program funding and initiatives announced in the budget pertaining to equality. Increased funding to address the issue of violence against women will enhance and expand the services and shelters available to women and children who are victims of sexual assault and domestic violence.

Improvements to the tax system will benefit low-income families, many of which have single mothers. The development of 35,000 units of co-operative and non-profit housing will provide affordable homes for families on low and moderate incomes.

Employment equity initiatives and the appointment of a commissioner to conduct consultations on proposed employment equity legislation is encouraging. We appreciate having been given the opportunity to have input on the development of this much-needed legislation.

When the Pay Equity Act was first introduced it excluded hundreds of thousands of women from the right to equal pay for work of equal value. With the proposed amendments to the act, 420,000 of those originally excluded will soon benefit from pay equity.

With the proposed amendments to the act, women in all-female workplaces will be able to use proxy comparisons or proportionate value comparison to achieve pay equity. What does this mean to our members locally? It means our undervalued day care workers at the ABC Day Nursery, which is an all-female workplace, will soon be able to use proxy comparisons to address the systemic discrimination their occupation has suffered from day on day.

Although the proposed amendments are not yet law, we were successful in using the proportionate value comparison method for our female workers at the Windsor Essex County Health Unit. During our recent negotiations it was argued by the employer that there were no pay inequities simply because there were no comparable job classes. However, after the proposed amendments were introduced, we utilized its potential to convince our employer that the pay inequities must be addressed. We settled our pay equity plan using proportionate value comparisons within the bargaining unit, which resulted in 89% of our female members receiving wage increases ranging anywhere from nine cents to $4.79 an hour.

Although we were fortunate to achieve success using the proposed amendments as a bargaining tool, a draft bill must be brought forward immediately to address the hundreds of thousands of women still patiently waiting to receive the wages they deserve. This draft bill is critical to the women of this province and we cannot wait patiently much longer.

The $100 million allocated in the budget to assist public sector employers with the cost of pay equity adjustments will help to secure the jobs held by those women. The threat of contracting out our jobs to avoid paying our members what they are truly worth has become a very real threat. The funding will lighten the burden on municipalities and public sector employers but, more important, will provide a sense of security for women in the workplace.

The government should be commended for its commitment of funding for the Pay Equity Clinic, which will assist unorganized women in achieving their rights to pay equity. To ensure compliance with the act, the Equal Pay Coalition lobbied for enforcement improvements. A recent Globe and Mail advertisement for 13 pay equity review offices is proof that the provincial government is listening to the voices of the women of Ontario.

In conclusion, I would like to say that equal pay for work of equal value is a fundamental right that all women in workplaces should be entitled to. The provincial budget commitments are exactly that—commitments. It is obvious that this government is truly committed to equality by putting its money where its mouth is.

Mr Carr: Thank you very much for your presentation. In the province today, businesses, households, everybody under pressure to do more with less and trying to be more efficient, to cut back here, to work in different areas. What do you say to those people in the private sector who say public sector employees should do their bit in terms of taking less in pay? What do you say to those people who are saying, "We have to take 3% this year," or the Algoma workers who have to take pay cuts? What do you say to the people who are saying, "Why can't the public service do it?"

Ms Moore: I say to them that the bag of milk they pay $2.99 for at A&P is the same bag of milk we have to pay $2.99 for. If it is costing them that much and it is costing that much, then we must maintain the same rate of inflation to survive. I do not believe public service employees d have to carry the burden of a recession strictly as we work for the public.

Mr Carr: I guess some people would say if we did spend as much money, for example, on the public service increases we might be able to offer tax relief to single women or whatever. It is not as if that money turned back. In these times people are saying obviously the goal of every union is to try to get more for their members, but in this day and age the money saved could be used to help those who are less fortunate. You do not think that as being an area we could have looked at, taken $1 billion and frozen it or even put it at 2% for the public service, and then given that $1 billion back to some of these disadvantaged, to help the Algomas? You do not see that as being an option they could have looked at?

Ms Moore: No, I do not believe the option should at any time be on the backs of public service workers. I believe we are entitled to the same rights and privileges as any other worker and we should not expect private sector workers to take cuts in their salaries for us to be able to afford a brand new car, for instance. I do not think it should be expected of any worker to suffer in the time of a recession, or at any time for that matter.

Mr Sutherland: I notice your local represents a lot of municipal employees, day care workers and most of the employees of Windsor employees. I am wondering what you feel the impact would have been on your membership if the government had decided to provide a 0% increase in trans-fer payments to the municipalities, and more specifically to the municipality of Windsor?

Ms Moore: Most definitely that would have meant major job losses for Local 543. We went through a very difficult budget session with our local council in April and May of that was because of the increased costs of social services and welfare. It was the first time we realized that jobs were at stake because of the lack of funding coming down from the federal government and the provincial government. Had we not received the moneys, we would have had some major job losses in the public sector which in essence would hurt the entire community of Windsor.

Mr Sutherland: Were there any job losses as a result of the final budgeting process?

Ms Moore: We lost no full-time positions, but we had some major cutbacks in what we would consider to be reasonable help. Because of that, the city has become—how do I say it—the quality of the upkeep of the city has dwindled.

THIRD WORLD RESOURCE CENTRE

The Chair: The next group is the Third World Resource Centre. For the purposes of Hansard, would you please identify yourselves? You have 15 minutes.

Mr Dei: My name is George Dei and I represent the Third World Resource Centre, but I am also here as an academic, a concerned citizen and obviously as a person of colour.

Mr Handsor: My name is Warren Handsor. I am with Windsor West Citizen's Organization. George and I came up today together. I will be speaking right after George.

Mr Dei: I am not an economist and I would like to leave the figures and statistics to my friend. Actually, without any stretch of the imagination, I think what we see here in this budget is an attempt to make some rare increases in government spending to back up a commitment to a fair and just society. As a critical social scientist—I am also a sociologist and anthropologist—I am particularly concerned with the social issues and implications of poverty. I think it is very refreshing to note that we see a provincial budget that does not attempt to blame the poor for their problems as if poverty is an independent variable.

Obviously, in the midst of the worst recession in 50 years, what you see here is a government that is trying to fight the recession, rather than fight the deficit, through things like the increases in social spending and the attempt to minimize some of the tax burden for the poor. We can read into this an attempt by the government actually to know that the poor are the hardest hit in terms of economic recession. To me it makes no sense, really, trying to fight a recession or the deficit on the backs of the poor.

There are a number of studies which have been conducted in our country which basically point to the fact that our society would like to see some more spending in the area of education. I am more interested in talking about the question of pay, employment equity in education, and also the question of education as a stability in some of our post-secondary institutions.

A recent study which was done by OISE, the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, made the point that Canadians would like to see some increased spending in education at all levels—secondary, post-secondary, community and so forth—and I think there should be an attempt to make these increases very real so as to benefit those who are the hardest hit in our community. Sometimes we hear, "Where are we to find all these increases?" I would say that, in finding these increases, there must be a fair distribution of resources and also an attempt must be made to trim some of the fringe benefits of the most powerful of our society rather than try to fight or make some increases on the backs of the poor who, incidentally, are the hardest hit by some of these unfortunate situations.

To focus on the question of education and the budget as it affects somebody like a person of colour, in the question of employment equity and education: We have seen over the years that some colleagues, especially some of the minority colleagues, have been leaving and going across the border because there has been no attempt made to get them into the system. What we see here in this budget is an attempt to remove some of the systemic barriers in the three areas of recruitment, retention and promotion of minorities into the educational system.

In the past, basically we had the focus on recruitment. You get people recruited into the system. Sometimes they hold one- or two-year positions, on contract basis, and then they have to leave. I think this is beginning to change. I have been teaching at the University of Windsor for the past three years, on contract. Unfortunately, I did not get a tenured job at the University of Toronto this year. My situation is not unique. It has been the story of most minorities I have come into contact with. Sometimes we are employed on contract basis just to hold positions for a year and then we have to be let loose, without any attempt made to retain us into the system.

What is happening with the affirmative action programs which have been initiated because of the budget increases is helping not only minorities, in terms of visible minorities, but also women. I work at the University of Windsor. We do have women who are entering the university and faculties and this is a good sign not only for the stability of this country, but also in terms of questions of race relations. I teach students at university who come up to me after lectures and tell me, "George, you don't know how happy we are to see a face like yours here," and I think this is something we cannot dismiss. People are really asking for some measures to be taken to become part of the system, not only to be empowered, but to feel they are part of the system and not to be alienated in terms of their working or the financing of the system.

The question of education as a stability: I think what we see also in this budget is an attempt to open new doors for minorities by addressing some of the issues and concerns in the area of education. I think there is a recent surge in the area of anti-racist education, and if you look at some of the campuses, universities and colleges, there has been an attempt made to create these anti-racist education positions, and the attempt here is basically to address some of the issues which have to do with race and racism in education. I mentioned the position I have just got at the University of Toronto, which is basically in the area of anti-racist education. There is no doubt that this has come because of the funding provided by the government in order to promote these areas in our educational system.

The main point I want to stress is that when we talk of the poor and the problems of the poor, I think there is no room for any partisan discourse or debate in terms of providing money for the poor or improving upon the predicament of the poor. It makes no sense to me, really, in a recession, to attempt to change social assistance. I think, given the finding that the poor are the hardest hit by a recession, the attempt should be made really to make significant increases—not only in giving them tax breaks, but also providing programs and structures which will make them feel they are part and parcel of the system we are all part of.

I would like to conclude with a couple of things I think maybe can still be addressed in future discourses. First, I think we all recognize a need to ensure that the minority populations we have are not marginalized in the system. But it raises a challenge, and that is, how do we ensure diversity in our schools at the same time when we have cutbacks on the part of the government? You cannot have diversity and cutbacks at the same time. If you are very sincere about promoting diversity on the campuses and in the colleges, then I think there must be increased funding. There must be a way to find the funds to provide for the diversity.

Last, I think strategies also must be in place to encourage educational funding from the private sector. The private sector tends to benefit from educated graduates, and government must try to come to some sort of agreement with the private sector to make them contribute fairly sharing some of the burden. I do not see any attempt being made to address the question of high dropout rates in schools. We do not know anything about the problems in the high schools. It is just happening in the universities the second year some of the students drop out. The reason they drop out is not because they do not like school, it is because they feel very alienated in the system. There are no strategies in place to make them part and parcel of the system. I think we need to address these issues. Thank you for inviting me here.

Mr Carr: Thank you very much for your presentation. I have concerns that I have heard from the average working people, of families that are out there. I think in this day and age people know that deficits are tied to taxes, and we know we are in the most heavily taxed province in all of Canada. One of the concerns people have is that when they see these large deficits, they say, "I know it not only means there's not going to be any opportunity for tax relief, there also will probably be increases." I am talking not only about the average person. Hopefully there will be the programs to help some of the poor and the seniors and so on, but the average man or woman working out there is saying, "Aha, all this deficit means is that somewhere down the road I'm going to pay higher taxes and I'm going to be the one to get it." What do you say to those people who are fearful about tax increases as a result?

Mr Dei: Yes, I think we need to give the appearance that the success of this country really depends on our stability. I think our country needs to be stable. To get that stability, it may come to a point where there has to be an attempt made to make certain increases. Whether it is in the form of taxes, my only objection, really, is that the increases have to be very fair and that those who can afford, those who have the means or those who benefit the most from the system are made to contribute their fair share.

Mr Lessard: You seem to focus a great deal of your presentation on education. That is an area where there have been some increases reflected in this budget. However, there is some criticism saying, "How do you measure the payback on these increased contributions to education? Even if we do get a payback, it is going to be so long-term that maybe we should take a second look at those sorts of expenditures. Could you address that concern?"

Mr Dei: I think the question of payback in education is something you cannot measure in the short term, as is rightly pointed out. I think those who raise that objection do so because they want to see what we call quick-fix solutions. Like I said, I think education provides many benefits to our society. Whether we are administrators, educators, workers or single mothers or parents, we need to get the message across that we cannot measure the success or benefits of education in terms of just dollars and cents or what we have before us. It needs to take time to mature. It needs to take time to let yourself be first throughout the system. We need to get this message across to people.

When the public gets this message, it likes to respond. I said in my presentation, more and more studies are showing that people are prepared to pay for education. I have some question as to where the money is going, whether the money is going to the right people, the people who need the money the most.

Mr Sutherland: There not being a lot of tenured positions available is pretty commonplace in the post-secondary education system, but I think it brings up another important point in terms of how employment equity really feeds into a healthy economy. It is only in a healthy economy where you have people changing jobs a great deal and where you can start to make your workplaces more reflective of your community. Particularly when you are talking about the public sector, of course, we need a healthy economy so we can have more resources to have more tenured positions coming in. That is going to be our real challenge in the next few years. We will have inflation, but in order to make it work effectively we need to get the economy going so positions are opening up in due time.

WINDSOR WEST CITIZENS' ORGANIZATION

Mr Handsor: Members of the finance review committee, I would like to thank you for inviting me to speak today on the government's 1991 budget on behalf of the economically disadvantaged in Windsor, as the budget relates to them.

It is my intention to highlight a few of the items within the budget, namely housing, employment equity and the social services review reforms. I would like to point out that although I will only be focusing on these three specific items within the budget, it is very clear that the budget, like the budgets, provincial and federal, has an impact on every one of us. If only we can make aware that segment of the population that is only too often left in silence, whether it is because of race, gender, physical disability, place of origin or socioeconomic disposition, that political leverage and economic leverage within our society and that you must draw from your peers to stake out your rightful position within society where, in the process of change, greater equity is achieved for all of society.

The allocations in the budget in regard to housing, employment equity and social services reforms are provided for bringing about greater equity to visible minorities, where the taxpayer is asked to view these expenditures as an investment in the economic growth of Ontario. The minister responsible for the budget, in his opening remarks on greater equity, states, "Our social programs help give people the confidence to meet the challenges of economic change and participate fully in our economy."

Throughout my argument in support of the expenditures allocated to these three areas, I will be attempting to point out that there are real needs for these particular expenditures. However, unless in the delivery of those social programs efforts are made to contract and empower that segment of the population the government hopes to affect, then it would be unrealistic for the government to expect taxpayers to perceive those expenditures as an investment within the process of producing the social goods and services, that same segment of the population is not made responsible for value added to that product. In my support for expenditures in these particular areas there did not appear to be any real commitment to developing concrete linkages between the various ministries and the social agencies where their primary responsibility is delivery in order to avoid duplication of services.

I also have some difficulty with the notion that government on one hand is recognizing the importance to merge social and economic policy, but in retrospect does very little in terms of these expenditures to begin a process of consultation with the private sector to develop new and innovative ways to improve the social welfare system in Ontario to make it economically sound and viable.

The first item I would like to look at is affordable housing. As a community worker and advocate for decent and affordable housing, this is welcome news for the many families who find themselves having to live in substandard housing where they have conditions of overcrowding and poor services in the private sector. This is particularly true for single dwellers who find themselves locked out of the private housing market due to high rents and discriminatory practices where alternatively they are having to turn to motels, boarding houses and in some cases rest homes to meet their daily shelter needs.

I think it is fair to say that Windsor is beginning to see an affordable housing market develop as a result of the progressive housing strategy that has taken place in the province over the last few years. But there is still an inadequacy in the supply, and the level of need is still there. I think we need to move in that direction. We are making good progress in that area.

However, I do feel that as a result of the increase in the number of units being built, there seem to be more adequate regulatory procedures that should be adopted, such as a consolidated waiting list. We know there is a need out there but we want to make sure we know who are the people who are looking for housing. A consolidated list means that when non-profits put their housing up, or co-ops, and we are subsidizing that housing, we do not have person number one on two different lists. We want to consolidate those lists so that the system becomes a lot more efficient and we are able to identify who the homeless are or who are those who are really in need of housing.

That is one thing I certainly would like to see come in. I know the previous government was looking at bringing in a consolidated waiting list. We in Windsor are still waiting for that consolidated list to happen. I think it is long overdue.

Another sector of the social housing program which is beginning to get some attention, but certainly not enough when you consider the amount of dollars being put in the system annually, is the current state of the public housing stock. I have been involved with CMHC in the consultation process when it was beginning to review the public housing stock within the province. We need to see some real changes there. We are talking, on one hand, of building more social housing, but we have major problems in one segment of that social housing, which is public housing, and the problems have not been addressed. We really need to begin to address those problems.

There are a lot of things you can do with that particular housing stock. One of the ideas tossed around is that maybe the government should look at turning the property over to non-profits and co-ops. We are not getting enough action out of the federal government or the provincial government in this matter.

Where I live, which is the west side of Windsor, I am involved in the redevelopment of a particular project. We seem to be pushing residents to deal with just the physical aspect of that project and not with the social and the other problems that are very inherent within it. This housing is all geared to income. There is no mixing whatsoever. There are some real problems. The residents in that area are very much up to the challenge of addressing that problem, yet it has fallen on deaf ears because all they want us to deal with is the physical. If you are going to deal with the physical, you might just as well go ahead and make the decision on your own and forget about consulting with the people who live there.

I also remember in the last government the honourable John Sweeney, when he was the Minister of Housing, had strong feelings that we begin looking at home ownership rather than just looking at subsidized housing. I strongly support that. I think we should begin to look at more home ownership, whether through co-ops or through looking at how we can make housing more affordable so people can own homes, especially for the working poor who have no vision of ever owning a home. We should seriously look at that.

CMHC is also looking at the possibility of decreasing the down payment. Where we are now at 90% financing, we may go to 95%. I think that is a move in the right direction so that we can get people into owning their own home. In that respect, they are seriously looking at home ownership for the working poor as a viable option to subsidized housing.

Another point I would like to make is with respect to employment equity. Visible minorities require real job opportunities that pay decent wages and provide a greater degree of job security in the primary labour market in both the private and public sector. Many of the target groups are underemployed in secondary services and manufacturing industries which have very low standards and poor wages.

In the public sector it is very difficult to break in at the entry level due to restrictive recruitment policies and procedures. You find yourself applying for an entry-level position and waiting two to three months for a first interview at which time, if you are lucky, you are placed in a pool or short-listed, and then it could take one to two years before you ever get called. At that point, you would have to determine whether it would be worth the risk of leaving your current position regardless of the working conditions you are in when you know full well that your government position may only be part-time or temporary at best.

Many people are frustrated with the public service hiring and recruitment procedures. The employment of a commissioner to review and make recommendations is long overdue and will be welcomed by all of us who have had similar experiences with the system.

I would like to speak a little bit on the social assistance reforms, where $250 million is going to be put into the system. Before I begin to comment, though, on the social assistance review measures that the government intend to implement based on the Transitions recommendations coming out of the Thomson report back in 1988, I would like to take a moment just to congratulate the advisory group on new social assistance legislation for its report, Back on Track. I was very much impressed with the report and the actions taken to get the recommendations made in the Transitions report up and moving. I further recommend it for reading to anyone who feels that our welfare system needs an overhaul.

I would also like to add that after all my years having to rely on the welfare system, and in later years working with the staff of the Ministry of Community and Social Services office here in Windsor, I can tell you they work under a great deal of stress. They have very difficult time lines they are trying to meet and extreme pressure from within and outside the bureaucracy. Given that, it still remains one of the most pleasant and caring ministries in its work that I have ever come across.

I would like to address the issue of delivery of services. There are several actions being recommended by the advisory group, from setting up pilot projects in self-declaration of individual need to the direct deposit of benefits into a bank account for the client. There are too many issues here to go into at great length, but it is worth pointing out that all the actions being recommended are designed in such a way as to provide greater self-worth for the client and to make the system more time-saving and efficient. In this way less time is spent on the eligibility question and more time is spent in getting the client job-ready, equipping the client with adequate skills and training in order to re-enter the labour market. The one concern I would have is the way we attempt to purchase jobs through short-term contracts where after six months to a year on the job the client ends up back on the welfare system.

The other issue is the issue of empowerment. One of the key recommendations under the issue of empowerment of welfare recipients is setting up a council of consumers and the establishment of self-help groups. It is my view that these two recommendations are fundamental to the reform of the social welfare system as we know it today. I certainly share the view of the advisory group when it says, "People who are receiving social assistance...and those who have received it in the past have a special perspective on the system." The council of consumers would function in an advisory capacity to the provincial government.

The funding of neighbourhood self-help groups is a long time coming. There are several local groups in Windsor, such as the Windsor West Citizens' Organization, which work in promoting community and creating self-worth among those people through greater participation. The supports to employment program is a very good program. Many people who are on assistance are getting involved in STEP. It is beginning to work. People are talking about it. It is very positive and that is one of the key work initiatives being highlighted in the Back on Track program. Thank you.

Mr Lessard: Thank you very much, Mr Handsor, for presentation. You certainly touched on a broad range of issues in your presentation. I just want to focus on one with respect to the Social Assistance Review Committee reform recommendations. We have heard a lot of criticism with respect to the budget and our policies generally, especially from Diane Francis, who writes for the National Post. I am sure you are probably familiar with some of the things she had to say with respect to social assistance benefits in Ontario. Her arguments are that we need to tighten it up, that it is too easy to get social assistance. Why work unless you can make over a certain amount of money, the system is rife with fraud and we need to make some changes because people are taking advantage of it. You seem to have a good sense of the social assistance system. What is your sense of it? Do you think there are a lot of people who are ripping off the system and that we need to make some drastic changes?

Mr Handsor: I do not think there are any more people ripping off that system than those ripping off the tax system when you pay your income tax, or the banking system, the political system or any other system. I am sure there are, and I do not think they should be targeting in on the welfare system as a place where people are ripping off. I do not see that as a major concern.

Ms M. Ward: I just wondered about your organization. Obviously you are involved in advocacy work and so I wonder if you could tell us a little bit about your organization.

Mr Handsor: We certainly work a lot with people on assistance and the working poor. We work on a lot of initiatives in getting people to build a lot of self-confidence in themselves. We also look at the various services that people have access to and, if those services are not available, we try to make those services available for our membership. Most people who are within our organization are poor people—working people on assistance, people with disabilities, black, you name it. There are a lot of ethnic immigrants within our organization. We work together trying to resolve some of the problems we have, and we are working on some new initiatives so that we can look at possibly enterprising types of situations where they can get involved and become a lot more assertive about who they are. Certainly, the majority of our membership comes from public housing and we are also dabbling in the concerns with respect to housing and we can make that system a lot better.

Ms M. Ward: And the people themselves on these social services are actively involved.

Mr Handsor: Certainly, yes.

Ms M. Ward: That is very encouraging.

Mr B. Ward: I have a quick question on your views on housing and the availability of home ownership for lower-income people. You stated that the ability for them to purchase a home should be examined by all levels of government, I am assuming. Was that intention meant for increasing public housing stock or were you looking at new homes, new housing construction to be made available as much as possible, or a combination of both?

Mr Handsor: I think a combination would be great. There is a lot of stock, the stock is there, and they are really looking at ways to make that system work. That housing was built back when they were building massive housing and just putting it there. Communities evolve out of that particular stock and you have to really begin to redesign how those communities operate. You seriously should be looking at that stock, but it also requires some combination with some new stock as well. A combination of both would be great, but I think seriously looking at that stock needs to be addressed and needs to be addressed now. With our project here in Windsor, we are still waiting to hear back from CMHC as to whether or not it is going to come on stream and get involved with that process. We need CMHC. They certainly are, as you know, owners of that property as well, with the province, and all the responsibility should not be on the province.

Mrs Sullivan: I was very interested in your presentation. You had some very interesting points to make and I think many of them made us think about agencies operating in our own communities that are facing similar problems and have reached similar conclusions. I am interested in looking at the social assistance dollar figures. Over the past, I think, three years they have quadrupled. In the past two years they have gone from $2.5 billion to $5 billion. Is there a better way? Would a guaranteed annual income be a better way?

Mr Handsor: I am not sure. I will be quite honest with you. I do not know at this point whether I can answer your question. I know the system is getting costly and I think we need to do some serious reviewing of that system and look at some alternatives. So a guaranteed income could be one of the other possible alternatives that we should be looking at, but at this point I could not give you a yes or no.

Mrs Sullivan: Are you seeing STEP kicking in at all in your area?

Mr Handsor: Certainly.

Mrs Sullivan: Could you describe whether that is working.

Mr Handsor: It is working because a lot of people are getting into STEP. You see the numbers; the percentages are going up. I know just from my own personal experience when I came on to STEP, when I was on assistance, my benefits cut in half to where eventually they were not there any more. A lot of people are getting into that program; it is very beneficial. What is nice about it is that a lot of social agencies are bringing a lot of people on to STEP and they are finding good, solid jobs. So, it is working; STEP is a very good program.

Mrs Sullivan: How are you finding the availability of training for people who are entering STEP?

Mr Handsor: I am not seeing much training other than through the colleges and universities. Many of the people who are going into STEP, you understand, have a level of high school education, some of them post-secondary. In terms of education and training, many of them have chosen to go back to school, get some upgrading and do some training through the universities and colleges, and then they are able to get into STEP.

As for any direct training going on, I am not sure of any really progressive training taking place in the social services other than maybe some work activity programs; and you are getting some semiskills there, which are working pretty good. But I think the real impact is when the recipient himself takes on that responsibility. I can tell you it is wrong for anyone to think that is not possible. Many of them are taking the responsibility very seriously, and they have similar concerns to most Canadians.

Mrs Sullivan: Your comments on public housing, I thought, were very interesting. Certainly in my community we see people who are involved in public housing for a short or for a longer period of time now, because of some enlightened management, who are becoming involved with the management of the projects themselves and with community organizations that are tackling not only the financial side but also the social side of public housing developments. Do you have any of that happening here?

Mr Handsor: Right now we are in the process, as I said. The local housing authorities are beginning to look seriously at residents and tenants—we like to consider ourselves as residents—at what type of involvement they had. But we have not had anything concrete in terms of management. If I am answering your question correctly, there is nothing concrete yet. We are working in consultation, but it seems that every time we start dealing with the more social and management issues we are sidetracked and we are asked to pull back and just get into the physical. So, there is some resistance there to allowing tenants to get too involved, which I find very discouraging because I think that is where the real solutions lie, with the residents.

Mr Carr: Thank you very much for the fine presentation. One of the concerns that have been voiced with regard to housing is that for a variety of reasons over the last little while, the private sector has been pushed out of housing, and as a result the government has had to jump in. If you look at the amount that is spent on housing, that is one of the big increases and why some of the deficits have risen, because the private sector has jumped out. People need homes, so the government jumped in.

When you look at it on a per-unit basis, the cost of so-called non-profit housing is virtually double what it is when the private sector puts them in. I was just wondering how you see us controlling costs in the non-profit housing area. Any suggestions that you can see in that area?

Mr Handsor: If you are talking about construction costs, I certainly could not answer that. I think the real cost saving you are going to see is in maintenance of the non-profit co-ops and any kind of housing. I think you can see some real savings if you involve the residents living in the areas. These people are very capable of taking care of their own properties. I think the philosophy behind the co-ops is certainly that. They are seeing a cost saving in terms of maintenance and management with respect to working to keep costs down. I think we are seeing that being done the co-ops and non-profits.

Mr Carr: I was talking about the actual building costs, but another area that is of concern, of course, is the dramatic increase in the social assistance cost. A lot of people, after the last recession, thought we would see a decrease in social assistance as the economy picked up, because I think in 1985 all the way through to this current recession, Canada had the strongest growth of all the industrialized nations with the exception of Japan. So the figuring was that we would see a decrease in social assistance. That did not happen. In fact, what happened is it stayed the same and there is more coming in.

There is a strong feeling that what you have to do to get people off social assistance is give them the training and retraining and apprenticeship programs. I think you said that is what most people want. I think everybody believes that, and most people when you talk to them they say, "We do not want social assistance, because even if I cannot survive with my two kids," or whatever the reason may be. "I want to have a productive, high-paying job, but I do not have the skills" for whatever reason.

My feeling is that what this government has to do in the long term is really put an emphasis on education and retraining. My personal feeling is that the skills we give people will in the future be in direct proportion to the standard of living we have, if we give them good skills now. Wayne, I think, has just been promoted to parliamentary assistant for colleges and universities and has a vested interest. I was wondering if you could see a better way of making sure that we give the people, first of all, the training they want, the training they need that will then get them off social assistance, which is what they want. Are there any hard, concrete steps that you can see the government implementing to help do that?

Mr Handsor: Again, I am speaking in very general terms, but I think they talked about empowerment, and I talked about empowerment, I talked about contracting. It is very important that you determine what people's needs are in terms of what they see they need. Once they can identify with what the skills are that they want, there is a matching process that has to work, too, and I also think that we need to work stronger, better with the private sector. I think we need more of that. We need matching up a lot better, we need to identify. If we are talking about economic growth, we have to look at really early indicators, and say: "Well, that's where the skills should be going. These are the industries that are opening up. These are the growth industries."

You could start acquiring some of these skills, then you could start looking at moving into those industries rather than wasting your time on skills that would become redundant two or three years down the road. I think we just have to work closely together with the private sector and look at ways of identifying those growth industries and where the jobs are going to be. I think that will certainly help in that respect.

Mr Carr: Some of the people in my region say that the ideal situation was where you would go in body's home, sit down with them and assess their needs, look at whether they needed life-training skills, all the skills that were necessary. They say to me now that they are a little bit concerned because, of course, they are doing the in-home visits. We put these programs in place but the numbers are such that they cannot do it. It is in theory but now they are cutting off one of the places where they would take the time for these in-home visits. It is a nice philosophy, but the reality on the front is that it is not happening; too many people are just getting a quick run through; they are getting the money and pushing them out.

Like most MPPs, during this period when I have tried in the Halton region, I have found we are getting calls to our offices because people cannot get through. I mean, they are that backed up. I see that in the long term we have not done anything. That is why we need the cooperation of people like you who can say, "This is what has to be done," because quite frankly what they are doing is that by taking away home visits they do not get time to spend that they need to really assess. Maybe I could just comment.

Mr Handsor: There seems to be some misinterpretation of home visits. First, you have income maintenance workers. They do home visits. They do not spend the time. They are in there to deal with the eligibility question. I have seen some of the recommendations that are made in Backtrack talk about speeding up the qualification part of it, dealing with the skills and the real development of that individual. More focus is done on that, and it should not be the same person. I know from Transitions and the SARC that they talked about that. But I think you are going to see a lot of innovative ways on how you can get around a lot of those home visits which do different things to different people.

CAW COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT GROUP

The Chair: We will now move on to the CAW Community Development Group, Marcel Lefebvre, executive director. You have 15 minutes for your presentation.

Mr Lefebvre: My name is Marcel Lefebvre. I would like to thank this committee for the opportunity to present views of the organization which I belong to. I know it has been a long day and hopefully the information I give will cut down the time as much as possible.

I am here representing the CAW Community Development Group. We are a non-profit resource group working with the government and private industry to provide safe, affordable rental housing communities for the people of this province. Our organization has been developing housing for the people in Ontario for the last five years. At the end of this year we will have constructed over 500 non-profit and co-operative housing units across this province. We will have completed over 1,000 units by the end of 1992 and at least 1,500 units by the end of 1993.

As you can see, the majority of our development work and expansion of our resource group began under the previous provincial government; and fortunately for the people of Ontario it is being continued by the current government. The CAW Community Development Group is a member of the Co-operative Housing Federation of Canada, of which I am the president, the Co-operative Housing Association of Ontario and the Ontario Non-profit Housing Association. We have two branch offices which are located in Mississauga and Windsor.

The recent state of housing report demonstrated that the need for affordable housing has increased over the past decade. There are currently over 100,000 households on waiting lists for non-profit and co-operative housing. The report established that there are over 477,000 Ontario households in need of affordable rental housing. This only includes households that are currently paying in excess of 30% of their income towards rent. We see no reason for this trend to change unless drastic measures are taken.

Many communities like Windsor have been extremely hard hit with layoffs and plant closures. As a result, it is increasingly more difficult for people in this community to afford decent accommodation in the community in which they live. Our organization alone has waiting lists of 2,341 people for the county of Essex and 433 units for the Chatham area. These include singles, families and seniors seeking affordable housing.

We understand that most government sectors are requesting continued or increased funding. However, it must be understood that affordable housing is a basic need required by all people of Ontario, a basic need which is being threatened. If we wish to see our economy get back on its feet, people need the security of an affordable home environment from which to operate.

Due to this government's commitment to housing, the Homes Now program and the deadlines established during the previous government have been extended, and we will be able to construct the following units over the next year: Ser-Rise, 50 units for singles; John Moynahan co-op, 66 units for families; Ryegate co-op, which is in the town of Tecumseh, 50 units; Mariner's in Leamington, 50 units; Labourview in Chatham, 45 units; Union Village in Brampton, 137 units; Dan Benedict co-op in Mississauga, 147 units; Oaklands in the town of Oakville, 137 units; Glen Oaks co-op, 140 units in Oakville; and 37 units in Barrie.

This government has also made a commitment to build 10,000 new units per year across Ontario. This will greatly benefit all communities as they struggle in these hard times. Please note that even this amount of units will not solve the drastic need before us, but it is a positive start. It clearly demonstrates the current government's appreciation of this problem in our changing economy.

As an aside, I would like to mention the indirect benefit to the construction industry of over 22,000-plus person-years of employment which will be created by this new housing program. We support the current government's position that building housing and increasing work to the construction industry will help Ontario get out of this recession. Our resource group alone will have created more than 3,700 person-years of employment between 1986 and 1993.

As the president of the Co-operative Housing Federation of Canada, I have seen clearly the federal government's position on housing. I would like to speak briefly to the problems arising on the national scene with respect to housing and how it affects us here in Ontario.

Since 1986, the federal government has been backing out of housing, announcing, as an example, 5,000 co-op units per year in 1986, and this year only 1,500 units across the country. They also have reduced their commitment to the federal-provincial program by 30% in the last two years. It is easy to see by this that the federal government is leaving the responsibility for housing up to the provinces. Ontario has understood this challenge and has increased its commitment to housing.

Another victim of decreased or sporadic unit allocation by the federal government is the collapse of the resource group network across the country. Without consistent allocation or funding, many resource groups have ceased to exist. The impact of job loss on local communities is only one of the many consequences, for it takes years to set up the proper infrastructure necessary to build quality affordable housing. If the resource groups have to re-establish themselves, many smaller communities will suffer, even if new programs are announced.

The Ontario government has demonstrated its commitment during these difficult times and, as a direct result, a system will be in place to deliver new programs and build housing as our economy improves.

I just want to say—and I know it is not in the points you have here, but I tried to write it down because people asked for it so that you would have research—that I am very proud to be living in Ontario. Being the president of a national organization, when I see that in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia and so on they get four units of non-profit housing for a whole year, it really makes you feel that we put a human touch into it. I could not put that in the words that I wanted to say. A month ago I was in Newfoundland and I saw these people really having a need. Seeing what we are doing in Ontario—never mind the jobs, never mind all those other things that we are all here to talk about, but talk about human beings and not numbers and you start seeing that the things we are doing in Ontario are the right direction.

I know some of the questions you will ask, and I will try to answer them as honestly as I can. But think of people who really do not have any place to stay. That is the really important part. I could have spoken about many other issues, being on municipal council, but I did not want to do that.

I would like to close by stating that our organization is in full support of the current provincial government's budget. We feel that their commitment to the people of Ontario, in particular to developing affordable rental housing, will only serve to strengthen our economy over the coming year.

Mr Carr: One of the concerns that has been voiced is that we have put more money into non-profit housing over the last little while than the previous government, and the lists have gotten bigger. As you know, there is some concern that there is a lot of profit in non-profit, and when you build them, the cost per unit is $1,800 versus $800 when the private sector has done it. I was wondering, not necessarily your organization but as president of the national or the Ontario non-profit housing association, could you just comment on why it is that people are saying that when we build non-profit it costs twice as much as when the private sector does it? Maybe you could just comment on that.

Mr Lefebvre: We can go through some of the statistics of what is more expensive. If you look at your maximum unit price when you are developing a co-op or a non-profit—as an example, in Windsor, I will be very specific because we are talking about here—when you show that you can develop a two-bedroom town house for $82,000, the private sector says, "Look, when we factor in what we think we should be getting as a return, we cannot build them." It is a fallacy some people may have about affordability, that it costs more being a non-profit than a profit to build. From my experience, I have not seen that. I understand what you are saying about the cost factor, saying that it keeps escalating.

I am not going to say that is not a factor, but I have been working very hard in the last year with the federal government and also now the provincial government, even the Liberal government that was in place before, but now the New Democratic Party—into bringing an index-linked mortgage program that I hope the people here will take into consideration. It is called the index-linked mortgage program where we can use the pensions that we have in Ontario to reduce the cost, because it is tied to inflation, and we can build many more units with a much smaller amount to be invested into it.

Mr Jamison: I really want to talk about this particular budget and the increased number of houses, co-op and affordable houses that are being built. The effect of that, in the midst of a recession, we have heard from various construction groups, that in fact it has turned their employment situation around somewhat and actually created employment.

The other point that was brought out, especially given the time that we are in, by those construction unions and construction companies that have presented in front of us was that the opportunity to build at this point, in the co-housing area, is better than it ever was because during the recession builders are not working at their 100% level. Have you any comments to make on that?

Mr Lefebvre: You are absolutely right. We have gone from where, two years ago, we found it very difficult to come under the 100% maximum unit price, now some of our developments, because they took the initiative to bring it forward, are at 89% of maximum unit price 1992, and that makes a considerable difference. Just an example, in Ottawa, we would never have been able to develop both of those developments because those parcels of land were out of reach for anyone to get, and we were able to acquire that land because you had made that decision at this time.

WINDSOR WOMEN'S INCENTIVE CENTRE

The Chair: The next group is the Windsor Women's Incentive Centre. You have one half-hour for a presentation. In that half-hour, leave some time at the end for a question-and-answer period. Identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard.

Mr Greene-Potomski: I am Janet Greene-Potomski of the Windsor Women's Incentive Centre. I am the executive director. I will not nearly take the time that is allotted that should be refreshing.

please allow me to congratulate this government on its courageous approach to the Ontario budget. Rarely is it possible to prove justification for such investment in hope and vision. This government has demonstrated intent in implementing policy for which it was elected by mandates, services and programs, effecting equitable employment services and grass-root inputs to existing services.

The Windsor Women's Incentive Centre, otherwise known as WIC is a feminist, non-profit, charitable organization which has been servicing women in Windsor and Essex county for 10 years. Our mandate is to promote and enhance the status of women and many of the ways that we effect this mandate is through skills training, research, counselling and outreach. The outreach takes various forms including referral and intra-agency collaborative work. WIC participates in committee work with a variety of agencies that provide general services to our community and sometimes agencies which provide only very specific services to very specific women in our community. Beyond WIC is the only agency in Windsor and Essex county that serves women as a broad-based constituency. Expertise and knowledge is requested to share the shared information and perspective that we hold.

Our funding from government sources is directed to us on a special project basis only. Federally, we have received training moneys from Employment and Immigration Canada for teenaged women and adult women who are in danger of dropping out of high school. We also received moneys from the Secretary of State for research. Provincially, we have received companion moneys for research projects from the Ontario women's directorate.

Although the funding received from these sources is limited and certainly helpful in effecting our services, they are special project moneys only and are available to us for a prescribed time only. For instance, during our skills training project, 50% of the money granted paid participant allowances and dependant care allowances. The balance of those moneys paid for training costs and overheads directly related to the project only.

During our last fiscal year, provincially, we received $100,000 from the Ontario women's directorate as companion moneys to Secretary of State moneys which amounted to $100,000. This was to conduct research on the feminization of poverty. The research actually cost $40,737. WIC absorbed a shortfall of $15,737 and we did this through fund-raising, donations and membership fees. Provincially, we received only 50% of the funding needed for the project only.

However, last year, our operating expenses, including skills training, research counselling and workshops amounted to $252,074. The contribution provincially amounted to only 4% of our entire operating expenditure for the year. We lived and we grew. However, our major source of money comes from the community and our African neighbours, through bingos. In 1991, we received $47,410 through bingo revenue. The actual net moneys from these bingos represented only $23,300. Thus $24,110 went back into city and provincial coffers through bingo licences and bingo hall rental costs.

My point is that although the provincial budget has reflected a genuine commitment to women, many of the provincial funding constraints presently in place—they have been in place for years, even before this government—have little positive effect on the actual services to our constituency.

Since the time this government was formed, our agency has directed inquiries to a variety of ministries hoping to access equitable and efficient funding. However, moneys available are for apprenticeship programs or short-term workshop programs. Our research, and research conducted by the mayor's committee of Windsor, shows consistently that women need more if they are to participate in our society equitably.

Often, women are hindered by their lack of knowledge of options. Many cannot access information because of their address, financial circumstances and energy drain from depression. Of your client base, 80% are in receipt of social assistance. Those who live in a particular geared-to-income housing project in Windsor cannot have our only daily newspaper delivered to their homes because the newspaper has a policy of not delivering to that neighbourhood.

Our only mainstream television station has been diluted to a point that local community advocacy or opportunities are not covered. Rarely do these clients have the money to subscribe to cable television. Thus, again local coverage is unavailable to them. Case workers within the city and provincial social assistance programs are over-worked and presently many are being trained on the job. Thus clients do not have the opportunity to work with their case workers to effect positive changes in their lifestyles.

This agency wants to go to these clients at their home bases to share information about not only WIC, but other agencies and services that may serve their specific needs more specifically. We want to, but we cannot. Women who contact us or who are referred to us have a variety of needs that they cannot necessarily have met through specific apprenticeship training programs or occasional workshops. Some want employment training or job referral. However, we find that many women have chosen to be full-time care givers and homemakers and want assistance to make that unpaid career choice as fulfilling as possible for them and their families. They want to learn how to be assertive—increase their self-esteem, connect and advocate with schools, city administration, MPs and MPPs, learn about job opportunities, access dependant care and transportation. They want knowledge and the empowerment that knowledge would give them to make appropriate choices.

WIC could facilitate this efficiently with appropriate funding. We could prepare women to enter into paid employment training programs offered by other agencies and educational institutions, providing them not only with a training-ready or employment-ready woman, but also our community with a stronger guarantee on its investment.

Certainly the benefits of the provincial budget will affect many women in Windsor and Essex county. However, we must still work to make sure that those changes will reach them. New moneys for child care spaces have been directed to this area, for example, by the province. However, they are inaccessible until our own city council lifts a freeze on such spending. That is our problem here in Windsor, which hopefully will be remedied in November.

The provincial budget does and will help women. The government indeed has worked hard to effect compassionate spending during a most critical time. Now, as the budget proves its positive investment, I am certain that the women of our community who have yet to reap these benefits through pay equity, employment equity, child care assistance and social housing will, as this government continues to develop its social agenda. Thank you.

Mr McLean: On page 2, you say, "Last year our operating expenses, including skills training...." What type of skills training was to take place?

Mrs Greene-Potomski: Our mandate is to offer as much non-traditional skills training as possible. During the last fiscal year we offered two programs. One was to train women as quality technicians using statistical process control methods in manufacturing industries. The second project was office machine repair, to repair copiers, fax machines, etc. Also included within the skills training is our teenage program where we offer them paid summer employment at a variety of industries around town.

Mr McLean: Do you work in conjunction with the Ministry of Community and Social Services at all?

Mrs Greene-Potomski: We do, through a friendly correspondence. However, we receive no funding from them at all.

Mr McLean: So really, the only grants that you get are what you have indicated in your brief: the $10,000 from the Ontario women's directorate. The Secretary of State, $15,000, and $10,000 from the province, was it?

Mrs Greene-Potomski: It was $10,000 from the Ontario women's directorate.

Mr McLean: What is your budget?

Mrs Greene-Potomski: Last year it was $252,000 in expenditures. It is very difficult to ascertain what our operating budget will be from year to year because we receive no operational funding. To keep the doors open and the two staff people and extraneous bills, it would come to just under $100,000 a year. However, if we are to conduct other programs, then we have to propose funding proposals for those.

Mr McLean: I commend you for what you are doing.

Mr Christopherson: Mrs Potomski, I want to thank you very much for an articulate, comprehensive presentation. I have a very direct question. The vast majority of the moneys that we have spent in this budget, particularly that part of the deficit that was discretionary—it was not much, but those parts that were—we feel are an investment in Ontarians and an investment in the future of this province. Could you first of all advise this committee whether you agree with that, and if you do, in your own words, why you believe investments such as the money that is provided to WIC is indeed an investment in the future of this province?

Mrs Greene-Potomski: I see it as an investment and I see it as a really good starting point and a really good approach to building up equity in terms of not only our real dollars here in the province, but also equity in terms of the results. The best way to invest in a community of people is to invest in that hope, and their education. I truly believe not only through my airy-fairy believing, but also in terms of research and what I have come to learn in my years being with WIC, that you do get paid back. The community does get paid back from that investment. You get paid back in real dollars, if that is the bottom line. You get paid back in a better community of people. So I see this as really the only way to go.

1620

Mr Christopherson: Attached to that, could I know what would have been the result if we had not maintained the funding and indeed had cut back in your funding, the share of your revenue that we provide?

Did you want the floor, Mrs Sullivan?

Mrs Sullivan: I think there could be a clarification. The OWD provided WIC with a—

[Failure of sound system]

The Chair: Is Hansard having problems? Go on.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you. My question was, if that portion of your budget which is provided to the province was not provided because we took the Mulroney tack, to cut back on programs like this, how would that set back the goals that you have? Again, what would the impact be on this province and our future if indeed we went down that road?

Mrs Greene-Potomski: The impact on WIC would be, quite frankly, minimal, because it only showed a minimal contribution.

If I may also respond to something Mrs Sullivan said, that one of the constraints of OWD funding is that there is a cap on it and you may not overlap any projects or programs; if the project you are working on will take a year, you may not propose to the OWD for future moneys for a different project. So there is a very definite limit on that.

The impact of not directing the moneys from OWD to social assistance, etc., that would benefit women would be absolutely devastating. You have to keep in mind that women make up 52% of our population. Women are the most adversely affected by recessions, by job layoffs, by plant closures, by housing inaccessibility, by child care inaccessibility, transportation inaccessibility, etc., not only because of our historical stance in society, but also because we are the last hired, the first fired. That is just a fact. Yes, it would be really, really bad if you had not decided to invest that kind of money into this budget. But I must say that is a really good start and it is not something that we should rest on.

Mr Kwinter: I would just like to get some clarification. In your brief you state that these women are particularly disadvantaged because they live in an area where they do not get home newspapers delivered and they do not get access to community-based television.

Mrs Greene-Potomski: Correct.

Mr Kwinter: How are they disadvantaged? The point I am getting at is that it would seem to me there are lots of people who either choose not to watch it or do not have access to community-based television and do not get the newspaper.

he Chair: We will resume our hearings on the bud- eyview. Our next presenter is Ian Gartshore. You will 15 minutes for your total presentation. If you can, a little time in that 15 minutes for questions and ers.

Ir Gartshore: I think I will certainly be able to stay n the 15 minutes, because my presentation is really very I thank you for the opportunity to speak before you afternoon. I would imagine that you have been here period of time and you must be ready for a break.

When any level of government, at least one that is on- sible to the public, is preparing a budget, there are, ast to my way of thinking, two major considerations have to be made: the financial costs, both long- and -term, and the social costs, both long- and short-term. ems to me that balancing the budget means not just icing the financial income with the expenditures, but balancing the financial costs with the social costs.

We all know people who have been affected by acks, recessions and downturns in the economy. I give e examples here. Fred loses his job of 34 years and is le to find another one before his retirement in three s. Susan, a single parent, loses her sole income. Sev- families are forced to move to another city in search of b, losing the down payments on their homes in the ess. Families are broken up. A husband and wife are le to see each other since they are forced to take extra to make ends meet. Harry loses all his self-esteem being unable to find work for two years. Lucy, after iving two degrees that held promise for a good job at time, graduates and can only find a waitressing job—and I am not putting down waitressing here, by the way. She is unable to repay her student loan. These are only a few examples of what happens in bad economic times.

At this point, my question is, why does the question of economics seem to take priority over the lives of such people? Is there no way of measuring the human cost resulting from budgetary decisions? Surely we have the cart before the horse here. What would money be worth if it were not for human beings?

This reminds me of the story about a man who, through no fault of his own, found himself wandering through a barren desert looking for signs of civilization, or at least of water. After a period of time he grew very weak and thirsty. Suddenly he came across a campsite that had obviously been quickly abandoned. Hurriedly he dug through the few bags that lay strewn around the site in the hope that some water might have been left behind. Only one bag contained something. Disgusted, he threw it down. "All it is," he muttered to himself, "is a bag of gold." With this, he lay down to die.

Obviously gold is a very valuable commodity, and yet, like money, it has worth only to human beings. Human life is more important than money, not the other way around. Although it is important to carefully spend money—and I believe this very sincerely—human life is more important. Thus, budgets must balance the human cost with the financial cost.

My second point is to raise the question, in light of the foregoing, of how much governments are actually able to do, especially provincial governments. How much power do governments really have in determining the future course of a country or a province? It seems to me that over the last ten years, the more "free-enterprise," shall we call it, model of economics has shifted some power away from governments. More and more decisions, decisions that affect the lives of ordinary people, seem to be made by the powers that be, whatever they may be. As we enter an era of mega-corporations that easily move capital from one hemisphere to another, that decide where jobs will be, that decide what the economic viability of a given area will be, governments will be less able to make real decisions on behalf of those who elected them.

Over and over again I am hearing people say that it does not matter who one votes for; the same things seem to happen regardless. They say it makes no difference who is in power since decisions are being made without any real concern for the voting public. Although this hearing, in itself, is an indication that the present provincial government is trying to improve the situation, maybe such people are still right. Maybe the biggest decisions are being made beyond the reach of local governments. Maybe certain things are partly beyond the control of the decision-makers. For instance, this government is obviously not to blame for the deficit it inherited. It is not to blame for things such as free trade, the loss of manufacturing industries—at least maybe not until recently—and the recession. It is not to blame for government cutbacks either, I might add. Neither is this government able to bring to an end the innumerable federal taxes we all face.

Given the limited scope within which a budget is able to move, the need to help promote business as well as keeping the human costs in mind, what can be done? I believe the only thing that can be done is what this government has done. Nobody likes deficit budgets, but then nobody likes facing the huge dislocation that thousands, if not millions, of people would face if the budget were truly balanced this year, at least in the economic situation that we presently face.

I believe that society is no stronger than its weakest link. If we can work together and take care of each other, we will collectively be stronger. I believe this is what this budget is attempting to do, so I endorse the end to which it is aiming.

Ms M. Ward: On your second page, when you are talking about the free-enterprise model of economics shifting power away from government, I think that would tend to emphasize the point that government is more needed as a counterbalance to those powers. People tend to think of government as something outside of themselves. I do not look at it that way. I think the government is, or should be, the people. Not everyone agrees that it is, but I think it is our responsibility to see that it is the people.

I think that as we go further along to where we have a world economy, we might be seen as powerless, and that our government has a greater responsibility to counterbalance those tides and to protect the people. Do you have any comments on that?

Mr Gartshore: Ideally, of course, the government is the people. I agree with that. In a democratic system that should be the case. I realize that it is far more complicated than that simple statement would lead us to believe. It seems to me that governments and businesses can work very well together, governments as representatives of the people who are affected by business decisions. Sometimes I think even businesses are able to represent people better than governments, even though it should not always necessarily be that way.

But overall I would say I am slightly fearful of this movement towards larger and larger corporations, corporations that are now transnational, that cross many, many borders, corporations that do not have any one particular government to report to or any body of people at all. I know one of the fears that we in the western world have of communism is that it is a very centrally controlled type of economy. Yet it seems to me, as corporations become larger and larger, that to some degree—not certainly to the same degree, but to some degree—there is the possibility that economies will become controlled by a small number of corporations or whatever.

Ms M. Ward: What I am asking, really, is whether you think the responsibility of government is increasing—the responsibility to protect its citizens and to be their advocate, really, to protect their interests with this move to global economies?

Mr Gartshore: That was what I was leading immediately to. It seems to me, then, that governments need to do several things. One is to make sure the corporations do not become too large—one big example in the United States was the breaking up of Bell—so that nothing gets too large and out of control. Governments need to monitor corporations. Another example is the environmental movement. Governments need to make sure that corporations are abiding by regulations, etc, protecting people in that way.

Yes, I believe governments do need to be responsive to the voters and to make sure that corporations are ethically and being responsible to the people they are posedly serving.

Mr Carr: Thank you very much for your presentation and for coming before the committee. The question I relates to dealings with the public. As you know, we got this recession last year, April or thereabouts. One of the concerns a lot of people have is that the present government not let the people know what was going to transpire, they were going to increase some of the spending—

Mr Gartshore: The federal government?

Mr Carr: No, the provincial government that elected last summer. When they made the Agenda for People they did not say they were going to put in the spending fact, when they costed it out, with fairly detailed costing they broke down all the programs, the 60% financing—they said to everyone, “But the best thing about it is it is going to cost us $1.2 billion over two years to fund all the programs.” That is not including, for example, the funding that they have not even touched. They said, “all the wonderful programs, and it is only going to cost that much.”

One of the concerns out there is the cynicism of the public. They are saying that politicians make all these promises; they know when they get in they are going to do it but they do not make those promises at election time because they know if they said they would run up the deficit, people would not vote for them. That is one of the concerns I have because as you know, what this last government did was build a coalition. There are about 20% of the people who vote NDP, who always vote NDP. Where they won the last election was when they got the swing vote—those who were Liberal, Conservative, whatever. It was these people who jumped on, not knowing this was going to happen.

What do you say to those people who now are fearful with the deficit, and who a year ago were not told that it was going to be run up? How do you think those people feel?

Mr Sutherland: Are we rewriting history again?

Mr Carr: You actually got Conservative votes last time guys.

Ms M. Ward: Did you ever stop to analyse why?

Mr Gartshore: I do not know the psychology of the people and why they voted the way they voted and how informed they were in their vote. I cannot address that—that is what your question is.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for coming to the committee and presenting your views. I think this committee has to thank the citizens of Windsor and area for the presentations they have made to this committee. They have been very informative and I would say very enthusiastic presentations plus observers who have been sitting in the audience today. I think this is the largest group that we have had, with observers seeing what our government is doing and the opposition part in this particular government at this time. As I say, I thank the people of Windsor here.

If it is the committee's wish, we adjourn until 9 o'clock tomorrow morning in London for the ongoing hearings.

The committee adjourned at 1655.

LONDON MIDDLESEX TAXPAYERS COALITION

Chair: I would like to welcome the London Middlesex Taxpayers Coalition. Jim Montag is the chair. You will have 5 minutes for your presentation. Try to keep some time for questions.

Mr Montag: I am Jim Montag, the chairman of the London Middlesex Taxpayers Coalition. Our coalition is not just about deficit spending. We believe all levels of government—federal, provincial and municipal, should operate on a pay-as-you-go basis and should not under any circumstances be permitted to enter into a program of spend now, pay later. If I personally spent 20% to 30% more per year than I earned, I would be forced into bankruptcy in five years. How long can Ontario or Canada last? Ontario government's deficit spending was used to enhance social programs. This will provide some support for the present working force. Very little money was spent to create new jobs. In times of recession and restraint, we feel nothing should be done to increase or subsidize any program that is not directly intended to create jobs. After all, if we must tighten our belts, we should do it, not just the wage earners or taxpayers.

Free trade with Mexico and other countries is coming and is inevitable. It will happen either quickly, with the signing of a free trade agreement, or slowly, with a gradual reduction of duties and tariffs, but it will surely happen. We have already lost jobs with the implementation of the United States free trade agreement and will lose many more when Mexico is added, unless we do something positive about it now. United States cities are actively trying to entice Canadian manufacturers to relocate to their areas.

However, it is the present situation on the US-Mexican border that I feel is most threatening. When you travel from the United States to Mexico, you will find no restrictions at the Mexican side of the border. You can freely enter and leave these areas, called Maquiladoras, whenever you want to and bring into or take out of the country anything you like. It is only when you travel another 10 to 20 miles further south on the north-south highway that you are stopped by the Mexican army, customs and immigration officials and sometimes police. At that time you must show your passports, citizenship and travel papers and have your luggage and goods inspected.

In these Maquiladora areas, anything produced anywhere in Mexico can be purchased at very competitive prices. These products can usually be imported into the United States duty-free. Fortunately, the Canadian customs country-of-origin documentation prevents many of these goods from being imported into Canada at the present time. With a Mexican free trade agreement, duties and tariffs will cease to exist and we will be inundated by the flow of goods from Mexico.

It is this situation on the United States side of the border, however, that is presently affecting us very adversely. Every day from 7 am until 9:30 am there is a lineup that extends from the United States customs point across the bridge and for one or sometimes two city blocks into the Mexican border city. This lineup moves very quickly and is comprised of Mexican workers entering the United States to work for the day at their jobs in small factories and on farms.

Each of these workers has and presents a document permitting him to enter and travel in a limited area in the United States for the purpose of employment. In the evening, all of these workers return to their homes and families in Mexico. This situation exists at all border crossings—Matamoros, Reynosa, Nuevo Laredo, Ciudad Juarez, Nogales and Tijuana. The goods these workers produce are presently entering Canada duty-free. This is a serious problem and can only worsen with time.

The present taxation situation in Canada and Ontario appears to be that a government sets a spending budget and then raises taxes and creates deficits to match this spending. There seems to be no effort made to cut spending. When you raise taxes, our industry becomes less competitive and the exodus to the United States and Mexico is accelerated. Jobs are lost and wage earners who were taxpayers are now shifted to the unemployment programs and welfare programs where they become an expense to the system. This results in increasing expenses and a decreasing taxation base, with resultant loss of tax revenue. Inevitably this results in still higher rates of taxation and bigger deficits.

The position of the London Middlesex Taxpayers Coalition is that if the governments lowered the taxation rates to businesses and industry, then these institutions would be more competitive and in a much better position to meet the challenges of free trade. Their success would result in more jobs for Canadians, an increase in the number of taxpayers and therefore an increase in the tax revenues. The present fiscal policies of our government are self-destructive and can only result in bankruptcy. This is a terrible legacy to leave to our children and grandchildren. These fiscal policies should be thrown out and replaced with ones that are regenerative and job-creating. Thank you.

Mr Kwinter: I missed the first part of your presentation, but I was quite taken with your emphasis on the problems that could emanate from the Canada-US-Mexico free trade agreement and the threat of the absence of regulations and controls in Mexico and what the impact is going to be in Canada. I would be curious to get your reaction. At the present time trade between Canada and Mexico is negligible, it really is. Statistically it is really of no import.

There is no restriction against people going to Mexico right now. As a matter of fact, a company from the London area went to Mexico and is operating there, Fleck Industries. The Maquiladora areas are operating, but that is not really where we are getting our competition. Our competition is coming from West Germany, it is coming from Japan. They are major players in the North American economy and they are both high-wage countries. They are countries that have a very sophisticated social system. That is where we are getting our competition. How do you address that? I mean, when you single out Mexico, what about Taiwan, Thailand, Singapore, Hong Kong, Brazil, Poland, all of these places that have very inexpensive labour and are not really impacting on us to the same effect as West Germany and Japan?

Mr Montag: I was not going to agree with you that it was the European countries that are providing the most competition to us. I was going to point out that, unlike the Near East—or the Far East, whatever you want to call it, Hong Kong, Taiwan, Korea, Japan—my feeling is that with a free trade agreement with Mexico, at least we will be keeping the money in this hemisphere. The Mexicans are very willing to trade with us for our heavy-industry products: railroad locomotives, buses, automobiles, trucks, things like that which they do not produce. When you deal with the Orient, some money is gone that will never ever come back into this country.

Now, this would not be the situation with Mexico. The money would stay in this hemisphere and it would be spent back in Canada, very likely at a greater rate than the Orient is doing now. The only thing the Orient wants from us is our raw materials, but Mexico is willing to buy a lot more than raw materials.

I do feel there is a definite threat, with the implementation of free trade, of very cheap labour in Mexico. This is where I feel we should look at this situation now and be prepared for it—it is already affecting us slightly; it will affect us much more in the future—so that we can keep our jobs here. Whenever a factory leaves here, you lose a job, you lose a taxpayer and you have to increase taxes to make up for that loss of revenue. If the jobs are kept here or created here, you have more taxpayers and more revenue.

Mr Sutherland: First of all, you said that government should not run a deficit unless it is creating new jobs. Given the extent of this recession, this budget is designed to maintain and create up to 70,000 jobs. Would you not agree that in a recession there is also an obligation to try and retain jobs because, as you pointed out, if we did not make some efforts to maintain those jobs, those people would be going on the welfare rolls as well?

Mr Montag: Yes, there is a reason to maintain jobs as well as to create new jobs. It all works towards the same purpose. What I am saying is that in times of recession we should all take a step back. Most of the budgetary deficit that has been proposed now is to enhance social programs. I do not agree with that. Why should one group gain while other groups lose? I think the money should have been spent, as you say, to maintain and create new jobs.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Montag, the majority of the budget deficit is to maintain the current level of the program in most cases. Up to $8.2 billion of the $9.7-billion deficit is to maintain the level of the programs. That is what we are attempting to do with this budget.

I just want to ask you one other question, since we talked about free trade with Mexico. You said they are very willing to want to buy our products. I would like to know how the average Mexican worker is going to be able to afford to buy Canadian products when he is only making $5 a day?

Mr Montag: They are doing it now. They are buying most of their railroad locomotives from this country. General Diesel in London here produces an awful lot of them. They are buying their heavy earthmoving machinery. When they start building subway systems there, I am sure MLW of Montreal will be able to compete very favourably. This is the type of material they will buy from us. It will be heavy-industry rather than small-industry products. If they have money, which they do not have at the present time—

[Failure of sound system]

Mr Montag: I do not agree with that. I think if you have more jobs, you have more taxpayers and then you have more tax revenue. If you lose jobs, those people become welfare recipients or unemployment insurance recipients and do not pay many taxes any more. You have lost that tax revenue; but if you keep the man working at a good wage, at a good job, he is earning money, he is paying taxes and your tax revenue will increase. Jobs will increase tax revenue; a loss of jobs will decrease it.

Mr Kwinter: Just for a matter of information for members on this committee, if you were to go to Mexico and walk into their shopping centres, which are as good as Yorkdale or anything else, you will see thousands of people, not wealthy but not poor, wandering around buying from stores just like you see in our shopping centres. Mexico City has a population of somewhere around 20 million. When you drive around, everybody seems to be driving cars. There is a misconception that Mexicans are towing their little burros and living in little mud huts and have no money. Let me tell you, there are 85 million people in Mexico and they have a pile of them that are poor in the same way as we have a pile of people in Canada who are poor, but they have a vibrant middle class and a working class. There are more people in Mexico who have buying power than there are in Canada. They may not have the same level, but there are more numerically. Proportionally it is a relatively small number, but if you ever saw them, it would totally change your impression of it.

Ms M. Ward: How do you know nobody has?

CRAIG STEVENS

The Chair: The next person to appear as a witness is Mr Craig Stevens. You will have 15 minutes for the presentation.

Mr Stevens: I appreciate this opportunity to present my views from the standpoint of a middle-class Canadian tarian and a family man with three children and a income of approximately $50,000 a year. My wife part-time job; she makes about $5,000 a year. It may like a lot of money but it is not when you struggle to family.

ne the less, as a middle-class salary earner I feel alarmed and threatened with the spending practices levels of government. I am a proud Canadian. I feel d to have been born in this country. There is a ten- to knock this country a lot and I think we should all to improve it and contribute in our own way to do ing, and that is why I sit before this committee.

is typical of many families, I attempt to harness both mental and physical energies to provide and better the of life for my family. I believe there is no higher in this world than to bring young people into the raise them and see them become productive, educationists. The many complexities of daily living make pursuit most difficult, to say the least. To varying de- everyone's quality of living is inextricably linked to ability to generate money relative to their own per- consumption habits. Depending on the individual or income, we can all adjust our consumption patterns possibly reflect earned income. To do otherwise jeopardize and threaten the current and long-term economic stability necessary to maintain and improve standards of living.

ne most recent provincial budget, reflecting a $9.7- deficit, clearly does stand alone as an example of possible spending. However, in the realm of partisan es it is quite tempting to focus on the incumbent gov- ent and label it the all-time reckless spender. To a d extent this is unfair. Any deficit budget is reckless, more, some less, as determined by levels of incoming ue to outgoing expenditures.

ver the past 10 years Ontario has been governed by ee of the mainstream political parties at one time or er. During that time, Ontario's provincial debt has from a level of approximately $21 billion in fiscal 1981-82 to a projected $51.7 billion for 1991-92, an ase of some $30 billion. You could spend a day dis- ing previous government spending practices and what out I choose not to do that. However, I want to note here should be some commonly shared guilt here, that ee parties can be painted with the same brush when it s to unbalanced budgets.

he present provincial government has no business g Ontarians that by 1998 we will have no deficit for ing expenses. There are just too many variables over ong a time to make such a prediction. Likewise, just tawa spends 34 cents of every tax dollar to support st payments, we see here in Ontario a movement of to 12 cents of every tax dollar to support interest ents, and with the most recent budget deficit this has ed up from a level of 9.9 cents. This is very disturbing quite sadly, I think we are embarking upon the same ey towards smothering interest payments that we see e federal level of government.

The likelihood of reversing institutionalized deficits is remote. Any government attempting to do so would have to be willing to commit political suicide to reverse the spending practices. Once the electorate has tasted the benefits of any new or enhanced program, the weaning process is made immeasurably more difficult. The capacity of a society to fund those less fortunate is limited. Ultimately, overtaxation will lead to lessened individual and business initiative, resulting in fewer jobs and a reduced tax base. The long-term viability of any government wishing to maintain a more caring and compassionate society would then be threatened. Political opportunism could very well mean short-term gain for long-term pain.

As previously mentioned, individual and societal wellbeing can in part be controlled by living within one's means. Government should be no different. Overtaxation by reactive, spendthrift governments does everyone harm. Individuals, businesses and government should collectively seek non-partisan ways, as equal partners, to responsibly control spending. Accordingly, I wish to offer the following thoughts accommodating the aforementioned objective.

First, all Canadians, not only Ontarians, must lessen their expectations of government. The correlation of program spending and cost must be impacted on the taxpayer. In part this could be achieved through an active, ongoing education program promoted through the media and funded by government. I think this one is extremely important. Canadians do not have that correlation between actual spending in dollars and cents and the programs they are getting. We can see one of the fallouts from this attitude or this ignorance simply being the level of cross-border shopping and how significantly it has increased. Ultimately, if this continues onward and escalates, we are going to have a tremendous number of retailers and other small businesses that generate income in this country going across the border. If it does continue unabated, they will not even be able to afford the gas to go across the border. Ultimately, it is going to cut off the hand that feeds a lot of Canadians and Ontarians.

Second, something I feel very strongly about is the curriculum in the education system. I believe today's students at the secondary level must be provided mandatory studies in the area of political science that deal with and examine the roles of government and spending. This will provide future generations of Canadians with better insight as to how the political system in this country works. We could see the spectacle of federal government as led by Joe Clark, who effectively was turfed out of power because he could not co-ordinate his arms and his legs when walking. Canadians were not captivated by a person who was non-charismatic but who had sound policies to offer to Canadians.

Basically, in our democracy our vote is perhaps the most precious gem we have and, given the high level of apathy and indifference to looking into issues and platforms and the qualities of individuals running for office, we can see inexplicable turf-outs of incumbent individuals and parties. I think the education system is a significant contributor to a lot of the apathy and malaise we have in the electorate in our society. A lot of this has to start right now in the education system with province-wide, consistent, standardized courses. That is a starting point right now. The present generation, I think, you might have to pretty well just write off.

Third, nominal user fees must be implemented in the health care system. The health care system demands approximately one third of the provincial budget. Any such fees should, however, be of secondary importance to the concept of heightened cost awareness. The usage of any such user fee could impact negatively upon low-income individuals. However, there could be a rebate program or something to give the $2, $3 or $5 back. The point is that if you have something there, the patient would be a little more willing to gain some insight and see what it actually costs for his or her visitation. If you do not want to have a user fee, let them be a co-signer to the OHIP remittance forms with the doctor. The patient could see that his or her visitation may have cost $22 or whatever it might be. It is a reasonable request to be a co-signatory to any such form. Once again, it is educating the individual, the patient, as to what the cost of the visit might be. Quite frankly, I think we are all aware of the ever-smothering cost of providing health care in this province, and it is certainly going to get worse if we do not do something pretty soon with it. I feel it is a most reasonable request.

Fourth, I feel the accounting practices of government departments should be changed so as to list revenues first, then expenditures. I suppose it sounds like a simple solution to a lot of woes, listing revenues first and then adjusting expenditures, but that is what the private sector is all about and we have greater efficiencies and cost accountabilities as a result of that. It would be a major overhaul for all government to do something such as that, but none the less I feel a certain emphasis should be placed upon the accounting practices of government.

Fifth, legislative devices must somehow be utilized so as to remove the creation of deficits from the political arena. I am not a politician. I think I can understand people, however. It is very tempting to spend funds that are not there in order to maintain and create employment during times of economic downturn, Mr Sutherland said that this is most essential. However, I become most alarmed when I look back to the Liberal administration of Mr Peterson and see that in a two-year period it had record revenues that generated some $2.5 billion during healthy times, when things were good. Then all of a sudden, when our NDP government came into office, that money was gone and there is still a shortfall of another couple of billion dollars. Here we have people saying, "Wait until we return to the good times and things will straighten themselves out." We bloody well did have some good times under the Liberal administration and we are left worse off than ever.

This brings into focus the whole point of deficit budgets. I believe our current Treasurer, Mr Laughren, has stated, "We'll get back on the road to good times and don't be overly concerned about this." That is a bunch of hogwash; I can tell you that right now. Once you have them you are never going to get rid of them. Quite frankly, I feel that my family and myself are suffering as a result of these smothering levels of taxation.

Number six is very significant. The cost of education in Ontario for 1991 will approximate some $13,125,200,000. That is a lot of money to be funding the public education system. There are a lot of entrenched practices in the education system and a lot of misconceptions that should be cleared up. I had a discussion some two months ago with the Minister of Education, Marion Boyer, and discussed a number of things. One of those things mentioned to her was, "Did you know the local director of education makes $115,000 and that in all likelihood makes considerably more than you as the Minister of Education?" She said, "Yes, you're probably correct on that." I got the information from one of her aides in Toronto and am sure enough, excluding her allowance of $14,000 the minister makes some $76,000, and here we have local directors of education at $115,000 and program superintendents at $101,000 to $102,000. This is out of whack.

Boards of education conveniently blame higher levels of municipal taxes on downloading of funding from the federal government to the province and from the province to the local school boards. There are a lot of issues that have nothing to do with downloading when it comes to local education costs. Primarily, one of the most significant contributors to high education costs is the number of teachers and this is an issue that is negotiated annually, has nothing whatsoever to do with downloading.

A lot of mandated government programs in the education system are not mandatory. Government will offer little incentives, startup grants, and local boards have to realize that the time comes when they have to be weaned from these grants and supported from the local tax base.

Teachers have the right to withdraw services under B-100. In today's society, parents would just shudder at the prospect of ever having the school system shut down and what to do with their children. So, effectively, local boards when it comes to negotiations, have a loaded gun to the head should ever the local teachers strike, whatever panel it might be, the elementary or secondary panel, and they are just not on a level playing field when it comes to the negotiation process with the teachers. The Ontario Teachers' Federation is extremely powerful in this province. Their numbers exceed some 126,000 people. They have a budget in excess of $70 million. The Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation have their own Cheyenne job to take them around the province.

The Chair: I hate to cut you off, but your 15 minutes are up. There will not be enough time for any questions.

Mr Stevens: I think I have aired most of my concerns and I appreciate the opportunity.

LONDON DISTRICT LABOUR COUNCIL

The Chair: The next group is the London District Labour Council. Please identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard.

Mr Ashton: My name is Jim Ashton. I am president of the London District Labour Council. As you probably noticed, I do not have a written brief, and I apologize for that. Unfortunately I have not had the time or the opportunity t one together, but I certainly will give you the views of our as we see the budget.

I think it will come as no surprise to those in the business community, my friends out there on the right-wing side of politics, that we at the labour council believe that the government has taken the right direction. I would add that we would have liked to see the government move a little bit further than it has; but, given the hysteria that has evolved around this budget from various groups in the business community and others, it did as much as it could.

I find it somewhat interesting that those who so vehemently oppose increased government spending have urged us all to sit here this morning while we travel across the province spending more of the taxpayers' money.

I am not going to get into facts and figures and numbers today because I think, quite frankly, that does not serve any purpose, but I would like to talk about the budget and particularly those who oppose the budget. I find it somewhat interesting that those around this province who supported the free trade agreement, for example, which has put thousands of Canadian workers out of work—and I think it is basic economics and understanding that when people do not work they do not pay taxes, and revenues go down and of course the deficit goes up—these same people we've supported, I would say, the insane economic policies of this federal government, such as high interest rates, which have led to a high dollar; and certainly those of us in labour know what that has done in terms of our manufacturing sector in the province of Ontario. It has put thousands of our workers out of work. Again, when our workers do not work, they do not pay taxes and again revenues go down. They also require social assistance, something that again costs the taxpayer money and increases the deficit. I have difficulty understanding why, when they take the positions they have taken in the past, they now sit here today and say: "Gee, the deficit's too high. We're going to blame this government." I find it, to say the least, somewhat hypocritical.

These are the same people who supported the Mulroney government's cut on transfer payments to the provinces. I believe, in this budget, it is somewhere in the area of $2 billion to $3 billion that the province of Ontario is losing. Again, they supported these policies. I find it very hypocritical that while this government has provided more money for social assistance as a result of, I say again, the economic policies of the federal government, many of these same people are lined up in Ottawa and in Queen's Park asking for corporate tax cuts. I do not know how one causes a deficit and the other does not, although I know there is the argument out there that the less taxes the corporations pay—and I am surprised because so many of them do not—somehow by not paying taxes we are going to create jobs. I have heard that argument. If one looks over the last 40 years as corporations have continued to pay less and less of a share of tax revenues in this country, one has to wonder where that argument has led, because today we look at the thousands of people who are not employed. If you took that argument to its illogical conclusion, I suppose if nobody paid taxes we might all have a job but then we would not have medicare, we would not have social assistance, we would not have roads, we would not have firefighters, we would not have police departments and so on. So I find it somewhat hypocritical when they take that position.

When the government put out seed money for farmers I suppose that caused the deficit, and yet these same people are in Queen's Park and Ottawa asking for subsidies and grants for business and for corporations. Again, they want money. When the government has spent more money on housing for low-income people across this province—and that is one of the areas I would certainly like to have seen more done in, no question; at least in the Toronto area we have a major housing crisis—again those people have opposed that yet those same people, whether it is in London or whether it is in Toronto, are out asking for government money so we can build convention centres, art centres, opera houses. Does that not cause a deficit? I find it again very hypocritical.

If one looks at the issue in front of us as well, I find it hard to understand, as I said earlier, the hysteria that has surrounded this budget. I look at Alberta, which has a higher deficit per capita than we do, and there has not been the outrage there has been here; at Saskatchewan, where the per capita deficit is much higher; at Ottawa. Granted, in Ottawa there has been much discussion to a degree around the deficit, but not anything like it has been in Ontario, and one has to note the coincidence of three Conservative governments supported, I would say, by the people who are today screaming about the deficit in the province of Ontario.

As for the issue of the deficit itself, it has been used by those in this society who would like to change the direction that those of us in labour would like to see and the type of society we would like to see. It has been the old sword of Damocles hanging over our heads for the last 10 years. It has become a major political issue. I think if one looks back and is old enough to remember, from the late 1940s to the mid-1950s North America experienced one of its greatest economic boom periods in history, and we were running deficits twice as high as we are today. The sky has not fallen. In those same years we made major improvements in social programs.

I think as well that the people I represent and working people across this province, although none of them are economists, understand the importance to some degree of going into debt. I think we all realize that if tomorrow we did away with credit cards, bank loans, mortgage payments, new car loans, etc, this economy would collapse like a house of cards. People know that if they have to have a house, they have to go into a great deal of debt to buy it; they know if they have to have a new car, in some cases they have to go into a fair amount of debt to buy it.

I think the people I represent, their concern is not so much with the deficit as it is with how their tax dollars are being spent. It is hard to understand why those who oppose the government do not recognize the necessity at times for a deficit. I have to question the two opposition parties who are now screaming about the deficit because the working people, the people I represent, if we have a strike coming, if we know that there are going to be layoffs, most people put a little money away. When times are good, you save a little money and when times are bad you have to spend it.

The two previous parties that have been in power have gone through very good times and yet the cupboard is bare. Now whose fault is it? They say it is the fault of the government that came into power.

I think, quite frankly, the argument about the deficit and this government's budget is more about the type of society that we wish to see as labour people versus the type of society envisioned by those who support the idea of no deficit, competitiveness and so on in this country. Theirs is a different vision. I would say that I applaud this government's direction. As I said before, it has not gone far enough. But I think they have done well. I think they have made the right move. I am not an economist, but I spent a year in university taking economics, and I know that for every dollar invested, $5 to $7 are created. Certainly in the greatest recession we have had since the Great Depression, I find it difficult that those who have supported so many policies that have gotten us there do not understand it.

I do have one concern with the budget. That is in particular the 3.4-cent increase on diesel fuel. I am not concerned about those who buy imported Mercedes and BMWs because they are not part of the solution; they are part of the problem. I do not really care how much they pay on diesel fuel, but I do have some concern with the truckers and what is happening to the trucking industry. I recognize that one can lay almost the entire blame for that mess at the doorstep of the federal government in Ottawa. But I do not think that because a boat is sinking we ought to throw an extra anchor in it.

I do not have any solutions to the problem other than to say that I would hope that this government and both parties would take a look at doing something in regard to that tax, whether it be some form of rebate to Ontario truckers, on a quarterly or six-month basis. As I say, I do not have the answers but I think something has to be done to assist those people. Certainly there is the question of the environment, but I do not think it matters whether it is Ontario truckers or American truckers who are polluting because, one way or the other, we are going to have those people on the highways.

Again, let me say that I do applaud the government's position overall. I think you have taken the proper position. I think you have moved in the right direction. I think so many economists across this country and around the world have said that you are in fact not going the wrong way; you are going in the right direction. I think you have taken the position of people over things. I think you have taken the position of compassion over cold-heartedness and I think you have taken the position of fairness over injustice in dealing with the people of our province.

We do not want a society where people are left to live on the streets. We do not want a society where they cannot feed their children because there is not increased social assistance there for them. I believe 40% of welfare recipients are children. I think what our society ought to be about is making things better for everyone, not making things better for those who already have and taking away from those who have not, because any attack on this budget and the changes that were made would do that.

Mrs Cunningham: As always, it is interesting to hear you, Jim. I just returned from Victoria, British Columbia where even the views of your own party would not be shared by the NDP candidates who are using the Ontario budget as an example of what should not happen. I think their great concern is, first, if I can paraphrase them appropriately, the lack of consideration for good management and for the streamlining of programs and the gearing of programs to the needs, especially of young people in the workplace. I am now talking about training programs.

The other one was the fact that out there they are very much aware that the wage growth has increased about 1 to 2% faster for a number of years in Ontario than in our competing nations, basically the Americans in the United States. They were talking there about wage growth, especially in Ontario and especially in the civil service. I was very interested to hear this of course because I have been there for the last five days and I just wondered if you would like to comment on both efficiency and wage growth increases from your point of view, considering what I heard.

Mr Ashton: I cannot speak to what is going on in British Columbia. I have been too busy running around trying to solve the problems of workers who have lost their jobs, and closed plants, and unemployment problems and so on. But beyond that, wage growth certainly is not a concern. I believe the provincial government acted in good faith and did what other governments should be doing.

It is always the public sector that is the scapegoat for either deficits or government spending or whatever. I think we all know the numbers behind that, that really they play a small part in any overall deficit. I do not agree with that position.

Your other question was—sorry.

Mrs Cunningham: Streamlining and efficiency in government.

Mr Ashton: I do not know how you answer that question. Of course we would all like to see things run as efficiently as possible. I do not know that I agree with you that that is not being done. Again, I say look back over the last 10 years when we had the Conservative Party and the Liberal Party in power. Obviously, you could not have streamlined things too well because had this government done nothing we would have had the largest deficit in history.

I do not know that is a partisan thing. I think it is a third, maybe all three parties should be somewhat concerned with, but I do not think you can point fingers in this case.

Mr Stockwell: What about the competitiveness argument that is being made with respect to our industries? Our industries are closing. Some are saying the tax rates are too high, personal tax rates, corporate tax rates. We are not competitive with neighbouring states and neighbouring provinces. Clearly, there is an exodus out of Ontario.

How do you argue that? What is your point of view on that?

Mr Ashton: One has to start with whether you agree with free trade, which to a large degree put us into the nation of having to be directly competitive with wages in North Carolina, Tennessee, or somewhere else, where historically wages have been far lower than ours. Again, the competitive argument, I do not know. Now we are talking about free trade with Mexico where workers make $3 a day. I do not know how we compete with that. Is there anybody here who would like to work for $3 a day? I do not think so. We are obviously moving from Mexico—we will end up in Guatemala.

Mr Stockwell: I do not want to discuss wages. I was talking about the taxes, the tax rates, where the studies have been done and show we are totally uncompetitive.

Mr Ashton: You are talking about competitiveness.

Mr Stockwell: How do you argue that when you are suggesting that this kind of $10-billion deficit is acceptable? We are already uncompetitive when it comes to tax rates. This is just basically hiking the budget some 13% or 14%. Where is the competitiveness argument in that? How do you argue against that?

Mr Ashton: It is the same argument we always get. They cut taxes in Ontario; they cut taxes in New York. As far as I am concerned, quite frankly, since 1940 or 1951, look at the drop in corporate tax rates. Let's be realistic about it. That is what has been happening. Corporations have continued to pay less and less. We look across the country. How many corporations and businesses made money last year and did not pay any taxes? I do not know, how much more competitive can you get than that?

Mr Stockwell: You are suggesting we are competitive.

Mr Ashton: I am suggesting that I agree that the decision that this country has taken, the fact that those in Ottawa have decided to sell this country out is something I am in a fight, because if we were not in that situation—

Mr Stockwell: You are suggesting that we are competitive and we are being sold out?

Mr Ashton: I believe we are competitive. I can give you examples in my local, the autoworkers in the city, where we have to compete against plants in Kentucky where the wage rate is far less than ours, and we do it because Canadians, damn it, are good workers. Canadians work hard. They put out a good quality product.

Mr Stockwell: Not many people agree with you enough on that. The studies do not come out that way. I do not know. Have you got any evidence to prove this? Or is this just your own personal opinion?

Mr Ashton: I am the president of the Canadian Auto Workers in London. I am giving you an example of one of my plants. They are very competitive.

Mrs Cunningham: I just want to ask one more question. I am not saying that you or I can solve all the problems, but I represent London North and I am down there to find solutions. I am absolutely sick of people moaning and complaining about this great country. I am here to help this government find solutions. I think that is what it is all about, not partisan politics—and I have said this in this committee before and I mean it—we all have to work together to find solutions and stop taking pokes at each other. By the way, I have heard you speak before and I have seen you give solutions to problems so I am not aiming this at you.

But one of the concerns that was really brought home, on the west coast and in Ontario at these hearings we learned that about $50 billion of our debt is actually owned, in a sense, by the Japanese. When I heard the other figures, it was even more shocking. This country is not even capable of paying its own debt in any way, even if we take a look at our own institutions, our banks and what not. It is pretty frightening.

The solution I think we are all looking for is to get out of debt. It certainly does not give a lot of hope to our young people. I am just wondering what kind of statement you make about that great concern that young people have. This was at the University of Victoria where the representatives came from all over Canada and they were very concerned.

Mr Ashton: I do not think there is any question everybody is somewhat concerned about debt. But I am saying, if you look at 1947, the debt was 106% of the GNP. I do not know, did the people in 1947 say, "My God, my kids are ruined." Obviously, they were not. I grew up in a generation that benefited because of the 1950s and the 1940s.

I agree with you, everybody would prefer not to have a debt. Who wants a debt? I agree that there are things that can be done. Unfortunately, some of the solutions I have are not the solutions that, say, you would agree with.

The Chair: I have to go on to the government.

Mrs Cunningham: It relates to my point. It does relate to the interest rate, and it is unanimous. That is what I would think about.

The Chair: I am sorry.

Mr Christopherson: We follow the rules, Dianne.

Mrs Cunningham: I am going to finish my sentence no matter what.

Mr Christopherson: Ron, the hammer stops when time is up. It does not matter who it is.

Mrs Cunningham: I will keep talking until I end my sentence every time.

Mr Christopherson: But if you were Chris, your sentence would be an hour long.

Mr Ashton: Do you want me to leave? Will you guys work this out or what?

Mr Christopherson: I think it is interesting that some of the questions from the Progressive Conservative Party talk about the deficit when just last week we saw that the federal government is now suggesting that instead of a $30-billion deficit it may have a $40-billion deficit. That miscalculation alone is greater than the entire deficit that we have projected. And, I might add, our projections so far are all but dead on in terms of the way the economy is unfolding. I think things need to be put in their proper context and that needs to be said.

On the issue of competitiveness, I think it is interesting that, again, as the federal government takes all of us into trilateral free trade discussions with the United States and now Mexico, when the issue of competitiveness comes up it seems to want to define it by determining who will take the lowest wages. They want to compete to see which nation and which workers will take the lowest wages, which nation and which workers will have the lowest quality of life, which communities will have the lowest environmental standards, which workplaces will have the lowest health and safety standards. That is their definition of competitiveness.

What we have projected and what we have said in this province is that type of competitiveness is not for us. For Ontarian workers to try to compete in that kind of scenario is a loss for us, and it is defeatist for a provincial government or a national government to follow down that road. What we have said is that we need to identify areas where high value-added makes us competitive, where you cannot do anything as well as us because of our education system, because of the skills of our workers, because of the infrastructure of our municipalities, our health system, our education system. All of those things combined will make us competitive. That is where we will shine.

What kind of restructuring are we seeing here in London and how is the economy changing for workers, and where do you see London's ability to compete in that high value-added type of competitiveness rather than the one that says, "Let's compete for the lowest standard of living"?

Mr Ashton: First of all, we in London have suffered somewhat. I would say we have suffered more at this point. It is all linked together, because indirectly the high dollar is tied into the free trade agreement and the high interest rate policy. So it is hard to say which is which.

There is no question, if you talk to employers in this city—at least I have talked to a number of employers; we represent over 5,000 workers in 25 plants in London and area—so many of them will say it is the high dollar. It is not a problem with the work, it is not a problem with the quality; we could be competitive if the dollar was not artificially high. How do we compete with $3-a-day wages, no health and safety legislation, where the unions negotiate cardboard boxes and tin as wage increases there—government unions, I might add. I do not know how we could possibly be competitive in the long run.

Certainly, there is no question that unskilled jobs are going to come into a great deal of difficulty, as they already are, and increasingly so. We are going to lose most of those if the free trade agreement with Mexico goes through, no question. How can we be competitive? The only way you can be competitive, I suppose, is if you work for $3 a day. It is absolutely insane. It cannot happen.

I would like to respond to something else too. The point was made to me about the debt. In Ottawa, they come through with this interest rate policy which not only puts us out of work because of the high dollar, but costs the taxpayer hundreds of millions of dollars a year in extra debt financing, and at the same time they are telling us, "Well, we're doing all these other things to lower the debt." I find it absolutely insane.

I also find, if we want to talk about competitiveness, that the corporations in this country are not interested in research and development. If you look at the amount of money they spend in a year, it does not even equal what General Motors spends, and they expect the government—

Mrs Cunningham: Do you want to see what the government spends? You should see what the government spends, Jim. You would be shocked.

Mr Jamison: During your presentation you talked about housing and how you wish there was more done. Part of our budget contained provisions for new co-op and non-profit housing starts. In talking about that in previous presentations both from the construction workers union and the construction associations—and I notice we will be talking to the London and District Construction Association this afternoon—they have indicated that this was very helpful at this time for two reasons: Co-op housing in good times is very hard to start because construction on other homes and other housing is running at a good pace; but they have said to us that it has been a real boost for them, has actually turned their figures around for people working in the industry.

I just want your opinion if you see it that way, because part of your presentation dealt with that.

Ms Ashton: I agree with the extra emphasis the government has put on housing. I would like to see more, but I also recognize the restraints the government is under. The labour council has just begun work on co-op housing in east London, hopefully not just to provide that kind of housing but to help revitalize that area of town which both municipally and otherwise has been ignored.

I agree it is easier to get construction companies involved in that when the business is not out there. But I do think more and more of it has to be done. It is not really true, but there is this image of London having all kinds of money, where never is heard a discouraging word and everybody is fine. More and more now in London, just like on Yonge Street in Toronto, you see people on the street; you see people with nowhere to go. I think it has to be one of the major priorities of the 1990s to find housing for people, food and shelter.

Mr Kwinter: The government has said that it chose to fight the recession and not the deficit, and nearly every single group that has come forward supportive of the government's program has said—you just said it about 3 seconds ago—that more money should be spent on housing. Every group that comes forward says: "You should be spending more money on my particular program, but I understand that times are tough. I applaud the government for running up this very large deficit, because this is the time to do it. When times are good they'll bring it down."

How do you reconcile the fact that if we come out of the recession and things start to get better, people will come forward and say: "Now that we're out of the recession, you've got to make good on your promises. We want more money for this and we want more money for housing. We want more money for day care. We want more money for all these things." The government is then caught in a situation where it has no money to pay down the deficit. In fact the pressures are going to be even greater to provide more programming, because "How can you deny us when times are good when you said you couldn't do it when times are bad?" How do you reconcile that?

Mr Ashton: I am trying to take a basic working man's approach to it on the basis that one recognizes that even working people, when times are good, spend a little more money. But they also have the opportunity to save a little more money. I recognize that you have a double situation here. Programs that were promises are going to be expected to be implemented. But there is also the opportunity put away some money for the future.

You look at the unemployment insurance system. When times are good, you could sit on unemployment and nobody chases you. When times are bad, they have you running into that office inside out and backwards, and you cannot find a job. Does that make any sense? It certainly does not to me. I was going to have a criticism there. Why are you not scrutinizing more when times are good? I recognize what you are saying, but I also think it is important that the people who are talking about this deficit—everybody is here with their individual thing.

I do not represent the housing industry, but damn it, everybody in this province and everybody in this country ought to have shelter. I do not represent anybody from the food banks, but everybody ought to have food.

Everything I have talked about today, I do not think once have mentioned any kind of expenditure that has been made on "labour groups." I believe we have to represent people, whether they are union or non-union. I think this province has certain obligations, and I do not care how far into debt it is. Damn it, I am not going to see people sleep in the streets and I am not going to see people go hungry and children not have the proper clothing and everything else.

I think that has to be a basic tenet of any society. We have to start saying, "We are a community." We're not out there who can get the best, who can do this the best. I think we are here as a community and that is the direction every government should be moving in.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the comments of the labour council. My father worked his whole life about 100 yards from here in Wright Lithographing. He was a lithographer, I have a little bit of that feeling for the London area. As I have said to groups like yours coming and saying: "This is a great budget," and to other groups who say: "This is a terrible budget," we will only know probably in a year, a year and a half, maybe a couple of years from now. Clearly, the concerns that many of us have are around the future: deficits forever. The deficit in this budget never gets below $6 billion. There is some creative accounting that says it does, but it does not. They are going to put it all into debt. Hydro is being asked to pick up a whole bunch of government expenses.

My question really is this. Good times, supposedly, are coming as a result of this budget, but the unemployment rate never gets below the 9% level. I am always surprised labour councils are not in here railing at the level of unemployment. I would ask you to be a little bit cautious about blaming the federal government. That is fun but the fact is, Ontario had the lowest unemployment rate in the country a year ago. Today, one year later, we have the fifth lowest. In other words, we have gone from having the best, the lowest unemployment rate, to now being fifth. So it cannot all be the federal government. My question to the labour council is—because I keep all these briefs and I remember these things—a year from now when we are meeting with you, what will be your expectation about unemployment, and if it is not that bad, what will you be saying to the government?

Mr Ashton: It is hard to say. The government has been trying to tell us from Ottawa the recession is over. I do not know. It is hard for me to tell my workers who are still out on the street that it is over.

Mr Phillips: I think the Premier said the recession is over.

Mr Ashton: With regard to what you are saying, I do not know. You are saying that the unemployment rate in Ontario is now down to fifth, or whatever. If we want to argue that one out, I suppose I could blame that on the Liberal government, because most economic policies take time to filter through the system. I do not know if I want to blame you either. I will go back to what you said. I am going to make it quite clear. My view is that it is the federal government that has caused this disaster. If you ask me what is going to happen a year from now—I do not know if they are going to negotiate a Mexican free trade agreement. No question, if they do, it is going to be worse. I have heard from Statscan that if you work an hour you are considered employed. Is that what they are doing out there? You can juggle stats too. I do not disagree with you. We are losing a lot of manufacturing in this province and we are losing it because of the high dollar and, to some degree, the free trade agreement; or tie them in together. I do not know where else to lay the blame.

UNITED FOOD AND COMMERCIAL WORKERS CANADA

The Chair: We will call on the United Food and Commercial Workers. You have one half-hour for a presentation. Try to leave some time at the end for a question-and-answer period. Please identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard.

Mr Catherwood: Thank you very much. We are pleased to have this opportunity to come to London to make our organization's presentation on the Ontario budget. With me today are my colleagues Maureen McCarthy, representative with Local 175/633, which is the largest local union in Ontario and perhaps the largest local union of any organization in North America; and Bryan Neath, international representative with UFCW Canada. I am Tim Catherwood, assistant to the Canadian director of the UFCW.

We would like to have Maureen go through our presentation and then we would enjoy the opportunity to have a discussion with you about some of the issues raised in our brief and some of the things we just heard raised with our colleagues from the labour council.

Ms McCarthy: Mr Chair, members of the committee, the UFCW is Canada's largest private sector union, representing some 175,000 members in this country. UFCW Canada members are employed in more than 20 sectors of the economy, including the retail, service, meat packing, food processing, brewing and beverage production and distribution, fishing, general merchandising, health care, shoe and leather manufacturing and banking industries. The UFCW represents more than 70,000 men and women in Ontario.

In this presentation UFCW Canada wishes to review the conditions facing our members and other working people in Ontario and discuss how the budget presented by the Treasurer of Ontario, the Honourable Floyd Laughren, will serve to improve these conditions and place the economy on a track toward a faster and a more durable recovery. UFCW Canada supports the Ontario government's budget and believes it represents the right approach at the right time.

During the past year the people of Ontario have suffered through the worst recession since the 1930s. For Ontario this recession has been more severe than the recession of 1981-82 and its effects have been felt throughout the province in all sectors and in all communities. Ontario has lost more than 250,000 jobs since February of 1990. This job loss has occurred in virtually all sectors of the economy, manufacturing, retail, food processing, service, transportation, construction and so on. The unemployment rate has risen to exceed 10% and, in many communities, it has soared to the unthinkable levels of 50% or 60%. We are told by economic forecasters that this high unemployment will continue for the foreseeable future.

UFCW Canada members have suffered through the recession and from the results of unprecedented change impacting on the economy and the labour market. Our union has been hit by many layoffs and plant closures: Nabisco, Heinz, Hoffman's, Neilson's, Thompson Transport, Canada Packers, Lancia Bravo, Hunt Wesson, J.B. Foods, Simpsons, Dr Ballard's and Taggart. These are just 12 of the many closures that have robbed more than 5,000 UFCW members of their jobs.

The recession has not been the only cause of these job losses. Many can be attributed to a series of misdirected policies coming from the federal government. This disastrous agenda has included: high interest rates; the overvalued Canadian dollar; the Canada-US free trade agreement; deregulation; high and unfair taxation including the GST; cuts to transfer payments for education, health care and social services which are threatening medicare and other valued social programs; privatization; and cuts to the unemployment insurance program.

Rather than building this country to meet the challenges of a rapidly changing world, the government in Ottawa has placed our country on a divisive and backwards course. We have been weakened, left ill-prepared and ill-equipped to deal with the changes occurring around us and to build on our considerable strengths as a nation.

The Ontario budget represents a large step forward for the people of this province and for Canadians. The budget represents a vote of confidence in Ontario and in our ability to pull together to build a strong and prosperous economy and a better future for all. Contrary to the policies of the federal government and its belt tightening, which has been a major cause of the recession, the Ontario government has moved in the opposite direction. Ontario is fighting these hard economic times by working with the people of Ontario and taking action to help the victims of the recession.

Ontario has been one of the provinces hardest hit by the recession and the economic damage caused by federal government policies. The first year of the recession cost the province 250,000 jobs. This is over twice the number of jobs lost in the 1981-82 recession. Of the job losses in Canada, 80% were in Ontario. Also, 53% of the increase in bankruptcies occurred in Ontario. The federal government's spending cuts will cost Ontario $1.6 billion this year alone. Over the next five years, the province will lose $3.5 billion in federal transfer payments, more than any other province. Ontario has less money coming in and must spend more to keep social programs at their current levels.

The Ontario government could have done what the governments in other provinces did. They could have cut spending on education, health care and social services. Instead, they have recognized the needs of those who have suddenly found themselves unemployed and have moved to help these people.

The government of Ontario has cast a strong vote of confidence in the people of Ontario. This is the right approach. The Conference Board of Canada, in fact, predicts that because of this recession-fighter budget, Ontario will lead the country in economic growth in 1992.

The budget focuses on recovery. By building on our strengths and addressing the needs of working people and their families, the government has put the well-being of the people of Ontario before the deficit. The government has put into place a plan for stronger growth which will improve Ontario's economic as well as fiscal position.

Ontario, unlike the federal government, has not picked the pockets of workers. Ontario has put money into the hands of working people and their families. Ontario understands that if people have no disposable income, they cannot spend and there is no growth in the economy. Unlike some other provinces, they did not piggyback the provincial sales tax on top of the GST. This alone leaves an additional $470 million in the hands of consumers.

The federal government has placed its taxes on those with the least ability to pay. Ontario, on the other hand, has initiated a major improvement in the Ontario tax reduction program. As a result, more low income earners will be exempt or see reductions in their taxes. For example, a single mother with two children will no longer pay provincial income tax if she earns less than $22,500. The government of Ontario is showing that you do not have to fight a recession by putting people out of work and slashing social programs.

Ontario is investing in the future and, at the same time, is creating 70,000 jobs by building roads, bridges, hospitals, schools and affordable housing. Jobs will be created in environmental conservation efficiency and recycling. Funding will be available for retraining and adjustment to those who have lost their jobs due to layoffs and plant closures. The long-neglected areas of labour adjustment, social assistance reform, affordable housing, the environment and pay equity are finally receiving priority treatment.

In response to the increased burden on municipalities caused by a combination of cuts in transfer payments and increased need for social assistance, food banks and affordable housing, the budget provides for increased spending on social assistance and infrastructure improvement.

and development. When combined with the contribution of local governments and agencies, the government's $700-million anti-recession program will be worth more than $1 billion.

The Ontario government has introduced a number of policies that are right for Ontario, including some of the following: a $215-million social assistance reform package will assist municipalities by helping people get into or re-enter the workforce and provide fair and accessible services and benefits for those whose needs are the greatest; $125 million in funding will be made available to help with the cost of pay equity programs, hospitals, school boards, universities and colleges; $8 million will be spent to expand services to women and children victimized by sexual assault; $2 million will provide new shelter beds for women and children who are victims of sexual assault; $150 million in annual operating subsidies for 10,000 new non-profit housing units, when completed, will bring the level of provincially supported housing activity to an all-time high; $48 million will initiate self-government and resolution of native land claims. And $5 million will go to provide for child-care spaces on reserves, and $20 million will be for community projects such as water and sewage systems.

All this will be done while maintaining health care and education at their current levels, despite federal cutbacks. The Ontario government believes in the people of Ontario and is working to address the needs of these people and to build a strong future for all.

During recent months, the Ontario budget and, in particular, the deficit contained in the budget have drawn a lot of criticism from some elements of the business community. Some of this criticism has reached the level of hysteria. This criticism is unfounded, not supported by the facts and represents a negative and questionable view of the world.

UFCW members understand the economy of Ontario. They live it. Our members know that the Ontario budget represents an investment in the future of the province and an effort to bring everyone into the process of building that future. Our members are not concerned that Ontario's budget runs counter to the policies of the federal government. They do not feel that a Prime Minister with less than 15% support has much to teach the Ontario government about economics or anything else.

UFCW members know it was the federal government's own policies that caused the lion's share of the recession and the damage that has befallen the economy. Our members are living through the effects of federal policies that gave us: high interest rates; an overvalued Canadian dollar; high and unfair taxes, including an unprecedented shift of the tax burden on to working men and women, and the GST; cuts to the unemployment insurance program combined with excessive premium rate increases; the Canada-US free trade agreement and, more recently, movement towards a bilateral deal including Mexico; and cuts to transfer payments supporting education, health care and social services.

These kinds of policies have placed our economy on a backward course. They are regressive and destructive and run counter to what Ontario and Canada really need: a progressive thrust and an investment in the future.

A lot of people who know what is really going on are saying the Ontario budget represents the right course of action. John Kenneth Galbraith, one of the leading economists of our time, has said that "the Ontario government is leading the way" by reviving the economy with greater public investment. To the critics of the deficit, Galbraith answers: "Of course, greater public investment stands accused of burdening government with unnecessary debt. So, as a bow to fiscal conservatism, perhaps we should finance the process with a tax increase in the higher income brackets. The expansive effect of the large expenditure would far offset any restraining effect of the tax. The important thing is to get all levels of government off the deflationary track. They are supposed to be the guardians of the public well-being. At present, they seem intent on making things worse."

UFCW members know that there is a right time to invest and that if you want to move ahead sometimes you have to be bold. For UFCW Canada the time to move forward is now.

The Conference Board of Canada is another supporter of the budget. The Conference Board notes that very little of the deficit has come from new spending—$640,000,000—and that the deficit could serve as a confidence builder spurring more growth throughout the economy.

It is important to consider where the $9.7 billion deficit came from, for it is not primarily a result of the actions or decisions of the current Ontario government. In fact, it is estimated that a $2.5 billion deficit was left by the previous Liberal government. The federal government's unilateral cutbacks in transfer payments have had a cumulative cost so far of $3 billion on the Ontario Treasury, including $1.6 billion in 1991 to 1992. Federal high interest rate policies have raised the cost of servicing government debt, drowned—not just dampened—consumer and business spending and been a major cause of the recession. The recession has had the twin effect of reducing provincial tax revenues and forcing higher costs in terms of assistance to Ontario companies and workers. Federal government cuts to the unemployment insurance program have contributed to increased social assistance costs for Ontario. Social services costs will rise to over $5 billion from $2.5 billion two years ago, with 40% of all those on social assistance being children.

The deficit is not extreme and is, in fact, low when measured in terms of total spending, gross domestic product and per capita. The deficit is much lower in all of these measures than the federal government's deficit. And Ontario's public debt charges are not only low, but are projected to stay well under control.

Ontario is well positioned to invest in the future. Government spending will serve to stimulate economic growth, help companies and workers in Ontario out of the recession and through difficult economic times, and create new jobs. The budget is itself an eloquent statement of the government's caring, its commitment and its confidence in the future.

In conclusion, UFCW Canada would like to thank the standing committee for touring Ontario to hear the views of organizations such as ours. It is sometimes good to get a perspective on matters such as the economy from outside of downtown Toronto. UFCW members understand the economy and they know that the budget represents the right course of action for Ontario. They see it as a demonstration of the government's confidence in Ontario and as an investment in our collective future.

As a union, UFCW Canada believes in and is committed to progress and to moving ahead. We think the budget will work in favour of the future and progress and that it will serve to lay the groundwork for a strong economic recovery and sustained prosperity. In this effort the government has our full support.

Mr Christopherson: My thanks to Ms McCarthy and the delegation for an excellent comprehensive presentation. I see that in Ontario you represent 70,000 workers. I think you have articulated quite effectively the direction that we have gone as a government, why we have gone in that direction, and the kind of results we are hoping and expecting to see in the years to come. We had two choices: to go down the road that we did with the budget, or to go down the Mulroney road and fight the deficit. If we had chosen the latter as opposed to the road that we did take, how do you feel that would impact on the 70,000 people you represent and the communities they live in across the province?

Mr Catherwood: We think that making this kind of investment at this point in time is a right thing, both for economic and let us call them psychological reasons. We really have to turn a corner in this country where we are starting to talk about building things up rather than tearing things down. In terms of direct effect, a lot of our industries are being very badly hit by a number of things happening in the economy, some of which can be controlled within Ontario and some of which none of us could ever control, regardless of what we wanted to do. But when you look at doing things in terms of training and labour adjustment and trying to get some more assistance to industries, these are the kinds of things that we support because they maintain and create jobs. That is what we are here for: to make sure that our membership can get stability of employment, that our industries are stable, and that we are able to move forward.

In recent times, we have had an awful lot of discussions with other governments besides the Ontario government, with a great number of our business people, with our employers and business associations, talking about just exactly how we turn the corner in this country and start to build on what we have got and start to do better at what we are trying to do. We think the whole thing is really the right thrust. We are really happy to see somebody going out and standing up for Ontario and for Canada and, most of all, standing up for our members who have had one awful hard time. Those 5,000 jobs we mentioned are just the ones in Ontario, and do not include the ones in other parts of Canada. They are very, very serious. Our organization is spending a lot of time and a lot of money right now trying to deal with the closure problem. If you want, at some point, I could sit down with you and tell you the whole thrust of what we are doing in training adjustment; but that is not the subject of this particular committee.

Mrs Sullivan: One of the things that has been a matter of great concern in relationship to this budget, is the clear evidence of lack of investor confidence after the budget came out. There has been grave concern by financial analysts, not only in this country but elsewhere, by people who were looking at investing, at putting in capital investment for expansion or location of operations in this province. Other decisions have been made now. Indeed, we are seeing our own companies moving elsewhere or closing down.

It seems to me that while you spoke at some length about your presentation to us about where you see positive aspects of the budget, you have left out one of the very, very serious consequences of the issuing of this budget. That is, the capitalist fluid that the lack of investor confidence means—that indeed we will not be attracting investment that will allow for expansion and job creation in the near immediate period of time in Ontario. Surely, that by itself is a major reason to condemn this budget.

Mr Catherwood: I hear what you are saying. We at our organization have had a number of talks in the last two months with large employers of ours. Just last week we sat down with the grocery products manufacturing industry and one of the things that was on the agenda was exactly that question. I think that what has to be done is group like ours and the employers sitting down and talking about our different points of view. They talked about this thing called a capital strike. And we talked about how we do not think a capital strike is necessary or a good thing. By talking about the causes of the investors' concerns, we have moved that type of thing forward quite a way.

From our end, we talked about the importance of the dollar. If the dollar were not where it is, we would be in a awful lot more competitive. Their reply was, well there is $100 million of Canadian debt floating out there. How do you lower interest rates, lower the dollar without affecting interest rates and causing an outflow of money? I do not know the answer to that. The only way we can find solutions to the problems is by sitting down and talking, breaking down that wall between the big companies and our organizations and trying to get the facts on the table and get a good discussion of them. I really believe that if we get into the fall and as things get a little stronger in the economy, you will see a lot of that concern go away.

I do not think this budget alone, or any specific policy that came out of Ottawa or Alberta, or anything else, is the single and only cause of this overall concern in the country. I think the business community has a right to be concerned. But I know that our members have got an awful lot of concerns too. These are the kinds of things we try to put forward, not only in this presentation, but in our discussions with you, discussions with other governments, and most importantly, our discussions with the employers. You have got to bring these things to the table and get some solutions.

We have an awful long way to go to come back in the country. I recall we had something like this discussion a couple of months ago on the problem of cross-border shopping. We have gone away and Bryan, in particular, has done a lot of work on that. You know, we have got a long way to go, but I think that what we like the most about this udget is that it stands up for the future. It stands up for going forward.

Mr Phillips: Really?

Mr Catherwood: I really believe it does.

Mr Stockwell: If you had a $10-billion deficit this year, I could almost swallow that if it was accepted as a recession budget. I do not know that I would, but I am certain the response from the general public would be less. And the capital investors certainly would not be as animated as they have been. Except for the fact that you are suggesting you are moving to the future—"We are building for the future."—which in my opinion is such short-sighted pap. It is hogwash. How can you tell me we are building for the future when we are running a $10-billion deficit this fiscal year and when for the next three years we are nearly matching that number? Where is the consumer confidence, the capital confidence, for anyone to invest in a province that is prepared to double its debt in four years? Explain that one away. That just boggles my mind—how they can go about running those kind of deficits and then get upset when the private sector, the capital investors, say, "Hold the phone, folks, you people are spending money like water."

Mr Catherwood: I am not so sure I know what the answer is to the $10 billion. We sat down and looked at what we thought were the causes of it and we gave them to you. I do not know how you go back and turn some of those back. We were in a recession and—

Mr Stockwell: But that is not the question, and I would appreciate a response.

Mr Catherwood: But you are not letting me answer it. We had a recession and that caused a big chunk of it. We have had this transfer of deficit from the federal government to the Ontario government through the transfer payments, which is something that I think we need to take up with Mazankowski, not with you. I think interest rates have hurt the overall fiscal position of the government. The other thing is, look at what is being spent out there. I have yet to have anyone on our side or on the business side tell me where exactly it is that we are going to be cutting these things. I do not want to see a long-term run-up of the deficit or the debt in Ontario, but my understanding of it is that our debt position in Ontario, probably because of good management before, is quite solid. I do not think our numbers are projected to run up—the percentage of GDP or any of these other ratios that you measure debt by—to unmanageable proportions. That is not my understanding.

Mr Stockwell: I will tell you, you are wrong.

Mr B. Ward: In your opinion.

Mr Stockwell: No, not in my opinion. In fact, you are looking at an increase of at least 2% in the GDP as compared to your budget and deficit figures. There is no question it is running up. The question stands, though: How can you achieve a healthy, prosperous economy when you are running these kinds of deficits? And you are saying "building for the future." Even you or your group cannot buy into the theory that running these kinds of deficit figures for the next four years is going to be a healthy approach for the Ontario economy. Even you cannot accept that, I would think.

Mr Catherwood: I do not know what you mean by "even" me.

Mr Stockwell: I have heard that a lot of your groups have been standing up and supporting this budget.

Mr Catherwood: Yes, and we do. But you are treating us like we are off in some sort of corner. We are not. I just told you we are concerned about the idea that the debt would run up in the long term. But I also believe that if we can get some other things going in this province—for example, training and adjustment, where we get people back into the workforce faster, where we are not dumping people out when we have to make changes in the workplace—in the long term we will be able to build this economy up.

I happen to think the Ontario economy is one of the strongest in North America, and I do not know how you could possibly disagree with me on that. But you know, we have to find a fundamentally different way of dealing with the changes that are going on. This absolutely has to be done, and if we can do that we are going to have a strong economy. But you cannot say the deficit alone is causing people to run out of this province.

Mrs Cunningham: It is the projected deficit that people are worried about.

Mr B. Ward: Good presentation.

SCIENCETECH INC

The Chair: The next group we have is called Sciencetech. You have one half-hour. Try to save some time for the three parties here to ask questions of your presentation and your opinions. Please identify yourself for Hansard.

Mr Lazure: My name is Robert Lazure. I am operations manager for Sciencetech Inc, a small high-tech business situated here in London.

Sciencetech was born and raised here in London about five years ago. It began with four friends, three of whom once worked at PRA International, a London company that used to make lasers. In its first months, Sciencetech Consultants Inc, as it was then called, was but a part-time business for all involved. In 1986, I became the first to take this on as a full-time position, working out of my home, as do many small businesses. In 1987, we moved to the London Small Business Centre on Oxford Street, and with the help of manager George Stuart we developed a short- and long-term business plan and settled in a 1,200-square-foot space. By the time we left three years later, we occupied 1,800 square feet and had eight people on staff.

Today, Sciencetech designs and produces custom optical systems for medicine, research and industry, specializing in the fields of spectroscopy, lasers, biotechnology and holography. We have made instruments for many Canadian universities and companies. We export to the US, Mexico and Argentina. We have an engineering and production group in the south of London at a 5,000-square-foot facility. We have a research group in Hamilton located on campus at McMaster University, and a sales office in Georgetown serving the Toronto area. Of a staff of 13, more than 50% are physicists, engineers or technicians.

I would like to address three areas in the 1991 Ontario budget which strongly affect Sciencetech, both now and in the future. These areas are, first: education and training for jobs; second, research and innovation; and third, manufacturing recovery.

First, education and training for jobs: Sciencetech welcomes Ontario's commitment to quality education. In the years to come, Sciencetech will be looking for technical people with various backgrounds. It is good to hear that spending increases will occur in this area. The effects of education are difficult to gauge in the short term. It is only with a commitment to the future that our expectations are realized. With over 50% of our staff in technical areas, education is the gateway to innovation and the future of our industry.

Second, research and innovation: These two words are key to Sciencetech. We know that today's research project will become tomorrow's production. To date, we have made an extra effort to maintain an internal level of R&D so that we can face tomorrow's marketplace. We are glad to see that this government thinks the same way in providing $131 million for research, development and technology diffusion in 1991-92.

As do all new and growing high-tech companies, Sciencetech suffers from the shortage of investment capital. We welcome the increase of funds to support these activities, in particular the increase to $21 million for the Innovation Ontario Corp. We especially appreciate the raising of the ceiling for individual investments from $350,000 to $1 million. Sciencetech is in favour of the government's spending in this area, which will provide new job markets and industries in Ontario.

Third, manufacturing recovery: Sciencetech realized from its infancy that developing single-item projects would not sustain its future. We have slowly been trying to develop a production group to better attract customers in providing a total product from concept to prototype to production.

Growth in the area of manufacturing is difficult and requires loans which banks are reluctant to provide in these difficult economic times. Sciencetech is happy to see that small and medium-sized companies have been considered in this budget, with up to $57 million in financial assistance in the form of loans and loan guarantees.

These three areas—education and training for jobs, research and innovation, and manufacturing recovery—are all closely related. They are the process for a better Sciencetech and a better Ontario, all at the price of commitment.

Mr Chairman, I will leave you with a gift I received not too long ago. It is not gift-wrapped because I have been using it, but I feel it would be more beneficial to this committee. It is a nice stainless steel letter opener that I received from the Buffalo Economic Development group. It came with a nice letter offering low taxes, cheap electricity and other incentives should we consider moving our operations that way.

If we do not think of Ontario's future, who will?

Mr Phillips: That is a letter opener?

Mr Lazure: It is a letter opener.

The Chair: We will use that as an exhibit.

Mrs Cunningham: It has made its point at least, for the moment.

The Chair: I thought there was a double edge on it.

Mr Kwinter: Thank you very much for your presentation. At the present time, the average amount of gross domestic product that is dedicated to research and development in Canada is 1.3%. Ontario does a little better; it is at 1.7%. You can imagine where the rest of the country would be without Ontario's 1.7%.

Our major competitors, the United States and Japan, have set a target. Right now Japan is at about 3% and the United States at about 2.8%. They have set a target that by the year 2000—certainly Japan hopes to be at about 4.5%. We as a government, when we were in power, tried to get the federal government to go to 2.5% as a target; not as a target, but as a target. We could not get them to agree to it.

How do you feel about the commitment to research and development by all levels of government? What impact does that have on you?

Mr Lazure: As you know, manufacturing is difficult in Ontario. The automotive is a very tight market—not that I know much about it—but we certainly need to look at other alternatives. Other industries must be explored.

I have always been in the high-technology field and think it is an area that has not been explored that much. I am in optics design. That area is really quite a minor part of Ontario and Canada. As far as I know, there is only one university that offers a course in optics in Canada. Optics is really the way a lot of things are going—such as communications; it services many industries. I think all levels of government should look at it a bit more seriously.

Mr Kwinter: We are pretty well considered worldwide when it comes to laser technology. We have Geraldine Kenney-Wallace, who has done a lot of work in that. She is now the president of McMaster University. What kind of environment allowed that to happen, and do you feel it is not continuing?

Mr Lazure: I do not have a good answer for that. Maybe you know of a few examples, but I think it could be helped out more. I do not think there are enough industries that have developed around those kinds of innovations.

Mr Kwinter: What about the centres of excellence program, the one particularly in that area? Has that impacted on you at all?

Mr Lazure: I think it is a good intention, but it has not really developed into something everybody could use.

Mr Kwinter: Do you have any suggestions as to how it can be improved?

Mr Lazure: I think they need to go to all the small companies and offer ways to help them. Really, it has been something further away that not everybody could use. I feel the same way about the centre of excellence for computer-aided design/computer-aided manufacturing technology. That has somewhat petered out and is not available now. It lasted for five years or something like that. Now when seed CAD-CAM and computerized numerical control capability, it is not there for me.

Mr Kwinter: You have to understand that was a seed program. That was when CAD-CAM was a new technology and the idea of computer-aided design and computerized manufacturing had to be introduced. Now it is state of the art and CAD-CAM is routine in any company that is involved in any kind of high-technology production, even the smallest. You walk into any small firm and the first thing they do is show you their CAD-CAM operation. As a result, there was no need to keep funding that, because it was really seed money to get Canadian industry aware of the CAD-CAM potential. Now, of course, if you need it, there are people in the private sector who offer it. That is really why it was discontinued. It is certainly available; it just is not available from the government.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate your comments. I think many people now think the future of our value-added products rests in many more people being interested in the skilled trades and science and technology, and yet I think enrolment is dropping. Certainly in science and technology, I think we are headed in the opposite direction.

One of the conclusions of the Premier's Council was that we must get more people into science and technology. But if you go around the room, everybody is advising their sons and daughters to go into law and medicine and that sort of stuff. We cannot just say, "Do it." How do we change things so people actually want to go into science and technology, do go into it and do thrive in it?

Mr Lazure: That is a good question. I do not have an answer for that. I think it is probably the high school teachers. If there are enough who are excited about science, it is something that stimulates people to go into it as a career. There are certainly plenty of challenges these days with pollution control, new methods to take care of PCBs and chemical breakdowns and the ultraviolet concentration we are exposed to. There are plenty of problems. We just have to make it exciting enough for young people to go into it.

Mr Kwinter: I think the key is not the excitement, it is the remuneration.

Mr Lazure: Yes.

Mr Kwinter: Students are becoming very aware of their economic prospects. What they want is something that is going to get them a good, fast return on their investment in education and they do not see it in the science area. I think that is the key.

Mr Phillips: You know this field better, but in Canada we have an entrepreneur who has a really good new idea, gets it rolling to a certain stage and then I sense that an awful lot sell out to a larger US corporation for whatever reason: a threat, time to cash in, "I'm tired," or whatever it is. Is my sense reality? If it is reality, what do we do about it?

Mr Lazure: It is a very good question. I do not have an answer.

Mr Phillips: Darn it, we are looking for answers.

Mr Lazure: I just have an opinion.

Mrs Cunningham: You are here as part of a very exciting, innovative centre in London, Ontario, a small business centre, and you started all this on your own. I am wondering if you would like to tell the committee about the centre itself, how it got started, whether there are government funds in it and just how it works.

Mr Lazure: The small business centre situated in London probably started around 1987. I think I was one of the first tenants there. It is funded in part by many groups, the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology, the city of London, the University of Western Ontario, Fanshawe College and possibly the London Chamber of Commerce. There might be others that I have left out.

It is situated in an old building on Oxford Street in the west end near Fanshawe College. It used to be an old Proto Tool plant. They cleared it all out and started building walls and different sections. There is a managerial office. George Stewart is the manager there and he takes care of tenants coming in. It is a fairly decent rent. He forces you to make a business plan and to go before a board to justify your existence in his place.

There is a library facility there. All government publications at all levels are there, different groups that can help you out with planning, computerizing your accounting and that sort of stuff. It is a very worthwhile project. I believe it is ongoing and it is full now. Businesses come out of it—I think their maturing rate is three years; the rent gets a little higher in the third year and a little higher still in the fourth year, so it is an encouragement to get out of there and do it on your own, and it has been beneficial to us.

Mrs Cunningham: Where do you see the future of your company?

Mr Lazure: Our markets are pretty well worldwide. London is good to us because we grew out of another company. Our ties are here, certainly in the engineering and production area, but we have to keep in touch with universities. That is why we went to the McMaster University tie. You cannot be a high-technology company on your own. You have to have links with industry and universities. We are committed to Ontario. We are all Canadian in the company and want to grow here.

Mrs Cunningham: I think it is interesting that the grants that go to universities and colleges and to municipalities—some of that money is filtered down into business. Not a lot of it; basically it is self-sufficient but I think it is a great prototype for our government to be looking at with regard to how things get started and how people get excited.

Right now we are looking at our school students. We are looking at a very large project where they can work with these small companies in order to become even more excited, so that they are not just depending on teachers in the classroom but on actual people like yourself who, I think, motivate young people. So far there is not a lot of support for that kind of thing basically because school systems are threatened by it, so we have more work to do.

I did not miss your "low taxes-cheaper electricity" shot. That is why I asked the question. We are here to talk about the competitiveness thing, but I think it is a perfect example. I certainly know that three of the ministers are coming down to visit the centre and I am very pleased that you are here today. How did you choose to come before this committee?

Mr Lazure: The president of the company was asked to talk and I am taking his place because he is on holidays.

Mrs Cunningham: You have done a great job and I think he should possibly be the great manager of Ontario because he manages like we probably would like to see this province managed. Thank you very much for being here today. I hope my colleagues will take advantage of your presentation and listen as Mr Winninger and I present your institution as a prototype of what we would like to see in training and research and development.

Mr Winninger: Mr Lazure, you seem to be doing everything right. You started your undertaking five years ago, invested in high technology and are increasing your employees virtually by the month. I understand you are turning away business because you cannot handle it all. You have been able to use government and private funding to push your project ahead. You are doing environmentally relevant things like breaking down PCBs and trying to control zebra mussels.

You seem to be a real success story and able to live with the budget and thrive on the money that is being invested in research and development; as you mentioned, the $130 million. I am just wondering how you can be so successful and vibrant and relevant and progressive and productive and competitive and other businesses are coming to us and saying, "We just can't survive in this economy you've created in Ontario." Are you not a model for these other businesses?

Mr Lazure: Thank you for the compliments. I do not know why other businesses cannot do it. I know we sacrificed both time and money to make this work. We have done that since the start and we are dedicated to a future in Ontario. I just think it is hard work that gets you there.

Mr Winninger: Do you find anything objectionable about spending money during the recession to create jobs, retrain workers and improve job skills and technology?

Mr Lazure: I do not. I think it is a wise move. We are doing similar things because the market is going to be very tough out there. When things get good we are going to be left behind if we do not, so we have to get ready for it. Canada is going to have to get ready for the Mexico free trade agreement, which is coming whether we like it or not. We definitely have to prepare for that, and the European market—it is a world market out there. You are not competing against your neighbour any more. You are not isolated. You have to get ready for much tougher times coming.

Mr Winninger: How has the recession affected your particular enterprise?

Mr Lazure: It has been difficult, but of course we have spent a lot of time working on marketing the company and getting other customers. It is difficult but the payoffs are good.

Ms M. Ward: Thank you for your presentation. I was reading an article the other day about research and development. Everyone talks about R&D and how Canada is lacking in this area. The argument of this particular article is that our problem is not in research, that there is not lack of basic research in Canada but really in the development and further on down the road. The ideas are there and maybe the technical knowhow but the problem is getting those ideas into production. That is where we fall down. Do you have any views on that?

Mr Lazure: I agree with that. Certainly our universities are full of basic research and many professors are involved in all kinds of very good problem-solving things. Definitely the problem is in getting that into industry and that is probably the difficulty of many research and development companies. They do not last because they cannot make a dollar on the Ms M. Ward: Different skills are needed, as you have proven.

Mr Lazure: It is a difficulty because every development guy wants to do the best job possible, which ends up costing a fortune, so those kinds of projects run wild without funding and will never make it to product if they cannot live through that stage. We have recognized that and that is why we are definitely looking towards a production facility. As we bring our products through the prototype stage and work out all the bugs, that is the expensive part. Then you get it into production, which is another job to do, but you need to get through that. That is certainly where government can help industry bridge that gap and get into the new industries.

Ms M. Ward: How does your link with McMaster University work? Could you describe that briefly?

Mr Lazure: It is very nice. If we could have the same link with the University of Western Ontario, it would be good but maybe it is something you could look into. Industries definitely need the link with universities. The nice thing about this is that you get a university account and have fantastic facilities. You can use the machine shops—not that we do not have our own—X-ray technology, CAT scans and all sorts of development tools that are not available to you as a little company. It is a terrific foot in the door. I can get all kinds of tubing, Teflon tubing and all kinds of stuff there. I would have to buy $100 minimum. I bought it in any other store at a reasonable price. They are all little things but they add up to a really winning combination in making a company.

Ms M. Ward: So that is something we should pursue.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for appearing before this committee and for the insight you have given us on your company and how it is performing here in Ontario. The committee will recess for five minutes.

The committee recessed at 1057.

LONDON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Chair: We will resume with the London Chamber of Commerce. As all members have your written brief in front of them please leave some time at the end of your half-hour presentation for questions. For the purposes of Hansard, please identify yourselves.

Mr Thomas: My name is Bryan Thomas. I am the past chairman of the board of the London Chamber of Commerce and here today with me is Jim Etherington, the current chairman of the board. On behalf of our more than 1000 members of the London business community and our board of directors, we thank the committee for this opportunity to have our views regarding the Ontario budget heard.

The London Chamber of Commerce has some very grave concerns about the Ontario budget for fiscal 1992. These concerns centre on the size of the proposed deficit. The announced $9.7-billion deficit in fiscal 1992, when combined with projected sizeable deficits in the following fiscal years, we believe will add up to financial chaos for our province.

Mr Laughren's recession-fighting approach, as he has called it, rather than a fiscally responsible one, could not be in our view further off the mark. The more the government attempts to fight this recession by injecting capital which it clearly does not have, the slower will be the recovery from this recession. Certainly the lesson learned by the federal government in the early 1970s and 1980s should be heeded. It is well known that governments which attempt to spend their way out of recessions simply leave a debt-ridden legacy.

The Ontario government is demonstrating that it has little understanding of the emerging one-world marketplace and the need for Ontario to be competitive in that marketplace. This budget is accelerating the perception in international circles that Ontario is a poor place to conduct business. By creating a business climate that is not conducive to generating a reasonable profit, the result will be less investment from companies already located in Ontario and certainly much less from companies considering Ontario as a place to invest. Down the road this clearly means fewer jobs for all.

In particular, we believe the timing of this budget is poor. The business community here in London is well on the road to recovery from the recent recession—and you notice I said "recent"; we believe there are significant signs that we are recovering—by means of normal economic processes. This budget has been a kick in the stomach to that recovery, in our view. Just as business confidence was growing, uncertainty regarding the future business climate has returned.

Perhaps the most startling of all is the government's apparent inability to understand the simple realities of the world of the 1990s. It seems to think we can build a wall around Ontario and exist in a vacuum. In our view, what the government must do is provide an economic environment which is conducive to attracting investment from around the world. Instead, it is virtually saying, "Please take your money elsewhere, we don't want you in Ontario."

At a time when most other governments in the world are moving towards a society of individual freedom and responsibility—save the USSR as of yesterday, I might add—in Ontario we seem to be moving towards greater and greater government control. In this climate business will surely look elsewhere. I think there has been lots of evidence of that since the government brought down its budget. Jobs will continue to disappear.

The London Chamber of Commerce believes the Ontario government will be forced both to significantly raise taxes in the coming years—that is, existing taxes—as well as to create new taxes to achieve the objectives outlined in the budget. Unquestionably, its economic growth projections are too optimistic given the aforementioned climate. Already, both individuals and corporations are taxed too highly in this province. We find it difficult to compete with companies from the US and elsewhere. Our citizens continue to shop in the US because Ontario goods are too highly taxed. Until we can bring our taxes in line with our other major international competitors we will simply continue to lose market share and I think you know what that means for all people in this province.

Those are some general comments. Let me give you some specific items contained in the budget that we have some concerns with.

1. We calculate expenditures up over 13%. Throwing money at our problems is not the answer.

2. We estimate the real deficit to be in excess of $10 billion, possibly much higher if the optimistic growth goals are not met. This is assuming normal accounting procedures are followed and capital expenditure costs for those are included in the current budget.

Mr Stockwell: Do not assume that.

Mr Thomas: All right.

3. It will be impossible to lower the deficit to $7.8 billion by 1994-95 as originally announced without significant tax increases and new taxes.

4. Incentives for investment in manufacturing will be removed in December of this year by the removal of the Ontario current cost adjustment. This will be a further disincentive to private sector productivity improvement and to investment in Ontario.

5. The budget alludes to several retroactive pieces of legislation such as the wage protection fund and rent control legislation. Ladies and gentlemen, changing the rules long after the game has been played further adds to the sense of uncertainty of doing business in Ontario. Every time the government does this kind of thing you create uncertainty and you are adding to the climate that people will continue to develop of saying, "Let's go elsewhere, south of the border." It will surely scare more business from the province.

6. The fiscal irresponsibility displayed in the budget has added a huge extra burden on taxpayers due to the loss of our triple A credit rating and, of course, the resulting significant increase in carrying costs.

7. The budget assumes the protection or creation of 70,000 jobs. We estimate that less than 1,000 of these will be new jobs; the rest are what are being called protected jobs. These few jobs will be created at a very significant cost indeed.

8. The 40% increase in surtax on higher incomes is a strong incentive to be less productive for many Ontarians.

9. The 1.7 cents per litre tax increase on gas, which has already happened, and then the same increase in January, is certainly the final blow to the trucking industry in this province and a slap in the face to all drivers in Ontario. It surely has exacerbated the existing transborder shopping problem as well.

10. The tobacco tax increase of 1.67 cents per cigarette is a further blow to an industry that is already crippled. We certainly understand the health-related reasons but on the economic side it is a blow.

11. The increase in the gas guzzler tax, which we know has been amended since it was first tabled, will still hurt area manufacturers such as the Ford Talbotville plant, although we know it will be to a lesser degree than originally announced.

12. We believe that funding for Ontario's technology fund, the R&D superallowance and the manufacturing recovery program are bones thrown to the manufacturing community, the business community. Candidly, if we thought the government would use this money to pay down the deficit we would ask you to keep it.

13. The surtax on corporate profits over $200,000 in January 1992 is an incentive to be less profitable, once again providing incentive to lower productivity rather than to improve it.

14. Changes to the Mining Tax Act will discourage new mining ventures.

15. The significant increase in spending on numerous social programs is simply not the answer to the social problems of the province. A better course of action would be to create a positive business climate which would result in growth, the creation of new jobs and more prosperity for all.

In conclusion, the London Chamber of Commerce believes that the government's goal of sustainable prosperity is simply a pipedream, there will be less prosperity for all in Ontario. If the government wants more jobs, which is one goal we certainly have in common, then they must give us the freedom and the level playing field to produce and to compete with our international competitors. Given this incentive, the business community will grow and it will produce more jobs for this province.

In short, for the sake of all Ontarians, the Ontario government should keep its hands off the system of free enterprise that has made this province prosperous, one that used to be the admiration of the rest of the world. In the strongest of terms we urge the government to rethink this budget and to submit a balanced budget, a real balanced budget for this current fiscal year. Driving us further into debt is surely neither the answer to our current economic problems nor the foundation upon which a prosperous future is built.

That concludes our formal presentation. We would be very happy to enter into a discussion with the committee.

Mr Stockwell: There is one comment from the government benches about the high credit rating and the high dollar. I would like your thoughts on my thinking that it is related directly to the amount of debt or the amount of borrowing any government or province must incur. It seems to me that if we are always going offshore to borrow we must keep our interest rates higher to get the money. If we are keeping our interest rates higher it simply drives up the value of the dollar, and by going further into debt you are simply, using some of your terms, exacerbating the high interest rate/high dollar problem.

Mr Thomas: We could not agree with you more, Mr Stockwell. We believe that at the root of all evil, in terms of our economic problems, are the high amounts of debt governments at all levels are carrying. For God's sake, let us look at the federal government, the kind of spending that went on in the 1970s and 1980s.

You know that 38 to 40 cents on every tax dollar collected by the feds is going to pay for the deficit. I know the Ontario situation is far less than that, but all we are doing is pushing the panic button saying, "If you stay on this course you will never be able to afford the payments in the future. You will be as bad as the feds." Nobody wants to be caught in that situation. Their hands are completely tied, they do not have the cash flow now to do the kinds of things they would dearly love to do for the citizens of this country. If you go on spending more than you take in you are going to drive this province into that very situation.

Mrs Cunningham: On your last statement, Mr Thomas—either you or Mr Etherington—my colleagues on the other side of the room are going to be absolutely furious with you for talking about balancing the budget. What kind of things, let us say to manage in a more responsible way, can the government do? What kind of solutions do you have? At the same time I would like you to talk about social programs because some of us, not myself, but certainly others, get accused of not caring. Perhaps you can talk about balanced budgets and just what kinds of things we should be looking at in the year to come.

Mr Thomas: Let me first respond by saying that we believe the balanced budget is a must across all sectors including social programs, but also those things given to the business community. I talked about some of the incentives in our presentation being offered to the business community. Fine, cut those as well, but we would like to see cuts across the board.

In the area of social programs, I think many times the business community is unfairly felt to be heartless. That is not our view at all. We just believe in responsibility. We believe that if you have too much incentive for people to live off the social system, like all human beings we are going to try to take that course. We are very much in favour of a safety net there for people who genuinely need it. We do believe, however, that some of the requirements for getting funding from the government should be more stringent than these things have to be more carefully looked at.

By no means are we advocating that those programs for poor people and the people who really are in temporary need of help should be affected. Should they be judiciously looked at to make sure only those that really need the support get the money? Yes, but we believe the opposite is happening: that a gravy train mentality, if you would, is being created. We are human beings; we are going to take more and more advantage of it, if we can, right across all sectors.

Jim, do you wish to comment?

Mr Etherington: Only that one of the ways of balancing budgets obviously is to reduce costs in many different reas. The cost of government is one that is of concern to all chambers in the country and to our chamber, and we look with interest at the plans by the federal government to cap increases in salaries. Over the past few years they have actually reduced the growth of government. But we do not see in the current budget any intention to reduce the size of the Ontario government or to cap the increases in costs of the provincial government. We think that was something that was missed and it should have been in there.

Mrs Cunningham: I have recently returned from Victoria, British Columbia, where there were great discussions about which countries we were going to be able to borrow from. The Japanese community was well represented and informed us that they own about $55 billion. I am just wondering what your thoughts are when it comes to interest rates. We keep hearing the criticism. How does it work? Would you like to enlighten us as to our federal debt, and what can be done about it other than cutting it and getting rid of it, and where do we get the money from to pay it back?

Mr Thomas: From taxpayers ultimately, and that is the real crime of what is happening at the federal level and why we so strongly believe the province has got to learn from that lesson in history. Clearly they cannot handle the amount of debt; they are going to have to keep borrowing.

If you look at a straight operating cost, minus the feds' carrying costs of their very large, approaching $400-billion debt they actually have about a $10-billion operating surplus, but it costs them about $40 billion in interest, thus the $30-billion publicized figure you hear so much about. That is going to happen to Ontario if we keep spending, spending. The only way to pay it is to borrow more. Sooner or later somebody has got to pay for it out of operating costs.

Mrs Cunningham: How do our interest rates go down then?

The Chair: Excuse me; I have got to go on to Mr Jamison.

Mrs Cunningham: I can fit it in somewhere else.

Mr Jamison: Thank you for taking the time and making the effort to come here today to make your presentation. You have given a very specific, physically responsible approach to the whole question of the budget here today, although I would like to point out that this government had an $8-billion shortfall without any new spending, and we are, in fact, in the worst recession in 50 years.

You have been in possession of the budget since, I would imagine, late April and obviously you have been studying it and you have made a number of recommendations in a general sense to us. You have also indicated in your document that, and I will read it back to you, "In the strongest of terms we urge the government to rethink this budget and submit a balanced budget for the current year."

It leads me to a question and I have asked this same question to a number of your colleagues who have represented chambers of commerce. I was saying that you have been in possession of the figures and so forth and you are calling for a balanced budget in the current year. It would mean a lessening of expenditures at this point of $9.7 billion.

Seeing that you have the information and have had it since April, I would like you to be specific in where you, as a chamber of commerce, feel that $9.7 billion worth of cuts can be made.

Mr Thomas: I think, in the same answer I gave to Mrs Cunningham, that right across the board, in all areas, we are calling for the government to cut in all departments. We would like to see you start with reducing the number of civil servants, reducing the bureaucracy, all departments.

Mr Jamison: I understand that. I am sorry if I have left myself vague because I am asking for specifics here.

Mr Thomas: I am giving you a specific answer. You can take 10% right across the board in all departments. You see, governments love to grow. They love that power, but this money belongs to the people, all right? And the people are fed up with paying taxes right across, municipal, provincial and federal. What we are saying to you is start that ball rolling in reverse. It is a great big snowball rolling down the hill and if you do not start rolling it back the other way, it will keep getting bigger and bigger. Start with the business community, start taking some of the stuff away in your budget that you are offering to the business community. We will be first in line to take our cuts, but we want everyone else to take their cuts as well.

Mr Jamison: You are talking housing, you are talking everything.

Mr Thomas: Everything.

Mr Jamison: Okay. Would it be fair to say that the transfers that were paid to municipalities, which reflect very directly on your own members in the area of municipal taxes, is an area that should be cut by 10% and shifted again to the municipalities, because you have just finished saying, "across the board"?

Mr Thomas: I am very much aware that the federal government has reduced its transfer payments to the province and the province is therefore forced, unless it wishes to really increase taxes, to reduce payments to the municipalities. Yes, we are calling for all three government levels to stop having that ball get bigger and to start having it get smaller. Yes.

Mr Jamison: So you are asking for a 10% cut to municipal transfers. I just want to be clear on that.

Mr Thomas: As long as all other areas are also receiving cuts. I am not looking for selective cutting, Mr Jamison. We are looking for cuts across the board. So if you are saying, "The London Chamber of Commerce is in favour of cutting in one specific area," no; we are in favour of cutting in all areas.

Mr Jamison: Education?

Mr Jamison: Yes. Across the board, absolutely in education. We have made this presentation to the London board of education. They are also on a spiral of spending and an environment of increased students and less bucks coming from governments. They have to cut back too across the board. Yes.

Mr Winner: Certainly the civil servants are productive members of the economy. They contribute to the economy in terms of the taxes they pay, and some people have argued that the US is following us in coming out of this recession because of the lack of public sector spending; but aside from all of that, in the short term, are you going to have hospital bed cuts? Are you going to have schools closed?

Mr Thomas: Yes.

Mr Winninger: Are you going to see municipal property taxes for people on fixed incomes go up if we adopt your model?

Mr Thomas: You see, we are all living beyond our means. That is exactly what we are saying. It is money that we do not have that you are spending. You are mortgaging the future to subsidize today's living. That is what we are opposed to. Yes, across the board, we all have to learn to live with less because it is not there.

Mr Winninger: It seems to work in Germany.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Thomas, in representations that have been made to us virtually every chamber of commerce has echoed to some extent what you have said. On the other hand, when labour and some of the other groups make their point, you are perceived to be the enemy. The feeling is that you are not paying your fair share of taxes, that in fact the taxes you are paying as a proportion have been reducing regularly. We heard that this morning. The feeling is that if business and the wealthy would pay their share, everything would be fine. What do you have to say about that?

Mr Thomas: Let me just say that the greater question is ability to compete. You can go ahead and put greater taxes on all the corporations in this country and in this province if you wish; all they will do is go elsewhere where there are safer tax havens, frankly. If you do not make Ontario a good place to make a profit for companies, they will go elsewhere. Candidly, that is what they will do. There will be those that stick around because they believe in this place. Like it or not, business is all about making a profit, and if they cannot make one in this province, they will go elsewhere.

Mr Etherington: Just to add to that, in my other life I work for London Life Insurance Co. We provide group benefit policies to about 16,000 businesses in Canada. The greater percentage of them are in Ontario. We are one of the first to be told if a company plans to cease doing business or to reduce its numbers of employees. We started noticing in January a dramatic increase in the numbers of companies that were notifying us that they no longer plan to continue doing business in Ontario. One of their first questions was: "Do you have a firm in Tennessee that you can refer us to? Do you have a firm in Buffalo you can refer us to?" So we started going back and questioning them: "Why are you closing down? Is this the free trade thing? What is kicking in here?" The answers were always three: increasing levels of taxes, increasing levels of government bureaucracy and increasing intrusion by the provincial government, and that is why they are leaving.

Nothing conclusive, of course. I know that the province of Ontario is doing studies, Stats Canada is doing studies, trying to isolate the absolute numbers of these movements taking place and the reasons why. We are convinced that the reasons we are hearing are the right reasons.

Mr Thomas: It is not just the companies; the citizen: the same people who are in here complaining to you that the corporations are not paying their fair share of taxes are off shopping in the States every weekend because they do not want to pay their taxes as well. Candidly, for all people, for so-called rich people, the poor people and everybody in between, we have to have a system here in which taxes are reduced so that they will buy products that are made in this province; they will not go across the border; companies will not be shipping off to Mexico or the US or elsewhere. That is what makes the world tick, folks.

Mrs Sullivan: I would like to proceed with another question. One of the things you have alluded to in your brief relates to the confidence for future investment that is undermined by this budget. You have mentioned a couple of areas where there has been enormous uncertainty created by this budget and by policies that flow through government action as a result of the budget. You have mentioned that the OCCA was changed in midstream without notice and without consultation and has directly affected manufacturing capital investment. You have talked about retroactive legislation in housing and labour.

One of the other areas that I see as environment critical for our party relates to environmental legislation and regulations which have either been postponed—whether it is pollution control or waste management issues—or there has been such uncertainty created that business people are not making decisions about adding pollution control equipment or their investment capital has been taken right off the table. I wonder if you could talk about how rules changing in midstream and the uncertainty that it has created has affected business and industry in your community.

Mr Thomas: Absolutely. Nothing could be more devastating. The business community thrives on knowing what the future is going to be all about. They are not going to spend millions of dollars on new capital projects or get into whole new areas of any other kind until they can count on the future, 10 and 20 years down. That is how they get their money back. Take a look at what is happening in the stock markets and financial community today across the world because of what is happening in Russia. The instant things are uncertain, the business community stops everything because they know it takes 10 and 20 years to get their money back. Nothing could be more injurious to business than to change the rules retroactively, because suddenly you create a climate in which they say: "My gosh, I better not do this in Ontario. What kind of a law are they going to come up with now that will catch me for something that I thought was legal last year and now they are saying it wasn't?"

Mr Etherington: And new costs creep in. One that you perhaps are not familiar with is part of the Ontario auto insurance act which was passed last year. There was a clause put in—and Mr Kwinter would be familiar with this one. To fund the cost of the new Ontario Insurance Commission there would be a levy placed on insurance companies. At that time it did not apply to life insurance companies, it only applied to the auto insurance companies subject to the act.

In January this year the life insurance industry was notified that they too were to pay costs towards the Ontario Insurance Commission retroactive to last June, after budgets, of course, had been set for 1990 and the costs of product had been passed on to our customers. You add that a number of other things and the point that we make is, please do not do that any more. It is difficult enough to stay in business without any more of this stuff.

The Chair: Your comments will be noted.

UNITED CHURCH OF CANADA

The Chair: The next group is Rev Susan Eagle and Rev Peter Scott. For the research staff, could you say if you are coming as individuals or representatives of the United Church? You have 15 minutes for your presentation. Leave some time at the end if you wish for questions from the three parties. Identify yourself for the purposes of the record.

Mr Stockwell: I take it you are Peter.

Mr Scott: I am Peter Scott. I will start the presentation. We represent today the London Conference Church in Society Committee of the United Church of Canada. Just quickly to explain what that means, the London conference of the United Church covers eight counties in southwestern Ontario plus the district of Algoma. Only God knows why the district of Algoma is connected to the eight counties down here, but anyway, eight counties starting with Essex, going west to Oxford, Perth, Huron, Lambton, etc., that chunk of property.

We are here to present a position based on policy of the United Church of Canada and the policies of the London conference. Those policies are arrived at through a representative democracy similar to the governments of Ontario and Canada. Local congregations elect representatives to presbyteries. Those presbyteries elect representatives to the annual meetings of the conference and the conferences elect representatives to the national body. Those elected representatives formulate the policy for the church.

I want to distribute some copies of policy on economics, both the national policy of the United Church of Canada and the regional policy of the United Church of Canada, one on one side, one on the other, that has been formulated over the last 59 or 60 years and reiterated from time to time. This is not to say that every member of the United Church would agree. As in any democracy, there are those who agree and those who disagree, but in the method that the church has chosen to formulate its policy, these are the policies that have been formulated by that procedure as I have outlined it.

I am not going to read what you have got; I am sure you can do that while I am talking. Being a preacher, I now people read while you talk. I will talk and give you a chance to read the stuff. During those years the United Church has gone on record calling for some of the following things that you will find outlined there: guaranteed annual adequate income, fair pay for a day's work, a just sharing of the country's resources, progressive taxes based on income and wealth rather than on consumption, full employment and job security. That is national policy. It has enunciated that and reiterated it over and over again since 1932.

Locally during the last 10 years meetings in the London conference have voted to support the social assistance rate being brought up to at least the poverty line and increases in the minimum wage so that those working at least make as much money as designated by the poverty line.

Ms Eagle: We make our presentation to you today with two very clear perspectives. One, that this is a tough economic time, that tough decisions have to be made economically; and second, that Canada and Ontario are a resource-rich land with much more than enough wealth to provide an adequate income and lifestyle for all its citizens.

First, the economic reality: We acknowledge that the provincial government has a very difficult task in making budget decisions. Much of the present economic problem is a result of the current recession, cutbacks in federal transfer payments and the very unwise federal decision to give a further blow to the Canadian economy through the free trade policy and the GST. These problems have not been caused by the provincial government, so we sympathize with the provincial government in the decisions that it has to make.

On the other hand, we recognize that this is a country with resources and opportunities. As a church, our spiritual vision offers us the hope of a future with full employment, community-based economic development, adequate and secure incomes and shared benefit of resources that are protected and renewed, not squandered and exploited. Therefore, as a United Church delegation, we applaud and encourage those budget initiatives that are the means to support that vision.

Mr Scott: We affirm the philosophy underlying the provincial budget, at least I will quote a part of it that we want to affirm anyway, where it says on page 86: "The central goal of the Ontario government's economic strategy is sustainable prosperity.... A prosperous society must provide high levels of employment in well-paying, high quality jobs. Prosperity must be environmentally as well as economically sustainable. It must also be socially sustainable, which requires that the costs and benefits of economic change be shared fairly."

We affirm that. We affirm the budget's wage protection fund in this light and the increased spending for retraining and literacy programs, the funds directed to interest relief for farmers and the settling of land claims for aboriginal peoples. As the United Church, we support the additional initiatives of 10,000 new non-profit and co-op housing units and the additional funding for social assistance reform. We support the decision to increase the deficit rather than cut social programs during times of extreme economic hardship in the province. We do not see the advantage of making things worse.

Ms Eagle: We have said the things that we want to affirm, but there are a few other things that we would like to say that are concerns. As a national United Church, we are on record as supporting economic policies which place the needs for employment and wellbeing of people and sustainability of communities ahead of the free movement of capital. We therefore call on the provincial government not only to espouse the philosophy but to put in place economic policies which make the eradication of poverty and homelessness priorities in Ontario spending and social programs. I say that from the perspective too of being a community development worker working with families that are on social assistance and knowing that people do not make it to the end of the month on the incomes that they have.

Specifically, to put those policies in place would mean increases in social assistance that would bring rates to at least the poverty line and indexed to the cost of living. We just heard a presentation from a group that talked about some kind of gravy train. I do not know what kind of world they are living in, but there is no gravy train for those who are on social assistance. Social assistance is still way below the poverty line. Increases in social assistance have been to deal with the increased numbers, but they have not increased the number of dollars in people's hands who are on social assistance.

Further increases in minimum wage, fairly and justly recognizing the labour of workers but also addressing the gap that is continuing to grow between the richest and poorest of Canadians and Ontarians.

Another recommendation would be further increases in the provision of not-for-profit and co-op housing to address the real crisis in housing, one that is keeping people on waiting lists for two years at a time while thousands more are engaged in daily battles with cockroaches and landlords, not necessarily in that order.

We also propose a further involvement in job creation programs but through community-based economic initiatives that allow for new models of ownership and control including private, government, joint venture, employee and community owned.

And another recommendation that we make is a twinning of social policy and economic planning through cabinet committees, interministerial initiatives and with the inclusion of community people in that decision-making.

I want to say a word about revenue because I am sure someone is going to say, "Well, if we are going to do all that, where is the money going to come from?" Certainly, it should come from the rich, especially the ones that are getting richer all the time. We affirm the tax changes that have been made in the budget. The raising of taxes for those with incomes over $84,000, the dropping of taxes for those with the lowest incomes. We affirm the initiative the government has taken in setting up a tax reform commission, but we remind the government that the United Church, for many years, has been on record supporting progressivity of taxes based on income and wealth, rather than on consumption, so we would not support further increases in sales tax. We support the elimination of tax avoidance, the placing of a greater share of the tax load on corporations, and since 1982, our regional United Church conference has supported a policy of an excess profits tax on banks.

These are the matters we wish to bring to the committee. The two of us are here also as people who represent not only the United Church but those who personally work with those who are hurting, those who are struggling. We through the church, have been pushing for increases in food banks, but knowing that is only a Band-Aid, that at some point somebody has to bite the bullet and take seriously the plight of the thousands of people in this province who are going down the tube.

We are a resource-rich country. We have the means to provide that kind of lifestyle for people, if we decide it is political priority.

Mr Sutherland: It is a pleasure to see both of you here. I know both of you have been very active in the community in dealing with housing issues, poverty issues.

You were here for the previous presentation. They indicated that we should have balanced the budget. Could you give us what you think the impact would have been with the people you deal with on a daily basis if we had a balanced budget as the presentation had asked for.

Ms Eagle: Genocide. You would simply have people dying. I mean, you have people now who cannot feed their children at the end of the month. And also, if you do not provide the kind of income that people need in the first place to feed their children, then down the road you are paying huge increases in health costs, and all kinds of other costs to make up for the damage you have caused. There is no way to make up for the damage done to children who cannot eat, and I see them daily. They are not a figment of the imagination at all.

Mr Phillips: Back on the revenue side, what worries some people is the country: The federal government is bankrupt; like it or not, it is bankrupt. And there are some who worry that even to sustain our current level of services may be difficult unless we get economic activity going. I know it is fashionable to say, "Tax the corporations." But if you double the corporation taxes, take twice as much from them, it is still only, perhaps, $3 billion. Double the taxes and I am not sure that many corporations are left here. No one disputes the immense needs out there, but is the United Church at all concerned, perhaps, about the fundamental economic future of the country, and any recommendations you would have for us if you are concerned? If you are not, fine.

Mr Scott: Of course we are concerned about the economic future of the country. But economics is not separate from the human future of the country and the environmental future of the country, and we think that those things all have to be connected and worked on together.

Mr Phillips: Of course.

Mr Scott: And what we hope, what we pray for as a church, is that we do not lose the vision that we think this country once had of a place where we care for people—not just poor people, all people; and that business and industry and everybody would share that vision and work toward that same goal. We are not discounting business or the needs of business. We want those people to be treated like people and have them treat everybody else like people.

Mr Stockwell: It is hard to know where to begin, actually. How can you suggest to me—for social development and economic fairness or vision, I forget the words you used—that you would increase the tax on corporations do feel they are being overtaxed right now? Create a tax that if you make too much money and become too efficient, you get taxed? Do you think, maybe, you are taking the incentive out of the economic, the free-market system to do business here?

Ms Eagle: No, not at all. I think if you look at some of the material that is being produced by the Fair Tax Commission, you will find they have well documented the fact that it does not take incentive away from business to be taxed. Neil Brooks has prepared numerous papers looking just exactly that. To suggest that corporations are being unfairly taxed is not realistic.

We have a growing gap in this country between rich and poor. That also has been well documented. Those of us who have been out on the street for a number of years have seen it, but now the economists are documenting it. In the last 10 years Canada added eight more billionaires. We have one of the highest billionaires per capita rate of any western country. There is something very, very wrong with people who have affluence crying, when there is none to go around for those who cannot eat at the end of the month. Personally, I am getting awfully tired of being told that rich corporations cannot afford to share the wealth that they have unfairly taken from the rest of the members of this country.

Mr Stockwell: I guess I am personally getting offended by people suggesting that people who make money have unfairly taken it.

Ms Eagle: They have.

Mr Stockwell: That is bogus in my opinion and an argument that does not even deserve comment. Not being realistic? I think you are the one that is choosing not to be realistic. The next question—

The Chair: No, there is only one question there. I am sorry that the time has run out.

Mr Stockwell: Unfairly taken! What a bunch of bunk.

The Chair: We appreciate your presentation to this committee.

Mr Stockwell: It is like they stole it.

N'AMERIND (LONDON) FRIENDSHIP CENTRE

The Chair: The last group for this morning's session will be the N'Amerind (London) Friendship Centre. For the purposes of Hansard, please identify yourself. You will have 15 minutes for your presentation. Try to save some time at the end, if you wish, to have the committee ask questions.

Mr Dockstader: My name is Thomas Dockstader. I am the executive director of the N'Amerind Friendship Centre, the North American Indian friendship centre, in London. We are one of 24 native friendship centres throughout the province of Ontario and we belong to what is called the Ontario Federation of Indian Friendship Centres.

We are the largest native service agency in the city of London, meeting the needs of native people in the areas of community liaison, community development, day care, children's programs, criminal court work, family court work, and starting this fall, our own secondary school.

We support, and in most cases we assisted the startup of, all six of the following native agencies: Atenlos Native Women's Anti-abuse Centre; No Kee Kwe Occupational Skills Development Inc.; Native Inter Tribal Housing Co-operative; First Nations Housing Co-operative; and two native women's organizations in London.

We have a complement of 20 full-time staff members. With our summer youth employment programs, we employ up to 15 part-time staff members. Our core staff, the administrative arm of N'Amerind, employs six staff members, with funding coming from the Secretary of State of the federal government. Our program staff receive funding from two primary ministries of the Ontario government: the Ministry of Community and Social Services and the Ministry of the Attorney General.

For our newly-created secondary school, we are in a partnership agreement with the Ontario Federation of Indian Friendship Centres, the Ontario Ministry of Education, and the Board of Education City of London, under the direction of the secondary school pilot project of the Ministry of Education and the Ontario Federation of Indian Friendship Centres. Funding for the school has come from the London board of education and our own funding from the N'Amerind Friendship Centre, with a small grant from the native community branch of the Ministry of Citizenship, and that again comes through the Ontario Federation of Indian Friendship Centres.

N'Amerind is directly accountable to the entire London native community, which sanctions all programs and services annually with the election of a 12-person board of directors. Our annual operating budget is just under $1 million a year.

We are here today to speak in support of the London native community, which has a total population of approximately 7,000 native people. While many of us have citizenship in the eight first nations of southwestern Ontario, we are also comprised of Metis people and citizens of many other first nations, Inuit people, and what you call the non-status native people.

At N'Amerind we make no distinction among native people, except to state that we will serve all native people in London regardless of any government designations. Our people will eventually choose for themselves how they wish to be represented politically. That is for them to decide. The delivery of services is what our people expect of us at N'Amerind. All of our programs and services started because our people wanted and needed these programs and services. When other agencies became necessary, our people expected N'Amerind to help and assist in whatever way we could to create those agencies.

We have been in existence for 16 years. Today we are still in the process of creating new entities to serve our people. We at N'Amerind applaud the government of Ontario's continued and increased support for our people who have their homes in the city of London. We must implore you, though, to share more of the revenues which derive from our shared inhabitation of the land you call Ontario.

We are pleased about our shared experience called the Sweetgrass Secondary School, but N'Amerind had to borrow money to pay for the portable schoolroom which will shortly house 25 native students. To date, the Ministry of Education has contributed quite a bit of free advice, but no capital dollars and no operating dollars. We do not wish to dwell on the negative, but how does anyone say positively that native students attending schools in the London city schools have a dropout rate of 80%? We believe that Sweetgrass Secondary School will achieve better results. But it also takes dollars to build and operate a school.

We anticipate that with the purchase of the building, which we have done, plus the site plan preparation, which the city has imposed on us, we will require $150,000 in capital. We will need at least two native education support counsellors, plus operational support, totalling $200,000 annually.

The Ministry of Education simply has to do better. Before N'Amerind and our two sister friendship centres in Sudbury and Fort Erie even got consideration for funding for our secondary schools, the Ministry of Education committed over $500,000 of the $1 million in the demonstration pilot project fund to first nation territories.

We have no quarrel with first nation territories. We have a problem with designating your favourite Indians.

Let N'Amerind be clear here. We want Ontario to stop making the mistake of ignoring the needs of urban native people who, by the way, make up over one half of the total native population in Ontario.

In London alone, the aboriginal population is more than the combined population of all eight southwestern Ontario first nations. We must not be overlooked in the grand scheme of the Ontario government's statement of political relationship with first nations.

Likewise, our people are suffering from the lack of opportunity, and are in need of healing from their own people. So while the Canadian government discontinued our drug and alcohol abuse counselling unit, the government of Ontario has to consider what it costs to house and feed a native man or woman in its prisons, compared to funding N'Amerind and other friendship centres to help prevent our own people from sinking into despair that ultimately puts them in your costly and non-rehabilitative jails. Our drug and alcohol program would cost $90,000 annually and we pledge to serve our people and your people equitably and justly.

Finally, we have a joint proposal for consideration for your government from N'Amerind and Atenlos, the native women's anti-abuse agency. We propose to operate a native inmate liaison program totalling $129,000, to help our native brothers and sisters who are incarcerated have hope for the future so that we can save you some space and money by reducing the native population in your jails, which our people now inhabit to the point of over 50% of your jails' population. We can help our own people with trained native professionals in all fields, from administration and management to counselling to education to court workers and more.

If you are committed, as you say you are, to aboriginal peoples' right to self-determination, you can share the revenues which you reap from the resources which we share with you and dedicate those revenues to funding the efforts of native social agencies such as N'Amerind.

On behalf of N'Amerind Friendship Centre, we wish you the wisdom which the creator gave all of us to see some value in what we have shared with you.

Mr Kwinter: I just wanted a clarification. On the bottom of page 5, you say that the native population makes up over 50% of the total jail population. Is that accurate?

Mr Dockstader: Yes, it is.

Mr Kwinter: That is throughout Ontario?

Mr Dockstader: Yes. I believe 52% is actually what the stats point out. Your own government did a survey and looked at the population.

Mrs Cunningham: Thank you for your brief. It was most informative. You have updated me considerably as to the centre and what you are doing. Maybe it is off topic but I am wondering how successful your Sweetgrass pre-school program has been—the day care centre.

Mr Dockstader: We now have space for 32 kids. What separates it from other day cares is its unique resource centre where the kids are taught their traditions. This is integrated into the system so that, in addition to them having their basic needs taken care of, they are also reinforcing their identity. Currently, Ojibway and Oneida are taught to them.

Mrs Cunningham: How many children are in there now?

Mr Dockstader: There are 19 right now.

Mr Winner: You heard perhaps the chamber of commerce here earlier suggesting that we can wipe out spending, we can wipe out the deficit, we can wipe out the $48.5 million that we have allowed in the budget for settling land claims, for negotiating self-government and improving the quality of life for our reserve and off-reserve urban people.

I am just wondering, in terms of a statement of political relationship, what good that is if you do not get some kind of social and financial support to build your economic infrastructure for improving the quality of life of native people. Where would you be in terms of our recognition of your sovereignty and building up a state of independence if we were to wipe all that spending out?

Mr Dockstader: We have been suffering that from the federal government also which argues the same basic thing. "Well, we can do all these wonderful things," but the bottom line is that when socioeconomics are affected, it affects our people first.

Whenever it comes time to talk about sovereignty, self-determination and self-government, our people are talked to last. In this particular case, it was very courageous on the part of the Ontario government to take the stand which it basically did, which was to support our people in the times when you also have that $9.3-billion deficit. That indicates to us there is some hope for our people in that we are mentioned first and foremost among top priority in the Ontario province at a time when it is not in your best interests to do that. It is probably relatively unprecedented and we are pleased with that initial effort.

However, there is obviously a long way to go because we need the support not only of government, we also need the support of industry, we need the support of chambers commerce, to understand that our people are so far down on the socioeconomic scale that we have kids in this city of London living in the sewers. If you talk to me about our socioeconomics and how that is eventually going to lead to a wonderful re-emergence of business, more jobs and things like that, I will tell you that in good times and in bad times, we are still at the bottom and we need help. We need all the help we can get.

The Chair: Thank you for appearing before the committee. This committee will recess until 1 o'clock.

The committee recessed at 1203.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1305.

UNITED ELECTRICAL, RADIO AND MACHINE
WORKERS OF CANADA

The Chair: We would like to call on the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of Canada to come forward. You have one half-hour. Try to leave a few minutes at the end for each party to ask questions on your brief. If you would identify yourself for Hansard, then you can begin.

Mr Barry: I am Dick Barry, national president of the electrical workers union. Grigg Snyder is chief steward at the ABB plant here in London. Jim McCurdy is president of the local here in London at the ABB plant and a member of our national executive board. We represent the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of Canada.

We are a national Canadian union of some 12,000 members, most of whom live in southern Ontario, but with membership in Quebec and Alberta as well. UE represents workers in the electrical and electronic industries as well as a broad range of other manufacturing segments. Our members produce products ranging from small and major appliances to heavy electrical industrial equipment, small to heavy electrical power equipment right from switches to large motors, turbines and power transformers.

In fact, our membership here in London at ABB produces a range of electrical power transformers and capacitors for industry and Ontario Hydro. We also represent workers producing electrical wire, communication equipment, air conditioning, foam and plastic products, as well as steel products from auto parts and drive shafts right up to the largest diameter pipe for the oil and gas industry.

The Ontario government had a choice in the last budget. The options were clear: to back the monetarist, anti-working people policies of the federal government or to provide some relief from those policies. We believe the government has made the right choice: to fight this made-in-Canada recession and provide some small measure of protection for the workers who are the victims of both this cyclical downturn in the economy and the federal government's disastrous economic policies.

We think this budget, and in particular the deficit, must be seen in the context of the current economic situation. This recession is undoubtedly the worst to hit the province since the Depression of the 1930s. Job losses in the province have totalled 214,000 in the first year, two and a half times the number of jobs lost in the first year of the 1981-82 recession. Ontario's rate of job loss has been over twice that of the national average. In fact, Ontario job losses account for 80% of the national job losses.

Unlike previous recessions, this time the majority of the job losses are permanent and due to the decisions of United States corporations to partially or completely close down their operations here on a permanent basis. The manufacturing sector has been particularly hard hit.

This comes as no surprise to us, since we, along with the rest of the labour movement and our allies, predicted that the free trade agreement would have that effect. In the absence of tariff barriers and faced with an over-valued Canadian dollar, the head offices of many transnational have reduced or eliminated their Canadian operations. They have relocated their production closest to their largest market or in places such as the Sunbelt or Mexico where they can profit from subsistence wages.

These pullouts have had predictable effects on many domestic small and medium-sized businesses. Business bankruptcies during the first five months of 1991 were up 116% compared to the same time in 1988, prior to free trade.

At the same time as they have created the conditions for massive job losses, the Tories have also cut back on transfer payments to the provinces. This year alone, the capping of transfer payments will cost Ontario $1.6 billion in direct revenue lost. As well, they have cut back the UI program so that many more people must resort to social welfare much sooner, after being laid off work, than before. The net effect increases the burden of social spending borne by the provincial government precisely at the time when provincial tax revenues are dropping due to the unemployment creation policies of the federal government.

The electrical products industries, in which most UE members work, have been particularly affected by the recession and the combination of economic policies imposed by the federal government. According to Statistics Canada figures, since June 1989 employment in Ontario's electrical products industries has dropped from about 81,600 people to 61,300, a drop of about 25%.

Due to the high value for weight, the small appliances segment is particularly vulnerable to free trade, since transportation costs do not significantly inhibit relocation of production. The figures above bear out this explanation. Similarly it is no coincidence that our wire and cable segment is not suffering as much, since wire is relatively heavy for its value; therefore, transportation costs significantly inhibit companies from taking full advantage of their liberties under the free trade agreement.

The job losses in the major appliance sector are due primarily to the high-interest-rate, monetarist policy of the Tories. About 40% of the market for new major appliances is tied to housing starts, which are highly sensitive to interest rates. Replacement of existing appliances accounts for the other 60%, and there too families hesitate to borrow the money needed to replace worn-out refrigerators and stoves when interest rates have been so high.

As well, imports as a percentage of the Canadian market have nearly doubled in the last two decades. The federal Ministry of Industry, Science and Technology estimated prior to the FTA that due to the shorter production runs in Canada, a tariff of 12.5% would be necessary to allow the Canadian industry to survive. With the lifting of the tariffs, job losses have occurred as predicted. On the other hand, the electrical industrial equipment segment has suffered somewhat, but not to the same degree, due to the relative stability of its major customer, Ontario Hydro.

We can see a definite pattern of job losses clearly related to the free trade agreement and to the monetarist policies of the Tories.

The recent job losses forced on working people in this province by the Tories must be put in the context of the previous massive job losses during the 1980s, stemming from corporate restructuring in the two companies then dominant in the electrical industry in Canada; that is, General Electric and Westinghouse. GE, for example, employed some 19,767 Canadians in 1979, the year its strategic plan was adopted. By 1986 this number had fallen to 11,480 and the most recent figure available is 9,911 for December 1990.

GE was not alone in reducing its workforce in Canada. Robertshaw, Sunbeam, Westinghouse and Fedders are but a few of the companies which have taken advantage of the unfettered access to the Canadian market granted them under the FTA to move their production to such places as Kentucky, Tennessee, the Mexican Maquiladora and Haiti.

It is in this context that UE looks at the budget of the new Democratic government of Ontario. We are pleased to say the budget does maintain a minimum level of social spending and provides some modest level of stimulus to the economy. We do not think the deficit is excessive, even the economic situation and Ontario's long-term economic potential. In fact, the deficit is low, relative to the share of spending, share of GDP and on a per capita basis, compared to other recent budgets of Conservative governments.

As a share of spending, Ontario's deficit is 18.6%, compared with 31.9% for the Alberta 1987 budget, 30.5% for the Saskatchewan 1986 budget and 20.2% for the federal 1991 budget. As a share of GDP, again, Ontario's deficit, 3.4%, is lower than Alberta's was in 1987, which was 9%, or Saskatchewan's in 1986 at 7% or the last federal budget at 4.5%.

On a per capita basis, it is substantially lower than the previously cited examples of budgets in those Tory jurisdictions.

In effect, only about $640 million of the current projected deficit is a result of increased spending. The rest results from a combination of decreased tax revenue, both personal and corporate, and increased social welfare and health costs related to the recession.

Obviously, the provincial government cannot alter the decline in its tax revenues from personal or corporate income taxes without imposing major new taxation, something we feel would be counterproductive during a recession. Therefore, those who decry the budget deficit are essentially calling on the government to cut back on social spending.

To these corporate midwives of misery, we say, "Where would you cut?" Social welfare spending, which at its current levels only barely succeeds in protecting those most vulnerable from starvation or homelessness, and sometimes not even that? Or would you hack away at health care, thereby further eroding the quality of health services available in the province? Or would you have us fall further into education?

I know the corporate sector, in particular the corporate leaders who sit on the boards of governors of such universities as Queen's and Western, has been pressuring the government for some years now to increase university tuition, perhaps even create a two-tier university system similar to the US. Of course, they always add that supplemental student aid will be provided to "those in need." No doubt secondary education would be next on their list of targets.

We hope the government will continue to resist those suggestions and keep post-secondary education both accessible and affordable. It is important to working people and their children that a clear message be sent that post-secondary education is not only for the wealthy, and maybe a few token members of the deserving poor, but for anyone who has the desire for such education and the ability to participate in it. We support the Ontario Federation of Labour call for the government to eliminate tuition fees and to provide grants for necessary living expenses so that students do not graduate burdened by debt.

We are also pleased to see that the government has allocated some money for social assistance reform, which is urgently needed. Given the federal cuts to UI, more and more of our members have been forced on to the welfare rolls. Although the amounts allocated for reform are not huge, we know they are significantly more than what would have been allocated under either a Tory or Liberal government faced with the same situation.

UE members are also pleased to see the increased allocations for shelter beds and services for battered women and victims of sexual assault.

The allocations for pay equity in the public sector are also a welcome indication that the government is proceeding on its promises of equality for women. We hope the government will ensure that the private sector proceeds with pay equity promptly.

As well, the government's decision not to cut back public service jobs and salaries sets an example to the private sector. It is a welcome indication of the NDP government's commitment to the working people of this province that it resisted the urgings of the corporate sector and their poodles in Ottawa and refused to dump the burden of the recession on to the backs of workers.

Our members are particularly pleased by the government's allocation of $700 million for an anti-recession program. The construction of roads and upgrading of public buildings will generate jobs in the electrical products industry.

We are also pleased to see the $48-million allocation for the Let's Move rapid transit program for the greater Toronto area. We anticipate this will improve the demand for electrical equipment, both directly as inputs to new vehicles and transit facilities and in the construction and manufacturing processes.

The $57-million manufacturing recovery program for small and medium-sized firms will also have a welcome impact on jobs in the electrical products industries, since many of the surviving Canadian-owned firms are small businesses.

Of particular significance to our members was the announcement of the 10,000 new non-profit housing units. Although by and large UE members do not live in non-profit housing, we expect this housing creation activity to bolster the demand for the products our members make—motors, generators, electrical appliances, etc.

We would like to see the government maximize the job creation impact of its spending on housing by establishing a strong Canadian procurement policy for the electrical appliances, fixtures and wiring which goes into housing, as well as the machinery used to construct it. If the government stipulated that the appliances had to be energy-efficient, that would likely stimulate some specialization in that production at the Camco plant in Hamilton, as an example. This would also help position that plant to meet the anticipated increase in demand for energy-efficient appliances in the North American market as various jurisdictions take tougher energy conservation measures.

If the government is serious about promoting this type of industry, it should announce such a procurement policy as soon as possible, since the non-profit housing construction plans will have to take into account the fact that energy-efficient appliances—for example, refrigerators—require a differently shaped opening in the kitchen.

We are pleased to hear the Treasurer announce that health care and education spending would be maintained. In the health care sector, similar to the housing sector, we think the government should maximize the job creation potential of its own spending by having a strong procurement policy regarding medical devices. Both Quebec and the Maritimes have more aggressive programs to support the medical devices industries than does Ontario.

There is a total Canadian market of at least $2.5 billion, according to 1989-90 figures, in the medical devices sector, of which at least $1 billion is located here in Ontario. On average, 80% of this is spent on imported medical devices and equipment, and of that 70% is from the United States. That is a large chunk of money being spent which creates jobs in the US that we urgently need here.

Even if Ontario medical devices industries were to meet only the Ontario domestic market—that is, not producing for other provinces or export—we would stand to gain about 7,000 totally new manufacturing jobs as a result of such a procurement policy in Ontario. As well, other significant indirect job creation spinoffs from this expansion could be expected.

We have the skilled workers, many of whom are now unemployed. We have most of the necessary raw resources. We have the market base of a well-funded public health care system which is responsive to government decisions. We can expect an expanding market for medical devices due to the following factors: the aging population, the AIDS crisis and the trend to alternative site/home care. Why not make the effort to get the medical devices industries off the ground here in Ontario?

We think the steps involved would include the following:

1. Establishing a centralized purchasing system for medical devices for all hospitals and other public health facilities. Many Ontario hospitals have a Canadian procurement policy, but are unable to identify Canadian-made goods. They get no assistance in that effort by the American distribution companies which have a stranglehold on the Canadian hospital purchasing process, since those same

American distribution companies are also competing producers of medical devices.

2. Establishing a rebate system, with a 10% to 15% year-end rebate to hospitals on medical devices produced here in Ontario. A 10% to 15% rebate provides a cushion sufficient to offset some of the economies of scale enjoyed by US manufacturers without making inefficient production too attractive.

3. Providing support and incentives to import substitution industries, both private and public sector.

4. Supporting research and development in this strategic area.

5. Insisting that any corporation which wishes to sell to Ontario publicly funded hospitals must locate a certain amount of production and R&D in Ontario.

Some may say such a procurement policy would contravene the FTA. However, currently Canada only exports to the US about $100 million in medical devices, whereas our imports of such from it total at least $851 million perhaps as much as $1.5 billion. Therefore, even assuming a negative US reaction, we have more jobs to gain than lose by going this route and challenging the FTA.

The government should also establish a task force with participation from labour and the public health care sector, Ontario medical devices manufacturers and health care research academics, to come up with a plan to get this sector off the ground.

It makes sense for the Ontario government to make every effort to ensure maximum job creation spinoffs in the province for the large sums of public money spent on public health care in Ontario.

We are pleased to see the government increase its allocation for various energy conservation and environmental protection programs, including the municipal 3Rs program: reuse, reduce and recycle. We hope the government will take a number of measures to encourage the expansion of the environmental protection equipment industry in Ontario. Aside from the obvious benefits to the environment, which are important to UE members and indeed every trade unionist in this province, such an expansion of this industry would also create new jobs, many of them skilled and potentially well-paying ones.

Having strict environmental standards is one way to encourage such industries to develop, since strict standards generate a need for various types of equipment and devices. The stricter Ontario standards are, the more likely it is that some Ontario manufacturer will identify a need for the product and produce that here. This will give Ontario manufacturers the edge in these products as other provinces and the US states enact tougher environmental standards.

The government should also provide supports and incentives to those industries. If necessary, the government should expand the mandate of Ontario Hydro to include production of energy conservation products if the private sector does not meet the challenge enthusiastically enough. Ontario should not forego the opportunity to have the jobs associated with the production of environmental protection devices and equipment merely because a domestic private sector manufacturer may not emerge to take on that role, perhaps due to lower profit margins than they have become accustomed to.

gain, this is an area where concerted, swift action on the part of the government may both help us clean up the environment and create new, stable, socially useful jobs for artisans.

We also know that pressure is being exerted on a daily basis to force Ontario Hydro to drop its Canadian procurement policy. We want to take this opportunity to urge the government to remain firm. Ontario Hydro's procurement policy has been one of the stabilizing factors in maintaining what little remains of our electrical products industry. Although the on-site construction requirements of hydro generation facilities ensure that some production will always take place here, it is important that the government guarantee that the pre-manufactured inputs and parts used at Ontario Hydro facilities will also be produced here as much as possible. Most US utilities have similar procurement policies, which assist in the creation of vibrant electrical industrial equipment industries there.

In conclusion, no provincial government has the tools to totally neutralize the impact of the disastrous economic policies of the federal Tories on the working people in its jurisdiction. However, the Ontario government has at least taken a step in utilizing those powers it does have in a way which benefits the general population. It is a welcome indication of the government's understanding of the battering which working people of this province have been through in the last several years.

We look forward to the greater participation of working people in the government's decision-making process and to the kind of creative and committed government actions and budgets that will provide for greater economic democracy in the province. On behalf of my two brothers and our membership, I thank you.

Mrs Cunningham: We had a little bit of a talk before the lunch break. I would like to thank you for some of the constructive ideas you have put into your brief, especially with regard to the medical devices industry. I share your view on that. I am wondering if you can give us some more insight into perhaps some other areas where we can be more competitive with regard to your industry, given that you seem to know a lot about projecting the future here.

Mr Barry: As an example, we have put in the issue of procurement policies for Ontario Hydro. The facts are that Quebec has had a procurement policy in that province for a number of years, which has caused many of the electrical manufacturers to locate there in order to sell to the province of Quebec.

Mrs Cunningham: Could you give us an example of what you mean by the Quebec one?

Mr Barry: Turbines and generators. All the major manufacturers in the electrical industry have plants in Quebec. Whether it is Westinghouse, General Electric, Asea Brown Boveri, all of them are located there. As well, they have remnants of those plants here in Ontario. General Electric, as an example, used to employ some 5,000 people just in the Peterborough plant alone. They are now down to something like 2,000 people in total, including all their salaried staff. That is in the last 10 years. Westinghouse in Hamilton, which produced a wide range of products, had some 5,600 hourly rated employees. They are now down to 620.

Many of those products have simply disappeared or they have sold off chunks of their production to other companies, such as selling off all their power transformer businesses to Asea Brown Boveri. The electrical industry restructured prior to the free trade agreement. In preparation for it, General Electric, Westinghouse and others divvied up the market and decided who would produce which products and that they would not compete head to head, and they do not. Even though Westinghouse still has a motor company and General Electric has a motor company, they do not produce the same types of motors in competition with one another.

Mr Sutherland: Thank you, Mr Barry, for coming here. I was particularly intrigued by some of your suggestions in terms of medical devices, the Canadian procurement policy and how that would have an impact. It would certainly have an impact, I would say, on the community of London here in terms of the fine medical facilities we have here. It would seem to be a logical spot for putting them.

I want to get into the competition area, because I sat on the agencies, boards and commissions committee, which deals with public appointments. The president of General Electric talked about the difference between plants here and plants in Mexico, the two plants General Electric has. He cited the example of how they had difficulties getting the plant going in Mexico. If there was a dishwasher line, they could send the dishwasher down and make the same one time after time, but he said that here and in the plant they have in Montreal he could send eight different models down, one right after the other, and it still could be done. I was wondering if you could comment in terms of your membership as to where you see industry going related to that, in terms of maintaining jobs for your membership, retaining jobs in the electrical parts industry.

Mr Barry: As far as the appliance industry is concerned—that is what you are alluding to with General Electric; it is the Camco plant we are talking about—General Electric produces refrigerators in Hamilton and Stokes. They used to produce similar products here in London and they went out of that business. They concentrated their dishwashers and their laundry equipment in the Montreal plant.

You are quite correct. Jobs that are routine and can be done easily without training the Mexican workers will go to Mexico or they will go to the United States. That is exactly what the free trade agreement has allowed those companies to do. That is why those plants are established there now.

I am not putting the Mexican worker down. I think we also have to also elevate their standard of living. What we are concerned about is dragging our standard of living down to their level without at the same time increasing their standard of living. As those Mexican workers are trained, more and more of those products, even the eight production lines you are talking about, will be facilitated from Mexico, transmitted to the United States and then imported here into Canada. That will obviously have a negative impact on the jobs of our members.

Mrs Sullivan: I am interested in the comments you made in your presentation relating to environmental protection equipment. Clearly there is a sense that green can be gold and that there are real opportunities for the manufacturing of pollution control equipment and other devices.

One of the things that is problematical, however, is that the government in this budget has cancelled the Ontario current cost adjustment, which provided an incentive for the installation of pollution equipment devices, and has changed the way it approaches environmental legislation so that companies are highly reluctant to invest in the capital equipment required to make advances in the area. I wonder how you respond to those problems which have been created by the government, rather than moving forward in a way that could solve the problems.

Mr Barry: We are not suggesting the government has not done some things we are not in agreement with—far from it—but what we are saying is that we think the government should be encouraged to provide incentives to Canadian-based industry, and particularly Ontario-based industry, to facilitate production and to enable those companies to grow jobs here in Ontario.

As an example, a few years back under a Tory government when we were talking about a hydro line crossing Lake Erie, we intervened because at that point in time we were talking about exporting Ontario hydro across to the United States. At the present moment we are a net importer of hydro into Ontario. We get some from Michigan and we get some from the west as well, but overall we are a net importer of hydro. We also have the issue that within the next five-year period we are going to reach the crossover point where our consumption of hydro will outpace our ability to produce it.

Mrs Sullivan: Do you concur with the policy on the abandonment of nuclear?

The Chair: I am sorry, Mrs Sullivan, we have run out of time here. I would like to thank you for coming before this committee and we appreciate your comments.

SEXUAL ASSAULT CENTRE LONDON

The Chair: Charlene Foster, welcome. You have one half-hour for your presentation.

Ms Foster: I do not need one half-hour.

The Chair: If the three parties want to ask you questions up to that period of time, they have the right. Mrs Sullivan is already backed up with questions from the last presenter. Feel at ease and proceed with your presentation.

Ms Foster: I will be brief. On behalf of the Sexual Assault Centre London, I first want to say thank you to the NDP government for recognizing the need and the importance of services for those in our community who have been sexually assaulted. By increasing our funding from $80,000 to $340,000, we are beginning to be able to provide more of the services which are so sorely needed.

We have demonstrated in the past our ability to use funds wisely and to stretch them to amazing limits. Our direct service work has been done totally by trained volunteers, who work on our 24-hour crisis and support line, provide accompaniment to police, hospital or to court and provide in-person support for survivors of sexual assault and sexual abuse.

The most frustrating aspect of the work of our volunteers and other community workers is the dead end they run into when they need to refer clients for long-term counselling or therapy. For clients unable to afford the cost of private counselling, the availability of help is sorely lacking. The waiting lists are 6, 8 or 12 months for groups and even longer for individual counselling.

With our new increase in funding we have been able to hire a full-time counsellor who will facilitate two therapy groups as well as take on a full case load of individual clients. Our counsellor started a month ago. On her first day of work she was faced with a waiting list of over 40 women. She is now completely booked and the waiting list goes on. We will shortly hire a second counsellor, a public education outreach worker and a regional counsellor.

To accommodate our expanding staff and our clients' needs, we have been able to move within the last month to new office space which more accurately reflects the quality of the work we have always done and which finally legitimizes in a tangible way women's pain.

Again, I want to say thank you for recognizing the widespread incidence of sexual assault, sexual abuse and violence against women in general in our society, for recognizing the importance of the work sexual assault centres do and for giving us the opportunity to demonstrate our ability to use funds effectively.

We will be back when budget time comes again. This is only the beginning of the crucial work which needs to be done.

Mr Sutherland: We are very glad to have you here today to point out, as we have had pointed out in just about every community we have been in with these hearings, the great need in terms of providing resources, and how this is only a start on the process and is not going to meet all the needs.

Have you been able to access the current money already? We are finding out that is a bit of a problem. You said there was a waiting list of 40 before you hired the counsellor. Now you have the counsellor and there is still a waiting list. Where is the current waiting list at?

Ms Foster: I think she has only been able to take about 12 full-time, one-on-one clients, plus groups, but it increases every day. Every day we get more phone calls. I cannot say exactly what that waiting list is right now, but that is just our centre.

Mr Sutherland: Are some of those people on the waiting list being referred to other services, or do they all have waiting lists themselves?

Ms Foster: They are on other waiting lists at other places as well. Someone may have to wait only a couple of months to get into our centre; again, someone else may have to wait six. They may be on a waiting list at University Hospital for a year. It is on and on. The thing is that now we have a counsellor and are going to hire another one, we are almost afraid to let it out because we know we are going to be swamped with people saying: "You have counsellor now. We can get in." The waiting list is just going to multiply as soon as people know we have anything at all.

Mrs Sullivan: I just want to clarify, Ms Foster, your opening statement. Did you say your budget has gone from $80,000 to $340,000? What is the source of your funding?

Ms Foster: The Ministry of the Solicitor General.

Mrs Sullivan: Your entire budget comes from Solicitor General? You get nothing from the region, nothing from the municipality?

Ms Foster: We have private donations. We do not get anything from United Way any more. We had some funding from United Way for three years, but we do not at the moment. That is our major funder. We have smaller donations from the community.

Mrs Sullivan: It has moved in proportion from $80,000 to $340,000 in one year.

Ms Foster: Yes.

Mrs Sullivan: What is the difference in your client take?

Ms Foster: This has just started. The calls are increasing on the crisis line over the last year. There was an increase of 59% of the number of calls to the crisis line. We just ran out of the money, so we have hired one full-time person and over the next six weeks we plan to hire two more and gradually increase our staff. So our intake has not increased immediately; it cannot just like that, but over the next year it will as we get more staff to handle more clients.

Mrs Cunningham: To pursue that particular line of questioning, although you have been promised $340,000, you really have not received it.

Ms Foster: We have some of it. We do not have the total $340,000.

Mrs Cunningham: How many staff did you have when you had $80,000 as your budget?

Ms Foster: We had two full-time staff.

Mrs Cunningham: What is your plan on staffing?

Ms Foster: We now have those same two. We have a full-time office administrator and a counsellor. We are hiring another counsellor, a public education outreach person, a education person, and a regional counsellor as well.

Mrs Cunningham: So for $260,000 you are going to hire five people?

Ms Foster: Yes.

Mrs Cunningham: What will the rest of the money be spent on?

Ms Foster: Part of it is being spent on our new location.

Mrs Cunningham: That is what I needed to hear. You are paying rent out of that particular amount of money.

Ms Foster: Yes.

Mrs Cunningham: Are you going to be spending the money basically on counselling, since that is where your waiting list is and where your referrals are going?

Ms Foster: That is where most of the money will go, for services to survivors and for education.

Mrs Cunningham: What do you want me to do as a representative for London as a result of these hearings? What was the point? What are you coming here to tell us?

Ms Foster: To tell you that we appreciate what we have so far, that we will use the funds wisely and that we will need more to keep on with this work, that this is a beginning.

Mrs Cunningham: Do you work with other agencies in the city, like Women's Community House?

Ms Foster: Yes.

Mrs Cunningham: And you will be pooling your resources that way as well?

Ms Foster: Yes. We have referrals.

Mrs Cunningham: I notice we will be hearing from Women's Community House later on today and I think we are hearing from the London Family Court Clinic tomorrow. These are all psychologists. I thought there was another group as well, but anyway, thank you.

Ms Foster: We all work together and refer to each other. There is the London co-ordinating committee on violence against women.

Mrs Cunningham: I am interested in the money from the Solicitor General. You were quite successful. That is not where I would normally send people to get money, but you really did a good job on that one. From our point of view, I guess, and Kimble's and David's, maybe you could send us a copy of your presentation to the Solicitor General so we can help others.

The Chair: Thank you for coming before this committee. We will take a 15-minute recess.

The committee recessed at 1343.

LONDON AND DISTRICT CONSTRUCTION ASSOCIATION

The Chair: The next group we have is the London and District Construction Association. You have one half-hour for your presentation. Try to leave enough time for questions and answers from the three parties. To start off, identify yourselves for Hansard, then you may begin your presentation.

Mr Romanuk: My name is Ken Romanuk. I am president of the London and District Construction Association. I also have a small design and build general construction company.

Mr Dool: My name is Tom Dool. I am the general manager of the London and District Construction Association.

Mr Romanuk: The members of the London and District Construction Association extend to the task force their appreciation for allowing us this opportunity to make our presentation.

We believe something is fundamentally wrong with what is happening in Ontario and needs immediate correction. With regard to the budget, it does nothing to improve the competitive position of Ontario's businesses and only adds to an already bad situation by increasing taxes. Ontario is already the highest-taxed jurisdiction in North America.

It does nothing to help manufacturers of goods to be exported, a shortcoming for which the past Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology, Allan Pilkey, is partly to blame. The construction industry is the largest employer in the province, employing 12% of the workforce, and we could not get a meeting with our minister, Mr Pilkey.

Nothing in the budget improves productivity either inside or outside the public service. The public service did not get better or more efficient; it only got costlier. Less government is essential if we are to be competitive internationally.

Employers and employees, especially those in the construction industry, appear to be left out of the new partnership between business, government and labour.

The NDP government does not understand business and does not realize that Ontario's economy cannot absorb the social agenda Queen's Park has dictated.

The budget does nothing to stem the growing exodus of business out of Ontario and may be the final straw in a brain and talent drain that forces young entrepreneurs out of the province.

A $9.7-billion debt that will grow to $35 billion in four years represents future tax increases of such a magnitude that Ontario will evolve as a welfare state, a stagnant, non-producing environment.

The budget does nothing in terms of building and supporting enterprise, initiative, entrepreneurship and optimism for a stable future.

With respect, there is no hope of a sustainable prosperity through helping those who choose to do less than their best.

Let me attempt to make my point with a story involving my family. My father was a simple man. He worked hard every day and he provided for his family on his own. He believed in an hour's work for an hour's pay; simple. He spent only what he could afford. He did not ask for handouts from the government or anyone else for what he could not afford. My father was a union member and an NDP supporter. He and my mother lived in their own home until he died at age 87.

During his last years he became very confused about how the system rewarded scores of his work companions who had not saved. He saw those able and fit workers living off UIC. He saw people who could work choose to hold out their hand for others to fill. He saw them living in fully funded government seniors' homes.

Several years ago, because my parents were getting on in age, my father inquired about getting into this same old-age home. At the time, he could get in if he sold his home and turned the proceeds over for the government to draw off $100 a day until those proceeds were gone. Then, like the others, he could live off the government. He worked hard. He saved. The others did not. He had to pay. The others did not.

Is this approach a source of sustainable prosperity? The government's dedication to social assistance broke my father's spirit. The NDP's dedication to even greater social assistance is breaking the spirit of business people throughout the province. Why does the NDP strive to reward those who do not contribute? The youth of Ontario is quickly learning what it took my father 85 years to learn: Working hard and saving does not pay. These are sad lessons.

Prosperity begins in personal initiative. It grows in business allowed to profit and thrive and create more jobs and is sustained only if governments do not spend more than they earn so they do not have to tax the very bread out of the system.

Social societies are collapsing around the world. Are we in Ontario too blind to see the fallacy these countries have realized? Please, reward those who work. Reward initiative. Reward the discipline of those who want to save and look after themselves, who choose not to hold out the hand for governments to fill. This province's business people need private enterprise wind in their sails, and the mood has been stilled by the negative initiatives by government. Business is floundering. I hope you see our point.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Romanuk, as the president of the London and District Construction Association, how do you see the immediate future for your industry in this area?

Mr Romanuk: Right now we are probably running—I do not have statistics, but from what we can gather we are probably running between 25% and 30% unemployment.

Mr Dool: We are running at about 30% unemployment at this point. I think the worst part of it, though, is we are running at about 40% capacity. In other words, our companies just do not have any work. There is no investment going on in this area. One of the problems is the recession but the other one is the lack of confidence that has been created in the province. People are not parting with their money to put into business. It is okay to put money into schools, and that is all great and wonderful. It is a stopgap measure, and we appreciated every cent we got, believe me. But when that comes to an end, where is the rest of it? Nothing has been created. There is no spinoff from that kind of investment.

Mr Kwinter: What is your usual lead time between the time you know you are going to be working on a project and the project starts?

Mr Romanuk: I have been in the design-build business and the average when I talk to somebody about building—I built for small businesses—generally was nine months from my initial conversation to when we put a shovel in the ground.

Mr Kwinter: What I am trying to determine is you have about a nine-month lead time, and things are very slow right now. Nothing is going to happen for nine months to a year after it starts, because of that lead time that is required.

Mr Romanuk: Definitely, and I am talking about small businesses. Large business would be much longer.

Mr Kwinter: You do not see any impact from the supposed recovery?

Mr Romanuk: What I see now in my own personal business is that all the small businesses I have talked to have reduced inventories, have reduced people. They have empty space. There is going to be that lag time before they start to hire back the people to fill their factories and inventories to fill up the space they have, before they are going to need new space. We represent generally the commercial industrial building business. Some of our members do work on high-rise buildings and parking garages and what ve you. We look at the work we are losing now in the tal end where projects have been stopped. Items that need rk in the apartment building business have closed down.

Mr Phillips: You have answered that you do no residen-
 l. Do you follow the co-op area at all? Do you know that?

Mr Romanuk: Yes.

Mr Phillips: There is one thing I would just like some nfirmation of. In the budget there is a number that sug-sts that for each 10,000 units of co-op, and I gather the dget predicts they will construct 10,000 a year, there is annual subsidy required by the government of $15,000
 r unit each and every year for 10 or 15 or 20 years.

Interjection: It is 35.

Mr Phillips: Is that right?

Mr Romanuk: On the geared-to-income housing, as I derstand it, on an interest rate that may be 12%, the vernment will subsidize that 12% down to 2%. So in fect everybody is picking up that 10%, plus there is the bsidy for the geared-to-income. I think there are people
 t there who do go out and work every day and work rd, but for whatever reason—they had to leave school rly to support their family. Who knows why? They ould be helped. I think we should help people, but I ink we are going overboard.

10

Mr Dool: In the budget I think there was a $1.3 billion using budget. This was an expenditure designed to enurage housing, to increase the housing market and create bs and so on. But our calculations are very close to yours that the $1.3 billion is going to create a $150-million bill ery year that you are going to have to pay in taxes. That what we find offensive. You have eliminated the private using sector, which would not cost me or you or Joe nth down the street a darned cent in taxes, because he is perating on a marketplace basis. He is going to charge hat he can get. Yet the government in its wisdom has ow taken over the whole housing market. We have co-op using coming out the kazoo, but we are never going to op paying for it. When is it going to stop?

Mr Phillips: I just did not know the numbers. The umbers in your opinion are correct. It is about $150 million year for each 10,000 units and it goes on.

Mr Dool: Yes. Who is going to pay that?

Mr Phillips: This follows up with my colleague. As I ve said to many groups, the comments on the budget are ke forecasting the weather. Some groups say, "Listen, it's problem." Others say, "It's a great budget." We will only ow in about a year. I think the government is assuming the onomy is starting to move, that we can sustain deficits infinitum.

Your organization—you have partially answered this—ould be very close to the ground in terms of sensing an onomic recovery. Are you beginning to see the turnound? Are your clients beginning to talk to you now out building, albeit in a few months?

Mr Romanuk: No. I foresee this winter a lot of the dustry's small firms that made it through last winter inking that as always in spring construction was going to get better—it has not got better. They are still struggling. I see them either closing the door or going bankrupt this fall.

Mr Stockwell: What I find most offensive about this budget—I should not say "most offensive"; one of the most offensive items within the budget, besides the never-ending debt which they take pride in pointing to about fighting the recession and not the deficit, is their glorious projections of growth in this province in the next few years. I think 3.4% was the growth rate; inflation would be about the same. They are up around 7% in growth. Then they came in with a 10% increase in spending per year. What do you think about those kinds of numbers? If they are not achieved, then clearly you either increase the deficit even greater than they have called for or you increase taxes? I would just like to hear your comments on the growth rate that they are speaking about.

Mr Romanuk: I am not an economist by any means.
 Quite frankly I read the paper and see what I have and make my own judgements. Where we are in Ontario, we do have a very good workforce, a very productive workforce, but I cannot see with some of the policies that are being proposed that we are going to have businesses moving here to take advantage of our workforce and our standard of living, and we do have a good standard of living in Ontario.

Today when I picked up the Report on Business in the Globe and Mail, I read through it. I look at our partnership between what they call business, government and labour, and the taxes we are projecting, succession taxes and what have you, and turning over private enterprise to the workers.
 It reminds me of two things.

One, you people are all politicians and I admire you for being that, for doing that. A lot of time you take abuse and you also get a lot of pats on the back. But you are elected as leaders to run the country and the general public. Now owners of businesses run their businesses and they have employees working for them. They are there as the guiding principle of the business and they have employees work for them, similar to the government with the elected people, running it for the people.

What I see the NDP doing is that it is saying that in this partnership it is going to tax the living hell out of the owners, take the money and give it to the workers to operate better than the owners who were there in the first place.
 It reminds me of being in school—it is the first time I thought about this; I have not had time to talk to Tom about it—in one course, I think it was in philosophy, you had to read the book called Animal Farm, and boy, it is there working; right now we are living it.

Mr Stockwell: One quick question: That was a very good analogy. It should be required reading for the government. Why have you in your industry basically opted out of the rental market all together; as brief as you can get.

Mr Romanuk: I am not in that business, but I can see what—

Mr Stockwell: I assume you represent the construction association or the people who are in that business. Why has everyone opted out?

Mr Dool: Because you cannot make any money.

Mr Romanuk: If you cannot make a return on your investment and if buildings need repair and you have to repair them and you have to get your money back—if you put money out, you want to get something back for it and you are just not getting anything back.

Mr Stockwell: And co-operatives have filled that void, I assume.

Mr Romanuk: I do not think so. We are talking about high-rise buildings.

Mrs Cunningham: I would like to ask a question with regard to the future. I am hoping something is going to happen. I do not know what it is. With regard to apprenticeship training in your industry, is there anything happening? Can people find placements? I have just come back from British Columbia where they have engaged in a very progressive program, totally changing their delivery system of education. I am wondering what you think here, what is happening.

Mr Romanuk: I will turn this over to Tom, because we have been working on this.

Mr Dool: They are in the process now of changing that delivery system in Ontario also, coming up with some very far-reaching and noble ideas based on the British Columbia system. The fact of the matter is, though, in relation to apprenticeship, the two programs they have introduced into the secondary system are all great and wonderful and will work in busy times where there are placement areas for those students to go to. Today there are no placement areas. I happen to be chairman of the local apprenticeship committee and I have 20 kids on my list. We refuse to take any more because we cannot give them any kind of reassurance that they will get to work. There are 20 kids on that list who have been on it for eight months and will continue to be on it for at least another six.

What the future holds in terms of apprenticeship for the majority of people in construction is they are now facing the employment equity program that you are bringing down. We will find that of the 20 people who applied, 18 will drop out because they cannot get an apprenticeship.

Mrs Cunningham: Which has been the pattern for about the last decade in Ontario.

Mr Dool: Fairly.

Mrs Cunningham: You talk about a vision. You should know the Toronto-Central Ontario Building and Construction Trades Council made a presentation to this committee. They were also talking about co-operative housing and the kind of incentives, but I should underline that it also said, "There is a very important role for the private housing market and the question of affordability is an issue that has to be addressed by this government and by the private housing sector."

They went on in section 7 of their brief—you can have my copy if you want to see what your colleagues are saying. Their title was, "NDP Budget Good For Construction Workers." I said I came from London, Ontario, and I did not expect that was what I would hear, so you have not disappointed me. I am glad there are people on this committee from other parts of Ontario who know that things are not equal right across the province and that we in southwest Ontario are having a very difficult time in the construction field. I do not know about your company, but I bet it is not doing wonderfully well, Mr Romanuk.

Mr Romanuk: No, it is not. We have gone, probably in the last 16 months, from an average of 15 people who have had for a dozen years to three people.

Mr Sutherland: Thank you for coming before the committee today. I just want to address a couple of comments. First of all, you say that business is foundering and you leave the impression that business is foundering since the time of the budget. You talked about investment decisions long before the budget came down. We were in a recession caused by many factors. High interest rates and free trade certainly have to be included in the whole picture. You said you could not get a meeting with the former minister, Mr Pilkey. Are you referring to the London group or are you speaking of the Ontario group?

Mr Romanuk: I am talking about the Ontario group.

Mr Sutherland: Okay, the Ontario group.

Mr Romanuk: The Ontario representative, yes.

Mrs Cunningham: I am glad you asked, Kimble.

Mr Sutherland: I wanted to know that. I guess it is just the sense I get that your presentation is saying, "The budget is the one that is stopping all the development from going on," and I think we need to clarify that.

Mr Romanuk: No, you are wrong. It is not just your budget. All you are doing is piling on an already bad situation.

Mr Sutherland: Okay, so you are indicating that you think we are part of the problem.

Mr Romanuk: You are a part of it; you are not all by yourself.

Mr Sutherland: Are the anti-recession projects you mentioned providing some employment to some of your people here?

Mr Romanuk: Yes, they are.

Mr Dool: There is a small amount of employment going on here. We are one of the areas, though, that is declared as being well-off so we do not get a hell of a lot anyway, but we get a few.

Mr Romanuk: I am sitting here and I am saying, let's watch our spending. But quite frankly, if we did not have that work now, there would be a lot of other companies in a lot of dire straits.

Mr Sutherland: Despite what you think of the overall budget, is the anti-recession good for the time being?

Mr Dool: The $700-million anti-recession amount: Is that the amount you are referring to?

Mr Sutherland: Yes.

Mr Dool: That is broken up into some smaller numbers.

Mr Sutherland: That is right, over the entire—

Mr Dool: About 20% of that went to pay equity and employment equity programs, sir. Now that is counterproductive to anything.

Mr Sutherland: No.

Mr Dool: Yes sir, you check your numbers.

Mr Sutherland: No, the $175 million—

Mr Dool: No, not to finance the program, to finance employment equity within the projects.

Mr Romanuk: Let me just explain what has happened.

Mr Sutherland: Go ahead.

Mr Dool: There is $3 million going in our area alone that has employment equity attached to it. None of the contractors can bid for it because they cannot fill the bill.

Mr Romanuk: What we are saying and what Tom is saying is that these projects that require the employment equity are probably adding about 20% to the capital costs to get the employment equity to work. So if you have a company, to make it work—mine worked great. I have a French Canadian, my wife.

Mr Sutherland: I would be interested in seeing any of the documents that came forward. I was not aware of employment equity part as part of it. What was supposed to be part of it was high-priority projects that could be going right away in terms of the fact that they could be done this year to have the most impact in the worst time. That was the focus area for the priorities of the anti-recession. I am not aware of this other. I would be interested in getting information on it.

Mr Dool: Most of which were education projects, correct?

Mr Sutherland: Education, colleges, hospitals, roads.

Mr Dool: Now you have said, "The money is there, but you won't get it till 1994." So I have to pay more education taxes locally to pay for the interest on that money; is that correct?

Mr Sutherland: No, sorry. That is separate. That is the Ministry of Education announcement for future expansion.

Mr Dool: Is that not a part of the $700 million?

Mr Sutherland: That is separate from the anti-recession, sir.

Mr Romanuk: The one thing I would like to point out is that for years and years the construction industry, the OCA, the Council of Ontario Construction Associations, the road builders, have said to governments, not just yours, all governments: "Let's not spend money on government projects when the place is booming, because you're going to be paying top dollar. Spend your money on roads and on government buildings in commercial downturns." We have advocated that. We have said that for years.

Mr Sutherland: So I guess what you are saying is that you would have wished that in the good times there had been some surplus so the money could go in right now and there would not have as high a deficit.

Mr Romanuk: Yes, you are quite correct there.

Mr Winninger: Just a very short question for clarification. I can accept that the construction industry depends on land prices and on interest rates and supply and demand. Obviously the recession would have quite a heavy effect on building. It is this intangible thing you call loss of confidence that I have a problem with. We have not heaped on taxes in this budget because it was a time of recession.

If you take our operating deficit compared to other provinces, hived off the capital deficit and just treat the operating deficit, we have the lowest per capita in Canada. In other countries such as Germany, Sweden, Japan, they have a very advanced and enhanced social safety net and worker protections and yet they are incredibly competitive and productive. So I am having difficulty knowing why, simply because we have enhanced our social programs to deal with recession, that somehow impacts on business confidence. The two can go hand in hand; they do not have to be exclusive.

Mr Romanuk: I am not sure I can answer your question the way you want an answer. Our debt is not as great as perhaps that of the other provinces; I do not know. I know we are going to be catching up to them very quickly at the rate we are going. You ask about business confidence. I will put my glasses on and go through my notes, but along with the budget some of the things that you are throwing at investors, like rent control, the labour law reform you are proposing, the minimum wage, tax reform, all of these things are, for someone investing or coming from out of country or wanting to invest newly, detrimental towards that.

Mr Winninger: We heard from the building trades council in Toronto yesterday and they said they are all ready to work.

Mr Romanuk: Sure they are ready to work, but there are no jobs.

Mr Winninger: Within the rent control.

Mr Dool: Mr Winninger, we need jobs to work at.

Mr Romanuk: I want to work.

Mr Dool: Our industry depends almost entirely on investment.

The Chair: I am sorry. Time has run out. We appreciate your attending this committee. Your remarks will be taken into our report.

Mr Romanuk: The only job I have now is I am taking a guy and reducing his business by two thirds. That is what has happened to his business.

WOMEN'S COMMUNITY HOUSE

The Chair: The next group we have coming forward is the Women's Community House; Ms Jan Richardson, executive director. Welcome to the committee. You will have one half-hour in your presentation. Try to keep some time at the end for questions and answers from the three parties.

Ms Richardson: Actually I only asked for 15 minutes, so wow.

The Chair: We can always go to that length.

Ms Richardson: Do not worry. I am just looking at my notes here and it is no problem.

I would like to thank you for the opportunity to present to you this afternoon. As I was introduced, I am the executive director of Women's Community House, which is London's transition house for abused women and their children. I have been with the agency serving as the executive director for the past seven years, and the shelter has provided service in our community since 1978.

As a way of introduction to what I would like to speak about today, I will apologize and say with regret that I am unable to speak towards the entire budget but will look specifically at the budget and the financial implications as they affect women in our community and specifically the issue of violence against women.

The provincial government, both past and current, has made a significant commitment to looking at wife assault services beginning in 1985. Those initiatives have been in the form of financial incentives to transition houses and other agencies operating in our community, as well as a significant increase in the funding available for public education and awareness. As was expected, this has meant a dramatic increase in the level of services required in our communities.

I think that certainly in 1985 the advocacy groups indicated that the funding available would not be enough to meet the needs in our community and that we really were opening Pandora's box by broadening the services available. That is exactly what has happened throughout the province and throughout the country. As the public awareness campaign and services have expanded, thousands of women are coming forward now indicating their victimization.

In addition to that, we have begun to become more aware of the impact of violence in the home, by the effects of violence on children who witnessed violence. We are looking more into the needs of the services required to assist the men who are being abusive, and in scratching the surface of this issue and in learning more and more about it we have begun to learn how to ask more questions of the victims and are coming up with more complex questions as women and men begin to speak about their experiences as adult survivors of childhood sexual abuse and their victimization through sexual abuse.

As a result of all that, we are at a place in our communities where we are virtually overwhelmed. Historically Women's Community House has turned away one woman for every one we have taken in, and that has been what we have operated on for many years now. At this point in time in our evolution, we are now turning away two women for every one we take in. When we say turn away, we do the best we can. We have a grant available from the Ministry of Community and Social Services to transport women to shelters outside the community, so we are not abandoning them to the city streets when they are fleeing violence. However, the eight shelters in our area have been full all summer and there is absolutely no place for these women to go.

Women's Community House several years ago recognized the need for an additional facility and has now embarked upon building a new transition house for London under the joint federal-provincial program called Project Haven. This program was intended to allow for capital financing through the federal government and operating financing through the provincial government.

The commitment that was made from the federal government was $480,000 to build a 30-bed new construction facility. The project right now is estimated at $1.6 million. There is just a little gap there. Our organization has launched a fairly significant fund-raising campaign that, itself, is probably a little overeager.

I think the reason I am providing some of this history right now is to look specifically at the initiatives that were announced in the new budget and to look at some of the implications that will have, not only on the organization Women's Community House but in an expanded sense.

In the announcement of May 8, 1991, of the wife assault initiatives we were pleased to see that transition houses would receive a significant increase directed towards shelter services. I would like to point out that at this time towards the end of August, we have not seen those increases and have had no indication from the Ministry of Community and Social Services as to when we will see those increases coming forward. Regrettably we based a lot of our financial calculations and services on the proposed increases and have yet to see those. I understand that will come forward, so I am optimistic that in the next two months we will see some of that $1.9 million being released towards services. But in the interim I need to point out that this has caused significant difficulty for our own agencies as we have implemented new services based on these increases.

In addition, specifically relating to the announcement that was made, it was announced that $12 million would be available for new shelter beds for battered women and their children. Again, this money has not been released to the public and there has been no indication as to how that money will be allocated.

For Women's Community House right now, we are at a point where we have to go to tender very soon. With a $1.9 million budget we were very hopeful, given this new announcement that was made in May, that there would be some recognition that the $480,000 allocated from the federal government was insignificant to meet the needs of a 30-bed facility, and that there would be some consideration and allocation to our shelter.

I would like to point out that regrettably we have had no response back from our communication to the ministry and continue to be asked to wait a little bit longer for the government to make some decision about how those funds will be allocated.

So hear my thanks for the announcement. I think the announcement indicates the commitment and awareness of the current government of the needs of our facilities. But also hear my plea to say that we would like to see how those funds are going to be allocated at a local level as soon as possible because it has a dramatic impact on our agency at this time.

Shelters are funded through what is called a stabilization funding formula through the Ministry of Community and Social Services. This funding formula was introduced through a review that took place in 1985 and is based on a ratio of number of beds-number of staff. I think it was a solid attempt back in 1985 to look at the ratio and the basic requirements, but I think it is also time to take a look at that funding formula and to look at what the realistic costs of running a transition house are.

Twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week means significant staffing costs. Women's Community House has staff of 30 to accommodate the 30 beds and to do the outreach that is also part of our programming. The funding formula allows for 12 staff, so there continues to be a gap.

I also am not a strong advocate for 100% funding from the provincial government. I think there is responsibility at the municipal level to support transition houses. I think it is so imperative that the community offer some support. What I am really suggesting right now as a recommendation is that it is time to take a look at how the 85 shelters in the province are funded through that funding formula, and to take a look at the bed-staff ratio and at revisions to it to make the flow a little more—more recognizing the needs that are in existence.

Another part of our funding, as I indicated, comes from the municipal government. The funding comes through per diem payments. How that happens generally is that the provincial government, through the Ministry of Community and Social Services, announces a recommended per diem rate which in turn, with how the caps work in terms of the 80-20 split, is taken into consideration by the municipalities when they set their own budgets from year to year.

It has always been a problem in terms of the timing. The municipalities generally begin their budget process in the fall, when we are asked to submit our budget requests, and then the administration go through their own calculations before they go to council in late winter and early spring.

The problem we have had over the years is that the recommended per diem rate from the provincial government typically comes along after the calculations and internal workings of administration in the municipality have occurred. As a result of that, if we look at what has happened with the shelters over the province, there is a significant split between what the provincial government is recommending the municipalities should be committing to in per diem payments and what we are actually receiving.

It would be great if the provincial government could raise its recommended per diem rate to match the budget process the municipalities embark upon. For Women's Community House, it results in about $12,000 this year, a difference between the recommended per diem rate from the provincial government and what we will actually receive, based on a 4% increase, from the municipality. It's a small bit of money, but it makes a really big difference. For us, that is a half-time person, or fairly close to a half-time person, so it makes a significant difference to the level of service we are able to provide. I think it is really an internal funding issue.

The other comment I would like to make about the tentative allocation to wife assault programming is that there have been no new dollars allocated for treatment programs for abusers. Although Women's Community House does not provide service to batterers, we work very closely in our community with the Changing Ways program. We feel service to the men who abuse women is critical if we are truly going to work towards change, and without an increase to the programs—Changing Ways has a very lengthy waiting list. As the public awareness campaign increases, as judges become more aware of court-mandating men to treatment programs and more and more services are faced with very lengthy layoffs or waiting lists, we are not able to serve the men at a time when they are ready to be served. Therefore we are not changing anything.

I also recognize that there has been considerable controversy over the past several months about the men's programs. It is the position of the co-ordinating committee to end woman abuse in London that we must continue to provide programs for men. I think the jury is not in yet about the true success of the programs, but I think it is imperative that we continue to operate the programs and to set some kind of community accountability measures into them. It is important to recognize that there is another side to the controversy about treatment programs, which is that we have to provide something in our community to the women who wish to return to their partners and attempt to live a life free from violence. We also have to provide an alternative to the men who truly wish to end the violence they are perpetrating.

Another initiative that came forward was through the Ministry of Health, for long-term services for sexual assault. I understand this initiative came forward through the inter-ministerial committee on sexual assault and that the funding is coming forward through the Ministry of Health and is to be distributed through local district health councils.

Over the past six weeks this community has had to undergo some very interesting negotiations and meetings in order to comply with the funding requirements. The district health council has indicated it is looking for one application to serve four communities: three counties and the city of London.

I would say that although it is very important to look at long-term services for sexual assault victims, including adult survivors of childhood sexual abuse, we also have to recognize the differences in how our communities develop and grow. To submit a joint application for three counties with very diverse needs and for the city of London, which has done some very progressive work in the area of violence against women, has severely compromised community integrity to a certain extent, in that we have really had to—it has just been a very difficult process to look at a rural area such as Middlesex county, which does not even have a crisis line for victims of sexual assault, and then to the city of London, where we are now looking at introducing long-term services for adult survivors of childhood sexual abuse.

I applaud the government for introducing these new initiatives, but would also ask that consideration be given to how that money is distributed at a local level. It may be that the district health councils are the best avenue to do some local development, but I think it is important to also look at how individual communities develop and how rich and diverse we all are in terms of our rural needs and our cultural needs.

One of the other questions that I suppose has come into play over the years is how shelters should be funded. I think it is now recognized that shelters are here to stay, that more are going to be built in our communities and that they will become an integral part of our communities. I guess the question is whether or not we are at a point where we should be looking towards legislated dollars towards transition houses.

I know there are pros and cons to doing that. I think a con for an agency like ourselves is that it requires more accountability and controls imposed by the government, but I think it also gives us some sense of stability from year to year. I understand that there is a review coming up on the funding of transition houses, and I would hope that consideration and exploration of legislated dollars could be explored through that process.

This issue, as I indicated when I began, is a very complex one. It is not as simple as saying all we need are shelter beds or crisis services. I think we as a society have created a real mess in terms of violence against women. We cannot blame the government for its creation and we cannot blame men for its creation, we cannot blame women for its creation, but we are all responsible for what we did create. We are therefore all responsible for its solutions.

I think we are looking at very long-term solutions. It is not enough to provide shelter services where we are patching women up and putting them out into the community to hope they will do well. It is important to recognize the needs of long-term services, long-term counselling, programs available for our children, programs available in the school systems, programs for men, training in our judicial system to help them become more aware of the problems and the insidious nature of the abuse that is taking place. It is important to continually remain open to the multitude of solutions that are available to us.

In closing I would say that I recognize, in saying all that, that it is an expensive price tag, but the provincial government has begun, with a very significant annualized contribution of money beginning in 1985. We have heard there is a commitment to continue that money forward through some longer-term initiatives. I think we are basically at the beginning of the avalanche. As we continue with the public education, we will continue to see more victims coming forward, and the price tag, I believe, will continue to increase. I think it is just a reality we have to face, and there needs to be the commitment by all parties to continue to look towards solutions.

Mrs Cunningham: Thank you, Jan, for your presentation. I like the ending of it especially, for all of us to be looking towards solutions. We were curious this afternoon when the Sexual Assault Centre came in and said that its budget went from $80,000 up to $280,000 or something—$340,000? I had the numbers written down and I cannot see them.

Mrs Sullivan: A quarter of a million dollars.

Mrs Cunningham: It was a lot of money, anyway; a quarter of a million dollars, my colleague advises me. When you made your presentation to the government this year, basically it was for the normal increase in your budget plus your capital dollars, I expect. You said you had not received the transfer payments yet. I am curious to know, is that on the normal part of your budget or is that the new program announcements that were made?

Ms Richardson: The per diem transfer payments? that what you mean?

Mrs Cunningham: Yes.

Ms Richardson: The per diems are a part of our regular operating budget. We have a revenue section which includes funds received from provincial government and municipal government and our donations. We calculated what we anticipated we would receive in our annual operating budget, and it fell, based on the communication we had from the ministry in the fall, but the announcement from the ministry did not come forward till February which was after the municipality had made its announcement. Did I make sense? Yes? Basically there were several months where local offices knew what they expected the increases to be, but the municipality was not willing to base its increases on anything short of a recommendation.

Mrs Cunningham: Have you received any of the 1991 transfer payment money yet?

Ms Richardson: No.

Mrs Cunningham: We are six months into the year, we actually worked in that ministry at one time and those things used to happen. It does not make me feel very positive to see it happening again. I have always been a great critic of big government. I prefer to put money in the front line, and this is an example of big government. It cannot even give the transfer payments out to pay the staff who are there.

Ms Richardson: I should clarify in saying that what we are being funded on right now is last year's operating contract with the Ministry of Community and Social Services. It should be understood that we are receiving our quarterly payments from the government based on our contract of last year. We do have yet to sign our 1991-92 contract based on this announcement.

Mrs Cunningham: Right; I am clear on that.

Mr Stockwell: My question is a little broader, and maybe somewhat more blunt as well. No one is coming up to me and saying: "Gee, Chris, could you see about raising taxes? I'm looking forward to getting my next tax hike." Has any thought been given to alternative sources of revenue? I do not know how or what, but has any discussion taken place? If so, when would we see some kind of report? I am not downplaying the role or the job, but there comes a point when we run out of money, or we as the government would run out of money.

Ms Richardson: Yes, and I think I indicated that I do not believe the solution is with the provincial government.

Mr Stockwell: I heard that. That was good.

Ms Richardson: To answer your question about whether I think we should be looking towards tax cuts maybe that is a possibility, but I would say what we have to ask ourselves in a broader sense—it is a broad question—is where the funding responsibility lies and proportionately how that funding responsibility lies. How much should we receive from the federal government? How much should we receive from the provincial government? How much should we receive through the municipalities through our tax base? I think those are important questions.

ask ourselves, particularly as we become more complex in this issue, but I do not have an answer to that.

The other part of our reality is that I am turning two men away for every one I take in. I do not have time to talk about taxes. I am trying to find enough money to find a place for these women to stay.

Ms M. Ward: You touched briefly in the latter part of your presentation on what I was interested in. I guess I was sitting there thinking, is there any hope? How long in the future are we going to have this problem? Are we always going to have it? You are just seeing the tip of the iceberg. You seemed to indicate that you think there are a lot of women out there who have not come forward or who are not coming forward. I wonder what you might have to say to us about what you think is needed in the way of preventive services. How much hope is there that there can be a change made through education? Should we be starting it in the schools?

Ms Richardson: We can look at this issue and the growing numbers of women coming forward in two ways. I could say, "This is a tragic thing that is happening in our society," which it is, but we can also say: "How hopeful is that, for every woman who comes into that shelter, she is making a choice. She has heard that message and she is making a decision to stop the violence."

In some respects, I think we are all to be applauded for the commitment we have made in finding more vehicles to get women, men and children to come forward.

Although I think the numbers are staggering, a way to look at that is that when we first began talking about this issue, we used statistics of one out of every 10 women in this country was physically abused by her partner; The provincial government has now released figures that indicate one out of eight women in a relationship is physically abused. So I guess in some respects I would say that, to me, that is progress, because these women are not being neglected as much as they were.

I think prevention is there. I think it is critical that we do public education. It is critical we get in and do the programs in the school systems to look at alternative conflict resolution to help children recognize that it is not the big family secret, that the services and system are in place and that the services and supports are available to the teachers so they do not have to deal with that increased level of disclosure.

I would say we must continue on the path we are on, which does include getting into the schools and doing the work with the kids. They are truly remarkable in what they are able to disclose to us.

Ms M. Ward: You are talking about long-term services for sexual assault. These are not simply the victims in the news, because women are victims throughout. Anywhere they go they are a potential victim. I believe Mrs Sullivan is riding where the young woman was murdered in the last few weeks. This is happening with much too great frequency for all of us. Some people view it as hatred against women from some segments of our society, so it is not just the family relationships we are looking at there, is it? It is a broader range of attitudes.

Ms Richardson: Yes, and when I talk about the fact that we as a society created this, you are right. We cannot be myopic in how we look at violence against women. We are talking about a society that has treated women as second-class citizens, and that is what it is about. That is why it is so hard to make the changes, because we are fundamentally looking at changes in how we function in our communities and in society. That is a very big problem and that is not one where we can have a project grant available to us to fix it. So we will take our Band-Aids, and in taking our Band-Aids, we will find our successes in changing that ripple of society.

I think we are making changes; little changes. I also think the incredible tragedies that women have experienced, the increased number of murders against women, will increase over the next 10 years. I think we will see an increase because we are scratching the surface, and that is annoying.

Mrs Sullivan: Much of what you had to say was really typical of what is occurring in my area as well. We are a community in Halton of approximately the same population, also looking for a second shelter and having a difficult time coming up with the gap in capital requirements. Similarly, on the funding formula, I could not agree more about the gap in time between the per diem rate from the province being announced later and so on.

I have a couple of questions that are really of some concern to me in this whole area of the funding of violence programs. I would like your opinion. I have appreciated your project.

It seems to me that we are funding sexual assault centres, rape crisis lines, transition houses and shelters, second-stage housing, programs for incest victims, programs for victims of family violence, all under different programs with different funding formulas, with little co-ordination between groups that are delivering the services, little cross-referencing between the agencies of skills required, and each agency is spending a great deal of time, probably a full staff person's time, on grantsmanship rather than on service delivery.

We heard earlier today what to me was, frankly, a shocking increase for one agency in one year—and welcome to it. They must have done their grantsmanship very well. But boy, I am telling you, I am not seeing that in my community, and I am going to go back and find out why.

Do you see any hope for the combination or the working together of these agencies to streamline the service delivery and to make the dollars more effective as they move out into the community?

Ms Richardson: I recognize the shortness of time, but I think it is a complicated question and answer.

One of the things we have to recognize is that a woman who has been victimized by her husband is going to have different needs than somebody who has been raped by her father or a boy who has been sexually abused by someone in the community. I think the type of counselling needs that they have and the type of services that need to be in place are different. I think they truly are different, and we have enough experience in what has been available in our community services to have known that.

To me, I think the secret is in looking more at integrating through community co-ordinating committees. In London, we have the London co-ordinating committee to end woman abuse, which has very successfully demonstrated that type of co-ordination of service.

I am not convinced that the best answer is to have one big assault centre where all victims come in for their service, and there are a couple of reasons for that. One is that I think you limit your catchment area. One of the nice things about London is that we have people entering into our system from a variety of different points, and we would lose that through one centre. The other part is that we have to recognize how diverse the individual abuse that is experienced is.

I think maybe in the future we can go there, and maybe we can strive to get there through co-ordinating committees that can talk the same language and get rid of all the junk and rhetoric that blocks progress, but I think right now we have to remain autonomous. I know that is more expensive, but I do not think we are ready because we do not have all of the answers yet. I think it is a good vision maybe for 15 years down the road, or a decade down, but I do not think we know enough about what individual victim needs are right now to say that we can do it all under one roof.

CROSS CULTURAL LEARNER CENTRE

The Chair: The next group is the Cross Cultural Learner Centre. Come forward, please. You may proceed.

Ms Amery: My name is Zainab Amery. I am the education co-ordinator of the London Cross Cultural Learner Centre. This is Nico Barrett, who is the librarian of the Cross Cultural Learner Centre.

The Cross Cultural Learner Centre would like to thank the provincial government for providing agencies such as ours with the opportunity to present our concerns and views on the first NDP budget and its impact on our community.

By maintaining social assistance programs and services while remaining committed to the economic development of the province during this time of a devastating international recession, the government has undertaken a brave stance in the face of corporate criticism.

The effects of the federal policies of free trade and the movement towards manufacturing southward, the GST and the reduction of transfer payments to the provinces have resulted in soaring unemployment, small business and individual bankruptcies, cross-border shopping and high interest rates. These issues have had a detrimental effect on this province, hurting mostly those in the manufacturing and working-class sectors. The government has been caught between a diminishing work force and tax base created by federal policies and a federal government which further seeks to place the burden of welfare costs on the province by drastically reducing transfer payments.

We believe this budget is investing in the future of Ontario and in the direction of recovery. In a number of areas, the budget brings into focus the need to increase community support mechanisms at this time. For example, literacy and labour adjustment initiatives are an investment in the province's economic future while serving to provide vital skills to those most affected and marginalized by the changing system.

The commitment and recognition of native rights, land claims and community development initiatives can only be lauded as part of an international movement to recognize indigenous peoples. Far from being a cynical move to bring about public support, this is truly an instance where government is supporting its policies with funding. However, it is essential that the government recognizes some of the negative climate around these issues within the public at large. We would encourage these initiatives be supported by increasing funding towards public awareness, education and sensitivity towards native issues.

Violence against women remains a major social problem that must be eliminated. Increased expenditures are essential to expand and enhance existing services to women and children who are victims of violence. In addition to this, we feel it is imperative to expand these services and provide family-oriented counselling, including specialized programs for male members of families.

Given the changing demography of Canada, it is also necessary to recognize cultural barriers which contribute to family violence. In many instances, these barriers are culturally transmitted, and although behaviour modification must take place, we must recognize that newcomers' cultural belief structures may differ dramatically from Canadian laws. It is vital that certain funds be allocated to combating violence against women to develop specialized programs and services from a culturally specific perspective with the objective of maintaining the family unit.

As the recession continues to have a devastating impact on our economy, individuals tend to blame their problems on newcomers, who are invariably members of minority groups. The multicultural demography cannot be changed into a single, homogenous grouping, so it is essential that programs that represent the restructuring of Ontario's economic growth provide for the funding and support of initiatives which represent our multicultural composition. Multiculturalism is not about songs and dances; it is about overcoming racism, prejudice and bigotry in order to achieve real acceptance and integration so all citizens in our community can share equitably in the benefits of economic growth.

The 1991 Ontario budget, while making great strides in fighting the recession and not the deficit, appears to be addressing minimally the need for expansion of education and sensitization through multicultural programs, which not only represent an essential component to the reduction of racist and discriminatory behaviour in our communities but are directly linked to all major areas of our society including education, health and employment equity.

We would encourage the provincial government to extend pay equity initiatives beyond women to the disabled, aboriginal peoples, minorities and newcomers. In addition, both pay equity and employment equity initiatives should seek to expand across the board and into the private sector.

Government budgets and policies have the potential to shape the quality of life for all members of our community.

Our newcomer clients represent a highly disadvantaged group. Although many members of this group are well-educated and skilled individuals, their low level of English racism and the lack of support for professional or skilled recognition in Canada, or Ontario more specifically, undermine their ability to function fully within our community.

Manufacturing sectors, where we have seen the highest number of unemployed, have always employed a high number of newcomers with limited English literacy skills. There needs to be increased funding for specialized programs to assist these individuals in obtaining or upgrading language and job skills.

Every effort must be made to recognize the needs of ready trained individuals and assist this group to obtain specialized apprenticeship training which makes use of their previous experience and skills. The most hated word about the newcomer, the one he or she learns almost immediately, is "Canadian experience."

We would like to emphasize that our objective of participating in this forum is to provide a voice for the community groups we represent to ensure that all newcomers and minority groups are empowered to participate actively and equitably within our society. Workplace training, employment equity and literacy programs are all good starting points to assist our constituents in developing the skills and adaptability to participate in the new economic structure of our province.

In conclusion, we thank the government of Ontario for holding the public hearings on the first budget and providing with this opportunity to present our views on its impact on our community. It is essential to look to the future of this province and ensure that all members will share equitably the benefits of our economy. In our view, the budget contains some major initiatives and investments in the people of Ontario. We applaud the efforts of the provincial government and encourage it to continue looking to the future of Ontario.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much for your presentation. We will start the questioning process with the government party.

Mr Winninger: I certainly appreciated your presentation. It sounds as if we are not spending enough for you. Is that true?

Ms Amery: From our perspective, we are not receiving enough for our constituents. We have been capped for a number of years through the Ministry of Citizenship for our organizations. We have assisted in developing projects for this past year for individual community groups for which we have been told there are no moneys available through the Ministry of Citizenship because of reductions.

Mr Winninger: I know that the Cross Cultural Centre in London has a tremendous reputation and a model for other municipalities to follow. A lot of your funding does come from the province, does it not, from citizenship?

Ms Amery: Actually, no, most of our funding comes federally.

Mr Winninger: I see, so it is not a provincial funding problem you are addressing today.

Ms Amery: It is both; I think we are addressing both. From our perspective it is imperative that the two come together provincially and federally to most benefit the group of individuals we are representing. On the one hand, we are representing everyone, and on the other hand, we are representing newcomers, because unless the climate is accepting within our communities, the newcomers we are bringing into our communities will not be accepted. If we are going to bring them, then we have a responsibility to ensure that they can participate in our community. Whether that is from the provincial or federal government's perspective, it should be a joint effort because they are living in both communities. At the present time they are being disadvantaged by both sides.

Mr Winninger: Some of your clients certainly are new immigrants to Canada and many of them require education and health care assistance before they become landed immigrants, right?

Ms Amery: Yes.

1510

Mr Winninger: I understand this is where government money plays a very important role.

Ms Amery: It definitely does. Language training has become one of the greatest problems, not only in terms of language training for basic language skills but in terms of finding a job. We have a number of people, for example, from within the Cambodian-Vietnamese community who were employed by several of the plants closed throughout London and St Thomas. Many of them came several years ago and did not receive language training. As a result of job losses, we find a huge client group that does not have the English literacy skills to move into another sector. They do not have any other skills to move into the language sector and they are basically floating around lost at this point. Not only do they require language training, but they also require job retraining to get into another field where they can work.

Mr Winninger: There were some delegations before us today that suggested we should not be spending any of this money and that we have to cut back on programs and pare down our deficit. What impact would this have on your clients and your agency? I realize you say you get most of your funding federally, but there is some from the Ministry of Citizenship.

Ms Amery: We get approximately $73,000 from the Ministry of Citizenship in OSAP funds.

Mr Winninger: What percentage of your total budget would that represent?

Ms Amery: It is probably about 4% of our total budget.

Mr Winninger: If we took away the $73,000 for your agency alone, would that have some impact on you?

Ms Amery: It would have a great impact on us.

Mr Kwinter: It would not have any. That was a trick question.

Mr Winninger: I think she should be allowed to answer the question without her time being used up.

Ms Amery: I do not have a problem with that in your question. I should make it clear that the funding we receive federally is from a number of different projects and is attached to a number of different projects. The OSAP funding we receive is the only money we are eligible for to do education, workshops and leadership development with the communities we are dealing with. It is one of the only sources of funding available to do that with, provincially as well as federally. The Secretary of State has also changed its mandate. It does not provide as much funding towards educational processes under the multicultural area. There is a greater focus towards specialized racism programs, but geared away through the educational programs within the schools within the individual communities we deal with.

Mr Winninger: There are clients of yours who are sponsored immigrants and people here, their hosts, have undertaken to support them for a fixed period. Sometimes those sponsors pull out for one reason or another and the relationship breaks down. In the past these people have been denied social housing and social assistance. What would you like to see happen in this regard?

Ms Amery: I have had to deal with a number of cases where I have seen people turned down for low-income housing and welfare benefits who have been placed in a position where the host families have had to pull back either because of a breakdown in the agreement, in the arrangement, or because the host family was no longer able to support itself, let alone its sponsorees. I think we should be open to assessing eligibility on a case-to-case basis on that format. I feel very badly for people who are turned down automatically and not given the opportunity to receive some of those benefits, so that when they are brought to the country, they really have nothing to do with what the relationship ends up being. Unless you can force the host family to care, in some way or another, for the people they brought in, it is not fair to penalize the group that has come to Canada and wants to participate in the community.

Mr Winninger: That would require provincial funding.

Mr Phillips: Thank you for your thoughtful presentation. I particularly like the line you had, which I cannot quite remember now, which was something like multiculturalism not being about song and dance but about access. I am paraphrasing a bit. I totally agree with that. I think one of the challenges with multiculturalism right now is that it is subject to grave misinterpretation. I like your definition of it.

I think the concern about the budget is real for some of us. My question is about getting the economy going. I think some of us are deadly worried that a year or two from now, not only will it be difficult to sustain organizations like yours, but if there are not the funds, it may be tough just to keep at your current level, coupled with some real concerns some of us have about job creation and creating the environment where many of the people you are servicing can be best helped by a quality job. We understand the recession is ending and that one of the reasons the government brought this budget was in the expectation that the economy was recovering. Are you beginning to see the economic recovery with your clients? How is that manifesting itself?

Ms Amery: I do not think we are beginning to see it. In fact, in most cases I think we are seeing a perspective where the students themselves are feeling they are not treated as if they belong in Canada. When I say "Canadian experience," it follows through on almost all aspects of their lives. It has become one of the most difficult ideologies to deal with, with the newcomers, because they do not know how to respond. How do you respond to an employer who says, "We know you have 20 years working as a welder but you have no Canadian experience and you have minimal English"? Six months of language training? How do you argue your point? How do you say to that person, "I am against the law for you to discriminate on the basis that you don't have Canadian experience"?

Because of our recession, we are seeing more of a backlash towards them. We are not seeing improved relations. We are seeing more people addressing the issues that people do not like them because they have an accent or because they are not from Canada. It seems to be on the increase rather than on the decrease.

Mr Phillips: That is surprising, because I thought you were coming out of the recession and that you might have seen that in the months behind us.

Ms Amery: It is unfortunate, but once attitudes change and people have found their scapegoats, it takes a process of re-education to get the general public to be accepting of the newcomers and provide them with opportunities, when they are seen as taking jobs from the Canadians.

Mr Phillips: One of the things that worries me a lot is this youth unemployment. I have spoken of this many times. Two years ago and one year ago youth unemployment was 8%; it is 16% now. Do you have many young people—"young" I mean in the 15 to 25 age bracket—who are clients of your organization? Do you see anything in particular, one way or the other, that changed with young people over the last few months versus what might have been the case one, two or three ago?

Ms Amery: With students in the 15 to 18 age range, the children of newcomers, we generally see that they will go through the educational system and many of them tend to go into the post-secondary sector as well. However, we are also seeing a number of people coming into the country in the 20 to 25 age range. A number of them will not go into the post-secondary sector unless they have had previous educational experiences that were incomplete. Even then they will go into the employment sector initially because they must acquire enough English to write a TOEFL or take it of English as a foreign language exam, which usually takes them between one to two years.

Mr Phillips: In terms of the demands on your organization, I am trying to get a feeling for what the demand would be today versus a year ago and two years ago. Have the needs changed in any area? Are you putting more focus on something now that you would not have a year or two ago and less in other areas?

Ms Amery: We are putting more focus right now into outreach into existing communities, because as I said, we have seen an increase in racism in terms of how people are settling into the community. Where prior to a year ago we dealt primarily through our settlement services with government-sponsored refugees or church-sponsored refugees, we are now in a process of reaching out to the culturally specific communities in general. We have also submitted to the Secretary of State a three-year plan to do institutional change within some of the private and business sector areas in the London community, because we are finding that is one of the areas where we have to make change in order to get some of our clients into those employable positions.

Mr Phillips: That is a sort of a cloudstorm on the horizon for us, I think, what you just said. You perceive an increase in racism?

Ms Amery: Over the last six to eight months, we have already seen an increase in racism. One of the examples I can give you is that throughout the Gulf war what we saw was a number of the schools, because London has a very large Arabic community in certain sectors of the city, was a high incidence where it was necessary for the people in the centre to go and do work with the school boards. We joined forces to develop resource lists and provide resources, but we saw quite a number of instances just over a three- to four-week period.

Mrs Cunningham: This is an appropriate time for me to jump in because I was one of the founding members of the Cross Cultural Learner Centre. It is interesting to see how it has kept your main focus but changed some programs as the needs of our community have demanded.

I would like to clarify a couple of things. When the school boards were asking for your help, it was basically a preventive thing, was it not? Teachers, as always, are looking for ways of dealing with situations, so I think it was a preventive, knowledge-based kind of thing. At least, the committee report I read from the school board said that.

Ms Amery: There were two instances. In one instance, we were asked to go in as a preventive measure. We addressed the principals and we provided them with resources. In the other instance, it was because of a response to incidents that had happened in one of the schools.

Mrs Cunningham: Perhaps it was whatever you provided them with that I was reading, as a result of the program committee, which I thought was a great use of our resource, because initially the Cross Cultural Learner Centre started to assist teachers in curriculum, if you can believe it, so we have come a long way.

I was going to ask some specific questions. Perhaps down the road and after this meeting, I can be of some assistance to you, because it has been a year since I talked to your director with regard to his needs, so you are presenting what he would normally present, I think, in my office.

When you talk about talking to the Secretary of State, right now the money for the literacy and labour adjustment with the Department of Employment and Immigration. There is a lot of money and Ontario has not tapped into it; other provinces have. I am not quite certain, although I am speaking to our minister as well who is involved in the skills development part, with regard to how we are going to access that money. As soon as I find out what it is, or if I can influence it in any way, certainly feel free to get in touch with my office, because it is brand-new for Ontario.

Ms Amery: Can I just address it to you?

Mrs Cunningham: Dianne Cunningham, London North. I have a card. We will see you afterwards.

The point I am trying to make is that there are so many institutions involved in the literacy part of your work just here in London. Mr Sutherland and I have had some extensive discussions around what we would like to see happen and how we can support it after talking to the groups. We have not chatted with your group yet, but I think it is an issue for your organization because of the many areas you touch upon. Certainly G. A. Wheable Centre for Adult Education must be something you work with, as well as the churches, in the provision of programming.

Ms Amery: We participated in the meeting with the labour adjustment board when it came to discuss the process and how it was going to develop.

Mrs Cunningham: Good.

Ms Amery: My understanding is that nothing has come into existence yet.

Mrs Cunningham: That is right.

Ms Amery: We are hoping that will develop and help some of the individuals who will need its assistance. My understanding, though, from the individuals who presented at the forum in London, was that it probably would not affect those individuals who had already received a layoff or who were not already in the workplace and were going to be laid off.

Mrs Cunningham: My job is to make certain that the agencies in London get the money they want. We can talk about that down the road. We are not aware just what the ground rules are in Ontario. We do know that other provinces have their money and we do not, so we are interested in getting as much as we can.

I am interested also when you talk about this Canadian experience. Certainly in my office when I get young people in—I did not know that number was 16% youth unemployment; I knew it was more than 10%, but I did not realize it was 16%—we are seeing it. I think Dr Pedersen will be here tomorrow to talk about the University of Western Ontario and I am sure it will be one of the things he will tell us, that we see students going back to school. Are you having that phenomenon within the group of students you deal with? Are they going back for other degrees or graduate degrees?

Ms Amery: They are not really going back for other degrees. What we are seeing is people coming out of programs like Fanshawe College or Wheable and going into another program. For example, they may go for six months' language training at Fanshawe and immediately to Wheable or the Centre for Lifelong Learning simply because they cannot get into an employment program and they cannot get into the employment workforce. They are stranded in between and they go for language training, they go for computer upgrading or business courses, but they go where they do not have to pay and they go where they can learn English. They do not normally go into, as I said, the post-secondary sector unless they have had some previous professional experience.

Mrs Cunningham: When you said OSAP, I thought there was something I did not know there. That is for the others who are specific to the university or to the colleges.

Ms Amery: Right.

Mrs Cunningham: You have been most helpful, but I think our discussion has just begun.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for appearing before the committee.

The Registered Nurses' Association of Ontario is not present as yet. I guess we are going to have to take a break until they get here.

The committee recessed at 1528.

1543

The Chair: Talking to the three parties here, as it getting on to 3:45 and the Registered Nurses' Association of Ontario has not appeared yet before this committee and its time is running out, we will accept its written submission to the committee. It is unanimous that we adjourn the day and meet again tomorrow at 9 o'clock in this room.

The committee adjourned at 1544.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Wednesday 21 August 1991

The committee met at 0902 in the Sheraton Armouries hotel, London.

1991-92 BUDGET

Resuming consideration of the 1991-92 provincial budget.

BOB WOOD

The Chair: Mr Bob Wood is the first witness. You will have 15 minutes for your presentation. Try to leave a little time at the end for questions and answers.

Mr Wood: Mr Chair, members of the committee, you have the duty to study a budget that is the worst policy mistake in the history of Ontario. That covers a lot of ground. It taxes too much, spends too much and borrows too much. It kills jobs, fuels inflation and is out of sync with the fiscally responsible direction of every other government in Canada.

This budget is based on the NDP government's failure to understand certain basic truths about Ontario economic policy-making in the 1990s. These truths are:

Ontario's budget policy must be consistent with the federal government's, which must be consistent with the developed countries'. France, a country of 55 million, tried consistent policies 10 years ago, with disastrous results. Developed economies are too interdependent for any country, let alone region, to try to go it alone.

John Maynard Keynes's 1930s idea of increasing spending during a recession has become outdated. People know that most spending increases come automatically now—more social assistance payments, etc—and spending on new programs can very quickly get out of control and become inflationary. This is particularly true now when the spending increases are coming too late in the recession and will only fuel inflation later, as happened in Ontario after the last recession. Voters know that the best way out of a recession is to let market forces end the recession. Massive new spending simply compounds the problem.

Big deficits are bad and destroy any financial flexibility a government would otherwise have. We need only look to Ottawa for proof. Deficits are also the unfair taxes of all, ones imposed by us and paid by our children and grandchildren.

Taxes in Ontario are already too high. The tax revolt that swept the province earlier this year is based on a high degree of voter frustration, and these people "aren't going to take it any more." Ontario is now the highest-taxed jurisdiction in Canada. We will pay a heavy price in lost jobs if we do not change this.

Ontario desperately needs restraint in government spending. In the last six years, spending has doubled. There does not seem to be a single special-interest group that Bob Rae can say no to. The reason this province has lost so many jobs in this recession is that our costs, including taxes, are much higher than other provinces and states.

Bob Rae has become Ontario's Donald Trump. He spends other people's funds without regard to restraint or value for money. The ultimate result will be to make Ontario the same kind of economic basket case that the Trump organization now is. Mr Rae believes that more is always better, be it taxes, spending or debt. Businesses before Trump and governments before Rae had learned the hard way that this is wrong, but we are about to experience again the old adage that those who do not learn from history are condemned to repeat it.

This committee should recommend the following program: an immediate tax freeze—any tax increase must be balanced by an equal or greater tax cut; a balanced budget within two years; a serious program to control government spending and get better value for our tax dollars; tax cuts oriented towards creating jobs once the budget is balanced. Only these steps will avoid the economic mess into which Ontario is sinking.

In conclusion, let me leave you with two thoughts. The severity of the recent recession in Ontario was the direct result of our costs being too high in relation to neighbouring jurisdictions. A major cause of our cost problems was David Peterson's massive tax-and-spend policies. It was like prescribing poison to see if it would make the patient feel better. The NDP government has continued the Peterson tax-and-spend policies with a vengeance and has added a new twist: the biggest deficit ever. Bob Rae's financial policies are like prescribing more poison to an already sick patient. The tragedy is that the longer this goes on, the weaker our economy will get and the longer it will take to recover.

The final point I wish to leave you with concerns public attitudes. There is a deep malaise among voters and they are not going to suffer silently much longer. If the politicians do not get the message soon, citizens are going to take matters into their own hands, the way the people of Blenheim recently did for a day. Ontarians are not very far from a large-scale tax revolt right now. It is too early to tell what form such a revolt might take, but we may have to require that no tax hike and no increase in public debt can be effective until confirmed by a direct vote of our citizens. One thing is certain: This budget is leading us to economic disaster, and the sooner we change course, the better.

Mr Phillips: First, I do not know how well you have examined the budget, but there are many ways to balance it. One way they are looking at balancing it is by putting capital into debt and putting many of the expenditures in other areas, like Hydro and what not. I would like your thoughts on what you mean by a balanced budget.

The second one is that most economists we have heard from believe that Canada and Ontario are well on the way to recovery now and that things are going to be fairly rosy in the future, which is in contrast to your kind of prediction here. I am wondering if you would care to comment on that.

Mr Wood: By a balanced budget, I mean a balanced budget under the current accounting system. In other words, I think we should go from $9.7 billion down to zero. I do not say the predictions of improvement in the economic cycle are wrong; I think they are right. What I am saying is the policies of the Ontario government are going to sap the recovery in Ontario rather than augment it. It is not that I think we are going to continue in a recession; it is that I think the policies the Ontario government is following are going to make our recovery weaker and make the next recession worse. I think the economic cycle will continue to apply to us. The problem is that our economy is going to be a lot weaker than it has been in the past.

Mr Phillips: I do not personally disagree with that, but as the NDP call it, the "prestigious" Conference Board of Canada is predicting Ontario may have the most robust economic recovery of any province, in spite of what you just said. I am wondering how you might explain that.

Mr Wood: Certainly their crystal ball has not been perfect in the past, and we are starting from a much weaker base than the western provinces in terms of the depth of the recession. Those factors tend to make a recovery look stronger, if you are lower to start with. I guess only time will tell. Our economy is clearly a lot weaker now than it was eight years ago. That is why the recession has been a lot worse in Ontario this time than it was in 1981-82. The figures are irrefutable on that. I am saying that if these policies continue for another four or five years, we are going to be that much weaker again.

Mrs Cunningham: One of the criticisms we get when we take the positions that you have taken, and I happen to agree with them, is that we are out to cut out all the social programs. The question you will probably be asked, unless they choose a different one today, is, if we did in fact achieve a balanced budget, what would happen to social programs? If you are talking about a balanced budget, what kind of things would you look for in doing that? What would you look at?

Mr Wood: I would look at the mistakes the government made in the budget it just presented. I would reverse what they did in the current budget, which would get us fairly close to a balanced budget, and I would then see what could be done by way of spending control and better value for tax dollars. When you have a $40-billion budget, it does not take a large percentage cut to cut $3 billion out of your expenditures.

Mrs Cunningham: The second question I have is with regard to comments, again both from presenters and from some of my colleagues across the way, with regard to interest rates and the federal government. Most of the briefs before this committee in support of the budget say two things. The first is that it is a great budget even for the construction industry, which is hard to believe. I will tell you the construction industry in London did not say that yesterday, but the one in Toronto did. The second is that the federal government is the real problem here, especially with regard to interest rates.

Where I am coming from is that I was privy to some meetings with Japanese lenders on the weekend in Victoria, British Columbia, who are telling us that they are not particularly interested in helping us much further, and people know that they already have $45 billion invested in our debt. If you could perhaps remark on the three points you have raised, I would appreciate it.

Mr Wood: I think the construction industry is dependent upon the economic health of the province. Certainly the policies between 1982 and 1990 clearly sapped, in a major way, the economic strength of the province. I say that this budget is going to make that situation worse. We are all basically in the same boat. Giving money to a particular sector does not really help it, other than in a very short-term way. Either the economy is strong or it is not, and I say it is going to be a lot weaker in five years than it is now if these policies continue.

I think the federal government has done a reasonable job on interest rates, because the massive deficits that it has had and to a lesser extent this province, have forced it to have high interest rates. High interest rates are directly related to the massive deficits the federal government is running.

Mr Christopherson: I would like to start by thanking Mr Wood for his presentation and for taking the time to come here today.

I note that you start your written presentation with an acknowledgement that you were a PC candidate in the last provincial election. Therefore, I found it interesting. To follow up on a question from Ms Cunningham regarding the balanced budget, the opposition parties have been rather adamant along the way to be sure people did not believe they were saying that there needs to be an immediate balanced budget. When we have suggested that is what they want, they have challenged that and said that is not the position. I see you have stated there should be a balanced budget within two years.

First of all, to get to a balanced budget, you are talking about massive—not tinkering, not paring back—cuts in expenditures. In light of the fact that you had run and have offered up that information of looking to be a part of this Legislature, can I ask for just a little more detail rather than just "look for control of spending and try to find inefficiencies," when we are talking about that kind of massive cutting. Given your own involvement in the political process, could you narrow that down somewhat and give us some sense of where you would start if indeed you were to begin looking for a balanced budget within two years, in light of the fact that even your own party colleagues have not taken that stand?

Mr Wood: Yes, I would reverse all the spending increases contained in this budget. You can debate just what are spending increases and what would have happened anyway, but I think that would reduce the deficit by about $6 billion, plus or minus. You can play around with what is the right figure. I would look at the increases year by year over the last five years which would get us to more than a balanced budget.

What I would also do is look at across-the-board controls on any increase after inflation. Typically we can look 2% to 3% growth. Whether that is going to happen in the next few years, time will tell. If we have that in our revenues in real terms, that gives us over $1 billion a year. Those are the areas I would look at.

Mr Sutherland: I find that very interesting, because I believe if we went to a balanced budget, it is something like $147 million per riding. There are three ridings here in the London area, so you are talking, at a time when the private sector is not investing anything, of taking $450 million out of the economy of the city of London.

I just wanted to ask you about Blenheim—you mention there—and about its tax revolt day. We heard a great deal about how they did not charge any sales tax and everyone packed there.

What I want to know is, did they close down all their sectors' offices? Did they charge tolls for their roads? Did they take away all the social services for the day? Did they defer any of those services at the same time they were giving this tax revolt?

Mr Wood: I think that question is, in essence, a red herring. What the people in Blenheim were saying, of course, was not that they were not going to pay any taxes. They were making a symbolic gesture that taxes were too high. In that, I think they are quite right. They are not thinking—nor is anybody in this province—in terms of not paying taxes. What they are thinking in terms of is paying taxes that are fair and are economically sensible. Taxes are high and people are going to do something about it one way or the other. It would be very interesting to see how many candidates run in the municipal election and are elected on the platform of a tax increase. Dam few, I will predict.

The Chair: Mr Wood, thank you for your presentation.

Mr Wood: My pleasure.

CANADIAN AUTO WORKERS, LOCAL 1520

The Chair: Would CAW, Local 1520, please come forward. Welcome to the committee on the budget review. See you are on for 10 o'clock and it is 9:15. The other two presenters are not in the room yet. This will save time and give everybody an opportunity to make a presentation. For the purposes of Hansard, please identify yourselves. You have one half-hour to make your presentation. In that half-hour, try to save some time at the end of the presentation for questions and answers from the three parties. You may begin.

Mr Witherspoon: First of all, good morning. My name is Rick Witherspoon. I am the president of CAW, Local 1520, and my co-presenter this morning is our financial secretary, Dusty Miller. Dusty himself resides in St Thomas and I am from London.

Local 1520 represents close to 3,500 members employed at the Ford Motor Co St Thomas assembly plant. For those of you who are not familiar with that facility, we would like to give you a little background so you will have a better understanding of just exactly what we do out there.

The location itself is on Highway 4, just north of St Thomas and is on a parcel of land of about 635 acres. We actually have over 44 acres of concrete floor underneath one roof where the production takes place, somewhere in the vicinity of 2.2 million square feet of actual production space, with over 12 miles of conveyor systems that run through that plant.

Looking at the facility itself during normal production, if you are looking at straight-time hours, as far as equipment and supplies coming into the plant are concerned, we unload somewhere in the vicinity of 155 transport trucks a day. That has probably increased dramatically recently, now that we have gone to a new production line of cars and are involved in the just-in-time delivery system. We also use the rail system and probably unload about 55 rail cars a day to supply our production.

As far as consumption is concerned, we use over 100 million kilowatt-hours of power each year, which would be the equivalent of what it would take to run close to 9,000 average homes; as far as water is concerned, over 400 million gallons of water a year or the equivalent to run 5,000 households; as far as natural gas to keep the place supplied and running and heated is concerned, the equivalent of what it would take to heat over 5,000 homes in this region.

At present, looking at our production system, we have over 100 robots within the system that do a lot of the different processes: welding, sealer operations and actual installations. As far as production is concerned, if you were basing our production on a 40-hour week looking at the capacity where we can normally build, when everything is right, 60 units per hour, we have the capability of building 250,000 cars a year. If you are looking at a 48-hour production schedule, which we have been running now and unfortunately have been doing almost for the last 10 years, over the course of the year we have the capability of building 288,000 units.

In actual production time, it takes about 20 hours to build a car. We put one car off the assembly line once every minute. From start to finish, where you actually start off with a piece of metal and end up with something rolling off the end of the assembly line that is running in a finished unit, that takes about 20 hours.

We had our peak capacity back in the mid-1980s, where we built in excess of 280,000 units per year. The models we are building now are the Crown Victoria and the Grand Marquis; I am sure you have all seen the new version that exists out there. To build that car, it takes in excess of 4,000 parts per car that have to be assembled in our plant, with over 2,000 welds to hold it together.

As far as manpower is concerned, when the plant started back in 1967 we had approximately 1,500 people on roll. In 1991 we find ourselves with about 3,000. If you want to break that down into regions to give you some kind of idea, from London we have approximately 55% of our workforce, from St Thomas about 25% and the other 20% would be spread around the surrounding areas. Currently we are in a position where approximately 400 of our members are on indefinite layoff with very bleak prospects of ever returning to our plant. Because we find ourselves in that position, we felt compelled to request standing before the budget committee. I personally would like to welcome all you committee members to London and thank you for your efforts to make sure the public voice is being heard.

Currently we find ourselves in the worst recession experienced in the last 50 years. Working people all across the province are having to endure tremendous hardships. Unlike other recessions, this one is more serious because its effects are expected to last even longer, with 65% of the major layoffs due to permanent plant closures while bankruptcies have increased by 75% in Ontario. Compared to the recession of 1981-82, twice as many Ontario workers have lost their jobs in the first year of this recession.

Job losses in this province have totalled 236,000, an increase of 4.3% in unemployment compared to an increase of 2.1% during the 1981-82 recession. Ontario's rate of job losses has been over twice that of the national average and accounts for almost 80% of the national jobs lost. The most unfortunate part of this is that many of these jobs are gone for good. In addition, 43% of those jobs that were lost were in the high-wage manufacturing sector. The implications for government revenues, let alone the impact on those who have lost their jobs, are obvious.

In this government's first budget a choice had to be made. I am glad to see that while most governments are slashing much-needed programs, this government has not backed away from its responsibility to protect working people in tough times. Those denouncing the present budget would have the public believe that the $9.7-billion deficit is a product of the budget and reckless NDP spending, when the fact is that the deficit would have been around $8 billion had the government done nothing.

It is especially important that we not lose sight of the reasons behind the deficit, that most of the deficit comes from the reality of the recession itself: falling revenues, increased costs in health care, social services and education. A very large part of the deficit is a direct result of the cuts in federal transfer payments. In fact, $1.6 billion of the NDP deficit is actually the work of Brian Mulroney. This, coupled with the federal policies of high interest rates, the high dollar and free trade, has had devastating effects.

Something else we must keep in mind is the fact that the previous provincial government campaigned not only on a balanced budget, but on a predicted budgetary surplus. The reality was that this government took power with a $2.5-billion deficit. In addition, another $3 billion of the deficit is due to increased spending to maintain the levels of existing services, primarily in health care and education. When all of this is totalled up, we find that the NDP government's spending on new programs adds a mere $1.5 billion to this deficit, with over half of that going directly to job creation.

Those who term the deficit unmanageable need to put it into perspective. The Mulroney government spends 34 cents of every tax dollar collected on its deficit while the Ontario government spends 12 cents, far below the federal rate and less than the debt charged by most other provinces.

No one likes to see a deficit, but spending money is critical to stimulating economic growth.

The first NDP budget contains initiatives designed to fight the recession while maintaining services to people: programs to maintain or create 70,000 jobs; a wage protection fund to protect workers if their employers go bankrupt; taking 120,000 low-income Ontarians off the tax rolls while raising taxes for those making over $84,000 a year; 10,000 new non-profit or co-operative housing units which will create over 20,000 jobs; an anti-recession program to help municipalities, schools, school boards, hospitals and colleges—for example, in London over $1 million for a new facility for the art gallery, $250,000 towards sewer and road work, $687,000 for renovations and improvements to the St Joseph's Health Centre, over $1 million to help in renovations with Marion Villa here in London, and at St Thomas an estimated $10 million towards bridge repairs, road work, sewer repairs and a new recreation centre, and there is no question that money is going to go to generating thousands of person-hours of work—the decision not to piggyback the provincial sales tax on top of the GST, leaving $470 million in people's pockets; money for research and development; relief for farmers; social assistance reforms; additional funding for victims of sexual and domestic violence.

Liberals and Conservatives say they would have a much lower deficit, but at what cost? What would a balanced budget look like? To balance the budget, two things have to happen: increase revenues and cut services. Let's increase some revenues: the sales tax in the province from 8% to 9.1%; individual income taxes by 14% of current levels; hike taxes on gasoline and tobacco by 14%. Let's cut some spending: cut spending to our schools at all levels by $920,000; cut spending to social services by another $726 million, with the remaining $1.5 billion to be spread among the other 20 or so ministries. The end result may well be a balanced budget, but what would that mean to a city like ours?

In a community like London, people would be faced with a 14% overall provincial tax hike. Health spending in London would be cut by $39 million. How many beds would that be? How many nurses' salaries is that? Education spending would be cut by $21 million. How many classrooms would have to close? How many teachers would be thrown out of jobs? Social service spending would have to be cut by $16.5 million. Is a city like London going to be able to take up that kind of slack, or do we simply cut families off, keeping in mind that 40% of those recipients are actually children? Eliminating the anti-recession programs would eliminate more than 1,500 jobs in a city the size of London.

In closing, the question I would like to ask the members of this committee is, would a balanced budget produce the kind of Ontario we want? Would a balanced budget make London the kind of city you would want to live in? Our answer is a resounding no. In our view, the budget is a major step in the right direction. It represents an investment in the people of Ontario and this budget lays the groundwork to sustain prosperity into the 1990s. On behalf of CAW, Local 1520, thank you for the opportunity to make our presentation.

Mrs Cunningham: Thank you for your presentation, and especially for informing us what work you do and would like to be doing even more of at Ford. I really preciate it. Coming from my point of view, I suppose we could have a philosophical disagreement with regard to a balanced budget, but for me as an individual, probably this or a balanced budget would not have been possible. Otherwise it would have been. I do not think it would have, but it is certainly something we strive for. The previous presenter was talking about a balanced budget over the next two years. That would be a real challenge, but something I think we have to work towards.

The bottom line for myself in living in this city, and for my children, is that there will be lots of work for them. The thing for myself, and I would like you to comment on that I am saying, is that one of the reasons people are not investing in Ontario—I have been involved with three or four different industries coming to London in the last four or five months and we have been somewhat successful with a couple of them, but people who were looking at us a few years ago are not even looking at Ontario. I think part of it is this uncertainty that we face and the fact that we are running a big deficit.

When I was first elected in London North, I was appalled to think that my kids would have to pay back a debt of some $10 billion, and I am even more appalled to think that in three or four years that could be $80 billion. So as a parent, I have a different point of view.

I have seen where you would make the cuts. Mine would be different, and they would certainly be phased in, probably over about seven years, but it would be my goal. I would just like you to respond to what I say to the public when I am looking for their votes, because that is how I would do it if I were in government now.

Mr Witherspoon: Our view of course does differ somewhat. I guess you, being of political stripe, know or have an opportunity to talk to some of the people who are either coming or going from the province as to whether or not they find it economically sound here.

I am a parent as well. I have two children who are going to be going out into the workforce at some point in time in the near future.

Quite frankly, looking at the budget itself and whether or not it is going to stop people from coming into the province, I turn the tables again, because I think a lot of these jobs that are being lost and the direction in which they are going is not necessarily because of this provincial budget, but it is because of some of the things our federal government has done to us: the whole business of the free trade agreement, the conversation now of a trilateral agreement.

You want to get into the whole business of talking about competitiveness and whether those people are going to be able to come into Ontario and compete. If we are going to talk about competing with people in the southern US and about competing with people in Mexico, if our people are going to work for $3 a day, I guess we can compete.

But that is not the issue at hand, because we have a good, stable workforce. In actual fact, over the past little while we have actually started seeing reports of people who have gone to Mexico or the southern US who are coming back. It is costing them more to produce things, but they are getting a reliable workforce, people who will come to work every day. We have a good workforce. We have a reliable workforce that, given the opportunity, can build extremely good-quality products and what have you that can go back into society.

Mrs Cunningham: I do not disagree with what you are saying, by the way. I would come to the defence of the federal government, no matter what party was in power right now, and I will say that openly and I do say it openly, in that the debts that were built up over the last decade have caused us to be in a terrible mess. My colleagues will be fed up with me talking about being in Victoria, but some of their colleagues were there too and they had the same opportunity I had to listen to the Japanese community talk about charging even higher interest rates to the Canadian government. We borrow over $53 billion now.

I find this whole thing frightening and my position is that we have to manage much more wisely. I speak, by the way, as a person who worked for the government with the Ministry of Community and Social Services. I would put all of my money into the front line, with the social worker and the family, as opposed to the layers and layers of bureaucracy, to try and get things done. So I do know where there can be some cuts.

On something you said with regard to the future and our kids and attracting jobs, we did hear from one person yesterday, and it is a group that I am familiar with, for the small business community out near Fanshawe College. One of the businesses that was here yesterday happened to be, to put it in a wide term, in technology. We chatted last evening on the phone. Most of those businesses find themselves quite competitive, but they are very small. I think there are places where we are competitive, basically because I think we do have some bright young people who will contribute to the world, and second, I think we do have a great workforce with good ethics. But one of the—

The Chair: I am afraid I have to cut you off, Mrs Cunningham. The time is up.

Mrs Cunningham: Could I just ask a question? We started this morning at 9 o'clock. This group started at 9:30. Where are we going to make up the time?

The Chair: This group started at 9:15.

Mrs Cunningham: Are we going to lose some time, because I think they are very sincere in their presentation.

The Chair: But each party has its opportunity to ask, an equal amount of time in questions.

Mrs Cunningham: Can we not have more time with this group, since we have time to make up?

The Chair: We do not know, because the other group can come in.

Mrs Cunningham: Can we come back at it then if the other groups do not come in?

The Chair: We have been following the schedule. What we have done is fit in another group. I am sorry, but your time has run out.

Mr Christopherson: To Rick and Dusty, welcome. Thank you for the hospitality we are receiving here in London. I am enjoying your comments, and obviously the opposition members are too, based on their desire to continue dialogue with you.

A straight, simple question: There has been a fair bit of discussion by a lot of presenters and by opposition members about the ability of Ontario business, particularly manufacturing, to compete. I would like to ask you how competitive you feel the Ford Motor Co in St Thomas is.

Mr Witherspoon: I guess with that I would have to ask, who are you asking us to be competitive with? If you are talking about the Big Three throughout the rest of Canada and the United States, we as union representatives sit down with the company on a regular basis to look at the state of our economics as far as the company in comparison is concerned. There is no question that we compare, that we stack up with anybody else who is producing the calibre of vehicles that we are. I think it is important that when you talk about that, you have to deal with apples and apples. As far as any other manufacturer that is building the same type of units that we are is concerned, we stack up with anybody—probably better.

Mr Christopherson: That is the answer I was hoping to get, because the questions from the opposition members of some witnesses tried to lead down the path that we are not competitive and that as a result of this government being elected and the measures of this government, the entire economy is going to hell in a handbasket and we are going to be totally uncompetitive. That is why I thought it was important particularly to ask union representatives in a well-established manufacturing base how you feel about your competitive position, and I am pleased to hear that you are feeling good about that.

I guess the only thing I would ask you is, do you think there is anything in here that is going to change that for you for the worse? Have we done anything that is going to hamper your ability to represent your members and yet still allow the company you work for to remain competitive?

Mr Witherspoon: No. Just to try to put that into perspective, if you take our plant as a stand-alone plant and look at the large car production throughout Canada and the US, our plant alone supplies 14% of that market, as one plant.

Mrs Sullivan: That is 14% of North America?

Mr Witherspoon: Pardon me, 14% of the large car production, not 14% overall by any means.

Mrs Sullivan: Not 14% of the market?

Mr Witherspoon: No.

Mrs Cunningham: It would be nice, though.

Mr Witherspoon: It would be nice, yes. We could not build enough cars.

Mr Phillips: Did the NDP not stamp on large cars, though? Are they not getting rid of the large cars?

Mr Witherspoon: If you want to stay in the vein of that type of production, I do not think you are going to see them go. People have said we are going the way of the dinosaurs with the big cars.

Mr B. Ward: I would like to thank you for your presentation and the support for the direction we are trying to take as a government. We have had pretty well two different interests coming before us. Some, as Gerry often says, are against, and others are for, and we will not know until a year or so down the road who is right. It is a good question.

I too am a parent. My little girl is fairly newborn, five months or six months old, and I am looking farther down the road than next month or next year at what type of society we are going to have when she gets older. My greatest fear is that if we listen to some people and the organizations, we will head down the road the Americans are, where it is an "I'm all right, Jack," dog eat dog, "Who cares about my neighbour?" type of society where 35 million people do not have access to medicare because they cannot afford private insurance. That is my greatest fear.

I was just wondering what your thoughts are had we taken that road. We have attempted to maintain health and education standards in this province during these tough times, recognizing the shortfall in revenue. Let's look farther down the road than even next year. What type of society do we want to have in Ontario, and are we willing to have that commitment to keep that society?

Mr Miller: Rick mentioned earlier that we had 400 people on indefinite layoffs. Of those 400 people, a lot of them are now approaching the point where they are going to run out of unemployment benefits. That means they only have one alternative, and that is the welfare system, to be able to maintain any type of economics in the household at all. We have 400 people in our location who are looking at that in the very near future. In the community we come from, St Thomas, we are looking at between 2,000 and 3,000 people who are running out of benefits.

It is only due to the budget and the moneys that were put into the social assistance program that we are going to help those people through some very tough times. As to the ever-increasing food bank situations and so on that we are finding ourselves in, actually we should not have food banks in Canada today, but we do. We definitely are in some very hard economic times right now, and without the moneys that were put in it would be even worse. What would we do with those people who are running out of benefits when they start lining up at the social assistance offices?

Mr Kwinter: I just want to correct a misconception that a lot of presenters are making; that is, when you say the reality was that this government took power with a $2.5-billion deficit. You should know that when the election was held on September 6 and the government came into power, it was six months into the fiscal period 1990-91. At that time, at the end of the six-month period, the Treasurer reported that there was a $750-million deficit. So when the government came to power, it had a $750-million deficit. At the end of six months that was their doing—they were responsible for six months of that budget—it was not a $2.5-billion deficit, it was a $3.5-billion deficit and that was their doing. They had responsibility for it. They are the ones who could have made the changes or made any adjustments they wanted, but it was $3.5 billion.

Another comment, and I would like to get your reaction: I notice that the Canadian Auto Workers in particular are very critical of free trade. I find it, as the expression goes, passing strange that the CAW would be opposed to free trade, because you have been the beneficiary of a similar free trade agreement, the auto pact. Now 80% of the production of that St Thomas plant goes to the United States and you have been the direct beneficiary of that kind of arrangement. Why would you expect and hope that we could cut that off and that the cars that are made there could go only into the Canadian market?

Mr Miller: First of all, the free trade agreement is totally different than the auto pact. Under the current free trade agreement we lost what we had under the auto pact. We used to have 60% Canadian content under the old auto pact. When free trade came in, we went to 50% North American content. In reality, we lost 400 jobs because of that. We lost production out of our plant to the US and Mexico in order to facilitate the corporate average fuel economy requirements under the free trade agreement. So we lost jobs under free trade in our location. You cannot compare the free trade agreement and the auto pact at all. They are two different things altogether, and under that we did lose, we did not gain.

Mr Turnbull: Mr Chair, on a point of information: I could just like the record to show that last year for the first time in history we actually had a higher amount of sales from Ontario to the US than sales from the US to Ontario.

Ms M. Ward: You're out of order.

Mr Christopherson: Don't come in here and start talking nonsense.

Mr Turnbull: You don't like that, eh? That is the truth.

Mr Phillips: Thank you for your presentation. You are setting on this budget as the one that is the right one. Some of us are concerned it is not. We will only know probably a year or so. I find it unusual for the labour movement to be praising a budget, with 10% unemployment continuing for at least three years, with virtually nothing in it that is going to create jobs in the private sector to put your members to work. I am just a little surprised your brief does not mention anything about job creation, about economic activity, about getting things rolling.

Is the CAW prepared to live with the unemployment rates that are projected in this budget? How free are you to criticize the budget? Just how free is the CAW, with its very strong ties, obviously, to the NDP? How free are you to speak on behalf of your members in the job creation area? A year from now we will be sitting here and either they will have been right and you will say "Yes, they were right," or if some of us are right, I think you will want to be fairly critical of the budget. I am just wondering what freedom you have to move in that area.

Mr Miller: Rick did talk about the job creation programs in the budget. They are nowhere near the numbers we would like to see.

Mr Phillips: I do not think there is anything for the private sector in there.

Mrs Cunningham: There is nothing for the private sector. It is all public.

The Chair: Excuse me. Mr Phillips, you have about 30 seconds.

Mr Phillips: Okay. I have to stop there.

Mr Miller: He did talk about job creation as far as contracting, building, the sewer systems are concerned—the type of things that are being upgraded—and those are let out to private contractors. They are not government jobs.

Mrs Cunningham: They are all short term.

Mr Phillips: What about the free to criticize one?

The Chair: The time has run out.

Mrs Sullivan: Can we just have the answer to this question?

The Chair: Excuse me, the time has run out.

Mrs Sullivan: On a point of order, Mr Chair: Can we have the answer to this question?

The Chair: It depends if the three—

Mrs Cunningham: We all agree.

The Chair: All three parties agree?

Mrs Cunningham: Give me a break. We want the second question answered. You are going to say no?

Mr Sutherland: Are you going to keep badgering and not give him an opportunity?

The Chair: We went through a time period that was agreed upon by the subcommittee.

Mr Turnbull: Open government.

Mr Christopherson: We did fine until you got here.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for your presentation.

LONDON FAMILY COURT CLINIC

The Chair: I will call on the London Family Court Clinic. You have one half-hour for your presentation. Near the end of your presentation, the time will be equally divided among the three parties. Sometimes if the answer or the question becomes a little long, you will be cut off because each party has an equal amount of time. I am not cutting you off because I do not want to hear the answer. Identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard.

Dr Sas: My name is Louise Sas. I am a clinical psychologist at the London Family Court Clinic and I specialize in the preparation of child witnesses for testimony in court. I also do child welfare assessments and young offender assessments, and also assessments for parents who are separating and divorced. These assessments involve custody and access issues.

I am going to talk about a child witness project that was developed here in London to prepare young children to testify in court. I am also going to be talking about some of the issues we have raised with respect to continued funding in this area, and some of the problems we have encountered.

I would like to begin by talking a little bit about the problem itself. I do not know how familiar all of you are in this area. This is going to be a fairly clinical presentation. There will be very little mention about free trade or budgets. I think it will be a topic that is probably very close to all of you in terms of your children and my own children and other children in the community.

Over the last decade or so, there has been a tenfold increase in the reporting of child sexual abuse by children to agencies, to the police, to children's aid societies, to teachers, as well as to parents. I am sure you are aware, just by reading the newspapers and being familiar with what goes on in the media, that more and more children are feeling comfortable in coming forward and talking about the abuse they have experienced. In my opinion, it does not represent an increase in the abuse itself. It is just a society that is more tolerant and willing to listen to the accounts given by children about what happens in their personal lives.

In any event, as a result of these increased allegations, agencies are faced with having to deal with it, deal with the families, the children who are traumatized. As well, the criminal justice system has had to deal very quickly with the increase in allegations, so police are being encouraged in all communities to lay charges in cases where children make allegations. Other agencies—social agencies such as our own—are encouraged to try to respond to the treatment needs and the needs children present once they have been abused.

In 1987, there was a federal initiative in the area of sexual abuse. I think that was as a result of a fair amount of lobbying on the part of professionals across the country, who are very much concerned about the lack of treatment facilities for children who have been abused and the difficulties in the criminal justice system for handling sex abuse cases. As a result, a fair amount of money was put aside for use nationally across the country and we were all encouraged, as researchers and clinicians, to apply for money. The money was to be used in the area of research and the development and evaluation of new programs.

The Family Court Clinic in London historically conducts a fair amount of research in the area of family violence and sexual abuse, and the needs of children with respect to treatment. We applied for funding and were successful in terms of the federal response. We received $360,000 to be spent over a three-year period in a demonstration and evaluation project.

The major goal of the project was to try to come up with a program that would prepare children to testify in court so that they would be more competent child witnesses, providing the court with the information it needed to adjudicate. Also we would attempt to monitor new legislation in this area for dealing with child sexual abuse. We would try to co-ordinate this community's response; that is, co-ordinate all the mandated agencies, such as the police, the children's aid society and the crown attorney's office, to work towards the betterment of how this system would respond to children's needs.

We are very pleased to obtain this federal money. The money was certainly put to use. It was put to use in the development of a very effective court preparation protocol for young children who have to testify in court.

As an aside, I should mention that the research is very definitive, both clinically and in terms of field research, that there is trauma for children who testify in court. First of all, children are traumatized by being sexually abused. We know that many of the children have long-term difficulties which translate into dollars spent in treatment facilities, both inpatient and outpatient. We add further trauma to that when children decide to disclose abuse and the police decide to lay charges on their behalf.

Many children, if any of you have sat in court and watched children testify, may be as young as five years of age. It is a very intimidating, very adult-oriented setting. These children are expected to face the accused person and describe in detail some of the behaviours that have happened and some of the incidents. For many of the children, it is very traumatic. We were concerned about that. Certainly the research supported our concerns that children are made worse by traumatic court situations.

The research also suggests that if you do not deal properly with children at this point, they are going to have long-term difficulties which will translate into many dollars of inpatient treatment and funding towards long-term counselling. So we are not just talking about a short-term event; we are talking about an event that will affect them throughout their childhood and beyond their childhood as they become parents. If they have been sexually abused, their own children will likely suffer as well. We are finding, not only here in Canada but internationally, that children of abused mothers are often abused themselves. It is a very cyclical pattern where the whole role of being a victim is played over and over again across the generations. The project that we developed at the London Family Court Clinic is one of its kind. I think it is really a model for Canada in terms of providing highly sophisticated court preparation for children who have to go and enter the courtroom arena.

In 1988, as you know, Bill C-15 was proclaimed in Parliament. Its new sexual abuse legislation also has some amendments to the Canada Evidence Act. What this has done is made it more possible for children to tell their story in court, which we, of course, are really pleased about. What it has not done is really regulated to this point in time the implementation of the changes in Bill C-15. So although the spirit of the new legislation is very progressive, in the sense that it suggests children be treated differently than they have been in the past in court and their special developmental needs taken into consideration, it has not really had the impact of policing or ensuring or monitoring how different communities actually implement the legislation. You may have some communities where very little is done to make children more comfortable in court, as opposed to other communities where a lot is done.

What I have given to you here is just an executive summary that very briefly describes what we did over the three-year period of time. There is a full evaluation report that is about 200 pages long which I could make available to any of you who have time to read it.

Over the three-year-period, one of the things we learned was that children who present to the courtroom really need a lot of assistance. The crown attorneys were very supportive in our findings, in that they also felt strongly that the children were doing a lot better in court. They were being better witnesses and they were much better oriented to the court procedures. As a result, a lot of the outcomes in terms of what happened in the courtroom, were much more positive. Children were not being destroyed on the stand, were not crying and unable to continue in their testimony, but were fairly strong and competent. As a result, the whole process runs more smoothly.

The other finding we had was that the agencies were willing to be co-ordinated. We developed a local community board made up of police—both city police and the OPP—children's aid societies, crown attorneys and victim-witness individuals. Everybody was working together in this community so that the networking would be much more smooth and there would be integration of services for young children. The result was quite dramatic. The police referred over 98% of the children over a two-and-a-half-year period who had to testify in court. Very few children were missed and as a result services were offered to children which had never been offered before. They were individually prepared for court, not on the facts of the case but on how to present themselves.

Those children who were so distressed as to not be able to testify were given additional treatment in terms of stress reduction therapy, which I will not go into in great detail. Suffice to say, they were able to get on the stand. Almost all of our children were sworn in, so they understood how to give an oath and to testify in court. For the most part they did well. That is not to say none of them were stressed. Certainly some were stressed. But for the most part, there was a great difference, as seen by crown attorneys and police, in the presentation of child witnesses in this area.

The other area I think we were very successful in is dissemination of information, both nationally and internationally. I just came back last night from San Francisco, where I presented a paper on the work we are doing here. We have also submitted some publications. We have had chapters in several books in the area of child witnesses internationally. I can tell you honestly that the work that is being done in the London area really is the cutting edge. We have been invited this summer to a NATO conference to present on our work here in London at the clinic in the area of child witness research.

The federal government provided the money for a three-year-period of time. Two and a half years of that time the money was to be used both in evaluation and clinical services. When the money was ended, when the funding ended for this specific project, we approached the federal government for continued clinical service money. But our understanding on hearing from them was that the money was to be used only for a demonstration and evaluation project, that there had been no commitment—and that is true, right from the start—to provide ongoing clinical service for this community.

There was a lot of distress in this community when the project came to an end, not because of the results—the results were really very positive—but because the community had a sense of what it is like to have a co-ordinated program where children are not shafted, where crown attorneys do spend the time that is necessary to present the cases, where the police do handle the cases sensitively, and where the children are really very competently prepared. I think this community did not want to go back to the status quo that existed prior to funding.

A great deal of pressure was brought to bear on the provincial government to provide funding to continue what we now knew, based on the evaluation, to be a very successful project. The lobbying came from individuals from this community, and I think hundreds of letters—if I am not mistaken—went to the Attorney General and Solicitor General and to Community and Social Services here in Ontario to continue funding this project.

A number of interministerial meetings were held where we attended and gave presentations. There was an attempt on my part to have one of the ministries, either the Ministry of the Attorney General or the Ministry of Community and Social Services, take ownership of this project and continue the clinical aspect.

We do not have a great deal of problem obtaining research money. We have another federal research grant to look at the research aspects of child witness and sexual abuse. What we have had difficulty with is getting money to provide ongoing clinical service, and provide a service which we know, and we have evaluated, and it works.

We approached the Attorney General again last year, because this community was referring children we could not see for preparation, and as a result of a lot of lobbying and I think a fair amount of pressure, it provided us with some interim money for a four-month period, during which we tried to re-establish ourselves on a part-time basis to accommodate some of the children coming in.

One of the roles our clinical staff provide is not just preparation of children, but also expert testimony, so I gave a fair amount of expert testimony in court on behalf of children, talking about issues around sexual abuse and also talking about their need for the screen, which is a provision in the new legislation to protect children, and at times just being there and advocating for children to make sure things go the way the law says they should go and children are protected.

We were able to see some children during that four-month period. Naturally, having closed down the project and having to re-establish it and getting the referral patterns back in and everything, it took several months to get under way. We were recently successful in obtaining funding for this fiscal year to provide clinical services for children. Our expectation is to see about 100 children coming through in the next year who have been sexually abused and will need to testify in court.

We are also providing training for crown attorneys, both locally and across the province. Our staff is involved in a fair amount of professional development, and we also work with the police very closely in providing them with training in the area of child sexual abuse and in the area of child witness issues. At the same time, we are continuing to publish and work on papers across the border, as well as within Canada itself.

I think the reason I was asked to come here today was to try and talk a little bit about what we are doing, but also to emphasize that when the federal initiative was over and our funding for the demonstration evaluation grant came to an end, we really did need the provincial government to come in and pick up the pieces in terms of providing what we knew was a really effective and in my view very important program. The children continue to come to the door. What we envision is that there will be increases again. If we can accept the statistics from the children's aid society about the number of cases of sexual abuse presented to the agency, we know for a fact that the numbers are not going to go down, and this problem is not just going to go away.

It also translates into money, I think, saved in the long term, because of the treatment needs of these children, if you follow them through the system, and I have done that with many cases through the children's aid society. We are talking about children when they reach adolescence. The girls very often become runaways. They get involved in the criminal justice system, not in assault cases but in cases of wilful damage, running away, break and enters and property offences.

The male children who have been sexually abused, we often find, become abusers themselves. Some of the children who were first referred to our project who were male and who were involved in homosexual attacks have recently been charged. We have 25 of our initial 100 who have been charged themselves and involved in the criminal justice system, the boys as assaulters and the girls as victims again and runaways and involved in prostitution.

The problem does not just end with that incident. I think there are costs involved for provincial and federal governments in terms of the long-term needs of these children, so I really feel that when the provincial government agreed to provide funding—it is to the tune of about $140,000 a year; it is not a great amount of money, but it allows us to see approximately 100 children and provide clinical service and research and training—it is really an investment in the future in this community in children.

These sexually abused children do not represent a great number of all the children in this province, or even in this area, but I would imagine that the estimate of about two out of 10 children is probably conservative. There are probably more than that, so for every 10 children you see in a classroom, there are probably two, maybe even three children who have been abused either familially, that is within their own family or extended family, or by someone in the community they know. Only 13% of the children we see are abused by a stranger. So it is myth that children are necessarily safer within their homes or their extended homes than they are on the street. It is really very frightening what is happening in our society today with respect to children.

As a first step, the acceptance of children's disclosures is very important and providing a climate in our country where children feel free and comfortable to talk about what has happened to them. Beyond that, we have to respond.

The literature shows us that if offenders are not dealt with, and there are no deterrents in our criminal justice system, they go on to have many more victims. In fact, in the United States there is research coming out that the average offender has 200 or 300 victims before being caught, especially the paedophiles.

We are not talking about one or two incidents on the part of one perpetrator and one victim; we are talking about many children in a community being victimized by the same individual. If you have one child who is strong enough and willing enough to come to court and provide testimony, that may well result in a conviction and some time in a rehabilitative centre or in jail or on probation for an offender and you may well be saving many children that same community from the same fate.

Mr Winninger: There have been many presentations before this committee over the last day and a half or so that I have sat on it, and the thrust of some of these presentations is that in a time of recession you should not be spending any money on new programs, that in fact you should cut back on existing programs. I wonder if you would agree with me, in light of your comment, that by not paying now, we can pay a lot more for the kind of social and special educational and correctional services later, that not paying now is actually a very short-sighted approach, and that to spend money during a recession for social services is not throwing money away.

Dr Sas: I certainly agree with that. I think in particular when you are talking about children who have their whole futures ahead of them, not putting the money now for the treatment needs and not educating the community about the social problem that exists with respect to the sexual abuse of children, for example, is not putting money where you need to, and you are going to pay for it anyway. I know.

A lot of the children who are referred to the clinic in the other areas, such as the young offender area or child welfare area where we do assessments, are children who have been in and out of systems for years and years at a per diem of $100 a day or more in some of our children's mental health centres where I think the cost to the government is incredibly great. Plus, I know that some of our young mothers were children who were abused themselves and have since gone on the street, become pregnant and have babies of their own, where the children's aid society has to go in and remove them or provide care. The dollars are incredible for each child.

What we offer in our particular little service, which I think can be generalized to other social services for children, is an opportunity to come in and do the right thing at the right time. We are doing a longitudinal study now on the impact of intervening at the right time for children. The results are looking very promising that it makes a difference. So I agree the money is well spent.

Mr B. Ward: Just as a follow-up, perhaps you could expand on this statement as well: This problem would exist in good times and bad times, and by not recognizing that the problem is there, we are putting our heads in the sand and saying there is no problem.

Dr Sas: I think the problem has always existed. I do not think we are seeing an increase in child sexual abuse per se. I think we are seeing an increase in physical abuse of children as a result of the hard times, the present economic times. There is a lot more pressure on families, a lot more family dysfunction as a result. Some of the child abuse areas, such as neglect, deprivation and physical assault, are probably on the increase as a result of the recession. Sexual abuse I think is a different ball game. I think it has existed and will continue to exist at a rate. The reporting is going up, not the actual behaviours.

Regardless of whether there is a recession or not, you have to continue to provide funding for children in these areas. I think it is not a luxury; I think it is a basic.

Mrs Sullivan: I want to move away from the specific delivery which is being offered in London to a broader question. One of the things that has been a matter of some consideration over a period of time relates to the integration of service delivery to children, whether it is mental health services, whether it is services offered for protection through children's aid societies, witness programs, family violence and sexual abuse programs, with integration of funding. I understand that most of the funding, for example, for your clinic would come from the federal government with supplements from the province. Is that right?

Dr Sas: No, that is not correct. Forty per cent of our budget is from the provincial Ministry of Community and Social Services. That is block funding towards young offenders research and clinical services. All the rest of our money is fee-for-service and grants that we ourselves generate.

Mrs Sullivan: It is a chargeback.

Dr Sas: Yes. There may be some federal grants in there, such as I described to you, but there certainly is no block funding from the federal government at all for our projects.

Mrs Sullivan: Could you speak then to the question of integration of delivery of services to children. I think it is an important question we have to come to terms with, not only in service delivery but in terms of the funding.

Dr Sas: I think one of the concerns of agencies like my own, if I try to generalize a little bit beyond the child witness project, is that you really do need, in my view, solid block funding from both the federal and the provincial government, and it really has to be shared for agencies that provide clinical services and research for children.

What happens is that you have your clinicians and research people scrambling on a year-to-year basis trying to do the research necessary to document the value of the programs you are providing, as well as provide the ongoing clinical services. We are all suffering, certainly not just the clinic. The clinic is very successful in terms of getting research moneys, but that is unusual.

Most clinical services for children—I mean the majority, maybe 80%—do not have as many psychologists on staff. We have sort of developed in that way, to write for the grants and apply, to be aggressive and go after the various granting agencies for money to provide services. I feel very strongly that there has to be a significant federal contribution.

If I get a little specific and give an analogy, in the area of child witness and child sexual abuse, certainly the federal government responded very positively to concerns across the country and to a lot of lobbying in terms of what child sexual abuse victim needs, and actually provided—I do not remember the amount—a fairly large amount of money to do that research.

Once the research was done over the three-year period and all our different agencies across the country and we showed what was needed, then the clinicians and researchers were in the position of saying that this works, that does not work, this is what needs to be done, and then no one wants to pick up the tab.

My view may be naïve but we found ourselves getting caught up in a struggle between the federal government and the provincial government as to who was going to pay for something that we knew was helping children, and that we really felt needs to be done across the country.

Mrs Cunningham: Thank you for being here today. We have both worked in social services for a long time so I know what you are trying to say today. I guess one of the questions I object to are across-the-board cuts and what would we do without programs and what not. I think the better question would be, would you not rather spend your $140,000 on front-line support to children than $59,000 to a chauffeur for the president of TVOntario or doubling political staff in ministry offices?

I want to get that on the record because I have been sitting here now for over a day listening to this ridiculous question that people like myself would like to cut funding to social services. You and I both worked there, and if you and I were running it, I tell you, the front-line workers would be there to support kids, not all the bureaucracy. I am not going to ask you to comment on that, but you and I both know what is happening. I will just say that.

It was the wrong question to ask the wrong presenter today. I am sorry Mr Winninger is not here, but perhaps you could relay my question to his colleagues.

With regard to the front-line work money that is coming, being a representative now in London, along with two of my colleagues—I think I am following up on the question from my colleague behind me—we are hearing about duplication of services in a naïve way, I think. There must be some room for agencies to work together. When one is trying to get funding from three different levels of government, it is very difficult for us in our job to know just which way to move. I wonder if you could give us some advice.

Dr Sas: Certainly. I think there is some duplication in the city, although probably a lot less in this area than in some other communities I am familiar with. There has been a real attempt, in the last eight years or so, for agencies to get together. For example, there is a central intake committee and there is a difficult-to-serve committee that gets together. All the agencies will meet. There is also a child abuse council. I think you will find that in this community there is a real attempt not to have duplication of services.

One of the things that worked well for us, a small model that I think could perhaps be right as a model for other communities as well against the whole issue of providing duplication of services, is setting up local advisory boards and community groups, with representatives from the different agencies, where the actual tasks are parcelled out.

We were very successful in the child witness area. It is very easy to have duplication of services in that area because you have the police interacting with the crown attorney's office, interacting with the children's aid society and local treatment facilities, which all provide a certain part of the piece for the children who have been sexually abused. We have to be very careful about not providing duplication. I do not want to prepare someone who has already been prepared. You do not want the crown attorney doing the police's work and what not. I think by setting up protocols where each agency has responsibility for a certain aspect of that child's care and there is a case manager, it works much better.

Mrs Sullivan: One adult being in touch with the child.

Dr Sas: The case manager, yes, one person who controls, on agreement, everybody's role. We are talking about individuals now, but you can be talking about agencies, one agency sort of overseeing or monitoring a certain aspect.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation.

We are about 10 minutes ahead. Maybe what we will do is take a recess for 10 minutes. If it is the committee's wish, if the three parties here wish to extend beyond the time already laid out by the subcommittee, if you want to say one group has 45 minutes and one group has 35 minutes—this is what I am going by, the schedule of the subcommittee.

Mrs Sullivan: I think from time to time it is useful to extend the hearings, particularly if there is a gap because a witness has not shown and there is concurrence from the committee. We could have proceeded, for instance, to have heard the answer from the CAW to the last question. There may have been some interest when there was not a time schedule. I think that to go through the entire schedule and say, "Yes, we'll give this person five more minutes," or whatever—I think it has to be on an ad hoc basis. If there is concurrence, based on a witness not appearing, then surely we can act as mature adults and not simply be cut off.

Mrs Cunningham: Mr Chairman, on that point, I think, in fairness to yourself, you did give us that opportunity and people could see that the witness was not here. We were asked by you if the question could be answered and quite frankly the government member said no. I think from now on we should start using our common sense. Thank you for asking us.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chairman, if I could just make a comment before Mrs Cunningham leaves the room, I have no—

Mrs Cunningham: As far as leaving the room is concerned, your people get up and leave the room. Every time they ask a question, they then leave. I am leaving too.

Mr Sutherland: Mrs Cunningham, the only reason I said that was you had just made a comment and I thought you might want to hear a response.

Mrs Cunningham: You are not one of the culprits, Mr Sutherland, so you do not have to worry.

Mr Sutherland: That was the only reason I mentioned it.

Mrs Cunningham: You are not one of the culprits.

Mr Sutherland: In response to the comments made, in a situation such as the last presenter, that is fine if there is mutual consent to extend time on questions of basic information. In terms of the previous presenter, however, one of the reasons the time ran out was because members of both parties were not giving an opportunity to answer the question. They were interfering, either with interjections or asking additional questions. If that is going to be the case, Mr Chair, I would advise you then that time should not be extended in those situations. In those ones where it is just pieces of additional information, such as with the last presenter, then I think you should use your best judgement.

The Chair: As the Chairman here, I have been trying to have the presenter or the questioner wind up having the whole answer completed, but sometimes when the preamble gets too long I have to say it is at the end.

The committee will recess for about 10 minutes.

The committee recessed at 1020.

COMMUNITY HOMES OF SOUTHWESTERN ONTARIO INC

The Chair: We would like to welcome the Community Homes of Southwestern Ontario to our hearings. You will have one half-hour for your presentation. Try to save some time near the end for a question and answer period which will be divided equally among the three parties. Would you identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard.

Ms Coulson: I am Marnie Coulson. I am the manager of Community Homes of Southwestern Ontario. Community Homes is a resource group accredited by the Co-operative Housing Federation of Canada. We provide consulting services to non-profit co-operative housing groups. We serve both the London community and southwestern Ontario. Today, I am going to focus on the issue of housing in London, however, rather than a broader perspective. I probably will not need the full half-hour, or even 20 minutes of it for my presentation, but once I get going, you never know.

The Co-operative Housing Association of Ontario presented a brief, which I believe all the members of the committee received, in Toronto last week. A lot of the more global provincial comments I will leave to that report, as I think they were very clearly outlined in our brief presented at that time. What I want to do this morning is to give you an idea of the state of housing in London and focus it in terms of our own community's needs in the province. Therefore, I want to talk to the budget in terms of housing.

I appreciate the opportunity to speak in front of the committee. Certainly in London we applaud the potential development of 10,000 units in Ontario, presuming that because of the need for affordable housing in our own community, we will be provided some of those affordable housing units. The supply of affordable housing has not kept pace with the demand for assisted housing in London. I am sure some of my co-workers in London have talked to you about the Listening to London study that was put out in 1990 and some of the findings that were indicated there. Although we have found that the co-op sector has provided over 1,500 units in the city, and the non-profit sector has provided almost 2,000 units, we are still finding that the need for affordable housing has not been met.

I have provided the committee with a State of Housing in London fact sheet rather than the whole context of what I was going to say today. I have tried to focus in on and just highlight specific items that relate to our community. Often people think of London as a very wealthy community. I think you have probably heard a lot that counteracts that opinion in the last day and a half. I have indicated our vacancy rate. Although it is 4% in the community, in our assisted housing, which is our non-profit co-op and London Housing Authority stock, it is 0.5%. There is very little turnover and it is a very low vacancy rate. I have indicated some of the need and demand.

As well as being the manager of Community Homes, I am also on the board of the London Housing Authority and I am also the chairperson of the community housing advisory committee for the city of London, so I have a very general view of the situation of housing in the community.

In terms of London Housing, as I indicated, the waiting list as of the end of July was 1,360 people. I have given you the breakdown of families, seniors and singles. The waiting list in January was 1,146. This represents an increase of 19%. Our housing authority waiting list, as you can see, is rapidly increasing. Community Homes also keeps a waiting list, and I have put that down. There are other non-profit groups in the city that have waiting lists. Our individual co-ops keep waiting lists, but in terms of our own statistics, we are looking at over 500 people who require affordable housing in the community.

In the 1991 municipal housing statement I have quoted before, which actually is in a draft form but our community housing advisory committee reviewed it yesterday, it reports that we still have a need in 1991 and 1992 for another 2,300 or 2,400 assisted housing units in our city to meet the need. Of the people who are in need, 42% are in the deep core category. I have included those figures and the categories for you just for reference. The $14,000 to $27,000 indicates one bedroom to four bedrooms, which is where the differential comes from. I have also reflected in the stats from the fact that home ownership for the citizens of London is becoming far out of their reach, as it is in other communities in Ontario. Only 14% of the renters in London, according to the Listening to London survey, can afford to buy a home.

I have touched very briefly on the issue of homelessness. A survey was conducted on March 15 of this year and we are trying to get a handle on how many people are in the streets of London. If you talk to people on our municipal council, I am sure a lot of them think there are not any homeless people in our community, but certainly this evening we found 253 people were in shelters at the time. One of the things we recently set up through the community housing advisory committee is a steering committee to address the issue of homelessness in London. So we too, as other areas of the province, have our problems with people forced to live on the street.

Those are essentially the statistics. The other thing I have not touched on is the needs of the disabled people in our community and Dorothy Nordemann, who is following me from the March of Dimes, will be addressing that issue more specifically, so I have not touched on that issue in my report.

The other thing is that the 10,000 units in the 1991 budget will stimulate the economy in London. Right now, the reality of the issue is that very little private rental housing is being built outside the non-profit sector. I have just come up with some statistics. I have not given them to you, but I thought I would just verbally report them.

Between January and July of this year the assisted housing starts for town houses were 333 units. For the private sector there were no new town house starts. For the apartment sector, assisted housing was 117 and there were 233 private, but 176 of those have just been in July. As you can see, the co-op and non-profit sector is providing most of the units for people who cannot afford home ownership. The 10,000 units promised in the budget will certainly help this community in terms of stimulating our economy and helping the unemployed construction workers in this city. The other statistic I wanted to share with you is that we expect 500 more co-op and non-profit units between now and the end of the year. So I think there really will be a stimulation of the sector.

Essentially this will create between 2,000 and 2,300 new jobs for local people. Also, I think most people on this committee are aware of the social benefits of co-op and non-profit housing, particularly co-op, because that is our main emphasis at Community Homes. Co-op housing represents a unique form of tenure which encourages the creation of community development and personal development. We feel that is a very positive contribution to our community in terms of providing another form of tenure to the citizens of London, and co-ops have also been very much of a leader in the inclusion of housing for special needs in our complexes.

The final point I would like to make is that given the cutbacks we have noticed from the federal level, certainly in the index linked mortgage program, and also in the federal-provincial housing program for co-ops and non-profits, the federal government has withdrawn its support. It now is up to Ontario to bear the responsibility in the area of housing policy and I think they have shown leadership in the consultation paper that was released in June, A Housing Framework For Ontario. Community Homes applauds the government's initiative in this area and I think it demonstrates the ability of this government to co-operate and develop partnerships towards providing affordable housing to the citizens of Ontario.

My comments were strictly towards the housing issues reflected in the provincial budget of the 10,000 non-profit units. I would be glad to answer any questions as to the further impact on the community of London I have not touched on.

1040

Mrs Sullivan: I do not have a lot of questions, but I did want to ask what your maximum unit prices are in London. I should know that but I do not.

Ms Coulson: I should too and I did not bring them. Sorry.

Mrs Sullivan: Generally do you know if your assisted housing is now able to be built below the MUP level, the cost?

Ms Coulson: We have noticed a certain effect on land and construction costs because of the recession, yes.

Mrs Sullivan: So the units coming on stream, the 500 you expect before the end of the year, you expect to have built below the MUPs?

Ms Coulson: We do not relate it necessarily to the MUPs because we have always had problems with the MUPs in this community. We have always felt they were set unrealistically. The issue is that we know we can get competitive prices from the construction trades and that the developers in town are much more readily negotiating the price of land.

Mrs Sullivan: When you say you have had historical problems with the MUPs, have they been set too low for this community?

Ms Coulson: Yes, they have, because we tender most of our projects out. We deal with the contractors in the community and we found that the price of construction has been increasing yearly.

Mrs Sullivan: I also wanted to ask about the 233 private sector apartments coming on stream. What income level or what rental level are they directed at? What market are they serving?

Ms Coulson: That is a good point, and the 4% vacancy rate also indicates that it is mainly high-end income earners that are being built for right now, and the 4% is basically in the high end.

Mrs Sullivan: The vacancy rate is at the high end and the new apartments coming on are also at the high end of the market, so there will probably be an oversupply at the high end of the market and not very much coming on other than the assisted housing?

Ms Coulson: Yes. As I mentioned in my comments, it is not feasible for the private sector at this point to meet the affordable housing need.

Mrs Sullivan: Is any government land being used in the co-op and non-profit areas in the new units coming on stream?

Ms Coulson: There are no government land parcels available in London. Certainly the Co-operative Housing Association of Ontario has been lobbying with the government, the Liberals before and the NDP now, to release government lands for the purpose of affordable housing and certainly Community Homes would support that. At this point, there is no available stock as far as we know in this community. We certainly would be open to it.

Mrs Cunningham: Good to see you again. It is always interesting to see the figures from London because that is not the way we are portrayed in the province, as you can imagine, having people on waiting lists for affordable housing. What is your hope of getting any of the money with regard to the units that have been announced? My particular experience has been with the Homes Now program, and we were not particularly successful. I hope we will be more successful with this announcement.

Ms Coulson: Unfortunately the need has always been articulated more in Toronto and Ottawa. Certainly my role on the board of the Co-operative Housing Association of Ontario is to remind them that there is life outside Toronto and that we also have a housing need. I have done lobbying with one of the MPPs so they really do know the state of housing here. I feel I have been fairly successful in articulating the need in this community, so I feel fairly positive about what units we will get. Actually we did fairly well under the Homes Now program. The federal-provincial units have been scarce in this community, I think partially because of the drawback from the federal funds.

Mrs Cunningham: We had the housing people here yesterday who are very concerned about the building of private sector housing. With your experience, the private sector housing in London is fairly expensive for the kind of families you are serving. Is that correct?

Ms Coulson: Right.

Mrs Cunningham: Do you see any hope of building private sector housing at the low end of the scale given the land availability in London in the next five years?

Ms Coulson: I am not sure, Dianne, if I know your question. Are you saying, do I think they will provide any housing?

Mrs Cunningham: Will there be any starts, given your experience in working with that industry?

Ms Coulson: Basically they are working with groups like Community Homes to provide that housing. All of our housing stock is developed by most of the home builders that would have been represented. In that sense they are still building our housing. It is just that we are having another form of tenure on the housing. I do not think you are going to have private sector straight rental projects built in the next while. It is just not feasible for them to do. From our point of view, we see that as positive because our focus certainly is control for people over their housing. We feel the way to do that is through co-ops and not-for-profit housing.

Mrs Cunningham: What happens to the people in the London Housing Authority, though? In a co-op we are expecting at least some of their own funds to be involved. Of the waiting list in London Housing right now, about 80% of those people would not be eligible to be part of these kinds of programs. Of the waiting list as it was presented to me two weeks ago, none of these families, or less than 20% of them, could even be involved in any way. Basically that would be the disabled community. What do you do about everybody else? This is a philosophical question, but what do you do? What do you think we should do? You are there.

Ms Coulson: I provided you with a stat sheet also and the London Housing Authority waiting list is increasing rapidly.

Mrs Cunningham: I know.

Ms Coulson: That is for general reasons in that people will not sit on a waiting list for two or three years. Part of the process that is interesting is an initiative undertaken by the Ministry of Housing to look at the potential of housing authority stock in terms of another form of tenure. I really applaud that effort because recently in the media in London there has been a community of London Housing Authority stock where the neighbours have wanted to change the name of their street so that it is reflected on to this community. The time has come for us to stop ghettoizing people.

I would like to see the mix of incomes continue and either change the tenure of the housing authority stock, do major rehab on some of it if you have seen any of it recently, and also provide opportunities for people to have control over their housing. Although that may not address the waiting list as much, I think we need to provide more affordable housing, and that is why I applaud the 10,000 new units in the budget. We also need to take care of the people in our communities right now on the housing authority to make those communities not housing of last resort, because there are some people in this community who refuse to move into London Housing. They will sit in rental and pay more than 30% of their income towards housing rather than be in one of the housing authority projects.

50

Mr Stockwell: I do not see anything wrong with that, quite honestly, but let's carry on.

Ms Coulson: Sorry, with what?

Mr Stockwell: Someone choosing to stay in a unit and pay more than 30%. If that is their choice, that is fine. There are a lot of people I know who pay a hell of a lot more than 30% on their mortgage and choose to do that as well. It seems you are caught in this malaise that most communities are caught in, that if you do not have any government building you have no building. Would that be correct?

Ms Coulson: No, as I say, there is the high-end market.

Mr Stockwell: But I am saying at the affordable level.

Ms Coulson: That would be correct.

Mr Stockwell: When was the last time you had any kind of private sector affordable building?

Ms Coulson: As I say, the private sector works in partnership with us.

Mr Stockwell: No, I am saying private sector operated and private sector owned; no government money.

Ms Coulson: In rental?

Mr Stockwell: Yes.

Ms Coulson: I think there have always been programs for the private sector to provide housing, so there has always been assisted housing in the past through some of the government programs, pure private sector.

Mr Stockwell: Yes, but what I am driving at is private sector owned and operated, built with no government money at the affordable level.

Ms Coulson: I think it would be some years.

Mr Stockwell: Have you noticed since the government has been involved in this that the problem has eased, that the housing crisis has eased?

Ms Coulson: I think the non-profit, co-op sector is providing a lot of affordable housing in this community and starting to meet the need.

Mr Stockwell: If rent controls were not introduced, do you think it could be provided by the private sector?

Ms Coulson: My feeling about rent controls is not something I was addressing today. I think they are doing that next door. Rent controls are just going to happen. I do not think we have any control over the private sector at that point and the rents are just going to go up without controls.

Ms M. Ward: Thank you for your presentation. The statistics you provided us show an increase of 19% in six months, I believe, January to July, on the waiting list.

Ms Coulson: Yes.

Ms M. Ward: My question is, what do you expect in the future? Given that we have been in the recession for over a year, there are probably a lot of people on UI and with the cutbacks on that, with their UI due to run out and possibly being forced on to social assistance, do you expect a further increase in the waiting lists and the demand for assisted housing to continue to increase in the immediate future?

Ms Coulson: Yes, I do, because I feel that when we get calls from people and they ask us how long it is going to be before they will be provided a unit, whether it is a housing authority unit or a non-profit, co-op housing unit and we say it will be two to three years, they normally do not fill in the material to get on the waiting list. I feel homelessness is a problem. There are the invisible people without affordable housing in this community. I think homelessness is going to become an issue and the waiting lists are just going to get longer.

Ms M. Ward: And they possibly do not even reflect the real need. As you say, people knowing there is a two- or three-year wait do not pursue it.

Ms Coulson: That is right. I think the stats I provided, the draft municipal statement—I saw just yesterday the stats are that we need at least 2,500 extra affordable housing units in the community. That is as recent as we can get.

Mr B. Ward: First thing this morning we had a presenter who was advocating a balanced budget. His suggestion to achieve that would be to eliminate all new spending and cut back elsewhere with existing programs. I think that philosophy, in essence, would have eliminated any initiative in affordable housing from the government, whether non-profit or co-op. What do you say to people who have the view that during these tough times we should be eliminating the affordable housing initiatives our government attempted to implement?

Ms Coulson: I think the comments you probably heard from Rev Eagle said it better than anyone could say it, as I heard on media coverage this morning. But without doing some of the spending the NDP government is proposing, it would impact on housing people. I think Mr Stockwell has indicated that lots of people pay 30% of their income. I hardly think it is the low-income earners who pay that. The more they pay on their rent, the higher rent they pay, the less they have for food and the more food banks we have. I think that has really been demonstrated in our province. It has certainly been demonstrated in our city. That kind of thinking is just not appropriate. We are concerned about the people of London.

Mr Stockwell: That is totally out of context, Mr Chair.

The Chair: Wait a minute. Excuse me. Mr Stockwell, the presenter has her—

Mr Stockwell: I have a right to comment, Mr Chairman. That is not what I said. I can give her reams of lists of people—

The Chair: Okay, it is in Hansard.

Mr Stockwell: —who are in that kind of predicament. They are paying more than 30%.

The Chair: Okay, we will carry on.

Mr Winninger: There is a lot of interest right now in revitalizing the downtown core of London, residential infilling and that sort of thing. I understand the maximum unit prices in London are not as high as those in Toronto and it is forcing agencies like your own to look for land outside of the core area, where it might be cheaper or more available. Is that a problem for you? Do you require higher MUPs in order to acquire the land base in downtown London, to develop the core rather than encouraging urban sprawl?

Ms Coulson: I was asked the question about the MUP earlier. Because of the recession, I think the MUP is a little bit better in terms of being able to negotiate land, but land in the core area has always been expensive and that is an issue, recession or no recession. It is valuable land and the developers will hold on to it. Essentially we have had to resort to the extremities of the city. The services are not as available for people in terms of amenities and shopping that some of the other social service agencies may or may not need to tie into. It is an issue for us.

Mrs Sullivan: I am very interested in your comments about changing the tenure relationship to public housing and wonder whether you would like to take some time to put on the record some of your views about the way public housing tenure could change.

Ms Coulson: If you understand that I am coming from a co-op housing initiative, our belief is that the more control people have over their living environments and the more they can make decisions in their lives, the better quality of life they will have. In the housing authority projects, I feel that the lack of control over people's lives, and the kinds of communities that unfortunately have been developed in those housing developments, do not allow people to develop with personal growth or do not foster a lot of community development.

Recently we have seen in London that community people have gone into the communities to assist and do some of the community development. I do not mean to say that people from the church and other organizations working with people and our housing authority are not doing a good job; they are. They certainly have developed a lot of programs and have got a lot of initiatives started in the community. But I think the problem needs some assistance. We need a formalized system and to put more efforts into it and assist the people who are in the community struggling with the people to make quality of life an issue.

Mrs Sullivan: In Halton we have seen the housing authority move quite reluctantly into allowing residents of public housing projects to become responsible and take responsibility in operational decisions in terms of management of the projects and provision of recreational facilities and programs and other social issues that help to define a community. Is that the kind of thing you are talking about, or are you talking about something substantially different in terms of the way the properties are owned or where the tenants themselves have a different kind of stake?

Ms Coulson: Our wish would be to see a co-op style of management, but that is not necessarily what the people who live in the complex may feel. That would be the decision. What I would like to see is that the people who live there have some say about what happens in their communities and the kinds of programs that are available, recreational, educational or environmental. I think people have a lot of good ideas of how they want to see their housing structured, run and maintained and so on. If we go into the communities and work together with the people who live there, listen to what their needs are and work together to meet some of those needs, that is what I am talking about, but I think we need to ask first. As I say, my bias is co-op housing, but that does not mean that is for everyone or that it is what the people who are living in those communities will want.

ONTARIO MARCH OF DIMES

The Chair: The next group is the Ontario March of Dimes. Come forward, please. You will have half an hour for your presentation. Try to save some time at the end for questions and answers equally divided among the three parties. You may begin by identifying yourselves for the purposes of Hansard.

Ms Nordemann: My name is Dorothy Nordemann. I am the Homelink co-ordinator with the Ontario March of Dimes.

Mr Suchak: My name is Jeff Suchak. I am community services manager here for the London region of the March of Dimes.

Ms Nordemann: The Homelink project was initiated in the fall of 1987 to assist persons with disabilities to find accessible, affordable and appropriate housing. This project is funded by the Office for Disability Issues of the Ministry of Citizenship. I think we are one of the few known projects. Not a lot of people know about us, so thank you for letting us speak. The Homelink project started with five offices in 1987 and was expanded in 1989 with an additional five offices in the province. The Homelink offices are linked with community-based organizations such as the Ontario March of Dimes and independent living centres. The money is transferred from the Office for Disability Issues to the host agencies.

The Homelink concept is simple. We are to provide a link between persons with disabilities who are looking for housing and landlords who are looking for renters or tenants. Homelink centres maintain inventories of accessible rental accommodations in the private and non-profit sectors. This information is then made available to persons with disabilities who are seeking housing. There are no hidden fees or costs of any of these services to anyone.

Since the inception of the program, many offices have found themselves doing more than just matching individuals needing housing with landlords. They have found themselves doing advocacy work on disability issues and barrier-free design consultations for architects and other agencies, including non-profit and co-op groups seeking housing allocations. We are involved with groups such as ccess to permanent housing committees, which are funded by the Ministry of Community and Social Services, national access awareness committees, etc.

With continued involvement in committees and in the community, the Homelink centres have made a significant link for anyone needing information regarding housing and barrier-free design. They themselves have become an integral part of the movement to make the province and this country a more accessible place for people to live.

The Homelink centres across the province are facing some major concerns as the programs become more integral in the community. The co-ordinators see at first hand how inaccessible housing in this province can be. Our lists demonstrate the great demand needed for accessible units. I have provided you with a list from the 10 Homelink centres in the province of all the waiting lists they are currently holding. It ends up being two pages.

I have also included a breakdown of the support service living units needed in those areas. In London, for example, I have 56 people waiting for housing, be they rent-geared-to-income housing or full accessibility with power counters. Out of that, 13 people need support service living units. Included with my list as well are Cheshire Homes of London. They have 57 people waiting on their list for support service living units.

Besides a person needing an accessible unit, a rent-geared-to-income component needs to be in place for some people. The only way we obtain these is through the local housing authorities or through the non-profit, co-op sectors. These again, as Marnie has said previously, can be two to three years in waiting. Support services may also need to be in place. So beyond a person needing a rent-geared-to-income component, he also may need attendant care services to live in the community.

This would give them the opportunity to live like we are. We are considered tabbies, temporarily able-bodied persons. We take this for granted. We can move wherever we want. We can work wherever we want. But if a disabled individual needs housing, he stays here. If their support services are then needed, they are going to have to put up with that in place. They cannot move from city to city and take those services with them.

Last week I did a cost analysis of what it costs per person to keep someone at Cheshire Homes of London, as opposed to keeping someone at Parkwood. There are good reasons why Parkwood has the rehab, and we need those. If someone has just incurred a disability and needs to go through the social service program, there is a good reason why it is $400 a day. We currently have people in Parkwood in rehab beds, as well as chronic care beds, waiting for housing and all they need is housing. They need some attendant care services, but the costs are so different. Cheshire III here in the city offers the highest amount of attendant care. At $86 per day for staff their housing subsidy, at most, is $15 a day. At the end of the year it constitutes $37,000 a year, whereas if you have someone in a long-term care bed at Parkwood it is $79,000 a year.

You cannot tell me that this is not economically viable. More people need to live normal lives like we do and if they are stuck in Parkwood or any of the rehab hospitals and cannot live in an individual apartment like you or me, we are denying them some human rights as well.

I presently am working with an individual who is a former resident of this province, moved here, could not find an accessible unit, and has talked to me and has talked to constituency offices, looking for housing. He was living at someone's place, which was not accessible, was literally bumming up and down the stairs, created a pressure sore, and had been put into a nursing home because he needed care. This individual is in his mid-20s. The care could not be given continually at the nursing home. He was moved to Parkwood. Then he is on the discharge list and I have nowhere to place him. He is now going to have to go to mission services. He is an employable, disabled individual. He has an education, but I do not have the housing stock to give him.

As Marnie said, under the housing authority list, 23 people are waiting for housing who are single and disabled. They have not tracked how many families need housing with a disabled individual in that family. The Homelink offices work hard to make all people aware of the problems facing the disabled population in finding housing, but the choices for disabled individuals to find the accommodation is very limited. The co-ordinators rely on the local housing authorities and the non-profit and co-op sector to provide the accessible units, but the private properties are not required to build any accessible units. Not every disabled individual needs a rent-geared-to-income unit and not every disabled individual wants to be or live under the non-profits and co-ops for whatever reason. Some are unable to do that because they cannot participate.

An alternative solution would be that the private builders be legislated to make a percentage of their properties accessible. This opens up the choice for living anywhere a person would like to and a potential to work with the rent supplement programs. Instead of building more units, you could increase the supplement programs. That could reduce the waiting lists.

The general public is crying about the costs of social assistance programs, "Cut a budget here, cut a budget there." The cost savings to the government could be achieved if disabled individuals were able to get off social assistance. That is fine to say. Employment equity is in place but some real steps need to be taken. There is a large number of educated, employable, disabled individuals in this province and country, but for all types of reasons, they are unable to obtain a job. The first real barrier is building accessibility. Fine if the employer wants to hire somebody, but if the job is on the second floor where there is no ramp and no elevator, how can a disabled individual take that job? Have you ever been forced to work a full day without going to the washroom? Persons with disabilities are faced with this problem constantly, not just because they cannot get through the washroom doors because they are not wide enough, but because the attendant care services are not available.

Yet another barrier: What happens if you get the job, the place is accessible, you have attendant care services, but you cannot get to your place of employment because there are no transportation systems available? These issues, if eliminated, could get persons off social assistance and give them the opportunity to make their skills and education workable. Again, those are things we take for granted.

The last subject I would like to talk about is education. I have people calling my office wanting to move to London for educational reasons. Again, their problems are that they do not have an accessible unit to live in and they do not have any attendant care services that are transferable to this city. They are then told, "No, you cannot come to this city because if you do not have these things in place you cannot live here." These people can be educated and they are being forced to stay on social assistance because if they cannot get these support services in place, they cannot work.

The last comment I would like to make is in regard to my project as a Homelink co-ordinator. We as Homelink co-ordinators get $34,000 a year to run our budgets. We are placed in non-profit agencies which already are feeling a very tight squeeze on their budgets. The non-profit agencies are asked for services in kind, but with the donor dollars down our projects are also faltering under their financial restraints. I am starting to not be able to mail things, call people and run an effective office. We have to travel within our city limits as part of our job. If these things are starting to be limited, we cannot assist disabled individuals in advocacy for their rights in housing and education and the like.

Mrs Cunningham: Thank you for appearing. I think the March of Dimes is a spokesperson for a lot of agencies in your brief today. Certainly, as a member, I am very much aware of some of the problems because we have a lot of the clients you are talking about in our office. As well, I am the mother of a disabled person, so I know what challenges are ahead.

I have never asked this question before, but I am aware of the Cheshire Homes in a private sector high-rise just off Oxford Street.

Ms Nordemann: Cherry Hill.

Mrs Cunningham: Yes. I am wondering if you have ever done a cost analysis on the program in there, as opposed to some of the other. Have you ever compared the units in any way?

Ms Nordemann: You have a cost analysis of Cheshire I, II and III.

Mrs Cunningham: Yes. Which one is that?

Mr Suchak: Cheshire II is Cherry Hill.

Ms Nordemann: Cheshire II ends up being the least amount of care. For the people who do not know, there are 19 people with disabilities living in the building. It is 12 storeys and it is integrated. I used to work for Cheshire Homes and that was the building I worked in. We were staffed there 24 hours a day and we would come and go. Tenants in the building really did not know we were there, other than, "Oh, you're the person with a lot of keys." It was an integrated living situation where all the tenants could live as normally as you and I, short of a staff member coming in to look after them.

Mrs Cunningham: The reason I raise it is that it speaks for itself. I did not know the answer to the question. I am not surprised. You talked about legislating the private sector landlord and everybody knows who the landlord is there and how well he has been recognized by our city. But the way, I am very proud to represent this city. I do think it is a way to go. For my colleagues, it is private sector money. It is a landlord who has made space available. I wish there were more who would do it. It is very much less expensive and the support services in the building are marvellous in the sense that you could be there 24 hours a day. The shopping mall is just below. People do not feel different. I know you are aware of this, Kimble. It is just a perfect way for us to go in Ontario in my view. It is not new. It has been there for a long time.

I worked on the London Housing Authority and I do know the costs and I do think we need a very real balance between private sector and public sector housing when it comes to affordability, but I am very much aware that you are in tremendous need for some more support units. I do not know if we can free things up with private sector landlords, but I just wanted you to know that we are working with three different buildings right now to see if we can free up, on behalf of Cheshire, probably as many as another 20 units before Christmas.

Ms Nordemann: To just quickly address your issue on the private sector, we would love to use the private sector. It does not have accessible apartments. How can I put a person with a disability, who has a 36-inch wide wheelchair, into a bathroom that is 24 inches? I know people are saying, "No, don't use the non-profits, don't use the co-ops." I have to. I cannot support the private sector because it is not supporting the disabled community.

Mrs Cunningham: I had to move my constituency office because I was not happy about people being able to get in, even though they could. My new office is in a new building, and unfortunately in London we have not had any new buildings to the building codes now. I agree with you, but I am talking about the future and the way to go, the renovations that many churches are making and small landlords are making. But you are absolutely right. I know why you cannot go with the private sector. We have a big world ahead of us and I think we have to plan that way down the road and have a vision about it. I want to thank you for coming today and speaking on behalf of so many others who I know will be pleased with your presentation.

Ms M. Ward: Thank you for your presentation. I want to make some comments and a question at the end.

I visited, in the last six months or so, two new housing projects that opened in my riding, mainly for seniors, but they also had apartments for the disabled. I was very impressed with the design of them: wide doorways, kitchens which a wheelchair would go under. Very often there would be a family of two in there, one of them possibly disabled, the other not, or in some cases both of them. Also there are units for young people, one of them for young women living together. I think it is very successful. They are near the plaza and everything.

I know of another location in my riding where a community centre has a wheelchair ramp which cannot be manipulated by motorized wheelchairs. I think your contribution to barrier-free design, is very necessary in that we make sure disabled persons are involved in the design.

Ms Nordemann: The Homelink centres have gone beyond just housing. Most of us now do the consultations or barrier-free design. It sort of lends itself very nicely.

Ms M. Ward: One thing I wanted to ask you about, which is not to do with the Homelink really, but you might comment on it: It is something I was reading in the paper the other day about the employment equity programs and the controversy over the definition of "disabled." Whether or not this newspaper article was correct, it was saying that according to the federal definition, they left the definition of "disabled" to the person, whether or not they defined themselves as being disabled. Someone who was in a wheel-chair might not be termed disabled, whereas someone else might be who was not immobilized in that same way. The definition was whether or not they felt they had disabilities.

Ms Nordemann: I do not know anything about that.

Ms M. Ward: You are not familiar with that. I will pass on to my colleagues.

120

Mr Sutherland: I just want to pick up on the question believe Mrs Cunningham and Mrs Sullivan had asked the previous speaker in terms of integration of services. It seems to me that you are offering a very good service. How does your service differ from home care? Have you got a different mandate or do you deal with people home care does not deal with?

Ms Nordemann: Are we talking attendant care services, or are we talking homelink co-ordinator?

Mr Sutherland: I just want to try and figure out what the difference is.

Ms Nordemann: Attendant care services are offered 4 hours a day and/or in an outreach program. I had listed what the difference between outreach and SSLU were. Home care does a lot of meal prep and washing and some baths. Under support service living unit or a 24-hour-care unit, an attendant would be working. We do personal care, from bladder/bowel care to baths, getting them in and out of bed, doing their meals. We do everything that they are not able to do to live independently. So if they are needing catheterizations, we are—

Mr Sutherland: So you are providing more in the need of nursing-type services or in the traditional providing of services in an institution, what would be considered nursing or health care aids.

Ms Nordemann: Yes. It is non-medical versus medical, and it is technically under the non-medical.

Mr Suchak: If I could just comment regarding that, it is the organization Cheshire Homes that provides the attendant services for London and neighbouring counties. However, throughout the province, other organizations such as the March of Dimes provides attendant care services. In southwestern Ontario, the March of Dimes provides similar services to those Cheshire provides in Whatham and Sarnia and in other communities: Hamilton, Toronto, the Niagara region.

Mr Sutherland: If I can just pick up on your staffing, as the majority of your staff gone through the health care aide program? Is that what you have, or do you have nurses?

Ms Nordemann: Under the attendant care, they have a social-worker-type background, but they do not have to go through the health care aide program. I do not have that background. I was trained by Cheshire and taught everything that I needed to know to perform the job. They want to keep it as uninstitutional as possible.

Mr Sutherland: It is just that I have had some of the health care aide people into my office who were a little concerned about their role in long-term care reform. There are not a lot of standards yet nor is it as regulated as they would like to be, and I was just wondering what the link was.

Ms Nordemann: I am a Homelink co-ordinator and I do not do any attendant care any more. I try to house people with disabilities, so I do work very closely with Cheshire and the like, but I understand the needs of the individual looking for housing. So I will ask the question, "Do you need support services?" If you do not need support services, then there is a different route we can go. So those are the links that my office and the other nine offices in this province make.

Mr Christopherson: A really short question. A good friend of mine in Hamilton, Alderman Terry Cooke, is a co-ordinator with the March of Dimes. I just wondered how similar the situation here is in London from what we have in Hamilton.

Ms Nordemann: Very similar.

Mr Suchak: Very similar. I am aware of the fact that they have waiting lists. They are in the process of working with the non-profit sector to develop more housing so that the March of Dimes can attach support services. Right now in Sarnia, our program there, we provide attendant services in 12 apartments that are part of a co-operative. We have a waiting list right now in Sarnia of 15 people who could benefit from support service living units.

Mr Christopherson: I know Terry and his people do a great job. I am sure you do here, too.

Mr Phillips: To understand the numbers you have presented here on the Cheshire Homes, the staff per day and then the housing subsidy, where does the $15-a-day housing subsidy go?

Ms Nordemann: Through the Ministry of Housing usually under the housing authority. It is under the dollar figure of the Ministry of Housing.

Mr Phillips: And then that money goes to the owner of the building, is that right?

Ms Nordemann: What happens with Cheshire, for Cheshire II, Cheshire has become the landlord. They take all the money and then they pay the actual company that owns the building. Yes, the money is all, at some point, put together in the same hands and given to the owner of the building to supplement. It is under like a rent supplement program.

Mr Phillips: Where does the rest of the rent come from? From the individual?

Ms Nordemann: The individual.

Mr Phillips: So the individual is paying.

Ms Nordemann: Exactly, out of their disability pensions or income or whatever. They pay the rest of it. So this is the highest number you get: $15 a day is at the top.

There are people who do not use $15 a day. They are working. They need the attendant care services, but they are fully employed in the community, so they do not need rent geared to income. They pay their own full rent. They are not even taking the $15 at that point.

Mr Phillips: I am surprised it is that low. The co-op numbers we see are about $50 a day per unit subsidy. Why would it be that low?

Ms Nordemann: It equates to about $465 a month under $15 a day.

Mr Phillips: How would it be possible somebody could operate a building at that?

Ms Nordemann: Yes, Cheshire is into its 12th year here.

Mr Phillips: Some day I will understand this, maybe, but in the budget, as you may or may not have seen, I think for $10,000 new units of co-op the annual subsidy per unit every year for a long while is $15,000 per unit, which I think is around $40 a day. But somehow or other, Cheshire seems to be able to do it at $15 a day.

Ms Nordemann: Those were quoted to me from Cheshire management last week, so those are up-to-date figures.

Mr Phillips: Something interesting there.

Ms Nordemann: That is where our concern is. There are people who could potentially be in SSLUs, and we could get them out of the hospital settings. I am working with a group to do just that, put another SSLU in place, get them out of the hospital. They are high quadriplegics. They do not want to be in hospital. They are in their mid-20s, and they want out. They want to live in a community all the rest of us take for granted. This seems to be the option to go.

Mr Phillips: I will tell you a quick story. I have coached hockey for eight years with a quadriplegic. He had an accident as a policeman and became a quadriplegic. But he is the type who will go to the ball game on Saturday. He will come and pick me up in his van and away we go. He lives in a home and just thrives and does it, I suspect, very efficiently and is very close to going back to work the minute the resources are there.

Ms Nordemann: Until we eliminate some of the physical barriers that people with disabilities are facing, some of this is not going to work. But we are fighting with building construction all the time, and that is why I work a lot with architects. I look over their drawings and I say: "Guys, this ramp is too steep. This washroom isn't big enough," because then we can make the world better for all. A person with a stroller—mom or dad with a stroller—is a disabled individual. If you have a heart attack or you are on a heart pacer, you have an invisible disability. It is just the wheelchair people see. There is a lot more out there than just that.

Mr Phillips: I know you are right. My father was in a wheelchair, and for a little ramp, he never could get out on to the balcony. It just was a half-inch of ramp.

Ms Nordemann: You break your leg tomorrow and you will find out what it is all about and how difficult it is to get in and out of the building.

Mr Phillips: Yes, I appreciate that. But those numbers are fascinating to me, and some day I will think about it.

Ms Nordemann: Those are per diem rates put out by the ministry.

Mrs Cunningham: Add it up. It is the same, just a little math. If I have a minute, I would like to ask about the pamphlet.

Mr Phillips: Fifteen dollars a day times 365 days is how much?

Mrs Cunningham: Yes, it is $15,400 a year, taking a 30-day month.

On the pamphlet here, you talk about your work in the Ontario March of Dimes barrier-free design. I was interested in looking at where you talked about building permits. You are saying, really, that we ought to be looking at the American National Standards Institute standards?

Ms Nordemann: That is a little outdated. We should look at the Canadian Standards Association.

Mrs Cunningham: Okay, that is what I was wondering.

Ms Nordemann: I cannot afford to reprint.

Mrs Cunningham: No, and I do not blame you. My question is, you are just making people aware that one has to check the standards.

Ms Nordemann: Yes. Canadian standards came out last year. Those were printed about a year before that, and I cannot afford to print new ones, so we are in a bind.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for appearing before this committee.

Mr Christopherson: Keep working on it, Gerry.

Mr Phillips: This new math really comes hard.

The Chair: I have just been informed that Mayor Downs is on his way back from Toronto. Maybe what we can do is not put a time period on this recess but just hang around to see whether he will come in the next 15 minutes, so this committee will recess until the mayor arrives.

Mr Sutherland: What if he does not arrive until 11:55? Are we going to hear his presentation?

The Chair: I hope he has a presentation we can deal with in five minutes.

Mr Sutherland: Okay.

The Chair: We will still be on the same time frame between 11:30 and 12. Okay, we will recess.

The committee recessed at 1130.

1140

The Chair: It has been agreed by the subcommittee of this committee that Mayor Downs is on his way back from Toronto and is unable to make it here for 11:30 and it is 20 to 12. This committee will resume at 12:40 if the mayor is here and hear him and get on schedule again at 1 o'clock with the regular thing.

Mr Stockwell: What if he is not here?

The Chair: If he is not here at 12:40, then we will wind up resuming at 1 o'clock.

The committee recessed at 1141.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1301.

SUSAN SMITH

The Chair: Susan Smith is the next presenter. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget review.

Ms Smith: Welcome to London. My name is Susan Smith. I am a candidate for the board of control in the November municipal election. I want to thank you for the opportunity to express my views on the provincial budget. I will make a special effort to follow government budget deliberations. Such budget deliberations are lucid statements of political will.

I believe this government wants to spend tax revenue differently and smarter than the other provincial governments have been served by in Ontario. The imperative of environmental and social sustainability responds to the statement of political will, not exclusively market-driven, that I was expecting from this government. I am not disappointed.

In order to foster informed public debate about any community's sustainable development, the broadest possible range of environmental, social and economic considerations must be integrated and evaluated in the planning stage of decision-making processes. I applaud this government's initiatives and policy direction on the environmental assessment process, especially as it applies to major road works. It is reasonable to encourage the participation of all residents in the designation of major transportation services.

I am heartened that some Londoners are prepared to pursue a vision of a pristine, if not nearly perfect, environment for our community. The former Minister of Transportation, the Honourable Ed Philip, was prepared to negotiate rail rights of way for public transit in all new highway developments and I hope the new minister, the Honourable Gilles Pouliot, continues this policy, as 20-, 30- and 40-year plans are essential to community planning.

I am a committed and usually enthusiastic consumer of the London public transit system. In your budget, your government's infusion of $2 million in transfer payments to the London system is at this point a continuation of the previous government's commitment to 75% of the cost of the new bus garage, bus shelters. If the software capabilities of the new electronic fare box is able to satisfy the information needs for a system in transition from a city centre grid to a better, expanded service, it will be money well spent. I do not know if that was included under the "Let's Move" part that was announced in the budget.

I had an opportunity to carry the budget around with me this summer, and when I was in Quebec I shared it with some friends who had one mild criticism that I will echo. Some of the figures on economic recovery are perhaps a little bit optimistic. I feel especially supportive and I am heartened to see in just the 1990-91 expenditures the Mantoulin Island land claim, the $196 million for the teachers' pension plan, which reduces the unfunded liability section of it, the farm income assistance and the phased-in pay equity for the Ontario public service.

In the Treasurer's budget announcement—God bless Floyd Laughren—he announced, I believe it was, several million dollars for child care infrastructure on our native reserves. Child sexual abuse has staggering costs to the communities and the social fabrics of these communities. I feel it is money very well spent. I know the dollar figure has been criticized and I am very supportive of that money being spent.

Locally, here in London we have benefited from the largesse of the province with $10 million for a convention centre. As someone who aspires to municipal office, I can guarantee you I would be happy to see that as a capped figure. I will not come back and ask for future funds. When the Minister of Tourism and Recreation, the Honourable Peter North, made the announcement, he was quite clear that this was a set dollar figure, and I think that municipalities can be prepared to bargain in good faith with this government. When the centre is constructed, please feel welcome to use the centre for your respective party conventions.

I appreciate the emphasis on infrastructure and the funding that is expressed in this budget. I will mention the deficit but I will still thank you for what I consider to be your fiscal responsibility. On the deficit, I believe there was an organization yesterday, the chamber of commerce, that criticized the wage protection fund, but that is just one example of how this budget's deficit is directly attributable to federal Conservative policies. Actually it is a very easy example.

Successive Conservative and Liberal federal governments since the late 1940s have certainly had the political tools, if not the political will, to change the corporate bankruptcy act. Any criticism of the wage protection fund is certainly not something you should listen to for very long. I know that in BC it is certainly part of at least one political party's platform and may well be part of any other political party's platform, and the responsibility rests solely with the federal government.

I will also just very briefly comment that I am not at variance with Justice John Sopinka's analysis of the Supreme Court decision regarding the Canada assistance plan and I am certainly not at variance with the syndicated columnist Leonard Shifrin's analysis of how much worse off we could be, but I want to thank the government for the good faith and the good budget.

Mr Sutherland: Thanks a lot for coming today. We appreciate having you here before the committee to talk about the budget and give your views on the budget. It was interesting to hear you had shown it to some friends outside the province. I think we have heard some reactions certainly from political leaders outside the province, their views on the budget, but you had shown it to some people, average citizens I take it, in Quebec who did not think it was that bad a budget. I was wondering if you could just comment a little more on what their reaction was.

Ms Smith: They did have criticism. It was mostly with a couple of the tables on Ontario in the 1980s, on productivity and wages. One individual is a business person, a consulting engineer who builds airports around the world, who is in an incumbent federal Conservative cabinet minister's riding. Some of the figures were overly glowing, perhaps that Ontario's productivity in terms of labour productivity growth has not been quite as high both in the area of R&D and the public expenditure on labour market training. They just had a pretty straightforward questioning of how accurate those figures were, but no particular disappointment with some good economic housekeeping in Ontario.

Mr Sutherland: I know you are very active in this community. I was wondering if you could just give us some sense for the record in terms of what some of the needs are out there, for the people who have lost their jobs, in terms of skills training. Is London an area that has a well-educated population, so it is developing new skills, or is basic skills training, something of that nature, what an emphasis needs to be on for London or for the community as a whole?

Ms Smith: There are some services in London, but I think what is needed is really a much better structure. I am personally more inclined to say that the money needs to be raised internally. It is good that the high value added jobs in education and health care are what is being preserved in the budget. Frankly, I did not look for the budget to create one job.

Ms M. Ward: Do we still have some time left?

The Chair: No, we do not. I would like to thank you for coming before this committee. I recommend that we recess for five minutes before the next presenter.

The committee recessed at 1308.

1315

SANFORD LEVIN

The Chair: Mr Sanford Levin, please come forward. You have 15 minutes and you can leave some time at the end for questions from the three parties.

Mr Levin: Thank you. I am a high school teacher. I also hold an MBA from the University of Western Ontario. I spent a number of years in the financial services industry before I started teaching.

I would like to start by saying that to have held the line or to have cut spending at the tail end of a recession would not have made economic sense. This government has decided properly to inject a little bit of adrenaline into the economy as it weakly emerges from a very severe recession. Putting money into consumers' pockets by protecting 70,000 jobs makes economic sense. After all, two thirds of the gross national product is generated by consumer spending, provided of course it is money spent inside Canada and/or saved.

There are certainly other bright spots. The $215 million to help reform the welfare system as recommended in the SARC report will go a long way to alleviating the cycle of poverty and the welfare trap. Anything to help, say, the single mother who wants to go to school or to work but who would lose her child's dental benefits or subsidized day care space if she did makes sense.

Unfortunately, detractors of the budget, those who have done so well over the 1980s, a period of increased federal government spending and lower taxation increases for corporations and those at higher income levels, have decided that the 1990s are going to be a period in which Ontario must decide between being competitive, the catch all phrase for the 1990s, and being a caring society. I ask you is this really the price those who did not get rich in the 1980s have to pay?

Having said that, I still have some concerns with the budget.

Although I salute the Treasurer's support of our agricultural sector, there is nothing in the budget really to help reserve farm land from developers' bulldozers, a real problem in the London area. Why did this government not announce that it was using some of the $90 million earmarked for agriculture to either land bank some of this precious resource or to purchase some of it through conservation easements, thus giving farmers needed cash while preserving the land for what it is best suited for, food production, not paving, or as it was said by a Peterborough politician at AMO yesterday, crops, not lots?

I am also disappointed that the government revised its tax on fuel-inefficient cars. This change seems to make the additional $10 million for the Ministry of Energy's activities aimed at energy efficiency a good intention rather than an effective use of funds.

As is true of all estimates based on projections, I am concerned that the Treasurer was overly optimistic, as most treasurers seem to be, in projections for future growth of both the United States and Ontario economies. I also wonder about the projected expected decline in the Canadian dollar to 84 cents. After all, it is fairly clear that the federal government is committed to a high dollar policy, for whatever reason, be it to satisfy unpublished agreements in the free trade deal or to encourage cross-border travel and shopping which will help integrate our two economies. I am not sure of the reason.

I would suggest the government has had a communication problem in trying to explain this budget. For the provincial Conservatives, it is very easy and effective, albeit overly simplistic, to talk about tax-fighting. After all, people understand the word "tax" at face value. It is easy to do when you have a citizenry that has limited understanding of basic economics. "Lower taxes" is easy to say, but for the government, explaining the benefits of the multiplier effect of deficit spending has caused eyes to glaze over. The federal government knows most people have limited command of economics. This economic illiteracy is one reason why the federal Conservatives did little to explain the technicalities of the free trade agreement during the 1988 campaign. After all, why dissuade those people who were thinking that free trade meant duty-free shopping?

The government is also going to have a hard time here in Ontario trying to explain why the Ontario government has $1.6 billion less from the federal government, and unfortunately, perhaps even less to come. I know and you know that when the federal government cuts back, it squeezes the province, which in turn squeezes the municipalities, which in turn ask home owners to cough up more. But do not expect the average citizen who does not eat, sleep and breathe transfer payments to understand any of People seem not to understand that the services we use cost money.

Let me talk about the deficit. The deficit itself is a red herring and a tool that can be used any way you want. Let's not forget that during the election of 1988, the federal conservatives made a point of buying voter support through election promises—excuse me, Mike Wilson called them spending commitments—such as national day care. Suddenly, after the election—and I say suddenly because the deficit was not even an issue in the campaign—these spending commitments became expendable in the interests of deficit reduction.

After a four-year orgy of federal spending without a deep debate about the deficit, it suddenly became big news in 1988. In fact, it was such big news we could not stop hearing about it. We saw commercials about it, a dollar sign rolling across our TV screen. Because we were told enough times it was a problem, it became a problem. As the saying goes, call a swan a duck long enough, someone will swear to hear it quack.

A deficit is a problem because of who holds it. When a parent borrows from a child or vice versa, a deficit is not serious. It stays in the same household. Before 1984, most Canadian debt instruments were held by Canadian citizens and Canadian institutions such as banks. Currently, thanks to the federal government's opening Canada for business, foreign investors own about one third of all provincial and government of Canada bonds and roughly half of all corporate bonds. Therefore, the payments flow out of the country, and it is to whom we owe the money that is a bigger problem than the sheer size of the deficit.

Another argument raised against the deficit is its impact on money markets. The private sector is concerned that it will be squeezed out from capital markets by large government debts. Might I remind you that the 1980s saw enormous increases in government debts, yet it was also a period of time during which record corporate takeovers occurred, most often using borrowed capital.

It is also argued that the budget will discourage investment in Ontario, but the majority of recent investment has simply been takeovers of existing business, and the earnings of these acquired companies are then used to repatriate dividends to foreign parents, not for research and development and continued investment in plant equipment and worker training which would encourage competitiveness. For example, Amoco, when it bought Dome Petroleum a number of years ago, had a total investment of only $300 million in its first 20 years in Canada. During the same period it repatriated $2 billion.

One reason for our declining competitiveness is not the deficit but the lack of indigenous Canadian companies involved in the non-resource sector. We need something to replace primary manufacturing and resource extraction as the engine of growth. The problem is that we do not have anything to replace them.

The Treasurer has talked about encouraging productivity growth based on high wage and high value added products and services, but where is the investment in R&D? The budget only calls for $131 million for Ontario's technology fund, just $57 million for a manufacturing recovery program and a mere $21 million for Innovation Ontario Corp.

In conclusion, the government could have done more to create a healthier future economy. Because the so-called free market is controlled increasingly by oligopolies which operate only in their own best interests—the real “private” in the term “private sector”—which are more often than not contrary to the best interests of the greatest number of people, it is up to government to take a lead in restructuring the economy in the interests of the whole and not just those interest groups led by the Business Council on National Issues.

There is actually a decent starting point for this. It is called Competing in the New Global Economy, a report of the Premier's Council under—I hate to say it—the previous provincial government. It is one of the few examples where various groups got together and put together something that made sense and was actionable. What happened to it, Mr Kwinter? It was a good report.

Mr Kwinter: Ask those guys. Why would you say, “I hate to say it?”

Mr Levin: Various reasons.

The Chair: Would you conclude? We will have about two minutes for each party, so Mr Kwinter can make his comments.

Mr Levin: I can stop at this point then.

Ms M. Ward: Thank you for your presentation. On the first page you were talking about the estimates and the projections for the future and expressing the concern that you thought they might be overly optimistic. I guess nobody knows at this point, but I just wanted to comment. A couple of the organizations which appeared before us, such as Informatrica Ltd, and actually the Conference Board of Canada also, which did not appear, but their projections are more optimistic than the Treasurer's. As I say, nobody knows.

What I wanted to ask you about is if you think that there may be action by the federal government to lower interest rates and possibly bring down the dollar, given that we may be coming up to a federal election. Do we have some hope there that they will want to make things look a little better?

Mr Levin: Yes, I would say so. The federal government is quite aware that lower interest rates and an improving economy will help its re-election campaign, quite definitely, so I can see that coming, which in general is going to help Ontario's economy as well.

Mr Phillips: Just a comment and then a question. It is interesting to hold that up, because that was the blueprint. It came out last July. There was an election. You have asked the question of the wrong person. You ask the government. I do not know what your political stripes are; maybe even that is who you might support.

My question to you is this: I do not think we can ignore the debt. Anybody who thinks the federal government has a lot of money is, I think, dreaming. They are broke. They are bankrupt. They have a debt of $400 billion, and as the Premier here says, we probably have to service half of that debt out of Ontario taxpayers. This provincial government will take the debt to $80 billion, so in about four years, Ontario will be servicing debt of probably $300 billion. Is that sustainable?

Mr Levin: I would suggest that it is. In the size of the economy that we have it is not really that onerous. If you really want to bring in money, certainly the deferred taxations of corporations are already $30 billion. They could pay off the deficit that the federal government is running in one year. These are tax matters, though, that are federal issues rather than provincial issues. Take a look at the balance sheets of most major corporations under deferred taxation.

Mr Phillips: I have. But I am surprised you would say that. But time will tell.

Mr Levin: Certainly.

Mrs Cunningham: Where do you teach?

Mr Levin: I teach in a high school, and at Fanshawe College.

Mrs Cunningham: Here in London?

Mr Levin: In Elgin county.

Mrs Cunningham: On page 3 you talk about debt and tax-fighting "within the same household." I am the mother of three kids in their 20s, and it took us a long time to pay for our house, my husband and I, and I hope I never have to borrow against it. I might have to. I look at the way I manage my household the same way as I hope that I have the responsibility of contributing to the management of this province, and I do not think it is okay that we have a debt. You as a teacher, I think, should be encouraging kids to stay out of debt. These kids are going into the world of work with an average of, what is it, Kimble, $10,000?

Mr Sutherland: About $7,000 to $8,000.

Mrs Cunningham: With $7,000 to $8,000 of debt after they get out of university. Then we are asking them to pay off debts.

I was on a school board in London for 15 years and we never debentured. I was proud to say to my kids that I did not borrow a penny to build a school, because I thought today's group was enjoying the educational benefits and I did not want to penalize them. Maybe I am wrong, but perhaps you could respond, as a teacher.

I am a parent and that is the view that I give my kids. I have encouraged them not to acquire debt, and they have had to give up a lot that their friends have, not to go in debt. I do not know if I am a good teacher or not, but I am saying your message on page 3 does not go far enough. I think it is bad that families go into debt, let alone countries.

Mr Levin: If we did not have deficit spending, if people did not have a mortgage on a house, we would not have any home-buying. If we did not have any home-buying, we would put into critical care a serious part of the economy.

Mrs Cunningham: But that is a planned debt. You take your mortgage for so many years and you have a planned period of time to pay it back. One of the big difficulties, and you have said it yourself, actually—and by the way, I appreciate your presentation today. You have given me some things to think about, so I am glad that you came and made the points you did. One of the things you said about the federal government is that it took five years to figure it out. I think it took them five years to figure it out because all of a sudden they were in government, just like this group is.

And yes, it is tough. It is really tough. I do not think anybody running in that election last year perceived a $10 billion or a $9.3-billion debt. I would say none of my colleagues running in London, from any party, thought we would ever have this kind of debt. I am just saying that the federal government got in and figured it out, and they are not holding the purse strings. The Japanese community has $53 billion of our debt, and I do not think those interest rates are going to go down, at least for that portion of the debt.

The Chair: Okay, Mrs Cunningham. The time is up.

Mrs Cunningham: Sorry the time is so short. We can do this another time.

CITY OF LONDON

The Chair: The honourable Mayor Tom Gosnell and Deputy Mayor Jack Burghardt.

Mrs Cunningham: H-E-A-R-T, right, Jack?

Mr Burghardt: You got it.

The Chair: I would like to welcome you here to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget review. You have one half-hour for your presentation. In that half-hour, try to save some time at the end for a question and answer period, which will be divided equally among the three parties. Identify yourselves for the purposes of Hansard, and you may proceed.

Mr Gosnell: Thank you very much, Mr Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Legislature. On behalf of the city of London and Deputy Mayor Jack Burghardt, we appreciate the opportunity to speak regarding the city's perspective on this issue.

This municipality and our civic counterparts across Ontario have taken dramatic steps in the past year to bring in municipal budgets that reflect the pressures being brought to bear on the economy today. Deputy Mayor Burghardt was the chairman of our budget deliberations and I would ask him to say a few words now.

Mr Burghardt: London city council set a pre-budget guideline that the municipal share of the tax levy in 1991 would be 5% or less. In fact, even with escalating welfare costs, the city managed to bring in its budget with a 4.78% increase. It should be pointed out that this was done with some very tough decisions on key services to our citizens. It was also accomplished without incurring long-term debt.

This municipality strongly believes we cannot mortgage our future for short-term solutions. It is our position that municipal ratepayers can no longer shoulder an ever-growing list of responsibilities for provincial programs.

For us to take the present government to task on any specific issue may be of some help, but it would miss the underlying point. While the new government is still young in its duties, we encourage those now in power to carry forth with full consultation. Labour, business, institutions and municipalities should all be invited to present their views. We want to be assured that the input received will be fully analysed and considered. New programs and policies put into place with little or no consideration placed on the views of those most affected can only result in severe damage and bitterness. In this economic climate, we cannot afford any unnecessary injury.

Mr Gosnell: Make no mistake about it: The businesses of southwestern Ontario are valuable resources, and like most other resources, they can be extracted. Those who would like to take our companies home with them are regular visitors to London. What these modern-day prospectors see and want to take back with them are the type of companies that have helped make Canada one of the preferred nations in the world in which to live.

Bankrupt companies pay no salaries and have no taxes. Companies that move to other jurisdictions pay us no salaries and no taxes, but they continue to sell their services and their products here. They therefore end up taking money out of the province.

The role of southwestern Ontario in fostering the economic wellbeing of the rest of Canada has led to some misconceptions. Although this has historically been a strong area, it is not without its weaknesses. Centres of additionally high job concentrations tend to act as a magnet for those who are seeking work opportunities. Not all of these people are easily absorbed into available job openings. Some indicators regarding this area should be of interest.

In 1990, southwestern Ontario lost 45.1 jobs per 100,000 population. This was a higher loss than experienced in any other part of Ontario. Also in 1990, over one quarter of the job losses in Ontario occurred in southwestern Ontario. Additionally, one quarter of the Ontario plant closures in 1990 occurred in southwestern Ontario. One third of the province's plant closures in January of 1991 occurred in southwestern Ontario, and 49% of Ontario job losses in January 1991 occurred in this region.

These indicators are not just objective, cold statistics. They reflect the enormity of the problem being experienced by thousands of people in this strategic area of the province. Job losses take their toll on the individual social and economic level of the people involved and on those who must try to alleviate the situation. In this regard, the cost to the provincial and municipal treasuries is enormous as welfare costs spiral upwards. These costs must be supported on a diminishing tax base.

London, as the regional centre for southwestern Ontario, is very concerned that this area of Canada and Ontario is becoming so easy to mine. This region has been one of the major economic engines of the province and of the nation. Southwestern Ontario helps to create an Ontario that is able to put far more into Canada than it takes out.

With the vitality that we have been able to build in southwestern Ontario, we have been able to develop a social system that does not often forget those who are in any kind of need. Our health care system is the envy of many. Our cities are among the finest on the continent. People from all areas of the globe seek to make Canada their home. Among these reasons are the personal freedom, quality of life and prosperity that this country offers.

There is no perfect society on earth. Imperfections and injustices will always remain to be addressed by people and their governments. Ontario is no different. There is yet a long agenda of improvements to be made. The passing of each year brings new items of needed advancement to our attention. The present government continues to develop its program in this regard, and in many ways we support it.

Our support is tempered, however, by a desire to ensure that any advances are being designed to achieve the intended objectives while enhancing the ability of our economy to continue to contribute to the wellbeing of the people of Ontario and Canada. New measures fashioned to bring new levels of social responsibility into being often carry a price tag of significant proportion. Because we live in a world which brings us into closer contact with people, institutions and businesses of those of other nations, we must take great care to make sure that our goals are achieved while enhancing the ability of the contributors to our economy to survive. We must be able to pay our own way.

We recognize that the source of our frustrations with the lack of the competitiveness of southwestern Ontario businesses to compete lies not with any one level of government or with one specific political party. We are pleased in particular with support for the convention centre committed by the federal and provincial governments and with assistance for new investment received from the present provincial government. The province has recently announced the manufacturing recovery program and is also moving towards the facilitation of the development of a southwestern Ontario strategic economic plan. We applaud these efforts. At the same time, we are in a position to list some specific areas of concerns that in our opinion need to be urgently addressed. These all affect our ability to compete in a global marketplace.

We are fully aware that the competition provided by those in other countries has no sensitivity to our values and goals as a society. Indeed, competition will come from wherever companies can optimize their investment to meet their chosen level of quality in the most efficient way. Our challenge is to find ways to meet this competition and come as close as possible to accomplishing the goals and the values of our society at the same time. This is not an easy task, but the benefits to our people and to the world are worth the effort. To institute social and environmental reforms while taking the time to adequately consult with those involved, fully research the possibilities and then select the avenue that leaves us in the strongest possible economic position while accomplishing our goals must be our standard.

We are now aware of the following legislative changes and policy areas which, if handled improperly, could further significantly damage the southwestern Ontario economy.

An artificially high Canadian dollar makes our manufactured goods and services too expensive to export and too expensive to compete with imports. At the same time, a high value dollar makes it easier to acquire and import goods and services. Free trade can only work if the value of the dollar assumes a proper market level. A proper adjustment in this area would work towards solving a number of pressing problems ranging from cross-border shopping to the realization of a more favourable trade balance with the United States, our largest trading partner.

We know that the size of Ontario and Canada, relative to the population and level of social and environmental programs we have achieved, requires more money per capita to maintain than many other countries. At the same time, we must find ways of cutting our deficits and more equitably collecting taxes. This is especially true when too many people and businesses still are able to avoid income taxes altogether. The trucking, airline and tourism industries are three that immediately come to mind.

The wage protection fund was implemented April 11, 1991. This fund is designed to pay unpaid wages to workers whose jobs were destroyed by bankruptcies or voluntary shutdown. Officers of a company are directly affected by this legislation and are personally held liable for payments of up to $5,000 per employee. This must be considered onerous and not in the best long-term interest of workers. Those companies, to avoid legislation, will look elsewhere.

The provincial government is proposing to raise the minimum wage in Ontario to 60% of the average industrial wage. If implemented, this would effectively jump the $5.40 minimum wage to $8.50 per hour. This has the potential of causing serious unemployment in the service sector and, more particularly, the retail industry. It also should be noted that Canada's wages are rising faster than those in the United States. This, when combined with the increase in the value of the Canadian dollar, means that in US dollars, Canadian manufacturing wages are at least 10% higher than those in the United States.

In another area, a new provincial discussion paper proposes changes to laws for workers employed in the contract service sector. Work performed by employees of an outside contractor could become the responsibility of the company hiring the outside contractor; again, a negative to investors.

Tax on capital: no longer a tax-deductible item.

Health tax levy, 2% no longer a tax-deductible item.

Unemployment insurance: a longer period of benefits resulting in rate increases to cover the increases in benefits and a requirement for employers to replace females and males on maternity/paternity leaves.

Indexed pensions: more pressure on defined benefit programs, which results in additional costs.

The government has eliminated tax-based leasing, which in the case of our manufacturers drives up the cost of tool purchases approximately 2%. Tax-based leasing is rampant in the United States and provides a further competitive edge to their industries.

Current interest rates: a spread of between 4% and 5% between the United States and Canada increases the costs of borrowing for businesses and consumers alike.

The gas guzzler tax: in its present form, this tax penalizes an Ontario production facility while allowing a competing United States facility and its products to escape taxation.

All of those points create a huge disincentive to expand, to stay and to further invest in Ontario. All of these taxes and programs should scare the hell out of the citizens of Ontario.

Another area of great concern to our municipality is the impending changes on October 1 to welfare assistance to those who are 16 and 17 years old who choose to live independently from their family home. Under the present legislation, an employable person under the age of 18 is not eligible for assistance unless there are extreme extenuating circumstances.

In the Back on Track report, October 1 has been earmarked as the date for launching substantive changes in this area. Employable persons aged 16 and 17 who are in need and are not living in the family home will be eligible for special financial support. We could not possibly disagree with that more.

To date, the province has not provided specific guidelines, nor how this legislation is to be implemented or interpreted. Specific costs to London are unknown at this date. While the province has earmarked $1.5 million for province-wide implementation of this legislation, the long-term, direct impact on both levels of government is unknown.

Unabated growth and expansion of welfare assistance cannot continue without all levels of government seriously questioning the viability of some other services or the ability of taxpayers to shoulder a crushing tax load. In a more optimistic vein, if we have the good sense to recognize the problems we face in Ontario and do something about them, we have a great deal to build on.

We have much upon which to build in this area and in the rest of Canada. Our people, our natural resources, our existing industrial plant, our educational institutions, our technology and our quality of life form a firm foundation for the establishment of a strong future. For this to be realized, we need to do a number of things now. We need to encourage high-technology transfer, facilitate increased export trade, encourage more flexibility in the workforce, foster more skills and increased product quality and improve the effectiveness of our educational systems.

Mr Burghardt: In its recent budget, the government of Ontario committed itself to reform of the social assistance program. Since many of the recommendations in the Social Assistance Review Committee's report, Transitions were not implemented, the current Minister of Community and Social Services asked her advisory group on new social assistance legislation to fast-track its work and present those recommendations that could be implemented without changing the legislation. Their work was presented, as you know, in the report Back on Track. The result of this advisory committee's work was the announcement of approximately 60 of Back on Track's 88 recommendations that are being implemented.

The recession has had a devastating effect on the economy of southwestern Ontario. This is proven by the fact that many of our new welfare clients have never been on assistance before. It is essential, now more than ever, that those in need have access to the system in these very difficult times. The stress of the recession on the municipality, however, is not adequately addressed. We must urge the province to implement substantial changes immediately to cost-sharing formulas.

The new direction will provide positive assistance changes to a number of our clients and the system will ensure that a basic level of income is available to an expanded population in Ontario. Key features of the reforms impacting on our clients include equalizing the benefits to sole-support parents on general welfare with the family benefits rate structure; improving benefits for battered omen; more information available for clients, keeping in mind the multicultural population; general welfare availability for persons working full-time; increased exemptions for earnings, enabling clients to retain more of their welfare entitlement, and increased rates for single persons.

The minister also announced approximately $50 million for the creation of 2,000 to 2,500 jobs. Every new job is a scarce and treasured item, and we applaud the direction. However, Ontario municipalities have experienced almost 100,000 new welfare recipients since 1989.

Relief to municipalities has been announced by the province in these new directions. The two key elements of this relief do not really address the recent strain that welfare costs have unexpectedly placed on municipalities. The key elements of relief include a 90% cost-sharing of that portion of our welfare case-load beneficiaries over 3.5% of our population. Although provincial contacts have indicated this may come into effect at midyear, the honourable minister has announced this would be retroactive to January 1 of this year and continue to the summer of next year. London will appreciate some additional subsidy from this. In addition, a second key element is that cases on welfare who are sole-support parents will be financed at 100% provincial. This will likely impact a little over 10% of our case load effective August of this year.

While the above changes are well received by us, there continue to be some major municipal concerns which have not been avoided.

First, on the issue of consultation, we are very disappointed that the input we have given through such mediums as the Provincial-Municipal Social Services Review Committee process has not been acted upon. This is evident from the fact that none of the recommendations in the minister's Back on Track report that dealt with the provincial-municipal cost-sharing arrangements are being implemented in the social reform package.

We are also concerned that the minister's advisory committee did not address many important recommendations in the Social Assistance Review Committee's report, transitions, specifically the recommendation that the senior levels of government should be responsible for the funding of social assistance.

Finally, we are concerned that many of the announced reforms, which have been identified as not entailing any costs to municipalities, will in fact produce significant costs to us in the future. In this light, and in view of our credible increases in the past two years, the announcement regarding relief to municipalities is diluted. In addition, the strain on our municipal staff continues and is not being clearly addressed at the provincial level. We therefore urge the minister to implement the recommendations of the PMSSR report which deal explicitly with the issue of the cost-sharing relationship between the two levels of government in line with the implementation of the announced reforms.

Mr Gosnell: As a municipal council, we must seriously question the viability of the province assuming the costs and overhead of running a car insurance plan for drivers of Ontario with no promise of lower rates, the loss of thousands of private sector jobs and the prospect of government assuming the costs of running yet another mammoth department. We have heard from the Premier that the new government-administered plan will create jobs but, once again, it creates more government and more expense to taxpayers. The auto insurance industry is a $4-billion-a-year business in this province. The estimated cost of taking this business under provincial operation has been estimated in excess of $3 billion. Surely taxpayers do not need that burden too. As someone who has operated a private family company before becoming mayor, let me assure you that government should not be in the business of running business. Enterprises are best left to the private sector.

In concluding our comments today, let me emphasize that Ontario and its municipalities have grown and prospered because of open communications and a co-operative effort with our provincial counterparts. In times of new challenges, and indeed in times of new opportunities, we cannot afford to centre our efforts on partisan bickering.

We applaud your efforts to meet with various community groups across the province. Your hearings, in combination with ongoing discussions at Queen's Park, will clearly paint a vision of where our province stands today and the direction it should take tomorrow. Ontario has traditionally been a leading force in our nation in virtually every aspect of Canadian life. That role, that vision, must continue for the benefit of us all.

Mr Kwinter: Thank you very much, Mayor Gosnell and Deputy Mayor Burghardt, for your presentation. I thought it was excellent. It was balanced and well researched. You have done a real service to this committee.

One of the things the government has always stated when it talks about the deficit is that if it did nothing, the deficit would be in excess of $8 billion. I think that is one of the problems, in that the government has really perceived that was the option it had, to do nothing. On the first page you talked about setting a pre-budget guideline of 5% or less in your tax levy. That meant you had to make some very tough decisions on key services to our citizens. Could you share with us some of those decisions and what you had to do to keep it in that line?

Mr Gosnell: When we went to that review, we found that we had some programs that really were not accomplishing what we wanted. It was a good exercise in management. We found that while we could postpone some projects, not indefinitely but certainly for some period of time, it was not causing the strain we thought it would. That is the one argument here from other levels of government, that if we do this, we are just sacrificing something else. In fact, a little bit of fat builds up in all organizations. It needs to be trimmed and that did happen.

We cannot afford to carry an $88-million-a-year welfare load in the city for very much longer. We are hoping the province can work very aggressively in trying to promote business investment in this province, because in the long term, if you want a program to keep people off welfare, you have to provide jobs and you cannot provide jobs with the disincentives to industry that are now in the province.

Getting back to your question, we could live with our 5% guideline. It was painful in some areas, but I think if we could show municipally the resolve that we can live within our means and be less than inflation, if that example could be felt by the other two senior levels of government, and if we can show an opportunity for new investment in this province, then many of the reasons why we are experiencing the problems we are, the very significant demands on social services, would end with people having employment.

Mr Phillips: I echo what Monte said. It was a very thoughtful presentation. A lot of work went into it.

It is clear to us the budget is not going to change. The government is delighted with it and it is there. All we can do as opposition—this is not partisan bickering—is to try and say, “Listen, we’ve got some real concerns about it in terms of economic activity.” We are quite worried about unemployment, job creation, all of those things, but I think you should assume this is the budget for next year.

Because you have the pulse of the economic activity in this area, let us assume that this is the budget for at least the next year, I suspect for several years. With deficits in the $7-billion to $8-billion range and new taxes in the $5-billion range, what do you feel might be the economic impact in terms of your either attracting industry to London or retaining the industry you have got here?

Mr Gosnell: I think it is going to be death for cities like London and areas like southwestern Ontario. We gave you a number of initiatives that have occurred, not just from this government but the past government, that, when taken in combination, are huge disincentives to doing business in Ontario.

First and foremost, we cannot add to that. We cannot bring in in October the right of 16- and 17-year-olds to leave home and go on welfare. That is going to debilitate the economy of this province and it is going to have impacts far beyond its economy. We cannot continue with an agenda that is going to throw any more hurdles on the existing planned business expansions or opportunities in this province.

Second, we have to get back to the realization that we have to compete internationally. You cannot have an minimum artificial wage that is going to do nothing but create further unemployment. There has to be a realization from the institutions and labour and government that we have to get people back to work, we have to get them off the welfare rolls, we have to make the right type of long-term investments. I applaud the government for some of the decisions it has made in terms of the investment in research and development and education. We have to get people back to work and we have to do it at a wage and at a tax level that will encourage investment. If we do not have that, then the next few years will be very bleak.

Mrs Cunningham: Once again, you make me proud to represent this city. I think you have given us enough specifics, those of us who represent London, that we can go back and I can ask the questions and David and Kimble can work with the ministers. I will say proudly that I like to think of us as being particularly non-partisan as we work on behalf of the citizens of London, but you have been great.

I have three points I would like you to clarify for the committee. First, on page 2 you talk about job losses in southwest Ontario. It is very difficult, as you can imagine for us to make this point at the Legislative Assembly, because we are not perceived as a city or a region that has people on welfare or that loses jobs. When I stand up in the House and say that, there are often uncomplimentary comments coming from the other side of the House. I want you to know that. In this committee so far, job losses have only been attributed by my colleagues and government to free trade. I would like you to speak to that.

Second, I would like to know how many new jobs we have seen as a result of this government's incentive, because it talked about the job creation money that went out. How many has the city of London got? If you would like to speak to the Fanshawe Park issue publicly in my presence for the first time, please do so.

The third one is—my colleague reminds me I have three minutes. So what? Let us show some flexibility. We have our whole city here. We have also listened in this committee to the same old question, and that is that the opposition parties would like to cut out social services as they make better management. I personally would cut out the $59,000-chauffeur-driven limousine to the president of TVOntario to start with, and a few other political positions. But I would like you to speak to how you answered the question here about 5%. People cannot believe it when I stand up and say that. “You must have cut out all the help to the poor people.” That is what people say to me.

If you would like to respond to those criticisms, often made by some of my colleagues that ought to know better, I would like you to take this opportunity.

Mr Burghardt: First of all, the mayor referred to that in some of his opening remarks where he stated that this area cannot continue to be mined as such. There is no doubt about it, and I have personally experienced it at other levels of government too, that people look to London and southwestern Ontario as a fat-cat city, as having everything going for itself. Sure, we have a lot of things going for us, but we are still affected as much as anyone else on a per capita basis in job losses, in increased welfare costs.

It has been mentioned that our welfare budget alone has doubled. We pay far more for welfare assistance than we do for looking after our roads, sanitary sewers and the like, which municipalities are really mandated to do. There is no question about that.

While we have applauded some of the efforts here in our presentation today, we have not seen the results of any increases in jobs in this area. Far from it; we have seen job losses. Small manufacturing plants in southwestern Ontario have left this area to go across the border or have closed up completely.

Whether that is the result of free trade or just the high cost of doing business in this area, who knows? But we do know one thing: We are being affected by it, and London is affected as much as any other city in the province with cost to municipalities. We can no longer afford it.

Mr Kwinter asked earlier about some of the programs that we had to affect in our budget deliberations. We had to really bring the hammer down on boards and commissions. We had to cut back on recreational and park facilities and this type of thing. We had to cut back on our LTC, the London Transit Commission, various areas like that. Library services were greatly affected and could have been more greatly affected had we not been able to move some figures around, I will grant you that. But on the whole, we have been affected and there is no question about it. London suffers as much as anyone else.

Mr Gosnell: If I can just jump in on one other item that is very much germane to this, the government has suggested it is prepared to see investment in capital and municipal infrastructure and, in our region, we are not seeing that at all. In fact, the Fanshawe Park Road project, almost $10 million, has not yet received provincial approval. The Minister of the Environment is holding up major road work that is the number one priority in the city. Our second, which is Wonderland, our third, which is Adelaide or Commissioners, our fourth, which is Cheapside, are all waiting for environmental study reports. Millions of dollars are being held back; jobs could be created right now.

Mr Winninger: I will not debate the road-widening issue with you today. It is a very complex matter. I would say this, however. I enjoyed your presentation. I agree with a lot of the submissions you make. It might not surprise you I disagree with some of the others. Maybe you can help me with a problem I have here.

We increased the municipal transfer payments. We announced Back on Track proposals that were free of cost impact to the municipalities so far. We have allotted moneys or pay equity to help municipalities, hospitals and the school system. We have also spent money on roads. We have spent money on hospitals. We have spent on schools, art galleries, universities, what have you. People are coming before the committee and saying we are spending too much already, the deficit is too high. You are coming and saying we have to revise the cost-sharing formula and I cannot imagine you would be coming to us if you were thinking that you bear more of the burden of the cost. You are asking that the province bear more of the burden of the cost, which again will increase our deficit, yet at the same time you are saying this budget is bad for the economy and you have itemized all the reasons why.

As a municipality, you are faced with competing pressures; so are we as a government. I do not see how we can—

Mr Stockwell: Is this a question or a speech?

Mr Winninger: —keep the municipalities afloat, which we have made efforts to do, and at the same time are down the budget.

Mr Gosnell: If I can just answer, I think the one thing that none of us should lose sight of is that we are all taxpayers to either a city or the region we live in and to the province. So if we are talking about a change in moneys to be paid by the province or the city, it is still our money and we are still representing the same people.

What we are saying is that we want that relationship disentangled. We think there has to be much less duplication of management in government activity, in transportation or social services, and your government has a responsibility to create a climate for investment and a climate for job creation so that demands on the social assistance program go down, not up. You cannot do that by putting more disincentives to businesses and on local governments through taxation, or provincial taxation that will just drive that investment and those opportunities away.

Those are the things we have in common. How we arrange or transfer moneys is something that can be worked out and we are hoping can be done with Mr Cooke's announcement the other day. But the bottom line for all of us in this province is that if we do not have financial reasons for companies to stay in Ontario and expand here, the problem will be much bigger.

Mr Winninger: You have certainly put forward a case, but it still does not solve our immediate problem as to how we deal with the impact of the recession, the loss of jobs, the dislocation—

Mrs Cunningham: You do not give welfare to 16- or 17-year-olds for starters.

Mr Winninger: You are taking my time.

Mrs Cunningham: You do well when I take your time. You are much better when I encourage you.

Mr Winninger: How do we deal immediately with the hungry, the homeless and so on, who are making great demands on your welfare roll? How can we deal with that to lessen the financial burden on you immediately, and still pare down the budget? You really have not answered my question.

Mr Burghardt: We have not had a chance to address it.

As we have said continually throughout our brief, the welfare costs are breaking us. They really are; there is no question about it. We are looking to the provincial government, which institutes programs without consultation with us: example, 16- and 17-year-olds. We are going to stress that and we are going to stress it far more. That is irresponsible; it really is. A youth 16 or 17 years old who cannot, for whatever reason, get along at home can now, if this is implemented, come down to city hall, receive welfare and live wherever, on the street, who knows? That adds to the cost. That adds to our costs.

We would like to see basically in the overall welfare situation that the province fund 100%. Then perhaps we can make some arrangements in our cost-sharing formula that will allow us to look after those things for which we are mandated.

Mr Winninger: You just added more to our costs.

Mr Burghardt: No, we have not.

The Chair: Time has run out. I appreciate your presentation and your time before this committee.

STRATFORD AREA ASSOCIATION FOR COMMUNITY LIVING

The Chair: The next group is the Stratford Area Association for Community Living. You will have one half-hour for your presentation. Try to save some time at the end for questions and answers that I know the committee members here are very anxious to ask you.

Dr Steel: My name is Dr Margaret Steel. I am the executive director of the Stratford Area Association for Community Living. I am sure you will be happy to hear that it is a very short presentation. I do not believe in being too wordy. You say what you have to say and then you stop.

This presentation is made from the point of view of a social service agency serving people with developmental disabilities and also that of a responsible taxpayer. I pay taxes the same as everybody else.

I will not be arguing that taxes should be cut. In my view, we cannot afford to cut taxes since that would necessitate cuts in services. I will not be arguing that social spending should be dramatically increased. This would increase taxes to the point that support for social spending would be eroded.

In my area of expertise, I am concerned with two kinds of social spending. One is the transfer payments received from the provincial government to fund services for people with developmental disabilities. The other is the social assistance received directly by the people in our services. Both have inadequacies.

In terms of transfer payments, as an agency, we find that these are inadequate to serve all the needs that are presented to us. We are able to meet most needs if we budget and spend funds carefully; if we are allowed to be creative and flexible with funding so that quality of service is maintained or is increased at less cost—the main problem with this, of course, is legislation. The changes are under way. The way that acts are written prevents flexibility sometimes, and they are working on that; also, if we were enabled to co-operate with other agencies to reduce overlapping. Most notably, special services for labelled people should in general be discontinued. All citizens should be able to access the same services, which would result in a reduction in overhead costs.

These ways of reducing costs allow the extension of service to more people. However, there are still areas of need that cannot be covered.

Social assistance is inadequate to maintain people with dignity in the high-cost areas of the province. In other areas, the situation is somewhat better. However, social assistance tends to support people in their present situation. There is little systematic assistance for getting into the mainstream. One area in particular that should be addressed is the provision of special employment services for all persons with job barriers. Funding directed to this area would gradually reduce the need for social assistance payments for many recipients.

Since social services are not adequately funded at present, taxes should not be cut. I do not believe it is in the ability of any government to reduce bureaucratic and overhead costs substantially, since bureaucracy is a self-perpetuating system. The belief that this can be done is a pipedream.

I wish to urge three avenues related to budgeting which can increase available funding for social services, at least cost to the taxpayer; first, modest tax increases.

The second is a reorganization of funding priorities. This should be done in terms of four considerations: (1) that the needs of the most vulnerable people in our society be given the highest priority; (2) that services which will enhance autonomy and independence and reduce dependence on social assistance be given a high priority; (3) that the co-operation among agencies to reduce overlapping be encouraged. As a corollary to this, generic services should be made available to persons with labels so that fewer services directed to special populations are required; (4) that the service planning be done locally rather than from Queen's Park. Communities have a clearer view of what they require and are better able to co-ordinate planning and delivery of services.

Third, I want to urge that the budget be developed with a long-term plan in mind rather than in reaction to consumer and taxpayer groups' aggressive tactics. The government should have a clear view of its priorities for the province and use the budget as part of its general policy.

Ms M. Ward: Thank you for your presentation. I have a question which is really just for information purposes. I am not familiar with the terms. "Persons with labels," is that referring to specific disabilities, like a hearing disability?

Dr Steel: Yes, any kind of disability basically. Also "welfare clients" is a label.

Ms M. Ward: You are saying basically that any service should come basically from a generic pool of services and not be targeted.

Dr Steel: Yes. In the past, for instance, services for people with developmental disabilities had to be received from agencies funded just for that purpose. Of course, when they were in institutions they received all the services there and they were not able to access regular hospitals or doctors or speech therapists or neurologists or psychiatrists and so on. In fact, that is still a problem in some areas. Every time you have a specialized agency for a special group, you incur more cost.

Ms M. Ward: Yes, overlapping of services. What about the income aspect of it, income support?

Dr Steel: You mean in terms of income maintenance?

Ms M. Ward: Yes. There is no problem there then basically?

Dr Steel: What I really want to say in terms of social assistance is that there should be more funds directed to helping people off social assistance, with specialized support programs for employment basically. A lot of people would work if they had the ability to do so. They have often never worked. They do not know how to. They do not know how to apply for a job. They do not know how to keep clean. They do not know how to talk to their co-workers. They do not know how to be on time. They do not know any of these things. But given support—and I know this can be done because we are doing a pilot project in Stratford—they can get off welfare and stay off. This is the best way to reduce the rolls, because any other way is just putting more money down the drain.

Ms M. Ward: There would be different levels of support required there, so you would be starting at a different starting point with some of them.

Dr Steel: Yes. Even if people only had a part-time job, they would not be using as much social assistance.

Mr Phillips: I found on page 2 your point B a very thoughtful direction for us. In your experience, are you finding that is not the current situation? In other words, in our dealing with governments, is there some evidence that perhaps that has not been the priority in the past?

Dr Steel: I think I see some evidence that there are moves in these directions. I would like to encourage that movement. For instance, in terms of long-term care planning, the co-operation between the Ministry of Health and the Ministry of Community and Social Services is beginning to move in this direction, and I would like to encourage it in a lot of other directions too. If communities can plan for themselves and all the community agencies co-operate, I think we will find that costs will be less and that services will be better, in general.

Mr Phillips: In terms of long-term care, because I am quite interested in that myself, my observation has been that at the previous government had strategies for change in plans—I think you are probably quite familiar with it—I did I am not aware that the new government has really come to grips with its plans.

Dr Steel: The consultation is beginning in the fall.

Mr Phillips: But nothing has happened over the last year.

Dr Steel: They are encouraging committees to be set up in various counties. We have one in our county. It is about the same. It is perhaps maybe four months behind. That is about all the time that was lost, I would say, with the change in government. It is continuing the same kind of strategy.

Mr Phillips: Are you generally supportive of the previous strategies for change?

Dr Steel: I am supportive of the direction in terms of the kind of idea that was being proposed. You cannot tell how it is going to work out. Both in the previous strategy and in the new one the intention, as I see it, is that the communities be able to put in enough input that they can make the plan, or the way they do it, flexible to their community. That is a very good direction to go because each community is different. The kind of plan they would develop with in Metropolitan Toronto would be quite different from the one we have in Perth county, for instance.

Mr Phillips: One thing we are quite worried about with this budget is not the spending side—I mean, it is easy to spend money—it is on the revenue-generation side, the economic activity side. We are frightened that a year from now when we meet with you—and I suspect you will take the opportunity to present your thoughts—the economic activity will not be going on to sustain and support the social services area. I am just wondering, from your experience right now—because the government feels the economy is turning around and starting to pick up, things are starting to happen, and we should not worry about the economic side of it—are you beginning to see an economic turnaround in your community?

Dr Steel: Yes, just beginning.

Mr Phillips: People are now starting to get back to work and that sort of thing.

Dr Steel: Unemployment is beginning to decrease in Perth county. Yes, I would say that there is a turnaround there.

Mr Phillips: So the pressure is beginning to come off there.

Dr Steel: Yes.

Mr Phillips: Your operation?

Dr Steel: Of course, it could partly be because this is the tourist season, but I think we see changes in the kind of jobs we can get for our people too, so things are looking up a bit.

Mr Phillips: Well, that is encouraging. If that is what the government is banking on, we will see in a year, I guess.

Dr Steel: I do not know how it will be in other communities.

Mr Stockwell: I think this is, without a doubt, one of the best submissions we have had or I have seen from pre-budget to post-budget. It is clear, concise; it should be required reading for the government members. You have commented on priorities for social services, etc. This priority list of four that you have I think is excellent. It says everything that should be said and, although I do not know if you are going to get any kind of hearing here because I am not so sure we are the ones who could carry the message back as well as you have presented it to us, I think you should be very proud of yourself. In fact this government should hire you, in my opinion. This is one of the best briefs I have seen.

Dr Steel: Thank you.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for making your presentation to this committee. We are a little bit ahead.

We are going to take a 10-minute recess and be back at 2:30 to hear from the London Unemployment Help Centre.

The committee recessed at 1422.

1430

The Chair: We are resuming the hearings of the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget review.

LONDON UNEMPLOYMENT HELP CENTRE

The Chair: I would like to welcome the London Unemployment Help Centre, Mrs Nancy Brown. You will have a half-hour for your presentation. In that period of half an hour, if you can leave some time at the end for a question and answer period, it will be divided equally among the three parties here. You can start now.

Mrs Brown: My name is Nancy Brown and I am the executive director of the London Unemployment Help Centre. I would like to thank you for the opportunity to speak to this committee and I am also pleased that these public hearings are taking place and that individuals across the province are getting a chance to respond to this budget. However, I am here today representing the clients at our centre and to communicate to you many of the concerns and issues that they face. Therefore although this presentation may be narrow in its focus, I hope it will bring to light some of the very human elements at stake when budgets are being debated.

I will just give you a little bit of background about the centre. We are a community-based, non-profit organization which provides employment and vocational counselling to unemployed and/or underemployed individuals in the London area. We have a very dedicated board of directors and staff who work extremely hard to maintain our underlying philosophy of providing a friendly, safe, caring environment for people who have been displaced from the workforce. I must say, this has been an extremely challenging task in light of the number of people seeking our services.

The centre was started in 1983 in response to the last recession. Although economic conditions improved greatly in the years following that recession, the number of people coming through our doors has steadily increased. Major increases occurred in 1989 and 1990, and this year we expect a 50% increase in the number of new clients served. Most distressing however is not so much the increase in the number of new clients but rather the type of clients seeking our services and the changing needs of these individuals.

Each week we have orientation sessions where clients are invited to come and hear about the services we offer and to share with us a bit about themselves and about the situations they find themselves in. Approximately 30 new clients attend these sessions and become involved in our programs. Their situations vary but often there are similarities in the circumstances surrounding their unemployment. For example, we generally have several immigrant people, a few new immigrants and a few who have recently been laid off after several years in a factory.

We also see many older workers who are having to make major adjustments in their lives. For many of them, their jobs have disappeared permanently due to plant closure and their skills are no longer relevant in today's market. These are hardworking people who never imagined themselves unemployed and who are totally unprepared for it. The same is true for the growing number of middle management and professional clients who find their jobs have been eliminated as companies tighten up during these tough economic times. We also see several women who are attempting to re-enter the workforce after many years because of financial pressures on their families and the need for that extra income.

For most of these people the loss of their jobs or inability to find another job is humiliating and can often be debilitating. Many of these workers are drained of self-respect and extremely frustrated. Many face innumerable barriers to re-employment while others openly admit in this initial orientation session that they have had so many rejections that they have no confidence left. For example, one middle-aged professional man stated just that and said he needed support and help building his self-esteem. Incidentally he attended several of our programs and eventually found a very good job. However, many of our clients are not so fortunate. They may have language problems and/or literacy issues and in many cases lack marketable skills.

Most of the workers we see who have been displaced from the manufacturing industry have to look at upgrading and/or retraining. In addition, they have no knowledge of how to look for work in today's market. For example, a résumé was unheard of 20 or 30 years ago in this industry. As well, the harsh reality for most of these workers is that they will not be able to make the kind of money to which they have been accustomed for most of their lives.

The statistics regarding the number of jobs lost in Ontario is staggering, particularly when you look at the manufacturing jobs that have been lost for ever. This combined with the major industrial restructuring, is taking its toll on workers. Without sufficient support and protection these workers would be totally crushed. Over and over again clients tell us that they do not know how they would have coped with their situation without the support they have received at our centre, and we in turn are grateful to the present government for the additional funding we have received to help these workers adjust.

I will just tell you a little bit about the services that we offer. In 1991-92 we have been able to provide many additional programs and services as well as being able to enrich many of our existing services. Our ongoing services and programs which are funded jointly by the Ministry of Labour, the federal government, municipal government, United Way, union and community donations include individual counselling, which is provided on an ongoing basis to all our new and repeat clients; job readiness training, which is a two-week group program focusing on self-esteem and confidence building; resume workshops—we have two of them weekly; job search program, which is a one-week program offered twice a month to assist clients with all aspects of their job search; a job finding club, which is a three-week program where workers over 40 conduct their job search from the centre and are assisted with every aspect of it; career planning workshops where individuals are assisted in exploring new career options and examining their transferable skills; vocational testing, which provides personality, interest and aptitude testing to individuals helping them to choose a new career path, and additional support services, which include a message-taking service and use of equipment and resource materials, and we do have used work boots that clients can come in and claim.

New services we are able to provide this year to the growing number of workers affected by small plant closures in particular include a mobile job search unit which provides a one-week on-site employment adjustment workshop to victims of plant closures; training information and assistance provided to the growing number of workers needing upgrading and/or retraining; an employer bank which assists in the actual placement of our clients; self-employment and small business information and resource which we have available for clients exploring this option; an immigrant counselling program is available to our immigrant clients, and we work one-on-one with these individuals; we have computer training which is available to those clients needing to become computer literate, and finally vocational testing. We have been able to acquire additional resources so that we can serve the growing number of people needing this service. I have attached for your information more detailed information on all our programs and services, as well as a program and service profile.

In summary, I would like to say that the vital service we have provided to London's unemployed is now more comprehensive and able to meet the varied needs of displaced workers. It is no longer enough to assist these people with writing resumes and conducting an effective job search. Displaced workers today are having to make major adjustments in their lives and need assistance in exploring career options, training opportunities and future employment opportunities, and they are having to do this at a time in their lives when they are expected, or when they themselves expected, to be secure and stable. Thus, the need for support has never been greater and we at the centre are pleased with the initiatives of the present government to protect unemployed people and provide them with vital services needed to help them adjust.

As well, since it often takes much longer for many of our clients to adjust and re-enter the workforce, they are often forced on to social assistance. This is indeed a very devastating experience for these people and we welcome the present efforts to encourage lifelong learning to reform the social assistance system and to provide more affordable housing.

I would like to finish today by sharing with you one of the many letters we receive from our clients, and it is this sort of thing that keeps us going through some very tough times. This is written in the client's words.

"I would like to take a minute, as I move forward into a new job, to give credit to the Unemployment Help Centre, and especially the tireless counsellors.

"My unemployment situation was a little different, in that I had been fired. In spite of the fact that it was a wrongful dismissal, finding new employment appeared to have insurmountable obstacles to overcome.

"The black mood I brought to the program slowly evaporated as Karen and Mary Ann put me to work learning new skills and searching out the job market. No time for self doubt or pity. Letters had to be written, calls made and interview skills sharpened. Work, work, work. How good it felt. My moments of panic were dealt with calmly and professionally.

"With the support of the group, Karen, Mary Ann and my newly acquired skills, I faced my first interview. Within a few days of this interview, I accepted the job.

"Each member of the club will leave stronger and with the skills required to give them the edge as they attempt to find employment at a very difficult time.

"My heartfelt thanks to a great community service and the caring, dedicated professionals who work there."

We hear this sort of thing very often from the clients, and I guess what I would like to say, finally, is that any cuts in services to people who have been affected by this recession would be a great concern to those of us working in the business. Thank you.

Mr Sutherland: It is a pleasure to have you here, Nancy. I just want to first compliment your organization here in London. I think the establishment of unemployment help centres during the last recession was a very good move in terms of those people who help bring the resources together in the communities. In many cases, labour councils were actively involved, and the governments in the past in terms of providing some funding. I was certainly very pleased to be here on behalf of the Minister of Labour to present a cheque to you for additional funding for your organization. I think the skills that you teach people in terms of job search, in terms of résumés, in terms of rebuilding the self-esteem and confidence that many people have lost are extremely important in helping these people get back into the employment sector.

I was just wondering if you could give us a little more sense of where your numbers are right now. You mentioned you have seen major increases in 1989 and 1990. Could you give us some sense as to what you have seen this year in the first six months? Is it starting to slow down, the numbers coming in? What feedback are you getting from the people who have gone through your program in terms of finding employment?

Mrs Brown: Well, maybe I will start with your last questions first. No, it has not started to slow down. We are busier than ever, and I think probably the effects of this recession are going to be felt a long time by the workers who have been displaced. It is not a matter, as I said, of honing their job-searching skills and finding another job. The jobs are simply not there right now, so the ongoing support is critical during these periods or they will not make it through. There is a lot of training, upgrading, that sort of thing, that is involved in helping these workers to adjust, so it is not a quick process any more. It is a very long process.

As far as numbers, in 1990 we saw 1,207 new clients. That does not include the thousands of repeat clients and people coming through our doors on a daily basis. This year I suspect we will be reaching around 2,000 new clients.

Mr Sutherland: So that is what, an 80% increase?

Mrs Brown: I think that is about 65%.

Mrs Brown: I gave a modest estimate here, but we seem to be seeing about 40 to 50 new clients a week right now, and that is very high for us.

Mr Sutherland: You mentioned skills training, upgrading. Can you give us some sense of how many of the people coming in are in need of basic literacy skills? Is it—you mentioned immigrant people—English-as-a-second-language skills, or is it more that they maybe have a grade 12 education but to get out, they need to get into a specific program at one of our colleges or universities? Or have they not really done any true job searches before; they just kind of came out of school and went in?

Mrs Brown: Well, a lot of the people we see, and the majority of them who come from plant closures, are people who had dropped out of school early, so they have to upgrade. Sometimes they only have grade 3 or grade 5. They are lucky if they have a grade 8 level, so they are having to upgrade to about grade 10 so they can get into training programs.

Now, we work in conjunction with the Wheable Centre for Adult Education to offer upgrading in math and English, and then we also offer night classes in English as a second language for the immigrant clients who have been displaced. We also see a lot of people whose skills are just not marketable any more. That again is very true of the people who have been displaced from the workforce, and sometimes it is not restricted to the manufacturing industry. There are a lot of other areas where people are no longer able to find work.

Mr Sutherland: Do they have to be pushed a great deal to go back to Wheable or things like that, or is there a great willingness?

Mrs Brown: They need encouragement, for sure. They need a lot of support and encouragement. They are frightened to death, because it is one thing to lose your job and go through all that emotional upheaval. It is quite another to start thinking of starting all over. So we cut it into little chunks, one piece at a time. Let's accomplish this and move on from here.

Mrs Sullivan: Can you give me some idea of your total budget for your operations?

Mrs Brown: This year it is just slightly under $750,000.

Mrs Sullivan: And how much of that do you receive from the ministries of Health, Comsoc and Labour?

Mrs Brown: I am sorry, I do not have those exact figures with me. We have wage subsidies through Comsoc and—

Mrs Sullivan: For your employees?

Mrs Brown: We have two employees who are on a wage subsidy; that is the only funding that we receive through Comsoc. The Ministry of Health is just starting to fund a program, and I have included a brochure in your package. That will start in September and run for nine months. This is the first time we have had funding there.

Mrs Sullivan: Do you know how much you receive from that ministry?

Mrs Brown: From that ministry, it is $26,000.

Mrs Sullivan: And from Labour?

Mrs Brown: This year 58% of our total budget is funded through the Ministry of Labour. Now, $200,000 of that funding was a grant to assist victims of small plant closures and that is why we have been able to add all these additional services.

Mrs Sullivan: Okay. When a business in this area is either downsizing or closing, would the company itself come to you to seek assistance in any kind of severance or close-down program, outplacement program, that it would be instituting? Or would they go to private sector operations that provide similar services?

Mrs Brown: That depends. We do not get involved in the severance part of it.

Mrs Sullivan: I am sorry, I should not have said severance.

Mrs Brown: As far as the counselling part of it, some companies come directly to us, or the unions may contact us, or sometimes we hear through the Ministry of Labour.

Mrs Sullivan: How frequently would a company come to you?

Mrs Brown: Since we received this additional funding, we have done one plant closure and that was the Florsheim closure.

Mrs Sullivan: And how many employees were involved with that?

Mrs Brown: Forty-three employees were involved that one. So it is just under the 50 mark.

Mrs Sullivan: One of the things that is of great concern to us is that the Treasurer, in his budget, is predicting that the unemployment rate indeed will not go down over the next budget year and in fact the youth unemployment rate which are extremely high now, are going to continue to remain at those levels, if not increase. I notice in your brochure that you only serve people who are over 25. Could you tell us why you do not deal with unemployment in any way and how those people are served?

Mrs Brown: We do not deal with youth because there is a Youth Opportunities Unlimited centre here which is mandated to deal with the people under 25. We are in the same building, so it is very convenient. If a younger client comes into our centre, we can refer him right downstairs and vice versa. So basically that is the reason why. We are allowed to go up to about 10% of our case load under 25 and most of that is in advocacy.

Mr Stockwell: Thank you. I guess I want to get a broader picture with respect to funding of your kind of programs rather than dealing with the specifics. You say you started in 1983.

Mrs Brown: Right.

Mr Stockwell: That was just basically after the last recession we went through. You started with, I suppose, a budget of X—I do not know what it was. Were you there in 1983?

Mrs Brown: Neither do I. No.

Mr Stockwell: My difficulty with the unemployment help centres and so on, speaking specifically about Etobicoke, which is the city I represent, is that it seems to me during those years of prosperous times in the province when the unemployment rate was at a very favourable number, considerably less than it is today, they consistently came back for more and more money, saying "We've got a need to service," etc. I am speaking from a taxation point of view. They were seeking increases year after year, and the economy could not have been better. In fact, I think we were ranked first or second in the world in some cases in this province. Unemployment was low, etc. Now, obviously, the economy has gotten worse. We are in a recession and people such as yourself—and I applaud your efforts, but you come back and say, "Gee, we need more money; there is a terrible recession." When is it expected that there would be some rationalizing of programs and services? Do you foresee this ever taking place, or are we in a circle that it matters not whether it is a good economy, bad economy, lots of unemployment, no unemployment, we are looking at increasing year after year and hitting the taxpayer up year after year?

Mrs Brown: If I can respond to that, the kinds of numbers that we are seeing now are much higher than we could normally see.

Mr Stockwell: Oh, I do not debate that.

Mrs Brown: We may see a 20% or 25% increase each year. As far as the ongoing need for the centre is concerned, it is not something that any of us hope would continue, but the reality is that there is also a restructuring going on in the economy and people are falling through the cracks and someone has to be there to catch them.

Mr Stockwell: I guess the question, though, stands. Although I understand your answer, I do not know if it has to do with the question. Maybe to put it a little more succinctly, say the government is correct and next year we come out of this recession and we are on our way to hangri-La with Bobby Rae and the socialists and unemployment goes down. Would you see yourself having a reduced budget? Would you see yourself coming to the province saying: "Gee, life is great. There are much fewer people unemployed. We are not servicing as many people. Why don't you keep $200,000 or $300,000?"

Mrs Brown: The grant that I spoke of, the $200,000, is for one year and it is not something that I expect to be renewed. Now, if the need is still very strong, if we cannot cope with the numbers, I would hope there would be additional funding so we can help these people, but our understanding at the centre is this is one-year funding.

Mr Stockwell: Okay, so next year you will not get the $200,000.

Mrs Brown: We do have a base funding. All of the help centres in Ontario have a base funding of $100,000.

Mr Stockwell: Which increases percentagewise every year.

Mrs Brown: This is the first time it increased, this year. It has not increased in many years.

Mr Stockwell: So what was your increase last year?

Mrs Brown: We did not have an increase last year. We were at $90,000 for two or three years.

Mr Stockwell: Yes, but you are at $750,000 now. You went from $90,000 last year to $750,000 this year?

Mrs Brown: There was an additional $230,000 this year from the provincial government, the Ministry of Labour, but we have also received funding this year from the Ontario Trillium Foundation and from a lot of other places.

Mr Stockwell: Government money?

Mrs Brown: Some of it federal. We run a job-finding club.

Mr Stockwell: Rather than simply debating splitting it up, what I am looking at is the total ball, and every year it seems that the total ball goes up percentagewise, whether it is a good year or bad year. The question I am asking very simply is, in recession periods in the private sector, companies rationalize, they downsize, they cutback. Clearly, in the industry you are in, if it is a recession time, you would expand and try and take up the slack that the private sector obviously cutting off. When we get back into good times in the mid 1990s, is there any idea or just any thought of yours that you would see a reduction in the services that you offer?

Mrs Brown: I would hope so.

Mr Stockwell: Good. Thanks.

REGISTERED NURSES' ASSOCIATION OF ONTARIO

The Chair: Could we have the Registered Nurses' Association of Ontario?

Is Dr Pedersen in the room?

Dr Pedersen: Yes.

The Chair: Okay. We are going to be about five minutes late on your presentation. It seems there was a mistake on the scheduling. The date they had was for today when we had them on yesterday's schedule, so we are trying to fit the nurses' group in.

You could take 10 minutes and make your presentation. I am sorry you were inconvenienced. Identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard, and welcome to the committee.

Ms McKellar: My name is Laurie McKellar and this is Anne Martin. We are both registered nurses and members of the Registered Nurses' Association of Ontario. RNAO is a voluntary professional organization whose mission it is to promote the health and wellbeing of the people of Ontario.

Partnership and wellbeing are two RNAO core values that provide a firm foundation from which RNAO can help create an efficient and effective mode of health care delivery in Ontario. Partnership among nurses, other health care providers and consumers or patients will facilitate collaborative communication and high standards of health care delivery. Wellbeing for the public will be attained not only by care during illness but also through health promotion.

RNAO's vision, mission and values have guided our assessment and evaluation of the NDP's recent provincial budget. I will present RNAO's position on the provincial budget in relation to the following issues: health care reform and pay equity.

RNAO is very cognizant of the deficit and the fact that the government has had to balance funding to various sectors of society. Although fiscal prudence and restraint by government is responsible, essential and necessary, RNAO believes that the health of Ontarians today and in the future can be assured if there is adequate government funding into the health system.

RNAO asserts that adequate housing, nutrition and income, clean air, soil and water and the ability to have control over one's life have more impact on health than does the sickness care system. These factors must be remembered during the development of new health care programs. The impact of these socioeconomic factors on health will no doubt be assessed by the new Premier's Council on Health, Wellbeing and Social Justice.

RNAO's partnership value provides the means by which innovative ideas to promote cost-effective methods of health care delivery can be explored. We must all work together to find the most efficient, cost-effective and compassionate way to deliver optimal health care with the funds available.

Unfortunately, recent amendments to the Canada Health Act by the federal government have resulted in a decrease in transfer payments to the province for health care. This federal cutback undermines and threatens the principles and values inherent in the Canada Health Act; namely, universality, accessibility, portability, comprehensiveness and public administration. The federal government is backing out on its commitment to health care. RNAO recently reaffirmed its commitment to these principles and will support the province's efforts to ensure their survival in the Canada Health Act and provincial legislation.

Reduction in federal transfer payments has increased health care expenditure for Ontario in the budget. RNAO supports the NDP's decision to supply funds to maintain our current health care programs. However, RNAO also strongly supports this government's intent to bring health care expenditures under control and to review, reallocate and redesign health care programs.

Society can no longer just talk about health care reforms; we must act. This government must facilitate the development of a health care program that is fiscally responsible, effective and efficient in meeting the health care needs of Ontarians.

RNAO's position on health care reform is based on rational, compassionate allocation of financial and human resources. RNAO advocates for development of systems with objective criteria to assess, monitor and control costs of acute care; expansion of multidisciplinary community and home support systems; improved utilization of nurses and other health care professionals as the point of entry into the health care system for assessment, care and referral; involvement of nurses, other providers and consumers in decision-making about resource allocation, policy and program development, and elimination of user fees, premiums and fee for service.

The government's recent agreement with the Ontario Medical Association to manage physician fee and utilization issues is an important step in cost control. However, RNAO urges the government to ensure that consumers and other health care providers be equally involved in health care management and in the decision-making process during all health care reforms.

RNAO firmly believes that health policy must be client-centred, taking into account that the socioeconomic determinants of health are fundamental elements and that health care delivery must be effective, cost-effective and accessible.

Each community needs to determine what social and health services it requires. By assessing its own socioeconomic determinants of health, the community can allocate financial and human resources into the most appropriate areas. Health consumers have to be given the knowledge, resources and opportunities to manage their own health and the community's health. By being involved in the decision-making about health care policies and programs, consumers may feel more personal responsibility to maintain and improve their own health to the best of their ability.

During the process of health care reforms, community-based health care needs to receive more attention than it has in the past. Although acute care and institutional care are important levels of health care delivery in the health care continuum, community-based health care is also essential to the wellbeing of society.

RNAO has long been an advocate for a health care policy supportive of illness prevention and health promotion. By focusing more on community-based health care, the government will ensure that consumers have the resources, support and education to maintain and to attain their optimal level of health and stay in their homes for as long as possible. This will ultimately decrease admissions in acute care and institutional settings. Therefore more expensive health care interventions will be avoided.

The government's plan to continue with the redirection of long-term care services to a community-based delivery of services will enable people to remain in their homes. Focusing on community-based health care with different levels of care delivery is fiscally responsible, and RNAO supports the government's efforts.

A shift to more community-based care has implications for the nursing profession. There would likely be a shift of nurses from hospitals to community agencies. This would affect human resource planning in each area. Education programs would have to increase the amount and depth of community-based health care courses. The nursing profession must adapt to these health care reforms, not only ensure a more fiscally responsible and effective health care delivery system but also to ensure optimal health of the client and the community.

Pertaining to pay equity, RNAO supports money allocated in the budget to assist transfer agencies to meet this year's costs of operationalizing pay equity for their women workers. We also support this government's initiative to extend pay equity to benefit 420,000 women working in jobs that previously did not qualify for increases under the pay equity law. These initiatives are laudable. However, RNAO believes all women in Ontario have a right to pay equity. Also, non-union women are still using their own personal resources to pursue their rights under the Pay Equity Act. RNAO strongly supports amendments to the Pay Equity Act so that all Ontario women will benefit and non-union women will be provided with the necessary financial resources.

In conclusion, RNAO recommends that fiscal resources be controlled by regional health bodies in the context of community needs assessment and human resource planning. The public, providers and government should collaborate to decide on health care needs and delivery systems. Local services must be co-ordinated so that adequate numbers of practitioners with different levels of educational preparation can provide the appropriate level of care to clients. Health care has to be client-centred and has to have a more community-based focus. RNAO believes that the economic viability of Ontario's current health system depends on health care reforms and major changes in the representation of health professionals on all health care decision-making bodies.

Mental and physical health are vital resources that enable society to function and to survive. Without health, people work less productively or not at all. Not only does this reduce the economic base that supports society, it also increases economic burden on society. For society, poor health comes like the double-edged sword. We must all collaborate to deliver optimal health care in a fiscally responsible way. Health is not a renewable resource.

The Chair: We will file your report. It is in Hansard, and your comments will be presented before the government.

UNIVERSITY OF WESTERN ONTARIO

The Chair: Dr Pedersen, welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs.

Dr Pedersen: I am here today to speak on behalf of the University of Western Ontario. It is a pleasure to have with me Dr Donald Jameson, who does a whole variety of things for us and does them all well. He works in our office of institutional planning and budget, so in some cases he will be more aware than I of some of the issues in detail.

I have a submission to leave with you. I am not sure whether you want that distributed now or later. I do have a short statement I would like to read and then I would be pleased to try to respond to any questions you might have.

Like every other interest group, the universities come before this committee to argue for a larger share of severely limited funding. The main difference, and quite frankly a major problem for us, is that the interest we represent is the province's and the nation's future, not an immediate and visible social ill with conspicuous sufferers and emotional arguments based on social justice or human compassion. We have seen as recently as last week in Canada's national newspaper a front-page story saying that such people as yourselves, those in government and even within ministries which control our activities, view universities as elitist institutions, arrogant and irresponsible consumers of public wealth and poorly managed bastions of privilege. I want you to know I am here today to tell you that is not the case.

Here in Ontario and earlier in British Columbia I have been a university president for over 12 years. I am the immediate past chairman of the Council of Ontario Universities and will retire this fall as chairman of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada.

I believe in education, I work very hard in support of its values and I spend a lot of my time raising public consciousness and whatever money I can for what I consider its essential activities. I do not believe that either the concern or the resources which are directed towards higher education in Ontario are being squandered or misplaced. On the contrary, I feel strongly that in neither area have we as a province invested nearly enough.

The people of Ontario and their elected representatives must come to realize that the economic, social and personal vitality which we all seek for the coming years will depend entirely on our own abilities to extend the frontiers of science and technology and to confront the challenges of environmental, political and cultural change.

The groundwork for a successful future is being laid in the universities today. We at Western and in all Ontario universities feel this responsibility and we accept it, but the resources we have to bring to such a challenge are constantly diminishing. We need the province's and the people's increased support.

Beginning this year, my university, Western, will be cutting its budget in ways which will severely affect the services we can provide to our faculty, staff and students. Over the course of the next three fiscal years, all operating units of the university will be required to reduce their expenditures by 10%. Within the academic faculties, this will mean larger classes, reduced course selection for students and, in many cases, the phasing out of essay requirements. In areas of support services, the cuts will affect library and computing resources, laboratory facilities, faculty research and many student opportunities for a full and vigorous educational experience at Western.

Our budgetary reduction is an attempt to protect and safeguard the quality of our university as much as is possible, but it certainly shows as well that our financial situation is desperate. We are not wasting public money. We are so pressed to support our essential educational mission that we are being forced essentially to redefine that mission and rescale to fit our resources. As both York University and the University of Toronto have told you, we have all done more, indeed a lot more, with a lot less. While succeeding governments' commitment and support have been essential, and we acknowledge this, we are now at the crisis point where quality may no longer be possible to sustain at a level appropriate to Ontario's vision of the future.

What do I come here to propose? Last December the Council of Ontario Universities put forward a recovery plan for Ontario's universities involving joint participation by government, through increased operating grants, and students, through the staged introduction of a supplementary tuition fee. Implementation of this proposal, which was endorsed by the province's universities and a number of student body groups, would restore support levels to those of slightly over a decade ago.

The recovery plan was a co-operative proposal and is, I still believe, a responsible solution to the financial dilemma Western shares with the province's other universities. It remains my belief that we can restore and advance the quality of secondary education in Ontario only through a partnership of government, students and the universities themselves.

For your part, this means vigorous and active support of increased university funding by the provincial government. In the face of federal recalcitrance regarding transfer payments, Ontario must continue to show the fortitude and sense of purpose to sustain the quality of university education.

For students, the direct beneficiaries of a university experience, there is the need to participate more fully in the cost of their education. Of course, any increase in student fees would be correlated with enhancement of aid provisions, guaranteeing that accessibility would in no way be compromised.

As for the universities, a restoration of appropriate funding would enable them to fulfil their mandated mission. A prolonged period of fiscal restraint has, I believe, pruned institutional operations to below a minimum acceptable level. We have major problems in overcrowding, obsolete—and I really mean obsolete—equipment and deteriorating facilities. All of these must be addressed.

Our universities are effective educational institutions. They should—indeed must—be allowed to develop and extend themselves. In many important ways, the future livelihood of this province depends upon this.

I will conclude by pointing out a few things that universities do in support of the other claims you are likely to have heard by now.

I expect strong representations have been made from the province's health care community for increases, or at least maintenance, in levels of support for hospitals, medical facilities and clinics. You have probably heard from social service agencies which require additional resources to support their work with the poor and the disadvantaged at both the community and provincial levels. You have very likely heard from the groups representing these people themselves.

The province's primary and secondary education systems are a great concern to all of us, and I am sure that both teachers' groups and school boards have made their feelings known to you. I would add my voice to theirs. A recent federal discussion paper noted that about as many young people drop out of high school as graduate from university in Canada, about 100,000 every year. This is clearly unacceptable for a country which sees itself as a leader in the next century.

How are the universities involved? We are the primary producers of the highly trained and educated professionals who provide the essential services in all these areas. University degree and diploma-granting programs in the health sciences, care giving and counselling disciplines provide a core of dedicated people who are knowledgeable in ways of coping with vital areas of immediate human and social need.

The teachers who must kindle the enthusiasm of Canada's young people and stimulate their commitment to knowledge are in our universities today. Our faculties of education are developing this essential national resource now and on a continuing basis.

Finally, as I am sure we all know, technological advancements will shape the texture of life in the next century, as they have changed the way we live today. Almost all the pure research and much applied research and development activity takes place in Canadian universities. Students who are now in the classrooms and laboratories of our faculties of science, engineering and medicine, for example, will determine the quality of economic and social life for coming generations of Canadians.

In every aspect of Canadian life the foundation for our national future is intimately involved with the activities of the universities. Our competitiveness and our productivity, key concepts in government thinking these days, will come directly from a basic commitment to developing the country's human resources.

This obviously means providing the professional levels of training in science and technology which will ensure Canada's partnership in a continuing knowledge revolution. But it also means, and I want to emphasize, developing the habits of mind which produce well-rounded, creative, resourceful and thoughtful citizens. In order to realize these high ideals, we need not only to recognize their importance but to support their achievement. By investing in universities, we invest directly in the future of Ontario and of Canada.

I want to thank you for this opportunity to speak to you this afternoon and I obviously will be pleased to try to answer any questions you might have. In the material that was given out to you, the words I just presented are included. As well, there are appendices. One talks about some concrete examples of what sorts of cutbacks are actually taking place in one university. The second is a brief outline of the COU recovery plan that was put forward. As well, there is a little brochure which we put together just to give you some idea of what some of the major problems are that are being encountered by the universities in this province.

The first graph is one example. Here we sit in what is reportedly the wealthiest province in Canada. We have managed to rank either 9th or 10th in support of our university system for at least the last 14 years. I for one am absolutely amazed. I am astounded that we are continuing to be prepared to tolerate that.

As a final comment, I will just give you some comparative data. COU just made a comparison of the 10 largest universities in Ontario, those with doctoral programs, with the 11 most populous states in the United States, over half the population of the US. If you just compare public institutions to public institutions, if we were in the US we would get $4,400 more per student per year. If you put their privates in, we would get $6,500 more per student per year. Maybe that is not a meaningful number.

Let me give you some percentage comparisons. On a per student basis, if we were in Michigan we would get 57% more per year. If we were in Pennsylvania we would get 74% more per year. If we were in California we would get 115% more per year. Folks, I am telling you, we cannot compete on the basis of the support we are getting now. It is not going to be possible and I do not give a damn how you want to cut it. It is not going to be possible to do that.

Mrs Cunningham: Some days it is hard to keep asking the same questions. But I think you summed it up very well. The themes of this particular meeting, as we heard from the presenters, have been twofold. On one side, it is a great budget and they support the deficit because that is the way they think we should go, and it really is not that much because we are only spending 13 cents of our dollar on the debt and the feds are spending 37 cents or something. On the other side, we have to balance our budget.

I am certainly being accused in my party of saying we have to cut out services to universities and social services and health care. It is not what I would do. I would start with the chauffeur of the chairman of TVOntario and his $59,000 position and just start cutting there.

But you have been around a little bit, Dr Pedersen, in your travels around the world and certainly in western Canada and in Ontario. If you had to start doing some prioritizing—I know that is not your job, but you must have seen some things over a very long career, and maybe it is not a fair question—but what kind of advice can you give us?

Dr Pedersen: If I had an answer to that, I would not be doing what I have been doing. I would be running m n consulting business and undoubtedly doing considerably better than I do currently. It is an extremely difficult question and obviously one that none of us has been able to find very good answers to. I think in the end we are going to have to make some judgements about what levels of service we are going to provide in these various sectors. I do not see any way out of that. The truth of the matter is, each of those areas has the capacity to absorb as many dollars as you are prepared to put into it.

Taking health care as an example, I think there have been some astounding advances made in the quality of service we are able to provide to people. The tough kind of question that eventually people like yourselves are going to have to answer is, you know, how many open-heart patients over age 85 are you going to be able to provide that service to? That is the kind of tough question that someone down the line we are all going to have to agree on.

I am immensely sympathetic with those of you in the political world. Those are really tough areas, and there is nothing tougher than the health sciences. In the final analysis, all of us want to be healthy and all of us want to live longer. That is a fact of life. So politically it is a tough area in which to start trying to make some finite judgements. What I would have to say, Mrs Cunningham, that is the kind of thing we are going to have to do in all areas.

The problem I have with universities and colleges is that it tends not to be a high priority item with most politicians. For one thing, it does not have a lot of political payoff. The results are long-term and not short-term. You know, if the post-secondary system gets a few less dollars this year than it got last year in relative terms, nobody is going to die. You are not going to push a bunch of patients into the hall and say these are cancer patients that are getting treatment and they will not live for six months or whatever. I understand all that. I appreciate the political dimension of it.

My argument, however, is that if we do not provide the quality of educational system—and I include elementary and secondary in that when I talk about it—that will provide us with the human resources that are needed, we are not going to be able to support all those other services. You are not going to have the economy that will allow you to provide high-quality medical services; you are not going to have the economy that will provide the needed help for the unemployed and the poor and all the rest of it. So I guess I am making a pitch that says you are going to have to give much higher priority to the educational system than you are giving at the present time.

I guess we must not do a very good job of convincing people. I come here and obviously have a major vested interest in the case I am trying to make, and that is the way in which I would be perceived. What we have difficulty in getting understood is that the rate of return on investment in human resources is at least as high as it is in any other sector of the economy, if not higher. So many of our other social and economic and indeed political activities are related to our capacity to have the well-educated people that are needed to make that work.

You just have to go take a look at what a country like Japan is doing, or Thailand or Korea or Taiwan or the European Community. The European Community now allows you as a student to go into an exchange program in your third year in any one of the universities that are members of the council of European rectors. That is almost 400 universities. You will be subsidized to do that. Why are they doing that? Because they know that the future success of the EC is dependent on the quality of people that they are going to have—educated people, people who understand how the whole EC operates, who understand other languages, who understand other cultures.

We are not doing any of those kinds of things in this country. What worries me is that we are getting further and further behind all the time. Those statistics I cited you for the US would have been very different 15 years ago. We would have been very comparable.

Mr Sutherland: Thank you, Dr Pedersen, for being here today. I just wanted to say with regard to the report that came out last week, I have never considered myself to be an elitist person. I do not think Mr Winninger considers himself to be one. I do think the universities, and particularly Western, have made a great stride in the last few years to open up and be innovative in pay equity and employment equity. Western should be commended for that. I think some of those perceptions are certainly dated, just from my time at the university.

I think you have made a very eloquent case for improved funding. We know it started in the late 1970s. I give credit to the previous government for trying to catch up. They made some very good strides, I think, particularly on the capital side. We are finally seeing some new buildings and new resources, but we also know that operating funds are a major problem. It is great to have the new buildings, but if you have not got the staff and the equipment to put in there, it is not going to help.

On your key point, I think we are going to have to put more focus on our economic viability for the future, being truly competitive in an international economy. I was really glad to see that you said not only in the sciences—they are important because we are lacking—but in terms of being well-rounded individuals.

You mentioned in your presentation that you would be expecting 10% cuts in all the academic units for the next three years if you had not received, I believe, a 7% increase this year. Can you give us some indication as to what that decrease would have been on those different units?

Dr Pedersen: How much larger would it have been?

Mr Sutherland: Yes.

1530

Dr Pedersen: I do not know that number just off the top of my head. But obviously there would have just been that much more that we would have had to eliminate. Part of the difficulty for us, in addition to dealing with just the straight matter of having so much in the way of shortfall, is that the way that typically gets met defeats some of the overall social purposes the current government and society in general are trying to achieve.

You can imagine who is going to be let go when we start reducing our payrolls—and that is almost where all our money is. In a university you have almost 85% tied up in salaries. So, who starts to go? Part-time lecturers and a whole variety of people who do not have regular tenure-track positions, and last people on, all the rest of it. Who are those? They are typically young women who have not been able to get new positions in universities because the funding has been going down like this for the last 13, 15 years, whatever it is. So you continue to sort of marginalize some of the kinds of things that you are trying to do.

Mr Sutherland: I guess you are saying then there is a direct link in funding to destroying the perception that was presented last week in that report.

Dr Pedersen: Right.

Mrs Sullivan: Thank you very much, Dr Pedersen. I was quite taken, as I am sure was everybody involved in administration at university campuses, with the report done for Dr Smith that talked about élitism or the perception of élitism of universities. I suppose that in thinking about that report one of the things that came to my mind was, what is wrong with being élitist if you are a university? Indeed, if your standards are of academic excellence and if your pursuits are scholarly pursuits of learning and research, what is wrong with being élitist?

The other side of that, however, becomes the question of the perception of the bureaucracy and certainly of politicians as well, which was made clear in that study. The demands being made by the university community—which have been well put this year, it seems to me—involving students and academics, as well as administrators and faculty, have been portrayed simplistically. They appear to be a minimal demand for one year, but indeed become a very long-term and heavy additional demand to the base of the provincial budget. I wonder if you would comment on that kind of a response, which I think people have felt as a result of the universities' presentation.

Dr Pedersen: Let me comment a little bit on the use of the terms "élitist" and "élitism." I do not think it needs a lot of profound thought to recognize that, by definition, the way in which people elect to go to university produces a form of élitism. I have never had a problem with that. Universities are élite organizations. They have always been élite organizations; indeed, as far as I can tell, will always be élite organizations. I do not find anything unusual about that.

What is critical is what is the basis for the élitism. Seventy-five years ago in Canada, the basis for university élitism probably had to do a great deal with your social background. It still does incidentally, but it is much modified today. There was a time when universities were indeed the sanctuaries for the wealthy. They were the ones who probably came from home environments where there was some appreciation for university education. They certainly were coming from a setting where the resources were available in order to go.

I do not have a problem with the use of the term élitism, provided that the criteria one uses are the appropriate ones and that you have a system of financial aid that will not preclude anyone from attending university for reasons of financial inadequacy. That, for me, is the critical part of it.

The question of how you fund universities is perplexing. We have a unique problem in Canada, given the nature of the federalist system. I do not know of any western developed democracy that does not use its educational system as a major vehicle for public policy, but because we have assigned education to the provinces, we continue to have this ongoing debate between the federal government and the provinces as to whether the federal government has any role at all. It is unfortunate that the system is not able to integrate better. West Germany, as it was prior to unification, had a similar system but managed to find a role for the federal government, as opposed to the latter. We have never been able to work that out in this country and I think we lose a lot of opportunities as a result of it.

To go to the funding side, I personally believe—and my own institution has said this and it is not a totally popular point of view, probably will not be totally popular with all members of this committee—that students themselves should be making a larger investment in their own education. If you look at what I said earlier, it is not hard to find justification for that. The rate of return to investment in university education is quite high. It is very high in some areas; in some, it is surprisingly not as high as you would think. For example, in medicine and dentistry it is not as high a rate of return as you would think, assuming that you weigh into the formula the opportunity costs, the income foregone in the time it takes to become one of those professionals.

But overall, in terms of straight lifetime income streams, the rate of return to university education is quite high. All of us who have gone to university have typically benefited from that in one way or another and so I do not personally have a problem with saying that students should contribute more than they contribute at the present time. The big hooker in it is the one I talked about earlier. You have to ensure that you have the means of providing assistance to needy students in order that they are not precluded for financial reasons. That deserves some serious consideration.

ANGLICAN CHURCH OF CANADA, DIOCESE OF HURON

The Chair: The Middlesex Federation of Agriculture is not here as yet, so we are going to move on to the church and society division, the Diocese of Huron of the Anglican Church, Rev Stephen Harnadek, chair. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs.

You have one half-hour for your presentation and, if you can, leave some time at the end of your presentation to give the committee an opportunity to ask questions on your presentation, which will be split up equally among the three parties.

Father Harnadek: That is double the time I was told I would have, so that is just great.

The Chair: Let me take a look; maybe I am wrong. They had 4 o'clock. Maybe it is 15 minutes. It is a 15-minute presentation, I am sorry. They did not have anything after that, so I was just guessing.

Father Harnadek: I have the pleasure of addressing you as the divisional co-ordinator of the church and society division of the Anglican Diocese of Huron, centred here in

don. It is a division which consists of committees representing rural concerns, the environment, peace and disarmament, AIDS and refugee concerns, to name but a few. I bring the thoughts, concerns and dreams for the future of one of these committees regarding the recent budget of the Ontario government and the direction in which it intends to indicate we are heading.

The SARC report: "This recession is over," some who do not count the large number of unemployed as their numbers tell us. The number of jobs lost in this recession is estimated to be about double that of the 1981-82 recession. Because the effects of this recession are still with us, we at the church and society division of our diocese have taken an interest in the Social Assistance Review Committee report since it was issued in 1988 and lauded by the government of the day. Although some initial changes were made in 1989, we have been waiting for the changes in the Back on Track report of the advisory group on new social assistance legislation recommends.

Although social assistance costs have doubled in the last two years, we see the adoption of the SARC report as absolutely essential to lessen the effect in this province of the erosion of this country's social safety net which we have been taking place for the last number of years. The good banks that our diocese has helped start, sometimes in other religious communities, in London, Stratford, Cheneau-Waterloo, among others, are now seeing as recipients of aid people who just a few years ago were donors to these institutions. What scares us is the increasing number of children now relying on social assistance. Some reports say that 40% of those who rely on assistance are children. We believe the time has come for the government, with the full support of all the members of the Legislature, to follow through with the adoption of the SARC report and Back on Track report. Now is not the time to cut back or renege on our commitments to the poor, we feel.

We urge all elected representatives to put aside any political animosity that might exist and work together to achieve the goals in these reports. The people this will help are sometimes the people some find easy to forget. Let's remember them. They are not likely to own machines to fax in their concerns to governments. Children only know that they are hungry.

Family violence: It is our concern that in a weak economy stress increases in homes and that violence against women and children may result. These are stressful times for many Ontarians and Canadians in general. Increasing taxation, the goods and services tax, the recession have taken their toll in reality or in people's perceptions caused great upheaval in the homes of many citizens. We are concerned about the potential for increasing violence as our provincial economy works its way out of recession.

We therefore laud this government in its proposal to commit $12 million for new beds and enhanced services in emergency shelters for the victims of domestic violence.

We have seen some of this violence in our geographic area. As a result our diocese, through the bishop's social fund provides seed money for churches, ecumenical groups and other groups in setting up such shelters, among other projects. These shelters have been built in many centres but need the continued partnership of government. To expect non-government organizations to do this work increasingly on their own—a fear of nongovernmental organizations if government cutbacks are encouraged—would, we feel, be unfair and unrealistic.

We believe, therefore, that the $12 million announced in the budget only really begins to answer this need for more emergency shelters. We hope that you will continue to give real priority to the voiceless, frightened people who live with violence in their homes. They sometimes are too scared even to ask for help, or where to find it if they do want to ask.

AIDS: The AIDS committee of our diocese, with its ecumenical and other NGO contacts such as the AIDS committee of London, reports the need for more counselling and support services for persons with AIDS, those who are HIV positive or their friends and family members. There may be some reluctance on the part of government to provide programs of support for AIDS sufferers because of the notion that AIDS is a gay disease. There are members of our society, sadly, who would oppose increased funding for AIDS research and support systems for those with AIDS because of this notion. We hope that all MPPs will do their utmost to help our society see these people with AIDS as in need of the same support as other people with terminal illnesses.

The environment: We live in a society that wants easy solutions to tricky problems. In pain? Take a pill. Depressed? This is my favourite: Go shopping or to a restaurant. We do not deal well with problems but rather tend to look for stopgap solutions instead of painful introspection and the changes that might be required of our lifestyle for a healthy, sustainable life. The same, sadly, seems to be true of the environment. In the election of 1990, we heard much about environmental concerns from the NDP when it was the opposition. This was heartening to many.

There is one concern which I have been asked to raise here today. It regards nuclear energy. Nuclear power has often been proclaimed as a safe, inexpensive source of electricity. Chernobyl, Three Mile Island, not to mention our own Darlington plant, to name but a few, show us some of the risks in nuclear power. We are concerned about the real dangers to those who work in and live near nuclear power plants and the potential dangers to the environment as a whole.

We urge the government to be vigilant in safeguarding the public. We also urge the Legislature to help our society focus on the need for conservation, lifestyle changes and other difficult but possibly safer solutions to lessen our need for more and more energy.

Equity for aboriginal peoples: Justice for our first nations has been a concern of our division and especially the peace and disarmament committee. We congratulate this government in doing more than just talking about just land claims and equity for our aboriginal peoples.

We are concerned about increasing reports that alcoholism, violence towards others and violence towards oneself is higher among the people of our first nations than in society as a whole. It is our belief that these actions may be reactions against the extreme poverty, unemployment and lack of land control, among other reasons, in these communities. Members of first nations have addressed our annual diocesan synod and said as much. The scenes we saw last summer at Oka, among other communities, seem to indicate the frustration our first nations feel towards a seeming lack of progress in settling their claims and meeting their just needs. We are glad that this government has not forgotten our aboriginal peoples. The fact that some of these people live without adequate sewage systems, housing and electrical power we hope will soon be a fact of the past.

We urge this government to continue to work with other governments and the representative associations of our first nations in wasting no time in reaching just land claims and other claims where these are still outstanding with the first nation communities of this province. Let us no longer assume we know what is best for them. Justice for our first nations peoples must begin with dignity, respect and a recognition of their rights.

Rural communities: Dignity is something which some say is also in short supply in many of the rural communities of our province. I quote a short paragraph from a report by the University of Guelph's sustainable rural communities committee:

"Rural communities are in a crisis. Battered by economic, social and environmental forces, they are living through a decline in their ability to support the strong agricultural, mining, fishing and forestry enterprises which, in turn, support the communities."

Many of the causes of despair that some rural communities feel are beyond this government's control, whether that be the removal of Via Rail service, the closure of rural post offices or the shutdown of some local CBC news services, etc. In spite of this fact, we do appreciate the beginning attempts made by the Legislature to counter some of the effects of these reductions in services.

Many farmers at a recent gathering reported to me that they have been in recession since the last recession of 1981-82. Commodity prices have fallen, a high interest rate policy and high dollar have all contributed to their feelings of neglect in our society.

We have seen people struggling against despair, family violence, marital breakups and even suicide because of the increasingly desperate state of the family farm. Many farms do not generate enough income to provide an adequate living for the people who live on them. Many farm families therefore rely on one or even two off-farm incomes to bring in enough money on which to live. While commodity prices have fallen, prices in our society continue to increase. Bridging that gap is becoming harder and harder.

This is causing a heavier case load for many care givers in our rural communities, which may or may not have the same number of social services as care givers have access to in urban areas. Had recent cutbacks in transfer payments from the federal government been passed along by our provincial government, this increasingly desperate situation would only have deepened, we believe.

Some feel that a Third World situation may develop on the family farm, where the people who grow our food will no longer be able to purchase it back at their local grocery stores. We ask you to keep this situation before you and be creative in developing policies which might help our provincial farmers.

We also ask you to check the influx of agribusiness which may help to dehumanize many farmers. When some farms are sold to agribusiness to cover high debt loads, these same farmers at times are hired by this business to manage the farm they once owned. This is a sad situation and we ask you all to work to alleviate this suffering.

We are also concerned about the amount of agricultural land being used for non-agricultural purposes. We were pleased to hear the government put on hold a proposal to build an arena on prime agricultural land outside Ottawa for a professional hockey team. This policy of preserving agricultural land must be a consistent one across our province so that prime agricultural land stays in food production.

Development work overseas: Each year the people of our diocese raise hundreds of thousands of dollars for development work overseas under the work of the Huron hunger fund of this division, which is associated with the primates' world relief and development fund of the Anglican Church of Canada. The target for 1991 is $466,000, one which I trust will be reached. We ask that the government and opposition parties look into the possibility of matching grants for moneys that the people of this province raise for overseas development work, as have the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan for their citizens in the past, the latter two even being have-not provinces.

In conclusion, we are a division of the church which takes up the call of the needy in our society. Although we live in one of the wealthiest parts of the wealthiest province of Canada, those who are poor, who live with violence, disease, injustice, pollution-related concerns, stress, etc., are still needy. To fight the deficit by cutting back on the services and support systems for these people, who may be the least likely to cope with such cutbacks, would be immoral, we believe.

No one likes to see a deficit increase, which will have to be paid back one day, but the alternatives of reducing and cutting back services and support systems, especially in a recession, would only make a bad situation worse.

On behalf of the church and society division of the Diocese of Huron, I thank you for taking the time to listen to the concerns of the people of this great and progressive province.

The Chair: We have enough time for one short question from each party.

Mr Sutherland: Thank you, Mr Harnadek, for your presentation. I think it is very thoughtful and deals with a lot of issues. I particularly like your conclusion in terms that cutbacks at this time are not going to get us into the recovery and in terms of dealing with the real impact of the recession on people.

As much as I support all your comments about rural communities, I think it is important regarding the Ottawa proposal just to imply that the government formally has not put it on hold. What has occurred is that the Ministry

Agriculture and Food is commenting as a normal procedure on the proposal for development before the Ontario Municipal Board.

Father Harnadek: But it is investigating it.

Mr Sutherland: It is making comment to ensure that interests of agricultural land are looked after.

I guess I wanted to get maybe a little more personal viewpoint from you. Reading here, you are from Listowel.

Father Harnadek: I live in Listowel.

Mr Sutherland: I was just wondering if you can give some sense of the impact, of what Listowel is going through. Right now, what is the impact on the people in your congregation and within your community?

Father Harnadek: In my community, the recession has been devastating. Our major employers have closed down. Some have moved to the United States because of the free trade agreement. Some have simply closed down. I'm thinking of a furniture factory that closed down, simply went out of business, and other places that have moved down to the United States because of the free trade agreement. They represented two of the three major employers in my community. It has been very devastating for our community. The number of unemployed has been very high, and we have just begun to see the number of these increase because their unemployment insurance benefits have ended and now we are beginning to see them come into our local food banks and our local agencies for help. It is pretty despairing. It is pretty devastating for these people.

Mrs Sullivan: I do not have questions about your report. I think that on the agricultural issues you have raised, we have been speaking with representatives from the agricultural community and we will be pursuing those issues some length.

I was interested in your comment about development work overseas and your suggestion that the government of Ontario should participate in matching grants for overseas development work. I thought you might be interested in knowing that while the province has not done that in the past, has not provided the matching grants, the province is indeed very active in overseas development work through contribution of equipment and goods and services from the government, including personnel transfers and technology transfers that are done sometimes through Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology and other times through the office of the Premier and the Cabinet Office. That might be something that might change your views about participation of the province.

Father Harnadek: We realize that, but what we are suggesting is that the partnership develop even deeper than that; we are aware of that. We would like to see a deeper relationship develop.

As I mentioned in the report, and so I will not duplicate myself, it is difficult for us to do a lot of work ourselves. It is nice to be in a province where for the last number of years—not just the last year but the last number of years—the government has seen itself as a partner with development work in our own province and overseas. We are just hoping that because of the financial situation we are in, that does not end. We would like to see that continue and develop.

Mr Turnbull: In the interest of time, I will just concentrate on a couple of areas. You are suggesting that the loss of jobs and many of the social problems are caused by the free trade agreement. I would suggest that last year was the first year in history that Ontario actually sold more to the US than the US sold to Ontario.

It seems to me that the greatest cause of loss of industry in this province is the high level of taxation. Essentially, when you are running deficits, it is just deferred taxes. You said the federal government had cut back on its transfers; in fact, it just limited the amount of increase.

Father Harnadek: I do stand corrected.

Mr Turnbull: Everybody seems to consider that the federal tax burden is too heavy. People say the provincial tax burden is too heavy. Who is going to pay these deficits?

Father Harnadek: I would suggest to you that the high interest rates and the high dollar—I am going to try to control myself here—are in large part responsible for the job losses I have seen in my community. I can only speak of my community, but these are managers of plants and these are people who have said those were the reasons why they pulled out, plus free trade.

The Chair: I thank you for appearing before the committee.

We are going to take a short recess. I cannot say whether it is five minutes or 10 minutes. We are waiting for the Middlesex Federation of Agriculture. There is no answer, as it is right now, on their phone at home.

Mr Sutherland: Maybe we can wait five or 10 minutes, and then if they are not here, we will adjourn.

The Chair: Yes, I would say if they are not here by 4:10, there will be adjournment.

The committee recessed at 1556.

1605

The Chair: The Middlesex Federation of Agriculture was to appear at 3:30; it is 4:05 right now. We are unable to contact them, so I would say, looking at the committee here, that this hearing be adjourned for the day and resume tomorrow at 9 o'clock in Brantford.

The committee adjourned at 1605.

1991-92 BUDGET

Resuming consideration of the 1991-92 provincial budget.

REGIONAL MUNICIPALITY OF HAMILTON-WENTWORTH

The Chair: I would like to welcome everybody this morning to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. We will resume our hearings on the budget today. To start off, we have the health and social services committee of the regional municipality of Hamilton-Wentworth. Would the gentleman please come and identify himself and his position for the purposes of Hansard. You begin and you have 15 minutes.

Mr Agostino: Thank you, Mr Chairman. I am Dominic Agostino, chairman of the health and social services committee, regional municipality of Hamilton-Wentworth. I thank the committee for the opportunity to be here today to speak on some impacts and effects of the budget, particularly from the health and social services perspective in the region of Hamilton-Wentworth and on our local taxpayers. I appeared before the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on January 22, 1991. At that time, I made a number of suggestions and gave some input as to what we would like to see in the budget. Unfortunately, the majority of those areas that we had talked about, particularly from the perspective of municipal cost-sharing, did not come through to our satisfaction and clearly to the satisfaction, I believe, of the majority of taxpayers in Hamilton-Wentworth.

I am going to briefly, first of all, address the health care side of it. In Hamilton-Wentworth, per capita health spending in the province is one of the lowest in Ontario. The range from $47.60 per person in the city of Toronto to a low of $6.71 in Peel. We are $19.95 per capita.

We have many special needs in our community: socio-economic concerns, environmental and multicultural issues as well as a number of institutions in need of assistance. Our concern focuses in on our funding primarily for the new mandatory programs which were introduced in 1989 on a three-year schedule which allowed local option approval by council to implement those programs as quickly as we possibly could in a three-year period.

In 1990, regional council approved 30 new positions under the Ministry of Health funding. Out of those, 15 were approved by the province. In 1991, regional council, in a very tough economic time and a very difficult budget period, budgeted our share of 28 new positions. Only 4.5 of those positions were approved by the province and by the Ministry of Health, which is absolutely ridiculous from our point of view. We were able to come through with the 11 positions. Our cost-sharing was just 25%. We were badly let down in regard to the response from the province in this area.

We certainly will not be in full compliance with all mandatory programs by 1992. It is totally out of the question from a financial point of view since we have not had the provincial support to phase in the programs we needed. We are, as I mentioned, one of the lower-funded health units with higher health problems than many municipalities across this province.

Reports from governments, including the Premier's Council on Health Strategy, have emphasized health promotion, prevention, local decision-making and a shift to community-based services. Unfortunately, Ministry of Health funding for public health services does not seem consistent with these directions. We believe the Ministry of Health budget must reflect the shift to community-based services by increasing the funding available for cost-shared mandatory programs and funding all public health programs which receive local approval.

Another area of concern is the funding for second-level lodging home programs. The second-level lodging home program provides health promotion and protection services to residents of second-level lodging homes. This is not considered mandatory by the public health branch, the Lightman commission has concluded. It is now reviewing the legislation and funding of rest and retirement homes. There is presently no identified funding source for this vital community health program. It is clearly important to our community. We had a task force chaired by then Alderman Christopherson, a member of this committee, that put together what was a first-class report and what the implementation of these programs is really waiting for is clearly provincial funding.

We recommend and hope that the ministry identify funding sources for the second-level lodging home program through either long-term care, the Lightman commission or the community mental health programs and provide sufficient resources for this program at a 100% level.

I would like to focus the rest of my presentation primarily on an area which is of a major concern to us, and that is general welfare assistance in our municipality and primarily the cost-sharing. Our presentation we made in January emphasized that we felt there must be a significant shift in the cost-sharing formula between municipal and provincial governments in this province.

I can tell you that our committee is disappointed with what came through the budget and the follow-up funding that has resulted. In January, when I made the presentation, general welfare cases in our region were 9,845 cases. We projected 11,000 on average for 1991. As of the end of July, we had reached a high of 12,690 cases. We expect this to keep rising. It is approximately a 62% increase from last year, and the disturbing aspect is that between now and April of next year we expect over 22,000 individuals to come off the UI rolls in Hamilton-Wentworth and approximately 4,000 of those people are expected to come on to the welfare rolls in our region. This is going to again cause an explosion in our numbers and it is going to once again cause major financial difficulties for Hamilton-Wentworth. We clearly see a possible crisis coming financially as well as economically in the area of social services in our region.

We were hoping that the budget would help our municipalities in that aspect. It has not. It has been a major disappointment. The funding formula has been shifted slightly to increase funding from 90% instead of 80% on 4% of the total case load. That is of some help to us but the financial impact is minimal compared to the money we desperately need.

First of all, on the positive side, I think the province should be congratulated for the initiatives regarding the job creation fund. Our municipality is one of the first to receive assistance. There is $1 million that has been put into programs, through the Ministry of Community and Social Services, for job creation for general welfare recipients. It will create about 150 positions for a six-month period. This is very positive and these are the types of initiatives we need and will continue to need in Hamilton-Wentworth and right across Ontario.

However, I must go back to the fundamental issue, and that is the cost-sharing. Recommendation 197 of the Transitions report states: "The full financial responsibility for social assistance allowance and benefits should rest with the senior levels of government." The emphasis of those recommendations was, I believe, adopted by all three parties in the House, clearly the government of the day. However, the reality has not met those expectations that we had.

We have over $17 million of Hamilton-Wentworth taxpayers' money budgeted in to general welfare assistance for 1991. This will increase as a result of the increasing case load. I clearly understand the restrictions on the provincial government as a result particularly of the latest court decision and the Mulroney government's idiotic decision to cap to 5% per year the growth on social welfare transfers to the provinces. Ontario is going to be particularly hard hit. We fully understand and we fully support the efforts of the Premier to use everything possible to get the Mulroney government to change that decision and to put in a formula that is realistic and reflects the economic needs.

Clearly, there is a hidden agenda here. It is to destroy social programs and social welfare right across this country. We cannot let them get away with that. But at the same time, we at the municipal level cannot be the victims of this fight between the provinces and the federal government. We need the help, we need the financial assistance, and this may take years to resolve.

The reality of the situation is going to be that our region is now going to be facing some very difficult decisions.

First, we are in a position right now to review, and we will start reviewing, what we call discretionary programs in Hamilton-Wentworth. These are programs that are not mandated by the province but clearly of extreme importance, items such as dental care for seniors and children, eyeglasses, cribs, beds, kitchen appliances for people who are welfare, prosthetic devices, clearly essentials but programs that are not regarded as mandatory.

At this point the region has budgeted $1.1 million and will probably spend in excess of that in 1991. Those programs are under review and will be under serious consideration for total elimination or cutbacks in the next few months unless we get some financial help. We are in a desperate situation. These are programs that we are mandated to carry out and that many municipalities across Ontario do not carry out. We feel we are further ahead as a result of these programs, but we do not have the financial ability to continue to carry out these programs. Those decisions may have devastating impact on people in our community. However, at the municipal level we feel we have no choice.

Second, I will ask our region in the next few months unless there is a clear shift in the funding formula, to very seriously consider sending the whole responsibility of general welfare programs back to the province. Clearly we are not in the financial position to continue to carry out those programs that are mandated and legislated by the province unless we get the 100% funding that we should get, that has been recommended and that clearly has been identified as a provincial responsibility. We cannot continue to carry the load of a provincial program that should be fully funded by the other two levels of government on the back of the people of Hamilton-Wentworth and the home owners who have to pay through their taxes for these programs. That decision, again, will have to be made by the committee and council, but clearly, unless there is a formula in place and a change very quickly in the funding formula, we will make that decision and the province can do what it likes—take us to court, challenge us or anything else on it.

I think the time has come for us to get serious at the municipal level and I think you are going to see clearly a revolt right across Ontario of municipal governments saying, "Enough is enough and we cannot continue to pay for programs that clearly do not belong in our lap." I do not think anyone can question that. The welfare programs are not a municipal funding responsibility. We will carry it out at the municipal level. We are the best able to do it because we are on the front line, we understand the needs of our community much better. But carrying out the programs is one thing. Having to pay for them unfairly is another, and we will not continue to do that.

These are drastic measures that our region will have to consider in the next few months, but obviously these are tough times. These are tough times for our taxpayers and we must be accountable to them and carry out the programs we are mandated to do at the municipal level. Welfare is not one of them, in my view, to be paid for by the taxpayers who can no longer afford it, who have been hit from all sides. Our region will make those decisions in the next few months and will obviously then have to deal with the ramifications at the provincial level of those decisions we do make.

I want to address very briefly the issue of day care subsidy, which is a concern to us, and the issue of profit and non-profit or commercial centres. We are concerned the direction of the government is going to mean an increase, particularly in the number of commercial centres will be forced out of business. The slack will then have to be picked up by the non-profit centres, which will mean, in our view, an increase in capital funding, an increase in spending, in order to ensure the spaces are available in our community. Approximately one third of the day care spaces are in the commercial sector. It works well and we urge the government that there is equal funding for profit and non-profit centres. We do not have a problem in Hamilton-Wentworth in that area. The level of care is relatively equal and we want to continue to give residents in that community that choice. If you remove that choice, I think you are going to see an increase in the cost of providing day care services, because clearly the non-profit sector will have to pick up the 30% or so that is now in the commercial sector, which in our view will slowly go out of business as a result of this type of legislation.

I am hopeful that this presentation will emphasize the seriousness of our situation in Hamilton-Wentworth, the problems we are facing and the fact that unless we get some help very quickly, we certainly will be one of the worst municipalities across Ontario to lead what I believe will be a municipal revolt, having to pay a welfare cost that clearly does not belong in our lap.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate very much your presentation. I think the whole future of dealing with issues like those you have raised depends on our ability to develop economic activity. Our biggest concern about the budget is that, in my opinion, it does not generate the necessary economic activity to be able to fund the sorts of things you have talked about.

Because you are very close, obviously, to the situation in Hamilton in terms of the impact of this budget—and I guess the other big thing for Hamilton probably was the Red Hill Creek expressway—I would be interested in your opinion of what this budget will do for economic activity in Hamilton that will fund the sorts of things you are talking about, and maybe just tangentially the sort of impact the Red Hill expressway might have on economic activity as well.

Mr Agostino: Clearly the decision to cancel this project has had a devastating impact on our community. Clearly, jobs have been lost. There has been nothing to replace those jobs that have been lost. There has been nothing to replace the plans we had talked about in building the expressway. This is in the short term.

The long-term impact is still difficult to assess because of the lack of incentive, because of the lack of a transportation network to entice business to move to and grow in Hamilton-Wentworth. There is a short-term loss of thousands of jobs that has been well documented, and a long-term loss of many other jobs and lack of business interest in Hamilton-Wentworth as a result of the decision to cancel the expressway.

The job creation fund has helped minimally, with general welfare assistance, but generally we have not had the type of infusion of dollars I believe we need to help Hamilton-Wentworth get out of its recession. We are facing an almost 11% unemployment rate, very difficult times in our community and clearly job creation has not come our way. Maybe other communities have seen it. Hamilton-Wentworth has not been a great benefactor of that to date.

Mr Carr: Thank you very much for a fine presentation. It was interesting that you talked about the taxpayers and about how much you needed more money for the various programs. As you may be aware, the province is in a deficit position right now. You are going to be here about 15 minutes making your presentation. During that period the province will spend $195,000, not for the health care, not for social assistance or whatever, but just to pay the interest on the provincial debt alone. That works out to $13,000 a minute, so in the time you are here we are going to spend almost $200,000. What do you say to those taxpayers who say spending $200,000 just to pay the interest in 15 minutes is an absolute waste of money?

Mr Agostino: Clearly we are not happy with it. Anyone would not be happy. We all have a choice. We would prefer this province to be in a non-deficit position. We would prefer the federal government to be in a non-deficit position. The reality is that we are going to have government deficits. I guess the question is, where are the priorities for that money to go into? I say to my taxpayers, "Should you be carrying that deficit further on your backs under the most regressive system of taxation you have, which is property taxes?" I do not believe that is the case and this is adding insult to injury. Not only are we getting hit with having to pay for the deficit on one hand, but then the home owner who is barely making ends meet in our community has to pay again. It is a double whammy and they are hit right between the eyes.

Mr Christopherson: Dominic, it is nice to see you again at one of our hearings. You have talked about a lot of the needs, mandatory programs, the second-level lodging homes, transfer payments, GWA, Transitions and all the things that I was with you in dealing with at the municipal level. You use terms like "desperate situation" and "devastating impact." The opposition parties, including members of your own party, have been making the case that the deficit is far too high and that this is not the direction to go in. The alternative, as you know, would be to go down the road of a Mulroney-type budget, which cuts back particularly in areas of social spending. I would be interested in your opinion on how Hamilton-Wentworth would have fared had we not at least made the transfer payments and the kinds of commitments to the social programs we did? In other words, if we had gone down the Mulroney road and not down the road we had, what would the impact on our community have been?

Mr Agostino: As I mentioned, clearly we did benefit from some of the programs, like the job creation fund and some of the other benefits that welfare recipients in our community have made. Frankly, I think a decision to cancel the expressway undermined by a wide margin any other efforts that came forward. If you weigh the net loss and the net gain, we clearly came out on the short end of that part of it. We have lost a lot more than we have gained as a result of the decisions that have been made by the provincial government and in our own region and, as I stated earlier, the municipal funding formula has not been addressed in any way by this government and the local taxpayers are going to be the big losers of that.

We have made some gains, but I think the losses have by far outstretched the gains because the expressway was one decision that would have had an absolutely positive, continued effect on our community. We are reeling and will continue to reel very badly as a result of that one government decision, and it is going to take a great deal to make up for the loss of jobs, confidence in our economy and basically confidence in our own ability to carry out our programs in the region. Regardless of political affiliation, we all understand the need for a strong economy and the need for business to grow and prosper in order to pay for those social programs. You cannot have one without the other.

We are having a great deal of improvement in the area of social services in regard to benefits to recipients and so on. We acknowledge that, but unless the economy is allowed to grow and prosper and the incentives are there for this economy and this province, you cannot continue to pay for those social programs fairly and distribute that fairly across so that people are able to afford it. Unfortunately we have not seen enough of the other end, and maybe that is one of the reasons why the money is not available at the provincial level to help out municipalities and we continue to pay the bill for something we should not be paying.

The Chair: Mr Agostino, thank you for appearing before this committee, and I believe you have brought some different points forward that have not been brought across the province so far. We appreciate your attendance here at this hearing.

Mr Agostino: Thank you very much, Mr Chairman, and members of the committee.

Mr Sutherland: As you know, Mr Chair, not all the groups that had wanted to make presentations were able to appear because of the limited time we have. One of those groups that also wanted to appear was from the Oxford Regional Labour Council, in conjunction with the CAW Local 636. They were not put on the list. However, they did drop off briefs at my office, and while I am not sure if there are enough copies here for everyone, I would like to table the brief with the committee and hopefully, if the clerk could get some extra copies, have that circulated to all members.

WALLY LUCENTE

The Chair: The next gentleman to appear before the committee is Mr Wally Lucente. Welcome to the committee. You have 15 minutes for your presentation.

Mr Lucente: I will try to get organized here. Mr Chairman and committee members, let me just start off by advising you that I am speaking as an individual first, and also speaking as an alderman representing the city of Brantford. Let me start off by thanking you, the committee, for attending here today. I cannot recall if a legislative committee has ever attended Brantford. I thank you very much for making Brantford one of your stops. It is very important for me, an individual and also a member of council, and for the province to feel that this city is an important stop throughout the deliberations across the province.

I want to talk first about the recession we are going through and the impact it is having on this city. Historically, Brantford has always been hit when it comes to recession, hit hard and hit fast. A number of examples as a result of recent recessions—and you are probably aware of the plant closures—are Massey-Ferguson, White Farm and Fruehauf. Brantford is always hit first with respect to recessions, and our infamous federal member of Parliament, Derek Blackburn, has always referred to Brantford as a microcosm of the economy, or of things to come, and that certainly has been evident with this recession as it was in the last recession.

I want to talk about the current impact the recession has had on this municipality at this point. Unemployment is in the double-digit figures, certainly larger than the national average. Inflation has been devastating in this municipality as well, and the welfare costs have been staggering in this municipality. As the previous speaker has alluded to from another municipality, I just want to touch on some of the figures with respect to welfare costs in this municipality, just to give you an idea of the kinds of increases we face and the kinds of expenditures we as a city and a county have been faced with when going through our budget proceedings as a city.

In 1989 our welfare costs were $8.7 million, in 1990 they were $12.6 million and in 1991 the projected costs, if we continue at the rate we are going, will be $24 million. That is approximately the projected costs for the end of the year. It is almost double from last year and this has a significant impact when we, as a council or as a city, have gone through our budget process. Let me just start off by applauding the current government with respect to its announcement of Back on Track, which allows some relief to the municipality if we go over a certain level. Our figure as I understand it, is approximately $25 million. If we as a city and county meet that level at the end of the year, there is an opportunity for some reimbursement. That is important and it may lessen the impact with respect to the budget we have just gone through this year.

With respect to building activity, again just some figures to give you an idea of what has happened in the last few years: In 1988 Brantford was in a boom, so to speak. There were approximately $109 million issued with respect to building permits. In 1989 it was $119 million, probably one of our best years. In 1990 that shrank to $70 million, and this year the projected cost, actually up to July of this year, is only $36 million. If you project that through to the activity we are at right now, it will be only $54 million with respect to building permits being issued. You can see the impact, or the downturn, in the local economy here. The city, I may add, is just strained and that is evident through the budget process we went through that I am sure you also went through.

Just with respect to debt, at this point the city has incurred $60 million worth of debt—$40 million in principal and $20 million in interest projected. These are the capital costs, because of course municipalities do not have the opportunity to incur deficits as provincial and federal vernments do. Let me just say that from a municipal point of view we just cannot afford any further debt.

Taxation has had a significant impact on the municipality well. The market value assessment has cost us increases in some situations up to 100% for certain individuals, and it is evident by the kind of activity and anger that exists in this municipality and throughout the province with respect to taxation. So I think it is important to recognize that from a city's point of view or a city ratepayer's point of view, they cannot afford any further increases because it is the most difficult year as far as taxes are concerned, and the ratepayers of this city are always the front runners, as the impact is felt first at the municipal level.

I just want to explain to you my point of view with the recession and perhaps talk about the difference between the 1981-82 recession and the 1981-82 recession that the city was faced with. There is a difference between the two recessions in that with this recession the difference is that jobs are not just being deferred or people are not just being laid off. The jobs are gone, and I am submitting to you that the causes of some of these jobs being gone, among other things, is the federal Tory restrictive policies that they have opted under Mr Mulroney.

The free trade agreement is the biggest example. Those advocating against the free trade agreement in the past—fortunately their predictions have come true because they argued against it suggesting it would have a devastating effect. Jobs would be lost. Plants would be shutting down and jobs would be going down to the States. Unfortunately for this municipality and this province, that has come to fruition because that is exactly what is happening. Brantford is the greatest example of the effects of that policy, or that directive, or that decision made by Mr Mulroney and his friends in Ottawa.

The goods and services tax is also contrary to those who argued against it. It has caused a devastating effect, and it has contributed, in my opinion, to the recession because it has impacted on consumer spending and attitude. That is evident by shoppers today. They are all going down to the States, crossing the border, because it is cheaper in the States to buy certain goods than it is in Brantford. You cannot blame individuals for taking that attitude because the amount of taxation is just ridiculous. Just in talking to people on the streets, when you talk about provincial sales tax and the goods and services tax, that is the straw that broke the camel's back; of course, with the tight monetary policies that were adopted by Mr Mulroney and his Tories as well.

I want to touch on the actual budget itself now. Let me just start off by suggesting that fundamentally I am against deficit spending. I think we are all against deficit spending on individuals and I am sure, as a provincial government, they are against deficit spending. However, in view of this recession—and as I understand it, it is one of the worst recessions since the Depression of the 1930s; certainly worse, from my point of view, than the recession of 1981-82.

There were two options I am suggesting the provincial government could have pursued. The one option is the federal Tory approach, and I call that the do-nothing approach.

It is a restrictive type of approach. It restricts assistance to individuals. It restricts job creation programs. A prime example is the worker adjustment programs that Mr Mulroney suggested would take place when the free trade agreement occurred. He talked about that, and those who were averse to the free trade agreement argued the amount of jobs that would be lost, and Mr Mulroney responded by saying there would be worker adjustment programs that would take place. Well, certainly those worker adjustment programs did not take place or have not taken place from a federal point of view.

The only worker adjustment programs that have taken place are from the provincial government, and Brantford was first to receive that assistance whereby certain provincial moneys came forward to Brantford, and it was instrumental in assisting us to set up the program through the unemployment service centre in Brantford. I applaud the provincial government for doing the job that should have been created by the federal government as a result of the free trade agreement.

Another policy or another method, if you had gone the do-nothing approach or the federal Tory approach, is to place certain restrictions on the province. Nothing is more evident than the recent Supreme Court decision to uphold the federal government's decision to rescind transfer payments to the province, amounting to something in the effect of $1 billion with respect to welfare payments. That is $1 billion that was added on to the deficit of $9.7 billion or whatever figure it is. In other words, if the federal government had not adopted this restrictive policy and had come good with the transfer payments, that would have been $1 billion off the deficit as well.

In short, the federal approach was a do-nothing approach, a cutback approach, a no-assistance approach, and their only approach was to increase taxation during very difficult recessionary times. Unfortunately, that sort of approach impacts the most on those who can least afford it, certainly not on those who can most afford it, which is usually the Tory approach anyway.

The other option is the provincial approach. This approach, I may add, is the approach that I certainly support, and that is a do-something approach or a proactive approach as I would call it, and the assistance has come to Brantford with respect to that approach. As a representative of ward 5, which is across the road from where we sit right now and includes a number of older neighbourhoods in this municipality, certain work, certain projects were definitely necessary. The biggest example that I applaud the provincial government for was the anti-recession moneys that came to Brantford, or a series of moneys through a package; $4.6 million flowed into Brantford for a number of different sectors.

In education there were improvements to three high schools. In health we have had improvements to hospitals. One example, the Brantford General Hospital, unfortunately it came to their attention that certain parts of the hospital had asbestos that had to be removed. You cannot really budget for something like that, and when you are running a really restrictive budget from a hospital point of view you just do not have those moneys. So part of the moneys that came as a result of our anti-recession package helped finance the removal of that asbestos, certainly moneys that were not budgeted for, and the hospitals did not have moneys for it. St Joseph's Hospital also received moneys. There were moneys made available through housing. Additional provincial dollars have flowed through to the new Brantford Public Library that is being built, and I can remember our representative Mr Ward attending and making the presentation on behalf of the minister responsible.

Sanitary sewers: The city, especially the older sections, are in desperate need of repairs in their infrastructure. These sorts of moneys have gone towards capital projects. Road reconstruction: a series of roads being rebuilt in the older sections and throughout the municipality. This reconstruction, in my point of view, would not have gone ahead this year if not for the assistance of the province, if not for the support of the province. These were activities, these were capital construction projects that were scheduled but certainly, in view of the budget that we have gone through this year, there is no way that we as a municipality would have afforded that kind of activity if not for the assistance.

There are a number of spinoffs that are created as a result of doing the work now during this recessionary time because it maintains employment firstly. It maintains employment from the municipality as one of the largest employers remaining. It also issues work to contractors, to businesses, to developers as well. In short, during recessionary times, it is important to inject assistance. It is instrumental, from my point of view, to help cushion or curtail the effects of a recession, and that is certainly important to the people of Brantford and certainly important to the municipality.

When I said earlier it is a pro-active approach, the biggest example that I can think of is: I remember sitting around the council table, and one of the resolutions that came forward was as a result of certain PRIDE moneys being made available; so we had a letter in front of us from the then Minister of Municipal Affairs, the Honourable David Cooke, saying, "Here's $400,000 anti-recession money. Here's upfront PRIDE money. If you have projects on the books that need to be done now, then these moneys will be instrumental in assisting it."

The Chair: I am sorry. I have to cut you short.

Mr Lucente: We are running out of time.

The Chair: You have used your 15 minutes on your presentation. The Conservative Business Association of Kitchener-Waterloo has cancelled out. Being the Chairman, I look for direction from the committee. If every party would like to have one question of this man, we have enough time, or we will just wind up keeping to our schedule which was already pre-arranged. What is it? We stay to our schedule?

Mr Kwinter: Let's have one question.

The Chair: Okay, we will start off with Mr Carr. One short question.

Mr Carr: Thank you very much and we appreciate your presentation. As you know, there are two ways of helping out during a recession. There is one where the government continues to tax and then turns around and hands the money back in terms of programs, which is what this government did, and we heard the other chap earlier say that it created 150 jobs for six months and then they gave him $1 million. There is another way of doing it and that would be to offer some type of tax relief, whether it be on the provincial sales tax or to reduce the tax on auto sales to spur that. That would presumably get more people to buy cars that, in his area, would help the steel industry and so on. So there are two ways of doing it.

This government took the approach where the people in Toronto will tax the money. They will then decide what the municipalities get money. What is your feeling about that other method of letting—for want of a better word—the consumer decide? You know in your area here that one of the big reasons for some of the losses—people like Massey and so on—was the tax situation, because there was no duty on their product with the free trade agreement. It came across the border duty-free anyway. So what is your feeling? Why go this route where the people in Toronto make the decisions as opposed to letting the consumers do it with some type of tax relief to citizens who, you know as an alderman, feel totally taxed out.

Mr Lucente: The rebate method is a good one. Sorry I did not get to finish my presentation. I go on at length but the rebate issue is a good one, and the example that comes to mind and I alluded to previously was the recent tax relief provided by the current government with respect to welfare payments. If this municipality goes over a certain level, then certain moneys will flow back to the municipalities so it will lessen the impact on the municipality for next year. That will be the relief. So instead of coming in at a budget at a certain percentage, it will be a better year, and that will be the relief to the ratepayers. That is the approach I would prefer.

Mr B. Ward: Thank you for your presentation. One of the initiatives of this budget was to increase transfer payments to the municipalities rather than flat-line them as has happened in the past, and this was a cost to the government, but it was a decision we made to assist municipalities in their property tax revenue. Recognizing the city of Brantford had a tough time with the municipal budget in the spring—and I believe there was still a 6% or 7% increase over and above last year even with these transfer payments—without them, if it was flat-lined as it was in the previous year, could you ballpark what would the impact be on the property tax and the ratepayers of the city of Brantford?

Mr Lucente: Yes, it would obviously have been significantly greater if not for a lot of the programs that we had on the books, especially for infrastructure repairs and reconstruction of roads and so on and so forth—that sort of activity. There is no way we could have afforded a lot of the projects this year. And as I suggested earlier, there is a spinoff effect. By doing that construction now, you maintain certain levels of employment within a municipality. You also increase activity for developers, for local contractors. That sort of spinoff activity is the result of doing the work now. So if not for some of the programs or assistance, we would not have been able to do some of the programs and the effects would have been even more devastating. I dare say that the mill rate that we set this year probably would have been significantly greater.

Mrs Sullivan: I am interested in your view about the impact of the $4.6 million which came into your community. There are a couple of things that stand out to me in terms of that kind of money coming in. One of them is that they are clearly very short-term jobs. There is no long-term job creation package involved in that kind of influx.

The second thing is that you have talked about sanitary sewers. Brantford clearly has had a problem for a long time with water and sewage infrastructure and clearly needs a major influx of funding in that area. One of the things that this government has done is to eliminate the continuation of the water and sewage corporation, which would, in fact, have levered funding to ensure that long-term water and sewage projects could have gone ahead. That would have done a couple of things—provide environmental protection and provide long-term job creation. We have not seen that happening.

The other thing you left out was how much money had to be provided by the community for these short-term job creation projects. In the case of the anti-recession funds, most municipalities have not been able to take up the funding because they cannot afford to come up with their share of the deal. I wonder if you would just like to comment on those observations.

Mr Lucente: First, with respect to creating long-term jobs, one of the points I made earlier was that as a result of picking up certain dollars, we were able to go ahead with certain capital projects. As I suggested before, it gave us the opportunity to maintain the level of work activity within the municipality. In other words, it did not result in any layoffs. I do not think anybody was laid off from this municipality because a lot of the capital works projects and the works that we were doing in this municipality were done by city forces. A certain amount were contracted out. It kept contractors busy. Contractors in turn have employees. It maintained a certain level of activity. So I am suggesting to you that there are some long-term jobs being created as a result of the influx of money—long-term in the sense that we are able to protect the jobs within this municipality.

You alluded to the sanitary sewers. Some of the monies that were freed up out of that program enabled us to do some of this capital work. So if we get to do the work this year, and the work—

Mrs Sullivan: You need millions of dollars. You only got $4.6 million for everything.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for appearing before the committee. We ran overtime a little bit—

Mr Lucente: Sorry, I did not finish. I had about another five minutes but—

The Chair: If you have it written, would you hand it to the clerk so it can be put in the report.

Mr Phillips: That would be great. I would like these notes for next year.

The Chair: Fine. Thank you for attending the committee hearings.

Mr Lucente: Thanks again for coming and making Brantford one of your stops along the way.

Mr Phillips: Mike Harris's idea.

Mr B. Ward: And he is not even here.

The Chair: We are ahead a little bit, so we will take a 10-minute recess.

The committee recessed at 0950.

COMMUNITY OPPORTUNITIES DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION

The Chair: The next group to come forward is the Community Opportunities Development Association. Mr Paul Born is executive director. For your presentation you have one half-hour. I would like to welcome you here to the committee. In that half-hour, if you could leave some time at the end for a question and answer period so the three parties can ask questions on your presentation. You may begin.

Mr Born: I want to thank you for giving me this opportunity to discuss the 1991 Ontario budget delivered by Ontario Treasurer Floyd Laughren. It is important for you to understand that I am not an economist and that I come to this discussion as the director of an agency involved in community economic development. CODA, or the Community Opportunities Development Association, is a non-profit community-based charitable organization serving more than 4,000 economically disadvantaged individuals in the Waterloo-Wellington region.

We have seen first hand the effects of the recession on the lives of the many workers and on the communities we serve. Many thousands of jobs have been lost permanently over the past year in our region. We are concerned about the significant number of people on unemployment insurance and, more recently, the significant number of people who will be exhausting their unemployment insurance benefits. We are concerned about the number of people collecting social assistance, many of whom are there for the first time. We are concerned about the extreme pressures that the recession is having on the social services network.

I come here today to impress upon all those present that this recession is very real, that many thousands of people are hurting in Ontario. I have come to stress that since January 1990, nearly 28,000 jobs have been lost in Ontario due to partial or complete company closures. These are jobs that will never come back again. In Ontario there are 527,000 people unemployed. This is an increase of 249,000 more people unemployed in June 1991 than there were in June 1990.

As an organization, we are struggling to deal with a strategic plan that looked at somewhere in the area of 6% and 7% unemployment. We are now fighting 11% unemployment in our region. So where do we go? What do we do? In the communities we serve, nearly 20,000 people are without jobs. I need to also stress that these are only the official numbers. It does not account for the many nameless thousands not represented by these statistics.

Behind each of the statistics I have presented to you today there are individuals in need of hope that the government they have elected is doing something to strengthen the economy, hope that there will be strong social networks to assist them during their time of economic transition.

The 1991 Ontario budget, in my personal opinion, represents a number of significant hopes for the many individuals, families and communities affected by this recession.

The $700-million anti-recession program is one of these hopes. In Cambridge, Ontario, this has meant additions to two libraries and financial assistance towards the revitalization of the economically depressed Hespeler area of Cambridge. It has meant a program to assist employees affected by small company closures. Each of these initiatives represents solid community development which provide jobs for the unemployed and significantly increases the quality of life for the residents of Cambridge.

Social assistance reform and the $215 million committed towards this provides another hope. The Transitions Report of the Social Assistance Review Committee must be implemented. A recent report, Back on Track, is definitely a step in the right direction towards its implementation. The 1991 Ontario budget will provide hope to the many individuals forced to live on social assistance. New programs such as Opportunities Planning are now in the process of becoming a reality. Programs already in place, such as the municipal employment program, social services employment programs 1 and 2 and community economic development initiatives, will be strengthened because of the 1991 Ontario budget.

More affordable housing, expanded training for unemployed workers, a strong health-care system, enhanced services for women who are victims of domestic violence, and other important and expanded services to help those affected by the recession, give hope to the people we serve.

I am not an economist and therefore cannot comment on the issues of spending cuts, transfer payments, tax increases and deficits. As an individual involved in community economic development, I can, though, comment on the issues of vision and hope and their importance on the health of a community. I have already seen how the 1991 Ontario budget has fostered hope for many of the people we serve. This hope has focused visions which I believe will bring us out of this recession.

Mr Sutherland: Thank you for coming forward today to make your presentation. I think you have outlined in a very brief and succinct manner the impact of the recession. We have been hearing in other communities from other organizations like yours what the impact of this recession has been on people. While this budget has started the process of trying to meet some of the needs, there is still a lot more to be done. I was just wondering if, for the committee and for those of us who are not as familiar with your organization, you could just elaborate a little more on how your organization operates, what its specific mandate is, what the clientele is. Do you do the same thing as the unemployment help centre? Do you work with them?

Mr Born: That is a big question. How long do you have? Has anybody got any money? I can really do a sales pitch here.

The Chair: I might say that your handout to the Chairman is very informative. If there is a possibility of getting more copies for the rest of the committee here, it will give them a good insight into exactly what your group is doing. Your brief did not lay out, as Mr Sutherland was talking about, exactly all your involvement in the community. I just noticed here your Christmas party and the 1991 donors. It seems to be a joint effort with the whole community.

Mr Born: If I could just possibly give you a brief precise overview of what we do. I also have two annual reports, if people want to pass those around. They give you some more specific statistics.

Community Opportunities Development Association was formed in 1984. Coming out of the last recession, we had a tremendous rate of unemployment in Cambridge, Ontario running around 22%. At that point, the centre was set up just to help these people get through the tremendous problems they had with unemployment insurance, with welfare, that sort of thing. Since then, we have grown to encompass many other programs, 14 in all right now. We have a staff of 24 people and a budget of just under $1.5 million.

Our mandate is to help the unemployed and underemployed and to provide them with social and economic opportunities. We also do community-based economic development. We have the Cambridge job centre, which is very similar to an unemployment help centre. We have expanded our mandate and also run municipal employment programs for the provincial government and the region of Waterloo, which help social assistance recipients get back into the workforce. We are running at about a 70% success rate, which is a very high success rate in terms of bringing people who have been long-term unemployed back into the workforce. We have also developed quite an extensive career resource area. We run career programs, helping people to make career changes.

Essentially then, the whole setup of this division is that we are helping people in economic transition. We know that people go through economic transition three, four, five times in their lives. Recessions are not the only times of economic transition for people.

Second, we run family support services. We have initiated a program called Books for Birthdays, which is our literacy initiative, and funded by local charitable groups—this one in particular by the Kinsmen. What we do is, about a month before a child's birthday, a parent can come in, pick up about $20 worth of Canadian children's literature and give it to their child on their birthday.

We have a children's Christmas party, which had 402 children at it last year and about 300 adults. There were 700 people on the morning of Christmas Eve who had just one great time. Again, it is for people who are low-income, who are struggling. It particularly also replaces that company Christmas party that very few low-income people now have and which they used to have when they were working.

We run a program called the summer swim tickets program, where we give free swim tickets to children during the summer, keeping them off the streets and away from the television when they are out of school. We also administer reduced-fare bus tickets for the city.

In addition to that, we run a Cambridge housing access program, where we help low-income people to find affordable housing. Last year, we served just over 200 people in the first year of the program. In the first quarter, we are at 70 already. Housing is a desperate situation. We implemented the program because we found out that in our job centre program 40% of the people had housing-related barriers to employment.

Last, we operate self-employment business resources, called the self-start centre. The self-start centre operates a number of programs. In one we just finished we had 10 Irish entrepreneurs, five from southern Ireland, five from northern Ireland, on an exchange program. We talked to them about entrepreneurship, put them into place with a number of business people locally. They trained them.

We also operate a program called the community economic development initiative in which we help social assistance recipients—this is welfare recipients—to start their own small businesses. We helped 116; 47% of them are now in business; 22% are in jobs with a success rate of 99%. Again, they are people on social assistance, the majority of them being unemployed for more than a year and we are helping them to start their own small businesses.

We started a Waterloo-Wellington credit circle which is an innovative form of community-based lending. Because low-income people do not have collateral, we imported a program actually from Bangladesh, implemented it here in Canada, the first of its kind outside of native communities. What happens is five people co-sign each other's loans. So in lieu of collateral, the goodwill of five people is what is their collateral.

We have a loan fund of $305,000 that we give to low-income entrepreneurs. It has been in existence since 1988 and to date we have zero default. Again, it is a tremendous success and it is a tremendous statement for people on low incomes and the credit risk that they really are. I need to stress, "zero default." I think many banks would love to have that same statistic.

In general, that is what we do.

Mr B. Ward: Very quickly, your organization is on the front line working with underemployed and unemployed in the Cambridge area. Our government took some initiatives and we said we want to maintain our social programs during these tough economic times. We want to maintain our health standards. We have been criticized by some organizations for that stand. If we had not taken our initiatives, had we listened to our critics and cut back, what ramifications would that have for the people of Cambridge, based on your front-line relationship with the people of Cambridge?

Mr Born: First of all, I think you should be criticized. You are in power now. When you are in power, you are supposed to be criticized. That is just my personal opinion.

I think if a lot of cutbacks happened we could have had more of a serious situation. I am not sure exactly how you could have manoeuvred it any differently than has happened, particularly in terms of the way the recession has hit. The recession has been very devastating to many people, our area in particular. We have had somewhere in the area of 22 plants closed.

Prior to the Ontario budget, there was no money, anywhere. We have many contacts within government. There have been three different governments since we have existed and we have been able to work with all of them very successfully. But there just was nothing. We were saying: "We've got 20 plants closing, how can you tell us there's no money? We've got to do something with these people?" There were 2,000 people permanently losing their jobs. We had to do something.

After the Ontario budget came into play, there were dollars available to develop programs, particularly for plants that were closed.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate your comments and I am sure your organization does some really fabulous work.

The last sentence in your brief says, "This hope has focused visions which I believe will bring us out of this recession." I might say that the concern of the critics of the budget is that in terms of looking ahead, at creating the economic activity—because the most important thing to your organization I think is the creation of job opportunity—and as we look ahead at the budget, it is deficits forever, in the $7- to $8-billion range. It plans unemployment in the 9% to 10% range over the next three years, even in good times.

That is our concern. It is not the spending side of it. It is the economic activity side of it. We are frightened that a year from now the job creation has not gone on, the funds required to fund organizations like yours are more difficult to come by, and as I have said to many groups, we will not know for a year. That is our concern.

My question really to you is this, as you look ahead of the budget—it is kind of an economic plan for the next four years—are you satisfied it will create the kind of economic activity that will allow you to provide the real services you need to the people who come to you, helping them to find—I think that is one of your key jobs—meaningful, productive and satisfying employment?

Mr Born: That is a big question. I wish I could predict four years down the road. I wish I could understand the budget enough to be able to give you a concise answer. But what I can tell you is that today many people are being helped by the dollars made available.

By providing them with this help, we have been able to give an element of hope. Fewer people will go on to social assistance because of these programs, in the short term. I am not sure if you have ever been on social assistance. I am not sure if you know a lot of people who have—

Mr Phillips: Yes, I do.

Mr Born: —but if you have ever followed someone going from losing a job to going on to unemployment insurance, the transition is no big deal, in most cases. It is hard; it is difficult; but in reality, it is an acceptable place to be in our society, in most cases, for short periods of time.

But then their unemployment insurance runs out. Watch someone go from unemployment insurance to social assistance. It is devastating. It is utterly devastating. I personally say, a big chunk of their soul is lost. It takes us more than twice as long to bring someone back, to give them the self-esteem and the energy, the drive—we call it the spark in the eye—that employers are looking for. When you are hiring, you look for that spark, you look for that person who is going to take the initiative. It takes us twice as long to get that back for that person when we have got them off social assistance.

So my answer to your question then, using that example, is that in some senses, yes, we have to look four years down the road, and I think you are right in saying that we really have to severely criticize the budget—sorry, critique it, more so than criticize. Critiquing is more beneficial. But we have to because everyone has to be sure that four years down the road these things are going to happen. So we all have jobs to do in terms of making sure that does happen.

But in the meantime, if I can just finish, we must give people hope now. We have got to get people into—even if they are temporary jobs in my opinion, to keep them from going on to social assistance. Do you realize that in our employment and immigration catchment area, we are predicting 600 people a week losing UIC benefits coming at the end of August, and 1,600 a week by the end of December?

Mr Phillips: But is not one of the keys, as you say, to create jobs? If you could wave a magic wand, is that not one of the absolute keys? And are you satisfied with the job creation potential of this budget?

Mr Born: No. No one is. The reality is that people's hands are tied. The job creation potential is directly, in my opinion, correlated to the amount of money that they have to spend. You can only spend so much money. There is only so much money in the pot. I think with what has been given, some significant things have been done.

Mr Phillips: Is job creation not related as much to individuals deciding that they will create an environment where they create jobs? Is that not what creates jobs, that individuals, men and women, say, "Listen, I've got an idea and I am going to develop it here, not in—" A year ago, Ontario had the lowest unemployment rate in all of Canada. Now there are four provinces with better unemployment rates than Ontario, for a variety of reasons. But is it not creating the environment where somebody says: "Listen, I am going to build a business. I am going to expand my business?"

Mr Born: I am not sure. I used to think that, particularly when I was in business. But you see, the reality is, in our organization, that it is not only my initiative and the initiative of our board that makes us grow and strong, but it is my workers. It is the people who do the work. My fear is that if we create an environment in which it is only the entrepreneur, the person with the initiative, the business person for lack of better term, that enterprising individual—if that is the only person that we are giving hope and vision to, then yes, we will create some jobs, but in the meantime, we also have to keep that hope and that vision and that strong work and the desire to work within the workers.

So we must give as much emphasis on keeping the employed and keeping them working and keeping them from getting that big chunk of their soul taken away when they get on to social assistance and the loss of that hope. So for every enterprising person, there are more enterprising people who are needed to make that enterprising person a success.

Mr Carr: Thank you very much for a fine presentation and also for the fine work that you do. As you know, there has been a lot of criticism of this budget by some of the groups that work with people on social assistance. I was reading one of the headlines here that says that the advocates of the poor were scathing in their criticism and the chap at the food bank said they expected so much more and they were terribly disappointed. Another chap from the Rupert House said it is very much a stand-pat budget. The budget shows the NDP is throwing its entire election platform out the window and there is nothing left of it.

They were saying they wanted more money. One of the areas we could have gotten more money from—and I was looking at your statement of revenue expenditures and you are not unlike the government—one of the biggest expenditures is salaries and benefits. There have been those who have said, as other provinces have done, either hold the civil servants' salary at 2% or even freeze them. It would have freed up $1 billion.

In fact, if we had not added 10,000 civil servants over the last five years, we would have been talking billions—not millions, but billions, with a "b." What is your feeling about having those who have what have been called recession-proof jobs in the government, people like ourselves taking a bit of a break either at 2% or freezing salaries for the 90,000 people? Do you think that is a good idea?

Mr Born: It is an interesting concept. Yes, I read the article as well. You need people who are highly motivated who are concerned, who are also feeling that they have a element of job security, which they do. You need to be able to reward people for their good work. To me it goes way beyond an issue of policy and doing an across-the-board 2% freeze on everyone's salaries. You have to work with these people. It is easy to put legislation in place and say we are going to put a 2% freeze across, but you have to keep these 90,000 employees happy and you have to keep them motivated and you have to keep them working hard because they are an integral part to pulling this economy out of the recession.

Now, if these 90,000 employees, many of whom are unionized—probably all of them are unionized, yes—they would then say we are willing to freeze our salaries at 2% for the betterment of Ontario, I would say, "Great. A power to you." Our staff have done that, not this year, but they have done it before and were frozen for that reason for the benefit of the organization.

But it is hard to impose it. You see what is happening in the federal government where they have imposed that kind of legislation and look what has happened: the kind of discontent with the bureaucracy, with the government workers. The kind of productivity that you are getting is minimal in comparison to your saying: "Look, we're partners in this."

re've got to work together. You're an integral part of the government team, and here are your salaries."

I think there has to be an element of co-operation, and I believe yes, if $1 billion could have been saved and the people on the front line would have voluntarily taken those cuts, I would say all the power to them. It would have made a tremendous statement to the people of Ontario, but at this point that has not happened. But I do not believe that we should legislate those sorts of things, because in a modern work environment it does not work. That is the honest truth. Co-operation and participation are the key.

Mr Carr: I would agree, because as you know, in Quebec they did do that willingly, and that will be an interesting question for the OPSEU people when they come through.

The second question that I have relates to the problem of getting people back to work. As you know, during the last recession we poured more money into social assistance programs, thinking it would be short-term, it would be temporary, and when the recession ended those people would come off the social assistance rolls.

Between 1985 and this last recession, in about five years, Canada had the strongest economic growth of all the industrialized world, with the exception of Japan. We outgrew the States, West Germany, Japan, France, Britain, but the social assistance rolls did not go down.

Many of the advocates say, "If we want to get people off social assistance, which is what most people want, then what we have to do is give them training, retraining, apprenticeship programs, the skills that they need, because a lot of the people who are on there don't have the skills that are needed in an ever-changing global environment."

The criticism of this budget is saying we are throwing more money at those people with temporary jobs that will last six months, but long-term down the road, four years from now, what you need to do is give them training so that, whether it be a single mother who has not had a chance to go to university, she has skills that are needed to get a job; whether it be a Massey-Ferguson worker who has been laid off and who is 50 years old and does not have the skills to get another job, he will get them. If you really want to help people, what you have to do is give them the skills and the training.

The big criticism of this government's budget is that it threw money at it, but it did not put any into upgrading the skills and training. Do you agree with that? Of course that is essentially what you do. What else can we do to try and give these people the skills and the training that are needed so that we can keep them working long-term, not just have short-term make-work projects?

Mr Born: The single most important issue, in my opinion, around social assistance reform that your government is facing is implementing the SARC report. It is a report that was developed and gave tremendous hope to a tremendous amount of people. It was supported by all levels of individuals. Even Conrad Black, who is one of your greatest critics, fully supported the SARC report. It must be implemented. It is a humane document. It will create many jobs. But social assistance is a very complex issue, and the people who are on it are there for many complex reasons.

That is one of our specialties, taking people from social assistance into jobs. It is purposely one of our specialties, and we have many very highly qualified people who have years of training and experience working just with this population.

There are many problems that have to be dealt with, but I tell you, the SARC report is probably the most comprehensive document available to deal with that problem. When that is implemented, you will see one of the most progressive social welfare systems, I believe, in the world.

Mr Carr: Thank you and I agree with you.

The Chair: Sir, there are some other members, if you happen to have any extra copies. That is all you had?

Mr Born: I apologize. I brought 25 copies of the speech. I usually just bring one copy. I can sell them to you for $2 apiece. It cost us money.

The Chair: The clerk is going to make copies. I was just asking. He is going to make copies for all members of the committee on the background of your organization.

Mr Born: I would love it if they could. I would appreciate that.

The Chair: Okay, fine. Thank you.

RETAIL, WHOLESALE AND DEPARTMENT STORE UNION

The Chair: The next group is the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, Mr Tom Collins, the Canadian director. Welcome to the standing committee of finance and economics and the budget review. You also have one half-hour for your presentation. At the end of your presentation, leave some time for questions and answers. You may begin.

Mr Collins: I am here as the Canadian director of the union to present some views on behalf of the members as we have discussed with them. I do not have a written report for you and this is the only presentation that our union will be making before the committee so that we can indicate to you how our members feel about the budget.

We represent a little over 20,000 members in the province of Ontario. Those members are in a number of the industries in the food distribution industry. They are in the bakeries and the dairies, they are in the retail department store sector and the retail food sector, a lot of independent operators, and one of the reasons I am presenting here in Brantford today is that we represent a lot of members in very small communities, whether it be small grocery stores, retail stores.

The effect of this current recession upon our people is as devastating as it is on any. We represent the lower-paid members in the service industry and society. These members are the ones who are affected by every glitch in the economy. Government statistics in previous years have shown that for every production job lost, that is, a good production job at good wages, there are approximately three service industry jobs that are lost as a result of that money not being in the economy and not out there to buy everything in the restaurants and the stores and all these supporting industries that are involved. So it is very important to us to say what we have to say about the budget.

We also represent a large number of part-time workers in all of these retail operations who are students who are affected both by any cutbacks in education as well as their own ability to get hours and part-time jobs and finance themselves through the education system. We represent a large workforce of women. Over half of our workers are women workers in the workforce, and as a result we deal with all the problems that come with dual-income families and the necessity for those incomes to support those families.

It is our position that we want to congratulate the government on the fact that it has taken the position of that very radical theory that it takes some money to get things going. We believe that it takes money to get the economy going, and that particularly affects our members.

I am also here to represent taxi drivers. As you know, they are the economic barometer in society. Anybody knows, whether from Parliament Hill or otherwise, when you hop in that cab, particularly in Toronto these days, you will be talking to one of our unionized cab drivers, who will tell you all the same things I am telling you today.

But it is necessary to spend money. It is not a radical theory, and we believe that the government in proposing this budget has gone against the tide of what I know it fully expected would be some public opinion, but it is very necessary as we see it that the anti-recession program, the social assistance package that has been put together, the tax reductions for some of the poorer-income people and the non-profit housing are all necessary components to tide us over this period of time and to get us into a position for some kind of economic recovery.

I think it is quite clear to most people that the recession has been brought about by a number of federal government policies. I want to tell you what in effect they have done for our members and some of the things that are affecting our members and what potential damage has been done. The damage has been done, and the only way to deal with that is for the province to have some fight back and to try and hold the line in a number of areas and try to make sure that the economy continues to grow and goes forward in Ontario.

The cuts to federal transfer payments in health and education: Without the support necessary in Ontario, a lot of our programs would be affected and a lot of jobs in some of our sister unions would be affected. Of course, that means money that those persons are not able to spend in the service industries, money that those service industries are dependent upon. From our dealings in negotiations with the major retail employers, and we represent literally all of them somewhere, they have cutbacks this year somewhere around 10% in retail sales in the major department stores. We know that a number of those companies are not stable right now. The potential is there immediately for the loss of one or two or three of those players who will not be able to finance their businesses unless there is more money in the economy, more sales, more commodities able to be bought by the average working Canadian.

The high-interest-rate policies are affecting a lot of our smaller independent operators, who cannot get the type of loans they need at reasonable rates, cannot support themselves through those periods of time, and some of the government policies that have been brought through in the budget will help to alleviate some of that problem. We do not believe in any sense that that can be done by the provincial government alone, and certainly the federal government should take a look at the provincial program and should follow in kind some of the things that are happening.

The free trade deal in itself has probably done the most damage to our membership and to industry in Ontario. I am sure you have heard the figures over and over again, but I can tell you that the free trade deal in our industries in food production and so on, has had a tremendous impact. It has meant that businesses, even though they are very profitable in this province, and production facilities are being moved south. When I say south, I am saying to the United States, but also to Mexico and elsewhere. I have sat through discussions with major employers like Carnation, in a community not far from here, and Aylmer which closed a plant, and closed it based upon the fact that it was making $1 million a year on that plant and that was not enough, so it had to move that production to California. So the whole concept of free trade and loss of protection for our industries and production here by the federal government is having a devastating impact on our people.

The high-dollar policy is promoting and encouraging the cross-border shopping, which is affecting all of our communities in the border cities. You have to understand from our point of view, it is not the companies that are getting hurt, it is the people. It is the jobs we are losing as a result of that money not staying here, because, you know, an A&P store just builds another store in Detroit instead of building it in Windsor. It closes Farmer Jack's in Windsor and it opens an A&P in Detroit. They are going to make the money either way, those corporate entities. So those type of policies on the high dollar that make it easy for people to go across the border—I think the statistics will show in the surveys that have been done that people are going over basically for price. That is what it is all about.

The GST as a federal program has had a devastating effect as well on our retail sales. Any of the retail employers will tell you that has been probably the major effect that has been upon the retail sales in this last year since January. Everybody expects that at some point they will come out of it; somebody has to buy a fridge again some day, somebody has to buy some more clothes some day but that will be stretched out over a period of time, and certainly any reduction or any lack of provincial government initiatives to provide through the budget support for consumer sales will have an impact that is much greater than it is today.

Speaking to those questions, and I would invite from the committee any comments or questions you might have about our industries and the ones we represent, the people we represent in the retail and the service industry welcome the budget that has been brought forward by the government. I do not think anyone is under any illusion that it is going to do everything that is necessary to spur invest-ent, but it is certainly going to provide more confidence to some of the employers we have to deal with, some of the ones in the medium range and small industries that may need some support in interest rates. It is going to provide more consumer dollars above all, and more consumer dollars will mean that there will be jobs created in a lot of those retail industries, jobs created that are necessary and jobs held that will be necessary.

Certainly any reduction in the budget and any loss of jobs that would be involved in the health care or other industries will be consumer dollars that are not available in the service industry. So from the point of view that we meet the consumer across the cash register, and that is where the dollars are spent in most families, that is where the effect is going to occur on our people. We welcome at least the effort by the government to not reduce, to not cut back, whether it be jobs or in dollars, for the purposes of somehow reducing the debt.

I invite any questions you might have.

Mr Kwinter: Thank you very much, Mr Collins. I was interested to hear some of your comments, and I have heard similar comments from other labour representatives. One of the major thrusts that they complain about is the high dollar, saying that it is making us uncompetitive. It sounds reasonable, but the other day I was listening to one of the presenters and it seemed to me that—who is to say what the value of that dollar should be? In fact, labour is saying: “If we have a 20% subsidy, we can compete. If you put on a level playing field, we can’t.” I know you are going to say that is not true, but could you comment on this?

In 1971, exactly 20 years ago today, the Canadian dollar was at $1.01. Unemployment in Ontario was at 5.4%. We exported $17 billion worth of products and imported $15 billion worth of products. So we had a trade surplus, we had very low unemployment, interest rates were quite low and the dollar was at a premium. How do you respond to that?

Mr Collins: There are a lot of factors that have happened since 1971. I think you cannot address or attack without discussing the tax situation at that time; without discussing the trade situation at that time; without discussing, in particular, many of the protections that were in place at that time to protect some of the industries and growth of industries in this province—and a larger tax base and based upon a lower unemployment. I think you have to take all of those into consideration.

I do not think we want to say, in itself, that a high dollar is going to address all the problems that are confronting this government or this economy, but it is one of them. To be specific to our industry, the retail industry, it is certainly one where we are sending those dollars across the border simply by the fact that we have the dollar where it is.

We are not talking about a country in which we are letting the dollar float to the other currencies. We are talking about a managed dollar. We are talking about one directed by government policy and the Bank of Canada, which is artificially set for whatever reasons of economic policy the federal government has.

Can I account for what happened in 1971? I would say we had a nation in 1971, as well, in which there was a lot more confidence in the economy, in which we had some faith in some of our federal institutions, and I think everybody was very much in a growth mode at that point in time.

I think the federal government policies have dramatically affected, since that time, the confidence in our economy, the confidence of our employers and the confidence of our workers. I think that will account for much of the change that has occurred since 1971.

Mr Kwinter: I would like to correct you. The interest rates are controlled by the government, not the dollar. The dollar is on the market and it is what people will pay for it. The government can support it a little bit if it feels it is dropping, but cannot really control the price of the dollar. All the government can do is keep the interest rates where they are, and that is what I want to talk to you about.

Interest rates have been falling steadily over the last several months, and most economists maintain that the reason our dollar is so high is because our interest rates were so high. Because people wanted to invest in Canada to get that rate of return, they had to buy Canadian dollars, which was keeping the value of the dollar up. We have a situation where the interest rates have been dropping rather dramatically over the last several months and the dollar has been rising. Do you have any explanation for that?

Mr Collins: No, I do not.

Mr Phillips: I was surprised that someone representing a major labour organization comes in and praises the budget that calls for the level of unemployment we are going to see over the next two to three years. I was curious about why you would not have commented on the fact that a year ago Ontario had the lowest unemployment rate in the country, where now four provinces are better than ours.

My question really is this. I think one of the challenges for the labour movement is going to be that first you, I think officially, support the NDP, the government, even with funds. You have a vested interest in them getting and staying elected. But you also represent your members, and there may be examples where those two are kind of incompatible. Certainly as I look at the budget, my concern is about job creation, economic activity, the thing that you have talked about of the employers being in an environment where they are going to create more jobs for your members.

I realize that at this stage, you congratulate the government. What happens when there is a conflict between the interests of your members and the government, particularly around the job creation area? How will you reconcile that?

Mr Collins: If there is a conflict, we will of course address it. Whether we are affiliated with the New Democratic Party or not, we have never been quiet about addressing our concerns on behalf of our members on any particular subject, so I do not fear that will occur.

Yes, we are concerned about unemployment. I think the consensus of the labour leadership is that we know where the unemployment is coming from and we are trying to get some of those federal government policies turned around, and the free trade agreement, so that we can help the situation.

I guess the provincial government could go into greater debt; it could do all kinds of things to promote jobs. I think you have to take a reasonable course, and I think they have taken one to support at least the existing jobs in some of the health care industries and so on that we have—that there are not going to be cutbacks, which we know will result in some loss of jobs, whatever that is, and some loss of consumer dollars. I think there are forces, because of the free trade agreement in place, that are drawing so many jobs so quickly from the economy of Ontario that it is not likely, unless that policy is reversed, that we are not going to see a continued drain on the jobs in Ontario.

Mr Phillips: Did you have any criticism of the budget at all?

The Chair: Excuse me, I have to go on.

Mr Carr: Thank you very much for your presentation. I appreciate your coming here this morning. I, like you, am concerned about high interest rates. I have a family, and in case some of you did not notice, those three gorgeous little children who came back in just a few moments ago are my kids. In the early 1980s when our friend Mr Trudeau was Prime Minister, I renewed a mortgage at 21%. So if we think they are high now, we can remember what they were like during that period of time.

As you know, the big problem we have with a lot of the public expenditure right now is the interest on the debt alone. We have been here about two hours, I guess; since 9 o'clock, and we are coming up on 11 o'clock. In those two hours, we will spend—it has been estimated conservatively at anywhere from $800,000 to $1 million an hour, 24 hours a day, seven days a week, 365 days a year, not to pay for social programs, health care, the environment, but just to pay the interest on the provincial debt alone. That is $13,000 a minute. As you know, being in the retail business, businesses cannot do that. Those that try to overextend themselves and do that end up like Robert Campeau. They go out of business. Businesses cannot do it; families cannot do it. I cannot go out and get a mortgage. But when it comes to governments, they can, because what they do is they pass the deficit on to their children.

My question to you is this: What do you say to those people—and some of them may be people in your unions—who say spending $13,000 a minute just to pay the interest on the provincial debt alone is a total and absolute waste of money?

Mr Collins: Well, I think I say to them something they already know, in the same fashion that you have talked about. You have a young family, so you go out and get a mortgage on a house and you prepare for an investment for the future. You pay tremendous amounts of interest on that mortgage for the purpose of having security in the long run, having the security of your family and having them looked after. That is the same approach the government is taking. We are at a bad time. We are planning for the future and not just today. And that is the purpose, as I understand it, of the budget: to get us over some of that period of time. That is how I would respond to my members.

My members understand that fundamentally, because they know the value that the programs in health and education have been to their families, and they know they do not want to give those up. They feel, in the long run, that this is the best approach at this point in time. I think beyond that, statistically, if I had to show them that, they would see that the amount paid towards debt in this province is much lower than it is in many others in terms of percentage. I think my members understand that, and they understand fundamentally, that if they do not have a job at a place because there are no consumer dollars out there, that drain is going to occur on all of them.

Mr Carr: That is right. My wife, who is also here, might have wanted to get a home in Rosedale or a beautiful place in Oakville, but we could not do it. We knew we had to get something that was within reason, that we could pay back, and that is what we are saying is happening. You do not overextend yourself. You get something you can afford. And this budget—you cannot afford it.

Specifically for your workers—and Mr Phillips touched on the point of your responsibility being to your members, not to support this government. There are those who would say instead of spending $700,000 for a program that will buy infrastructure to put roads in communities, or whatever officials in Toronto will decide, if you really wanted to help your workers what you should be doing is pushing, for example, for a cut in the retail provincial sales tax. As you know, under the Liberals it went from 7% to 8%. That cost $1 billion to consumers, that 1% increase. It could have been done, to reduce that, to spend investment in your particular industry.

As you know, we had a chap in when your group made a presentation before the standing committee on administration of justice on Sunday shopping, and he said they are going across the border for three things. They are going across for booze, cigarettes and gas, all of which are increased in this last budget and for all of which the biggest factor in there is tax increases. It is the taxes on those things that are making them uncompetitive.

My question to you is, if you were really representing your particular workers, why would you not be advocating a reduction in sales tax that would help your particular workers, rather than coming here and supporting a government which is putting money into other programs which really will not help your workers?

Mr Collins: Without playing my own membership against each other, those infrastructures will be serviced by my cafeteria trucks, by my vending trucks, by all those other people in our industries that we represent. Anywhere that there are people who are going to work, it is going to affect our people, whether it be in retail or whether it be in trucking or warehousing or in service: in cafeterias, hotels, restaurants. So we are served by that notion in any event.

A reduction in sales tax is a noble concept, I think, and one that we would certainly support in times when it was beneficial to do so. But that would again mean a reduction in the revenues of the province and it would mean a reduction in jobs. They are directly related. So whether they were our jobs or somebody else's, if the guy down the street does not have a job because of a reduction in sales x and he is not spending the money, we are not going to get the benefit of that, because they are not going to be spending those dollars.

Mr B. Ward: Mr Kwinter mentioned 20 years ago, 1971, about the economic times during that era. I would like to go back 60 years, to 1931, when we had little or no federal debt, the federal government was running balanced or surplus budgets and yet we were at the beginning of the worst depression that we have ever experienced in Canada. So it is very hard to relate different eras.

This is 1991. I would like to look to the future, and that is what our government is trying to do. We have had some criticism from groups lately that are expounding the virtues of a balanced budget during these tough times. From our perspective, to balance the budget, $9.7 billion would have to be taken out of the Ontario economy during these tough recessionary times. I know I am not an economist and I do not think you are, but from layman's terms, what do you think would happen if we withdrew that amount of revenue from the economy during these times?

Mr Collins: I can speak only in terms of our industry. There would be some major players in the industry gone. It would be as simple as that. I mean, there would be thousands of jobs lost in the service industries. Some of those that are borderline companies and big companies now would not be able to support without that level of retail sales that they need to project ahead and move ahead.

It is an obvious sort of thing that it takes money to run an economy. It takes money in the economy. It needs consumers. Particularly in our industries, we need consumers. The more money that can be spent on items other than the absolute necessities, the more that will spur on the demand for consumer products and the production and the warehousing and everything that goes with that. So I would say that at this point in time it would be disastrous for this province, knowing what we already know about the loss of jobs to free trade.

Mr B. Ward: One other question, and it is not really a budgetary item. Our government is attempting to develop new partnerships between labour, business and government, working together for the betterment of the province. We think that is the way to go in the future. It works in Germany; it should work in Ontario, and in Canada for that matter. Do you think that goal is achievable, or do you think that we are off base?

Mr Collins: Certainly it is achievable, and I think we are already seeing the signs of it. Without getting into a lot of details, our union is currently participating in some of the training moneys that have been available with some Canadian companies, in Ault's in the Labatt's organization, to try to upgrade skills and do sorts of things to protect the long-term interests of those jobs and those members. I think you will see a lot more of that as the government brings these parties together, because the co-operative aspect of it will be necessary.

If we cannot overcome some of the other policies that are out there, what companies we have left in this country will have to consolidate and compete for the purposes of what few commodities they are left to produce in this province. So I think, yes, those companies that intend to stay here and intend to work with the Ontario workers and the Ontario government will spend a lot more time in these co-operative ventures.

Mr Christopherson: I want to thank you very much for your presentation. It was very enjoyable, very thorough.

You talked about consumer confidence. I would like to just focus on that a bit. Before I do that, I would like to also mention that I found it interesting that Mr Phillips wanted to talk about political contributions from the labour movement to the NDP when it is well known about the political contributions by banks and the insurance companies and other major interests in the economy and their contributions to the other two major parties.

Anyway, my question to you is, you have talked about the fact that this budget is a bit of a consumer confidence-builder and that helps your membership, because it means that there are dollars out there, and you are certainly not alone. James Frank, chief economist for the Conference Board of Canada, has agreed that it is a confidence-builder with regard to consumers.

In light of the first piece of legislation we passed, which prevented provincial sales tax from being put on the GST and keeping about $500 million in the hands of Ontario consumers, do you believe, since your people are the end recipients of that economic activity, that that $500 million kept in the pockets of consumers during this recession was a good economic move in terms of maintaining jobs in the economy and providing some economic stimulation?

Mr Collins: You can directly translate that into sales dollars somewhere, and sales dollars will mean jobs and security. So, yes, there is no question.

Mr Jamison: This could take off on what Mr Ward had said. Certainly it has been a major effort on the part of this government to try to promote, where we can, the idea of partnerships in the future in areas where labour and business can work together, although, again, over the budget we seem to be hearing totally different views. I will give you an example and I will ask you how you would feel about this.

Just two days ago we were listening to the chamber of commerce from London and they wanted a balanced budget this year. They wanted restraint in spending to a very large degree and indicated that a 10% cut across the board in every ministry and in every area was what they would like to see. That would amount to about $5.2 billion. How would you feel about that if the government were to go in that direction?

Mr Collins: I would suspect in that case that chamber of commerce would not have to worry about some of its members very shortly thereafter, and particularly its independent members. They are dependent upon consumer dollars, and employees of the government have consumer dollars. I know enough about London to know that—I have lived there and I have worked there for many years—so I know also that there are a number of independent businesses that expressed even at this point in time how they will survive through the next six months or so without increased sales. So I would say to you, I think they have got the absolute wrong approach in terms of consumer dollars and in terms of their businesses.

1100

The ones that will survive it—and there are those that propose it—will be the big ones. The big ones will survive off the money they have in New York or in Washington or Chicago or wherever, in the dollars they have to invest. Of course, their long-term goal is that if you put enough of the independents out of business then you are going to pick up their volume and their sales and that will be your profit and your dollars. We have dealt for a long time with too many large corporations to know that that is exactly the game plan. If you can squeeze out everybody else, then the bigger corporate entities will take over. In some, I would suspect in the chamber of commerce, that is in their interest.

The Chair: I would like to thank you, Mr Collins, for appearing before this committee.

STEPHEN HERSHEY

The Chair: Mr Hershey is the next presenter. Would you come forward, please. Are you representing yourself?

Mr Hershey: Myself.

The Chair: Okay. You have 15 minutes, and I would like to welcome you here to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on this budget review. In that 15-minute period, you can keep some time at the end for the three parties to ask questions on your presentation. You may begin.

Mr Hershey: Thank you very much. I appreciate the opportunity to appear before you. I am a United Church minister, until recently serving a small rural church outside of Simcoe, Ontario. I come also with a background as one who had some things to do with the forming of a food bank in Simcoe. Until the end of June, I served as the chair of the Haldimand-Norfolk Committee to End Violence Against Women, and presently I am serving as the supervisor of a program focused on street youth in Hamilton, a drop-in program that attempts to provide resources to people who find themselves literally living on the street.

Therefore, I come with a very specific kind of perspective, and it is a perspective that I find supported in the comments of John Kenneth Galbraith, who I anticipate has been oft quoted in the conversations about the budget, but again to review his introductory remarks in the article as it was reprinted in the Globe at the end of May:

"It is truly remarkable to encounter an issue of major popular concern and discover that almost everyone agrees on how to respond to it. That issue is the recession and what to do about it. The response by all levels of government is an array of measures designed to make it worse. With the notable exception of the province of Ontario, governments everywhere are tightening budgets, curtailing services, reducing payrolls, furloughing workers or promising to do so. Individuals immediately affected, needless to say, have their spending and resulting support to the economy promptly reduced. Many, under threat of unemployment, are impelled to retrench. So are those receiving welfare and other payments not being curtailed or threatened with curtailment."

There are essentially two comments that I wanted to make in response to the proposed budget. The first comment related to the kind of media fanfare that accompanied the recognition of the size of the deficit. I was greatly concerned that the size of that deficit was being identified but not the aspects of that deficit, not the realization that tax revenues are decreased, as we know by the recession without the realization that federal revenue to the province was being decreased, and also the incredible increase in costs of social assistance as people moved first on to the unemployment rolls and then to social assistance rolls. The costs both to the municipalities and to the province were skyrocketing. I was, as you might imagine, greatly concerned with the federal budget direction of capping payments, certainly to the province of Ontario. Within Haldimand-Norfolk there certainly is no exception there. Mr Jamison, I suspect, would confirm, in probably more detail than I, the size of the increase that has been going on in social assistance. That is the focus of my first comment.

The second comment relates to those whom we term to be "marginalized." Those who are marginalized are those who, through a variety of circumstance, do not participate in the mainstream of our society, even of our communities. The ones we are talking about are those who are victims of abuse, be it sexual abuse, physical abuse, emotional abuse, be it abuse that has happened as children or abuse that has happened as they have come into adult life. But it, none the less, is abuse which within a person's psychology can create a sense of being a victim and, as victims, unable or unwilling to speak out on their own behalf.

I would want to identify further groupings within those who are unable to speak: those who suffer from psychiatric disorders who, because of previous governmental decisions, are not able to live in the kind of structured environment they need, but rather are sent to the street with their bottle of medicine and told, "Take one every day," but, by virtue of their disorder, are not always able to provide their own support to themselves.

We need to look at further groups, in which we might include those who are physically brain-damaged who, through no fault of their own, through a variety of accidents, find themselves with skills but not always just the correct skills to fit into the kinds of systems that we establish for education, for job training and so on.

Further are those who are developmentally delayed, what we formerly called the mentally retarded, and again the kinds of needs that they have and the ways in which they do not fit into the mainstream.

So to me it was critically important that in this budget proposal, as it was presented to the Legislature in April, not only were increases being given to the whole social assistance area, increases in excess of merely the rate of inflation—because anyone who has had any involvement with the social assistance field will know that the present rates are far below any kind of need level—but also that money was being put into, as one said, "Putting the Transitions report of the Social Assistance Review Committee back on track, recognizing and establishing that the system doesn't quite fit in a lot of ways, that there are a whole variety of people who don't quite fit into the sorts of definitions we make and the very broad sorts of systemic brush strokes in which we try to establish our assistance programs."

So to me it was critically important, as I say, that the government was willing to respond to fight the recession, to make that very conscious and, I would say, courageous choice rather than merely fighting the deficit. It is in these two areas that I would offer my comments in support of the budget as it was proposed.

Mr Carr: Thank you very much for your presentation. As you know, one of the concerns that has been leveled against this government is that there have been no controls in terms of the spending, and there have been examples. You may have heard about the chairman of TVOntario, who has nine TVs in his office and a chauffeur at $51,000. They spent $2,000 to send a Japanese businessman down to a Blue Jays game. Zanana Akande spent $54,000 for new carpets in her office. A lot of people are saying that rather than moaning and pointing to other levels of government about transfer payments you should look at your own house and see where the spending is going and where you can eliminate abuses.

What do you say to those people who say that instead of complaining about what the federal government is doing or the municipal government, you should get your own house in order and start to get rid of some of these abuses that have been laid out? What do you say to those people?

Mr Hershey: I do not want to sound flip, but I would agree, we all need to have our house in order. It was suggested to me that I could spend time on what has happened at the federal level, but it seemed to me that that was inappropriate.

Mr Carr: It is.

Mr Hershey: The reality is, this is the situation in which we are living, and my response is that then we respond to it. It was within the context of the capping of transfer payments that the budget was devised and designed in trying to respond to that reality. Yes, one of the consequences is an increased deficit, but none the less it does not remove the requirement that we respond to the individual needs of our communities.

Mr Jamison: Your presentation was very enlightening on the social side of things. I think it is very important that all of us as politicians here listening to the public at large understand the type of devastation going on, not just with people being laid off but the added pressures that are on all of our identifiable social groups that are there to try to assist. I wonder if you can expand for a moment and enlighten all of us here to the need that is ongoing and developing in probably all of our communities, in what you can put down in a number of words, in your experience, the effect on people's everyday lives this recession has caused.

Mr Hershey: Certainly one of the areas in which I can provide a broad response is in terms of the food bank, Simcoe's Caring Cupboard, that was established this spring in the community of Simcoe. It was anticipated that this food bank would be responding to something in the order of 25 requests a week. The food bank was devised out of three churches coming together and wanting to provide a co-ordinated response. On the very first day we opened we had 29 families coming to us and the numbers continued to escalate, so that by the end of 9 or 10 weeks of operation we had responded to 400 families, substantially higher than our expectations. The expectations were not unreal, they were based on the experience of the three churches.

Within our experience of those families, we discovered on our second day the need to have a box of Kleenex sitting on the desk as people came into the Cupboard because of people's sense of embarrassment. They were brought up as children that you take care of yourself, you take care of your family and it is your job, in a privatized kind of way, to respond to the needs. They found themselves not able to respond and so were coming to us for an emergency supply of groceries.

More recently in my work in Hamilton with the street youth, one would anticipate that the social assistance system was somehow to be a co-operative kind of system, that somehow it was put in place to enable people to provide for their own means by the issuing of a cheque each month. One fellow with whom I have contact—

The Chair: I am sorry, I am going to have to cut you short on that answer and go to Mr Kwinter for a couple of minutes.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Hershey, you talked about your involvement in the food banks in Simcoe. I would like to read a quote from someone who is also involved in food banks and get your comment. This is from Gerard Kennedy, who runs the Daily Bread Food Bank in Toronto. He says—this is his quote, by the way—"This budget ignores the poor entirely. There is about $12 per person per month possible extra for people on social assistance, so the word for food banks is not very encouraging." Is your reaction the same?

Mr Hershey: I would not be quite so negative as Mr Kennedy. If I were to be given my biggest druther, my druther would be that substantially more would have happened. But I recognize also that we live in a reality in which there is a whole list of conflicting demands that require us to negotiate how we respond to a variety of situations. In one respect I would say food banks were given more work to do, but I would also want to acknowledge that the causes for that are more than merely within the mandate of a provincial government. I would also say that what could be done was done, again, given the list of conflicting demands.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for appearing before this committee.

BRANTFORD CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Chair: The next group is the Brantford Chamber of Commerce. Would they come forward, please? I would like to welcome you here before the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget review. You have one half-hour for your presentation. You can leave some time near the end of your presentation for a question-and-answer period on your brief from the three parties. If you would identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard, and you may begin your presentation.

Mr Bateson: Thank you. My name is Terry Bateson. I am the treasurer of the local chamber. I guess my comments today are from the membership of the chamber, which is largely business-related. We are a group of small businessmen, and in some cases large businesses, in the Brantford area who have concerns essentially about the effect of this budget on business. But it goes beyond that, obviously, because what is good for the people is good for business, and what is good for business is good for the people, I guess. Based on that I have a few issues I would like to—I am not really speaking to the individual items in the budget itself, but more the overall effect of this deficit. Brad and I have already squared off on this subject, he has his opinions and I have mine. I guess I have my—

Mr B. Ward: We agreed to disagree.

Mr Bateson: We agreed to disagree. So, I have my day in court here. Anyway, the biggest concern the chamber members have is the quantum of this deficit; $9.7 billion is a considerable quantum and I hear tell recently that this $9.7 billion may be a pipedream, that in fact it is probably going to be worse than that.

Obviously the government spending into a deficit of this magnitude is going to have an effect on the economy of Ontario. Obviously this spending has to put upward pressure on interest rates. I believe the marketplace is already feeling that upward pressure. What I read says that interest rates are headed upward in the short term and I suspect this government has contributed to some degree to that. Because of higher interest rates, or the potential for higher interest rates, we have also got to consider the effect that may have on inflation and that it will fuel inflation and will contribute to this recession.

Inflation, the federal government—and I do not mean to quote them in front of you—but we are talking nationally of an inflation rate of somewhere around 3%. That is a target. Whether we achieve it or not is another question but I say to you that this budget by itself is having a negative effect on that attempt to rein in inflation.

By virtue of creating this deficit, it has to be addressed at some point whether we are talking about the deficit itself or the interest on the deficit that will have to be added to the bill next year. No matter how you cut the mustard, ladies and gentlemen, you are going to have to increase taxes somewhere down the road with this spending. You have to in order to offset the debt that is being created. I understand the bulk of this debt is being created essentially through continued social spending. I do not know that the budget in itself said that X amount of money was going to be spent on programs, and certainly this was not $9.7 billion of new money being spent on new programs. I believe the $9.7 billion merely came through the increases in the existing programs or the cost of administering existing programs.

A great deal of this, of course, is social assistance which in a recession obviously has to increase. But if we talk about further increases in taxes, I suggest that the main beneficiaries of this budget are going to end up being the merchants of Buffalo and not the citizens of Ontario.

Furthermore, again from a business standpoint, if we have higher taxes and if we have higher inflation, it certainly going to cause us to be less competitive in world markets, which is where our business people have to compete.

I can also suggest that this method of handling recessions, and by that I mean the statement that the NDP government is “going to spend its way out of this recession”—and I will wrap quotation marks around that phrase because it was used—I think it has been proven in world history that spending your way out of a recession does not work. I point to Sweden, I point to Britain and I point to France as examples of governments that have tried this type of program to spend their way out of a recession. It has not worked before and I do not think Ontario is any different. It is going to have essentially the same effect here.

There is, incidentally, in trying to get a grip on the budget's attempt to assist business—I am not familiar with the exact numbers—included in the provincial program a assistance program to struggling businesses. But it was noted, and I am speaking again on behalf of our members that to qualify for this I believe you had to have sales in excess of $10 million. The number may be wrong, but it was certainly a fairly large number and you also had to have at least 50 employees before you qualified. I am quoting directly from some of our members when I said that the feeling now is that the NDP government is definitely in favour of labour, as long as it is large and it is organized. I am quoting from several people on that issue.

The deficit, furthermore—we are talking $9.7 billion in the current year; we are talking a similar number next year and a similar number following and I understand that by the time we are all finished there is going to be an accumulative deficit of around $50 billion in this province. That is about five times the present number. I find that the numbers are staggering to a business person who has to balance revenues and expenses. You do not stick around for very long if you do not. Basically, the deficit that is going to be in place when we are finished with this program has to be borne by somebody. We are taxing future generations and I do not see that as being healthy economically.

Last, there has been talk of this deficit attempting to assist with job creation. The jobs being created, in my mind, are the types of jobs that—and I call them phantom jobs—are created and government-funded and they are only jobs as long as the government funding remains. As soon as you withdraw the funding the jobs evaporate. Basically, that, I am talking about the proliferation of organizations, even out at Brantford, that are attempting to help and it is all by government funding. I say “attempting to help whatever element of society, but there is certainly a lot of money being spent creating jobs that will not be here once the funding dries up and I will just leave it at that. That is essentially the extent of my comments and I will try to answer any questions.

Mr B. Ward: It is a pleasure to have you before us and to express the views of the chamber of commerce. We have had meetings in the past and I look forward to having more in the future, particularly the parliamentary assistant for the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology, Norman Jamison, whom you also will get to know in the very near ture, the parliamentary assistant for small business and industry. We look forward to working with you, not only for encouraging investment in the areas of Simcoe-Brantford, but overall.

Brantford has received a large portion of government funding or government revenue over the years. In fact, some people say there is an overreliance on the city of Brantford to count on either the federal or provincial government. It always seems to be the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow. Is it the position of the chamber of commerce representing Brantford and area that government funding of the extension of Highway 403, which will cost $72 million over the next four or five years, the $800,000 for the sound barriers that will be presently constructed, the $4.6 million from the anti-recession package, which primarily went to private sector contractors—I think of Haver Construction, that received the contract to reconstruct Huron Street as a specific example—as well as replacement of the boilers at St Joseph's Hospital, which is always attempting to fund-raise in the city of Brantford for additions etc, to better the health care service in the city, is the Chamber of Commerce representing Brantford and area opposed to that type of expenditure? During these tough times, should we be looking at cutting that aspect?

Mr Bateson: I am going to speak personally for a moment. You talk about that kind of expenditure. Let's face it, the government is a spender and a dispenser of services and owes its existence to the need to provide services. This community needs services the same as any other community and if anything, the Highway 403 extension is long overdue. I do not necessarily care what political party is in power; I say that is a service to this community and it is needed and therefore the money should be spent, when you keep in mind that this community in the past has not been on the receiving end of a great deal of government favour. It has not when you look at some communities, and I will speak specifically of Sudbury and the favour it got from the federal government and Kingston and the favour it got from the provincial government.

Mr Stockwell: Kapuskasing.

Mr Bateson: We can go on and on about the communities that received a real shot in the arm. I am talking about a real shot in the arm. The Revenue Canada office in Sudbury, look what it did to the community. There has never been anything like that happening in Brantford. There is money being spent on Highway 403; it is very nice. There was as gift to Communications, thank you very much; we do get some of it. I just say to you that governments can, and by themselves, give communities an enormous shot in the arm by doing things like bringing the communications department to Brantford in 1995.

Mr B. Ward: Constructing a new building.

Mr Bateson: Yes, all those things we are grateful for, but on the other hand we talk about budgeted deficits. The money has to be spent responsibly. You cannot just throw money at things in an attempt to solve the problems.

Mr B. Ward: By co-operating, like business, labour and government learning to work together locally, provincially and nationally, I think we can be more effective as government, rather than having all the groups fighting among each other. That is encouraging.

Mr Bateson: I hear that phrase and I see it quite a lot these days, co-operation between those three groups. It is not there yet, but ideally it will happen and if it does, God bless us all.

Mr B. Ward: My last question is a non-budgetary item: the issue of Sunday shopping. I believe the chamber of commerce locally has been opposed to it. Has that changed?

Mr Bateson: No, it has not.

Mr B. Ward: And the retailers have stuck together?

Mr Bateson: It is still essentially opposed to Sunday shopping.

Mr B. Ward: Okay, thank you.

Mr Phillips: Just a comment before the question. You indicate some concern about the $9.7-billion deficit. We heard yesterday, from no less an authority than the parliamentary assistant to the Treasurer himself, that things are right on track, that you should not worry about it and that it is the maximum deficit. I hope he is right.

I think the numbers may be even more troublesome to you than you are aware of because you said "spending our way out of recession." Our concern is not only spending during a recession but, when the recession is over, deficits ad infinitum. The deficit never gets below $6 billion or $7 billion. By the way, in three years it assumes $5 billion of new taxes just to get to that deficit of $7.5 billion. I do not want to alarm the chamber any more than it perhaps already is, but I think the numbers may be mildly worse than you think. That is our concern, just what kind of economic environment we are creating where we can attract individuals to create jobs.

We have heard conflicting evidence. We have heard: "The recession is now over. We're well on the way to economic recovery, and stop worrying." You are pretty close to the situation. How buoyant is that recovery, and will this budget help in that recovery or will it slow the recovery down?

Mr Bateson: I have already said that I think the budget by itself will have a negative impact on this recovery by virtue of what I have already said, and I will not repeat myself. You asked me, "Are there signs of recovery here?" I think there are signs that we may have seen the worst of it. Yes, there are some signs of a recovery. How long it is going to last is a serious question. The lost jobs we have witnessed in this community are not going to come back right away. It is going to be a slow, painful rise out of this recession.

We at the chamber believe we are becoming less and less competitive. A lot of the jobs we have lost in this community are to Tennessee and the Carolinas and the like. We hear about their wage rates and their benefits costs. I will speak specifically about workmen's compensation. That is becoming a serious issue. If we cannot compete with our neighbours, we are not going to be in the business very long.

There will always be an economy in this province because eight million people, or however many we have, are not all going to up and move in the next period of time. We are here and it will be an economy of one kind or another, but we are going to lose our manufacturing jobs to our neighbours if we are not competitive and I do not know how you replace that. I am not an economist.

Mrs Sullivan: The question I have really follows precisely on the train of thought so far. One of the things we have had some great concern about on this budget is that there is a measure of lack of confidence being evidenced throughout the business community from financial analysts and from people who are looking to business expansion or even to establishing business. What is being said is that this budget does not create the climate to attract new business investment in any way. We know that capital is fluid and that it can go anywhere in the world. What we do not see is any reason for it to be coming to Ontario.

The other aspect of that question, of course, is the uncertainty that is being created for the business community: the immediate cancellation of the Ontario current cost adjustment and the uncertainty surrounding environmental legislation where rules have changed midstream and so on, which are not specifically budgetary issues but have certainly added to the investment climate that is problematical. How do you see that kind of climate affecting long-term capital investment in Brantford? Do you see any signs of anything new coming on the horizon, or do you see this budget in any way helping or hindering capital investment in this area?

Mr Bateson: That is a pretty broad question. I do not know that this budget by itself is having an impact. It is having an impact provincially, I think, and therefore by deduction it affects this community. I cannot speak of specific issues there.

I am sort of a consultant to business, so beyond my treasury role at the chamber I sort of have my ear close to the ground, if you will. I see evidence of businessmen who are relieved a little at the fact that the economy is not getting any worse, but I do not see them rushing out to make capital investment as you talk about. There is no one I know who is out borrowing money these days on the concept that this economy is turning around and that there is going to be a shortage of capacity in the near term. There is not. I think that lends credence to what I said earlier, that it is going to be a slow, painful recovery out of this recession. There is no business confidence out there, just none.

Mr Kwinter: I would like to get your comment, Mr Bateson, on sort of an impression I have been getting during these hearings, that the government is saying it wants to have a partnership among business, labour and government. On the other hand a lot of the labour representation, a lot of the people representing social welfare organizations, come forward and they see business as being the culprit, the enemy, the reason for a lot of their problems and that if it were not for the greed and the profits of businessmen and the wealthy, everything would be a lot better. How do you respond to that?

Mr Bateson: Have we got an hour?

The Chair: You have 20 seconds.

Mr Bateson: There is a marketplace out there that prevents any individual from making a killing at anything. The marketplace is a great leveller. If an individual is profiteering today, he is probably not profiteering tomorrow because there are five or six people who jumped on the same bandwagon. That is true of any industry. I witness, for instance, the video stores today. There is no one company controlling that.

The Chair: Excuse me, I have to go on to Mr Stockwell. Maybe he can ask the same question and use his seven minutes up.

Mr Stockwell: No, I do not want the answer, actually. The previous deputation said there was a lot of focus on the $9.7-billion deficit and that concerned them. In a way that concerns me as well. Just as a note that you could take back to your chamber, the concern I have is the deficit. It is large. It is going to be cumbersome. I think it is irresponsible, etc. The other things that are built into this budget—and I am not sure that you know them or your chamber knows them, but it is good that you would—the $8 billion in new taxes over the next four years. The $8 billion is a significant amount to impact on the community and the province of Ontario. That is a lot of money. In my opinion, it is going to have a negative effect on business, on all kinds of people.

The $35-billion deficit that they will incur in the next four years: People do not seem to understand that in the first 125 years of this province we incurred $35 billion in debt. In the next four years, under the socialists, we are going to double that debt. The totally inflated growth numbers that they have included—which means that if they do not achieve these totally inflated growth numbers, I think it is $3.5 billion the first and second years, then that means either the taxes must go up or the deficit must rise above what the projections are and they are already projecting $35 billion more.

Have you reviewed the budget to such a degree that you have seen these kind of figures and, if so, if you could comment on them, what kind of things are you hearing from the private sector, the capital investors, the risk-takers, the venture capitalists? What are you hearing from them and where are they going? Are they staying, are they biding their time or are they fleeing?

Mr Bateson: I think, to answer your last question, most people are taking a wait-and-see attitude. I think, to some degree, this $9.7-billion deficit is an estimate. We have not seen a final accounting yet, although it is going to be there; that is a given. It just may be quite a bit larger. I think most people are taking a wait-and-see attitude at the moment. There is not a mass migration, if you will, of businessmen.

There is certainly disillusioned business out there. I am going to go beyond this deficit. The disillusion currently is over the other items of legislation that are put on the table that are anti-business. I will just call them that outright anti-business. It is creating a climate in this province that is not very nice for people in business. I do not know how you can resign your directorships fast enough in this province right now because of the liability. I do know I attended a conference recently on how to insure myself against this potential liability, and I should not have to do that.

Mr Stockwell: If this is adopted, if this mistake—it is the big mistake in my opinion—if this big mistake is adopted and implemented over the next four years, what do you believe the reaction of business will be? I personally think they are going to leave, frankly. Any risk capital is going to leave simply because there are greener pastures out there. What do you think? If this $9.7 billion, $35 billion over four years, $8 billion in new taxes, etc, etc, is adopted, what do you see happening?

Mr Bateson: When you say “a flight of capital,” I do not think we will witness a flight of capital. I think you will see that people will see better opportunities elsewhere and what you will get is stagnation within this province. People cannot really just pull up and take a walk right now. They cannot do it because you would have to liquidate and you would liquidate into the worst marketplace in the last 10 years. So there is not going to be a flight of capital. I do not think you will see that. But I think the people who end up having capital for one reason or another will probably put it somewhere else because the opportunities will be better.

Mr Carr: I had our friends in legislative research prepare what the interest payments will be on the provincial debt; so it is non-partisan. They used the Treasury figures. This was done even before the downgrading of our credit rating. Just so you know, it is going to cost us by the end of the mandate $7.8 billion a year, or $583 million a month, $134 million a week, $19 million a day, $800,000 an hour and $13,000 a minute. The government says, based on the revenues, that is manageable. As a business person looking at $13,000 a minute, 24 hours a day, seven days a week, not to pay for health care, not to pay for the environment, just to pay the interest on the provincial debt alone, is it manageable?

Mr Bateson: I think the answer to your question is in the question itself, is it not? I mean, the numbers there—they are staggering. The federal government has a bigger problem, but that is because of, I think, 30 years of bad management.

We in this province have had good management and now we are looking at bad management, and that is how I perceive it. I just hope that we have the visibility to see down the road and that this deficit thinking changes in the next budget, at least in the next budget.

Mr Carr: One of the other things that I wanted to ask you about was the Agenda for the People. It was interesting; it was written August 18, 1990, almost a year ago. In it they said they were going to spend, over two years, $1.8 billion and that was going to include funding to 60% and all the social programs. Instead, over two years, instead of increased spending of $1.8 billion of course we have an $18-billion deficit. That was only one year ago, to show how far they were out.

A lot of people have said, “If you were going to do this, if you were going to run up the deficit, you at least should have had the political courage to say it one year ago.” What would your comment be about that, about a government that one year ago did not tell us it was going to do it and now one year later instead of $1.8 billion we have an $18-billion deficit over two years? What do you say to the government?

Mr Stockwell: You wouldn't have voted for them.

Mr Carr: Brad just lost a vote.

Mr Bateson: Well done, Brad. I mean, what do you say? I think I have said it here for the last 30 minutes. I am opposed to this deficit financing. It is for all the wrong reasons and if you are going to spend the money you have to raise it. You have to pay as you go.

Mr Christopherson: I thank you, Mr Bateson, for your presentation. I do not always agree, but I always enjoy the presentations of the chambers. They are always well thought out and very sincere.

I find it curious and continue to find it curious that there are a lot of terms—today you used the term “staggering” when talking about the deficit, and yet last week we saw in the news projections that the $30-billion deficit of the federal government, the annual deficit of their budget, will possibly be as much as $40 billion, which means that the miscalculation alone by the federal government is greater than the entire deficit that we have projected. I think it is important to note that right now our budget projections are dead on target. There is very little difference between what we have projected and what the real numbers are right now.

I know that chambers of commerce and other business groups have said, “We've opposed the federal government's deficit spending in the past,” but I think it is fair to say that the volume of opposition by business is nothing like what we have seen here in Ontario. We hear a couple of little comments at the time a federal budget comes out, but we have seen demonstrations, we have seen fax machines sending out messages. The difference in volume alone, I think, says a heck of a story about some of business's approach to this deficit and I, quite frankly, make the case, and make no bones about it, that I think some of it may be political and ideological as opposed to just being a fair objective analysis. Now, that is a biased approach.

I would ask you a question, and I know you would like to comment on that. The question would be, the $0.5 billion that we did not take out of the consumers' pockets by putting the provincial sales tax on the GST, do you believe that had any kind of a positive effect on the economy—here in Brantford, I mean?

Mr Bateson: No, I cannot say that. I do not think that the man on the street really is even aware of that accounting function that is going on. All they know is that they go to buy something for $10, it ends up costing them $11.50, and they are angry.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for appearing before this committee.

The committee recessed at 1145.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1302.

CHRIS MEWHORT

The Chair: The first person we have on the agenda this afternoon is Mr Chris Mewhort. Would you come forward, please? Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economics. You will have 15 minutes for your presentation. Within that period try to leave some time at the end for questions by the three parties here. You may begin.

Mr Mewhort: Thank you very much for giving me the opportunity to present my views on the Ontario budget. I am a small businessman. My gut may be large, but my business is small. I operate a bookkeeping service in Guelph. I do routine bookkeeping, year-ends, this sort of thing, for business clients, and I do a lot of income tax for individuals.

That mix of clients has given me a real opportunity to look at some things in the Ontario economy and the Ontario budget. My conclusions, based upon a study of my clients' records, are that poor people are much worse off than usually portrayed and are not really being helped by the present budget. The main beneficiaries of the deficit are Ontario business people.

I will present two examples from my files. I have a semi-client. She is a 30-year-old single parent. She has a two-year-old child, Stephanie, I believe. Her total income from all sources—her job, her family allowance and some social assistance—in 1990 was $4,038.35. That is it; total; kaput. She is surviving on charity of friends and relatives and food bank handouts, this sort of thing.

I have to ask myself, why are she and her child on the edge of starvation all the time? It is not because she lacks skills or ambition. She is a secretary, she has a post-secondary diploma, she has excellent references, she has standing offers of jobs, she has got a really good work record and she wants to work. Child care; there is the problem. She just does not have anywhere to put the kid. She does not have ready cash to hire anyone to look after the kid, and she certainly has not been able to convince the government of Ontario that she deserves any subsidy. If she was successful in convincing the government that she deserves a subsidy, that really would not help her either. She would simply join a long list of approved applicants.

What I say to that is, so much for this government's boasting about what it was going to do for women and children.

Meanwhile, we taxpayers and everyone in Ontario made quite an investment in her training and her potential and that is being wasted; her earning power is being wasted. She is doing nothing to increase consumer demand in Ontario. I am not ashamed to say that I would like everybody like that to come running to me with their money and spend a little bit on me, but if they do not have it, they cannot spend it.

My second example is a 35-year-old guy, a single father. He is in university full-time, he has a 14-year-old daughter, he is the sole support, he is on social assistance, he runs a part-time job weekends, he gets family allowance. He has $14,483.26. With this he manages to pay the rent, tuition all his books, food and clothing for him and the child.

What has the government of Ontario done for this case? It raised his tuition. It seems that we can always stand there and slash university funding, simply because the long term results of that are not going to show up until after the next election. We drive more and more other people out of the province for higher education and technical training and we are chasing research and development out of Ontario. That is just horrendous. It seems to me that the vision of this government hardly extends past next week.

It seems to me that pronouncements about both the generosity and the abuse of our welfare system are misplaced. My clients who receive social assistance do not shop in the United States. They have no way of getting there if they wanted to. They spend all of their assistance immediately, without saving any, purchasing goods and services, primarily rent and food, from Ontario business people. Any provincial tax money or borrowed revenue spent in support of these people is immediately recycled back into the local economy.

I make the observation then that the provincial deficit is primarily a subsidy of Ontario business people. We have already lost a couple of hundred thousand jobs during this recession. That is a couple of hundred thousand paycheques that just are not there any more. That loss of consumer spending is hurting us Ontario business people. None of us like to lay people off when businesses go broke. The owners are not wealthy and we are often not—the guy or the lady who loses her business, she has no UIC, she has no nothing. She is worse off than the employees who lose their jobs.

These paycheques that are not there; that is consumer spending. That is what we businessmen live on. The budget was borrowing money to inject into the economy. That is money that is going to come to us. My business clients struggle and scrounge for every nickel, and none of them refuse to sell any goods or services in exchange for money that has been generated somehow by deficit spending.

I do, however, see major flaws in the way the deficit was spent. That money is like whitewashing a fence in a high wind. It was spread very thinly over a very large area. The Ontario business people have discussed for years the need for increasing worker training and improving our education, vocational training, the need to increase productivity, the need to become more competitive. The budget should have focused on at least one of these specific areas, and it still could have protected individuals and it could have still pumped money into the Ontario economy if that was what was wanted, while still approaching some sort of changes.

I think to make a difference in any one of these areas, that is a structural change in the Ontario economy, and we cannot avoid those structural changes for ever. This budget should have said, "Look, here are important, needed changes," and it should have prepared to make them. I did not see that at all. That was just a scattergun approach to social programming. A budget is an opportunity to look at the plans and the major priorities of the government. I just do not see anything like that in this budget whatever. I see no evidence of any strategic economic planning. This government had a golden chance to start to make some needed structural changes, and it seems to me that you have instead milled around for the past year like panic-stricken sheep.

What of the end of the recession? Does this government have plans for reducing the deficit when better times return? I do not apologize. I am a Keynesian, but I support the other side of the Keynesian equation. If good times come back, I want to see a healthy surplus, I do not want to run a deficit for ever. Certainly previous Tory and Grit governments in both Ottawa and Toronto have utterly failed to reduce deficits, and I do not have any faith in that. I certainly hope that this government does a little better.

Because the latest budget is primarily a subsidy of Ontario business people. I propose that when the recession ends, the taxes on us business people be increased, and I think 20% would be fair, to help reduce the deficit. I do not think that this measure would hurt in a very healthy economy. Certainly if the need for social assistance was to drop and a couple of hundred thousand additional paycheques start to move around and a couple of hundred thousand people start to pay some reasonable taxes again, then everybody will be much better off.

I will sum up my main points. The poor people in Ontario are much worse off than you folks seem to think. The budget deficit is primarily a subsidy. The lack of priorities in strategic economic planning has meant that most of the borrowed revenue will simply be wasted. When good times return, the deficit must be removed, and because business people are the real beneficiaries of the budget, they should bear the brunt of repayment. Thank you very much.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate a balanced presentation. We have had the extremes come to us and I think this is a balanced presentation.

My question is really in terms of dealing with the deficit and the debt when we come out of this. You suggest a 20% increase in corporate taxes. How much would that raise, do you think, and what sort of a dint do you think that would make in the projected $10-billion deficits in the future?

Mr Mewhort: I am not sure at all. I would rather clarify that. When you say corporate taxes, I am looking at my clients, and a lot of my clients are starting businesses in the present recession and gambling everything they have, their house and dog and everything else. Certainly it would not hurt if they start to make a lot of money to pay taxes and help the economy. They could certainly afford to pay that extra.

Mr Phillips: Can I just make the observation that corporate taxes raised about $3 billion in Ontario, that is, less than 10% of revenue. That is the challenge, a 20% increase on that, so just a bit of a dent.

Mr Stockwell: And 20% would be $600 million, so it would be absolute peanuts.

A quick question, if I could: You say the budget deficit is primarily a subsidy of Ontario business people. Your assumption is that because they are increasing social services and the payments go to social service recipients, who then go out and buy Ontario goods, in effect, by the government giving the money to the social service recipients, they have indirectly subsidized Ontario business?

Mr Mewhort: Yes, that is my point. My clients survive on money changing hands and they immediately spend that money on other businesses and it goes round and round.

Mr Stockwell: I would be willing to bet you as much money as you have that Ontario business would be prepared to forgo that heavy subsidy you are offering them.

Mr Mewhort: Certainly none of my clients are willing to forgo that.

Mr Stockwell: They are not?

Mr Mewhort: No.

Mr Stockwell: I think business in general would. Quite frankly, I think it is a convoluted approach, to be honest.

Ms M. Ward: Thank you for your presentation. I do not have time to ask you much. First of all, I would like to say I certainly agree with you that there are a lot of poor people in Ontario who are in a very bad position. I see them in my own riding.

Regarding your example about the woman, the single parent whose total income was $4,000, you do say that was 1990, and maybe she was only on social assistance part of the year or something, but I think there is a higher level of support than that available, unless you are in an area where the municipality is doing its share. The same thing with child care. We do not know where this person is. Is it the case that there is not any child care available there? I know there is a waiting list for subsidies in a lot of places, but in some places there are not even the facilities, which is a great concern of ours.

I agree with you also about reducing the deficit when better times return, we all agree with that, but the comment I would like to make there is that it is not expected that we are going to have any miraculous recovery in the economy. We are not going to be into boom times next year. That is something that maybe is not realized.

The Chair: I am sorry, Ms Ward, time has run out and your preamble was a little bit too long for an answer.

Mr Mewhort: Thank you very much.

The Chair: Okay, thank you for attending.

ALEX MICHALOS

The Chair: We will call on Professor Michalos. I would like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. You also have 15 minutes for your presentation, and at the end try to leave enough time for maybe one question from each one of the parties. You may begin.

Mr Michalos: I did give the clerk 25 copies, so you should all have copies.

I timed it. I will just read it, that is the fastest thing, and it will not take more than six or seven minutes to read.

The main point of my submission is this: I think the 1991-92 Ontario budget was reasonable, modest, and in the best interests of developing a high quality of life for Ontarians.

Others have recited and will recite the numerical details of this budget. Rather than repeat that exercise, I would simply remind you of the statement of July 29, 1991, of the 59 Canadian economists who strongly endorsed this budget.

I mentioned the July 29 statement to an economist friend at the University of Guelph one day, and remarked that I wondered when we would have a list of economists from the other side. He said he doubted there would be such a list, because the Keynesian idea of increasing government economic activity during economic hard times is a sound idea. That, of course, is what John Kenneth Galbraith wrote in his Toronto Star article following the budget.

In another Toronto Star article of May 4, 1991, by Thomas Walkom, it was pointed out: "This year, interest on Ontario's total accumulated debt will account for about 12 cents of every tax dollar. In 1982, at the beginning of the last big recession, interest charges accounted for 11 cents of each Ontario tax dollar.... By comparison, Ottawa has to pay 34 cents of every tax dollar to service its debt. In 1984, when the Mulroney Conservatives took power, that figure was 32 cents.... In 1982, under Davis, Ontario's total debt was equal to 17 per cent of everything the province produced. This year, that proportion is estimated to be 18 per cent." I assume he has got his numbers right.

These considerations indicate that the Ontario budget is in some ways similar to that of the Conservative government of Bill Davis, and much more responsible—more cautious—than that of the Mulroney Conservatives.

One can always quibble about the precise sizes of annual deficits and continuous debts. It seems to me that members of the Ontario Liberal and Progressive Conservative caucuses insisted upon these hearings to do just that: quibble and hopefully score points on the New Democrat government.

If, on the other hand, they are really suggesting significant structural adjustment programs, like those brought in by the Mulroney government, I would raise the following question: Since Mulroney-style structural adjustment is destroying our country, much as such policies are destroying many Third World countries, in what ways would Ontario Liberals and Conservatives depart from the Mulroney strategy?

This is not the place to describe and attack Mulroney-style deficit-fighting structural adjustment. However, it should be emphasized that the Mulroney policies are clearly having the effect of dividing Canadians into rich and poor by compressing the middle classes. If the Ontario government followed the lead of the federal Tories, an already bad situation would be made worse. Thus, the proposed budget of Floyd Laughren offers some appropriate resistance to the wrong-headed and destructive policies of the federal government.

More generally, since the federal government insists on initiating policies that allow our country and its natural resources to be sold to the highest bidder, it is important for provincial governments generally, and for the Ontario New Democrat government in particular, to initiate policies that allow us to have greater control of our own house.

1320

Accordingly, looking further down the road, I hope the New Democrat government will make good on its promise to legislate fair taxes. Excellent studies by David Wolfe for the Macdonald commission and by David Cameron for the Brookings Institution documented the fact that around the world, right-wing and centre-right-wing governments typically create enormous deficits and public debts in precisely the way the Mulroney government and its Liberal predecessor created them. Instead of taxing their relatively wealthy supporters they borrow from them through private financial institutions. In Canada, as a Statistics Canada report showed earlier this year, as elsewhere, huge government deficits and debts are not the result of excessive spending, but of regressive taxation mixed with excessive borrowing from the private sector. The clear result of such fiscal strategy is bound to be an increase in the gap between rich and poor, as the social safety net is shredded in order to pay off the national debt.

The record of social democratic governments around the world—this is according to Cameron and Wolfe again—and of the former New Democrat governments in British Columbia, Manitoba and Saskatchewan is also clear. Such governments tend to levy relatively heavier taxes in order to fund first-class social programs in health, education, training and social security. Assuming more taxes are in store for us, it is vitally important that they be fair. On this score, I think the government's appointment of the Fair Tax Commission is an excellent idea.

National surveys by Statistics Canada in 1970, 1977 and 1984 showed that the wealthiest 10% of Canadians own just over half the private wealth of the country, and the wealthiest 20% own just under 70% of it. Recently, Statistics Canada reported that since 1984 the share of the national income going to the rich increased at the expense of the middle class. That will certainly be matched by an increased wealth gap in the 1991 survey.

In light of these facts, I would urge the tax commission and the government to seriously consider some forms of annual net wealth taxation, or if not that, at least a reintroduction of some forms of succession and/or inheritance taxes. The last thing we need is an additional sales tax like the GST or flat taxes of any kind on consumption and income.

Steps should also be taken to introduce something like Quebec's spectacularly successful Caisse de dépôt et placement in order to put public sector pension funds to work developing Ontario industry. As Peter Campbell indicated in the Toronto Star of July 14, these funds represent about $55 billion and have annual cash flows of between $7 and $10 billion. Besides funding indigenous development, an Ontario caisse could be used to cover deficits without borrowing.

In the provincial convention of the NDP a few months ago, Premier Bob Rae said that he had "no particular affection for any particular institutional arrangements" and that "what we are committed to is to Canada itself." What must be remembered is that it is precisely institutions that give sible and substantial form to social and political visions. The reason so many of us are horrified by the Mulroney government's wholesale destruction of such institutions as the CBC, medicare and so on is that an essential part of the substance of the Canadian egalitarian vision is embodied in those institutions. If all the institutions are erased, there will be no more of Canada than there is of Camelot.

Floyd Laughren's 1991-92 budget keeps hope and the dream of an egalitarian Canada alive, and I for one welcome it.

Mr Stockwell: Most business people I know wholeheartedly disagree with your approach. Clearly, I can understand why. Many of them would like to be in your position of ensuring themselves a paycheque every couple of weeks and not having to meet payroll and not having to deal with the economy, such as yourself. They do not have that option.

Mr Michalos: What part of my approach are you talking about?

Mr Stockwell: Within your job situation. Their job situation is very different. If you did in fact study Mr Keynes, you would have read—and you choose to adopt some of his ideas, but not all of his ideas. If you truly supported—

Mr Michalos: What are you talking about now, specifically?

Mr Stockwell: I am just asking the question. If you truly supported this type of economic philosophy, you would be opposed to this budget. He suggested yes, there are times when you do need to put money into the economy as a government. He also suggested that if you have two years of influx of capital, you must have three years of reduction. This government has committed itself to five years of deficit financing. I could ask you 50 questions in here, but that one jumps out at me. If you are truly a believer in Keynes's economics, why, then, do you support this budget? It is contrary to his approach.

Mr Michalos: It is not contrary to his approach. His approach is that when you are in recessionary times the government has to do more, and that is what it is doing.

Mr Stockwell: You did not finish reading his thesis.

Mr Michalos: I finished reading it. You do not know what is going to happen five years down the road.

Mr Stockwell: No, but I do know what this government has suggested in its plan for the budget. Their plan—and it is right there, you can read it—says four to five years of deficit financing. He specifically said, if you are going to influx capital for two years, you have to retire debt for three. How can you support something that is so contrary—

Mr Michalos: And your alternative is what?

Mr Stockwell: I am asking you. You are the one who is suggesting to me it is a good budget. Your defence of that is Keynesian economics.

Mr Michalos: That is right.

Mr Stockwell: He does not agree with this budget, so how can you say it is a good budget?

Mr Michalos: He seems to agree with it. He agreed with it when John Kenneth Galbraith said it. He agreed with it when the 59 economists said it.

Mr Stockwell: Then, tell me where I am wrong. Have I misread his theories? Have I misread his—

Mr Michalos: Yes. Obviously you have.

Mr Stockwell: He did not say that we must retire debt?

Mr Michalos: Give me your alternative. We are in a recession, people are starving, there are 125 people in the food banks of Toronto—

Mr Stockwell: The question is, did he not say you must retire debt for three years after incurring it for two? That is the question. I would like to hear an answer.

Mr Michalos: Maybe he did. So what?

Mr Stockwell: So how can you support this budget if it is contrary to what Keynes suggested?

Mr Michalos: Because I am supporting other things he said, obviously.

Mr Stockwell: Thank you very much.

The Chair: Twenty seconds, Mr Carr.

Mr Carr: All of a sudden you are going very quickly. The problem we have with what is happening at the federal level—and as you know, Jeffrey Simpson laid it out—is the fact that we ran up the deficit in the early 1980s. The fact is, now there have to be cuts to a lot of programs because we cannot afford to pay it.

The Chair: I am sorry, I have to cut you off. We are out of time.

Mr Carr: See you after for coffee.

Mr Sutherland: I do not think any of us can say for sure whether Mr Keynes would support this budget or not, since he has been dead for many years, but I am sure he would be supportive of the approach in general with his philosophy that in the bad times you stimulate the economy.

Mr Michalos: thank you for coming and making your presentation. You talked about two issues I would like to get your comment on. One is the issue of tax reform; the other one is the question of pensions and developing something similar to Quebec and the Caisse de dépôt. My understanding of the Caisse de dépôt is that some of that has been used in risk ventures, and people who have put money into the pension plans have been willing to take some of that risk. What do you think the effectiveness of that approach would be without too much risk to future returns on those pensions?

Mr Michalos: I think there are risks, and I think it has to be done delicately and cautiously. It has been spectacularly successful in Quebec. I think it is a risk well worth taking. We have to get command of our own house. There is a bundle of money there, and we have to be willing to risk some of it in order to get command of our own house.

The Chair: You have got 30 seconds. Have you got a quick question?

Mr Sutherland: Go ahead, Mr Jamison.

Mr Jamison: I would just like to say that we appreciate your response and coming here today and appreciate your point of view. I think it does reflect sympathy with what is happening to people in this province during a recession that is deeper than the one many of us can remember. We believe that we are on the right course, and I am pleased to see you reflected that in your report.

The Chair: Mr Jamison, we have to cut you off. We go to Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: Your position does not surprise me. It is pretty predictable. Just a couple of comments. How much time do we have, by the way?

The Chair: Two minutes.

Mr Phillips: The reason that the federal government has not responded is it is broke, bankrupt. They have no money. It is as simple as that. I guess we all have to eventually wake up to that one.

The gang of 58 actually criticized the budget. You may not have heard it, but they said it was their belief that the budget should be balanced within four years. As you know, the budget never gets within $8 billion or $9 billion of being balanced. So I think you may have some concerns with the long-term implications of the budget. My concern is that we need to balance things. We need to have some economic activity.

The president of the University of Western Ontario was before us yesterday. Lo and behold, the US spend far more in subsidies per student at universities than Ontario does. The bad US do that. He was saying there needs to be a major influx of funds into the universities. I think the only way that can happen is with strong economic activity. If you are here a year from now, are you satisfied that within this budget there is enough to stimulate the sort of economic activity that I think you and I would agree has to take place to sustain and to enhance our quality of life?

Mr Michalos: Enough? I do not know. I think it was modest. The additional "enough" they put in was something like $1.5 billion. As I say, that was modest. Most of the people I talk to think it was modest. I do not know how much good it will do in a year. I would have to look at it then, but I certainly would have taken the step. Maybe personally I would have gone further, but I do not know. I am not in their seats, so I do not know what I would have done.

Let me just make one comment on the federal government being broke. They are broke because successive governments have practically destroyed their own tax base. If you look at the Brookings studies and you look at the regression equations, the mathematics is perfectly clear. The reduction of the tax base is about five or six times more important than the spending in terms of the deficits that are created.

The Chair: Okay, I would like to thank you for your input into this committee and your presentation. Thank you.

Mr Michalos: You are welcome.

Mr Phillips: See you next year.

ONWARD WILLOW CENTRE

The Chair: The next group is the Onward Willow Centre. Would they come forward please? Okay, I would like to welcome you here to the standing committee on finance and economics and the budget review. I understand the clerk has a copy and when we get back to Queen's Park each member of the committee will get a copy of your brief. We do not have the accommodation here for copying them all as it is right now, so each member will get a copy on the road next week. In your presentation you have one half-hour and if you can leave some time at the end to have a question-and-answer period, most of the opposition, third party and government would like to ask questions on your particular brief for possibly more clarification. You may begin your presentation.

Mr Zuber: Thank you. Good afternoon, gentlemen and women. My name is Gary Zuber. I am the chairperson of the Onward Willow safety committee and a sitting member of the Onward Willow committee itself.

Ms Margetson: I am Chris Margetson, a community development worker at the Onward Willow Centre.

Mr Vanderwoerd: My name is Jim Vanderwoerd and I am a researcher with the Onward Willow Centre and the Better Beginnings, Better Futures project in Guelph.

Mr Zuber: As I was saying, good afternoon, and thank you for allowing me to speak at your little convocation here. It is a privilege to be allowed to express my personal views on matters surrounding the proposed NI budget, and what effect it will have on my life and those around me.

Let me first give you a brief history of my background and how I wound up in the situation I now face. I began working in 1960 full-time, trying my best to make a living for myself. I laboured at many jobs that, when I look back in retrospect, I would not work at again, but when you are young and dumb, thinking is a process that does not often enter into a lot of decision-making. I met a young girl in 1963 and in 1965 we were married and we started to raise the family we both agreed we wanted to have. We had three children and in the fall of 1974 my middle son, Jeffrey, was diagnosed as having aplastic anaemia. This disease is almost always fatal and in our case it was. At the age of five my son died, leaving my wife and me totally devastated. I had lost my job. I had lost my car, my house, my money, my credit rating, and most important of all, I had lost my son. But I still did not want to accept bankruptcy.

I started another job and tried to put my life back together. I made payments on the bills I had accumulated and times were very tough for us. Still I had not taken any money out of the so-called system. Gradually the tension and stress began to affect my health and I contracted psoriasis which, in turn, led to psoriatic rheumatoid arthritis which I have had for some time now. As this disease progresses the chance that I will work again becomes less and less of a possibility. Nevertheless, in the fall of 1987 I went back to school at the tender age of 43 to see if I could get a diploma that would allow me to re-enter the mainstream and become a productive member of society once more. Through the grace of Voc Rehab and all the help and support from them, plus an awful pile of hard work, I graduated in September 1990. I had successfully completed various courses and received corresponding credits. Unfortunately, my disease had progressed to the point that I was nder heavy medication, preventing me from actually going out and seeking employment. Moving my wrists and hands had become a real difficulty, which it still is.

Now, having bored most of you to death, you are probably saying, "My, that is too bad, but what has this got to do with the new proposed NDP budget?" Well, I am going to tell you. The money that was used to put me through my schooling came from the very source that is now being pushed to be cut. What would I have done had this money not been there? Where would I have turned?

Let's take a look at the worst-case scenario, and in fact one that I am going to be facing very, very shortly. Since I am unable to work, since I am finished with Voc Rehab, I am going to be forced back on to the welfare roster, a system that is in the biggest mess it has ever been in. Survival in this system, as it now stands, is nearly impossible. Yet someone, in a moment of sheer lunacy, has proposed cutbacks. Wow, what a wonderful future to look forward to.

Who makes these decisions? Do the people who are stuck in this stinking hogwallow ever get asked for any input? No. Well, let me tell you, we are going to be heard. I see a great groundswell coming from the economically oppressed that will be heard far and wide. For those of us who are stuck in the welfare system through no fault of our own the future looks mighty bleak. What chance will there be for us to escape? None.

We are tired of being pushed around, ignored, and being told what is good for us. Sure, we have those in the welfare system who cheat and try to abuse it, but they are few and we have to live with them because we do not have the luxury of a cabinet shuffle or resignation to hide our dirty laundry. Everyone expects the present NDP government to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear, except they were given the entire pig. Sure we will be dealing with a deficit, inherited. Money must be put into the welfare system to try and revamp it. Money must be spent on educational and vocational training and retraining through college programs. How else can we get people back into the workforce? Or should we just keep them in the welfare system?

Also, if we do not see this proposed $215 million go into the welfare system, many of the now existing programs will be forced out of existence. Certainly without this $215 million the chance of anyone in the welfare system being able to get back to being a productive person will be almost nil. Moneys cannot be taken away from building more low-cost housing. I live in a rent-geared-to-income housing complex in Guelph. It is not a bad place to live, but there are still 800 on the waiting list in Guelph alone. How can we justify cutting back on any funding dealing with violence against women? One only need turn on the TV any day and there is increased evidence of this horrible crime. In and around the area I live many of the residents are single, female and parents, and I see living proof every week of this most brutal of crimes. And I mean every week.

Also of monumental proportion is the maintenance and management of our health care system. Whatever it takes to maintain it must be done. We cannot compromise on this. Too many of us, myself included, depend heavily on this system, perhaps the best one in the world. There are many other issues that I would like to bring forth, but as time is at a premium, I cannot. At a time when we must be trying to stimulate our great province, we cannot have our hands tied because we are going to be working with a large deficit. At least the money that the government of Ontario is planning on spending offers a glimmer of hope for many of us who, without it, would be afforded little or no chance.

So, I plead with those who are in opposition to this budget, take off the blinders and help to make it work instead of criticizing it to death. Maybe, just maybe, with some co-operation we can get this province off its backside and start it on the long, slow road to recovery. I, for one, feel strongly this can happen. It must happen. We cannot allow ourselves the luxury of believing that everything will heal itself. It takes money, initiative and the promise of a better future, all of which the NDP budget offers, especially to me. Sure it is going to cost us more money; sure we will have a deficit. However, I shudder when I think of the alternatives. It scares me. It really scares me.

Let me conclude by thanking you for taking the time to listen to me. I realize I may not be as articulate as most and I do not understand all the intricacies of a complicated matter such as this budget fully, but I do know in my heart what it means for myself and my family. Thank you again.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Zuber, you just said that you may not be as articulate as other people, but I think that is one of the most articulate presentations we have had. You have told your story. It is a great pleasure to see you here today. I did not know that you were going to be here. I think you have not told the whole story. Some of the support you have received through the years has, I think, resulted in a success story, and that is through your oldest son, whom I happen to know from university, and the fact that he has now successfully been able to get through university, is out being self-supporting, is married and is raising a family.

I think that example clearly shows that when you put support to people, and when you provide this necessary support through the tough times, there is a great deal of hope there for people. It is not that people do not want to get off the social assistance—they certainly do—but many people need to be maintained and I think what your story reflects—and what I know about Kelly who is certainly an incredibly hard-working and bright person—is that with support we can make steps in breaking cycles of poverty.

Mr Zuber: Exactly. By the way, how are you?

Mr Sutherland: Not bad. I would just like to know a little more about specifically what the Onward Willow Centre does as a whole. I am wondering if we can just get a little more background information about that.

Ms Margetson: You may hear that as Jim and I do our portions of the presentation.

The Chair: Oh, excuse me, I thought the presentation was finished.

1340

Mr Zuber: We have a three-parter.

The Chair: Okay, I am sorry. Let's finish our presentation there then. You have used a little over a minute; about a minute or two minutes left. Would you continue on? I am sorry I interrupted there. I thought the presentation was finished.

Mr Vanderwoerd: I would also like to thank you for the opportunity to speak to you about the NDP budget. The criticism and attacks on the government's budget have made me angry enough to want to say my piece in favour of the budget. In my opinion this is one of the few government budgets which is designed with the needs of the majority of citizens who have relatively less power and which does not cater exclusively to the interests of the powerful.

I personally am tired of budgets which justify spending cuts for programs and services with deficit rhetoric. The deficit has been the excuse for endless cuts to essential services and programs which support and enhance the lives of those who need them most. What especially irks me is that the people who enthusiastically support reducing spending on programs for people are the same ones who clamour for corporate tax breaks.

I believe government has a responsibility to those of us who are less powerful. I believe government has an obligation to ensure justice and fairness. Government must be a leader in providing the supports and resources necessary for all citizens regardless of gender, race, income, marital status or anything else, to live a life of dignity, free from stigma, poverty, discrimination and oppression.

The present government's 1991 budget has clearly placed its priority on people, especially those who have less power. I am completely in favour of this budget and find the rhetoric and criticism against it to be shallow, selfish and motivated by thinly disguised self-interest.

In the past year, I have been involved as a student and a researcher with a neighbourhood project in one of Guelph's poorer communities and have come to know many of the residents who have been involved in this project. Through my relationships with these people I have come to see how important this budget is to them and how important the programs funded by this budget are. I would like to share with you some of the stories of these people as a way of illustrating the importance of a budget which places emphasis on supporting people who do not have the power or the money to influence policy makers but who are deeply grateful for being remembered.

Charlie is a 42-year-old father of three. Four years ago he developed back problems which forced him to quit his heavy-labour job. After nearly a year on a waiting list, he was able to return to school for retraining with the help of the vocational rehabilitation program offered by the Ministry of Community and Social Services. He enrolled in the local community college and began a two-year course in social services. However, things began to fall apart at home with Charlie being away all day at school and spending long hours in the evenings studying. The task of caring for the three children without her husband's support and guidance was too much for Charlie's physically challenged wife. Charlie was forced to withdraw from the program so he could spend more time with his wife and children and re-establish stability in their home.

Charlie is ready to begin classes again this fall because his oldest child will be in school and government-subsidized day care spaces have come open for his other children, which will significantly reduce the stress on his wife. At the same time, his wife is learning skills which will assist her in overcoming her challenges and increase her self-esteem through programs offered by agencies funded by the government. Charlie and his family do not have access to the policymakers and they can only add their voice to thousands of others like them who would all press overwhelming support and gratitude for this budget which has remembered them even during a recessionary economic period.

At the age of 37, Alice found the stress of coping with an assaultive husband too much and finally mustered the courage to leave. For several months she and her two children stayed at the local government-funded women's shelter and, with the help of the staff, began to make plans to rebuild her life. However, the accompanying pain, guilt and stress were overwhelming for Alice, and she spent the next year and a half in a therapy program offered by a government-funded agency.

During this time she was unable, both emotionally and financially, to care for her children. An arrangement was made with family and children's services to care for her children in foster care temporarily until Alice was ready to resume caring for them. Alice enrolled in community college and two years later proudly graduated with a diploma as an early childhood educator. During this time, she was able to care for her children and survive through family benefits allowance. As well, she found affordable housing with the Wellington Housing Authority, funded through the Ministry of Housing. Alice is now living independently supporting herself and her children. She recently celebrated her first anniversary at her new job by buying a car and taking her family on a week-long holiday, the first holiday her family had ever been on.

Alice was able to reconstruct her life after the breakup of her marriage to an assaultive husband only through the many different programs and services funded by this government. This budget has maintained these programs and services as a top priority, and thus will support others like Alice towards healing and independence in similar stressful situations.

Finally, Dianne is a working mother of two young children. With the support of government-subsidized day care Dianne has been able to support her family with her job as a supervisor of kitchen staff at a hospital cafeteria. However, troubles started when her youngest child developed kidney problems. Dianne had to take time off to accompany her daughter back and forth to the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto. Her daughter required expensive treatment and equipment in order to remain at home. This was all covered through the Ministry of Health, including special programs to cover her transportation expenses and a home care nurse to check up on her daughter once a day.

Dianne is now back at her job, with the added perk that her wages have been increased as a result of recent pay equity legislation supported and continued by this budget. In addition, Dianne's taxes will decrease as a result of this budget, because she is a lower-income earner with dependent children. All of this means that Dianne can continue support both her children and herself despite the added medical burdens and her temporary interruption at work. Through programs like these, Dianne and her family are able to maintain their independence and dignity, even in the face of a medical crisis.

None of these three people will likely have a direct voice in government policy. In fact, the majority of people do not wield the power or wealth to influence government policy. Too often, the results are policies which benefit the powerful, with the rest of us paying the bills.

This budget places people with needs as a top priority. Government must take responsibility for those whose needs are greatest, particularly because there is no one else to advocate for them. I completely support the government of Ontario's 1991 budget, and applaud its compassion in putting people first. The temptation and pressure to respond to the cries of the powerful is strong. I applaud this government's resistance to well-financed and slick pressure tactics, instead preserving and enhancing programs and services which are essential to building and maintaining quality of life for all.

Ms Margetson: I have listened to and read avidly all of the criticism and negative commentaries on our provincial government's recent budget, and have also listened closely to and read many explanations and supportive articles. It is interesting and difficult for me to comprehend how so many intelligent and well-educated people can disagree so vehemently, and see the facts and figures from such different points of view. Philosophical and ideological differences abound.

I wish to speak to you today, from a much more practical and simplistic point of view, in support of this budget.

Social services, health care, child welfare, housing, violence against women and fair taxation must all be priorities in a fair and equitable society. Ontario is a wealthy province. I see signs of this daily: expensive new cars; personalized plates; our beautiful and regularly filled-to-capacity SkyDome; thousands of kids wearing $100 shoes, playing hockey or piano and attending expensive schools and camps; corporate executives wearing $1,000 suits, filling up the rooms in our expensive hotels. These are just a few of the things I notice. Many Ontarians are living the good life.

However, my own life as a single mother and my daily work as a community development worker at the Onward Willow Centre, which is a primary prevention centre in a high-risk neighbourhood in Guelph, very clearly point out the wide discrepancy between the haves and the have-nots in our province. Daily I run across many situations that are unfair, inequitable and downright unacceptable.

Some examples are inadequate and unaffordable housing; hungry and hurting children; overburdened and poverty-stricken parents who are unable to meet the very basic physical, educational and psychological needs of their families; a single mom whose son is stricken with leukaemia and who cannot afford child care, transportation or long-distance phone calls to facilitate spending time at her son's hospital bed in Toronto. This mom is also functionally illiterate and must deal with all that entails.

Another single mom with three kids, two of whom are handicapped, must walk screaming through her neighbourhood—and this just happened last week—"Please help me!" She was screaming in order to call attention to her plight. All three of these kids have been sexually assaulted and the mom has been a victim of wife assault. There is seldom food in their fridge.

A creative, talented artist with two kids who has given many hours of volunteer time to our project and her own neighbourhood is so stressed out from poverty, school and surviving that she calls our local counselling centre. After spending several days crying and trying to find food, support and whatever else she needs, she is told there is a three-month waiting list for non-paying clients. She needs help today.

These situations I raise today are not exceptions; they are the rule for hundreds of thousands of Ontarians, many of whom are children. How can we rationalize or justify the continuation of this lifestyle for so many of our future leaders? Last Christmas, statistics informed me that 320,000 of our children were living in poverty in Ontario. This was no surprise to me. I am confronted daily by the effects of abject poverty: the fear, pain, hunger and humiliation.

I believe that just maintaining this status quo is unacceptable in Ontario, yet our provincial government would have had to run a deficit with this budget just to do that. As a result of the non-caring corporate agenda of our federal government, they find themselves in an unenviable and impossible situation. Bill C-69 is a good example of that agenda. It will lead to a child in a province with a less prosperous or caring government receiving less adequate medical, educational and social service support than one in Ontario living under our present government.

Twelve years ago, pregnant, fearful and alone, I began to parent my four-year-old daughter after my marriage broke down. I found myself without employment, living in one room, afraid and lonely. With the help of many government agencies—for example, housing, welfare, family benefits, day care, OSAP, counselling, Big Brothers, Big Sisters—I began the long and tortuous climb to recovery. It has never been easy. My kids and I have all suffered pain, degradation, hunger and abuse, both in and outside the social service system. At times I wanted to give up, but one day at a time, we moved along and we survived. I now know that the sky is the limit. I will never forget, though, how it feels to be in this untenable situation. It is a large part of who I am today. I still feel it in my bones.

If the opponents of this budget and our own federal government have their way, if services are cut, another woman in my situation would not have access to all the services and assistance that have helped pave the way to my autonomy and independence. Cutbacks in funding these programs will directly affect our most vulnerable citizens. Ontarians desperately need each and every dollar allocated in this budget.

Some grass-roots groups such as environmental, anti-poverty and housing activists are pressing our government to do more, spend more, move more quickly. Although I can see their points and I wish the reality were different, I can see clearly how difficult it has been for the government, given the inherited deficit, Bill C-69 and the corporate lobby groups, to move forward at this time of recession with a budget which supports employment and economic growth. I support their first effort, a step in the right direction towards fairness and equality for all Ontarians. I applaud Bob Rae, Floyd Laughren and their government for their gutsy action and ask them to implement this budget and to continue to take steps towards a fair and equitable Ontario where all men, women and children will live with equal opportunity for health care, education, housing and an opportunity to move forward into the 1990s as equal partners in Ontario. This budget is the first ray of hope that Ontario will reduce economic disparities and make sure that the costs of economic growth and adjustment are borne in a fair and equitable manner by us all.

Mr Phillips: A very poignant presentation. The three examples you used—Charlie, Alice and Dianne, my recollection—as you described them, were all things that took place with programs by the previous government; nothing to do with this budget, because this budget did not come in until April 1. I just point that out because as you outlined the various services they required, I think they were mainly things that occurred, as I say, under the previous government, if I am not mistaken.

My question to the group is the one I have been asking elsewhere; that is, in order to build on these services, we do need to have a strong economy in the province. That was one thing that allowed the Liberal government, the previous government, to initiate many of the programs you talked about. We saw that economic activity going on.

Does your group have any concerns at all—I know you are kind of unequivocal on the budget—about whether this budget will develop the necessary economic activity so that the people you serve will actually be able to have the services and the jobs they would like?

Mr Zuber: I really have not given that much thought. I am going to be quite blunt and tell you that the only reason I am speaking here today is because of what this budget means to me personally. I fear for my family's future; I fear for my own future. If the economy goes down the dumper, which it is halfway down already, that is too bad, but my main concern is to keep my family fed and to keep my head above water. If the budget gets cut any more than it is, there is no way out for me, and that is what really scares me. Whether or not this budget will stimulate any growth, I really do not know, and quite frankly, I do not care. I just want to feed my family for the next four or five years, and this budget at least offers me that opportunity. Maybe, with the grace of God and some government program, I can get back in and start earning a living for myself again, instead of becoming what is so commonly called a leech of society on the welfare system.

Mr Carr: One of the things that has been proposed to find some money for some of the programs you talked about—because obviously you have said it is not enough. I was just looking through the Agenda for People, where it said it would eliminate poverty. We are coming up on 11 months and it seems like we are no better off now than we were 11 months ago with the new socialist government.

One of the areas where money can be found in this day and age of increasing demands on money is through the civil service. As you know, they have recession-proof jobs. Right now, we have management groups within the civil service that are getting double-digit increases of 11% while we have stories like this. We could put $1 billion into more programs like this if in fact we gave them just 2%, and if we froze them, we could probably do even more. Are you in favour of doing that, to ask the civil servants of this province to give up some of their increases to help people like yourself? Would you agree with that?

Ms Margetson: No, I would not. I think people who are working full-time and working hard—and the majority of those people are working in Toronto, the most expensive city in Canada—I do not think that is going to accomplish a whole heck of a lot.

Mr Carr: So they are not included in the ones you mentioned a couple of times, the rich and powerful. As you know, most of those people are making close to $100,000 and they are getting 11% increases.

Ms Margetson: I would suggest you are wrong when you say most civil servants—

Mr Carr: Just look at the paper, the jobs you are going through. We are talking about a substantial amount of money. We are not talking about people making $35,000. We are talking about people making from $60,000 up to double digits who are getting 11% increases. You seem to be saying that is okay. Is that how I read it?

Ms Margetson: I do not know enough about the civil service wage structure to really form an opinion on that, but I would say that average working people should not be asked to take a wage cut or a wage freeze, especially those people who are living in Toronto. If they are making $100,000 or $200,000 or $300,000, then maybe we have to look at that, but I am not sure I am the right person to ask that question. That is not my area of expertise.

The Chair: The time has run out. I would like to thank you for your presentation here.

WELLINGTON AD HOC COMMITTEE AGAINST BILL C-69

The Chair: The next group is the Wellington Ad Hoc Committee Against Bill C-69. Would you come forward please.

I would like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economics on the budget review. You will have one half hour for your presentation, and near the end leave some time within that half hour for questions and answers of the three parties.

Mr Bidgood: My name is Bruce Bidgood and I am the chairperson of the Wellington Ad Hoc Committee Against Bill C-69.

Ms Brownell: My name is Barbara Brownell. I am the executive director of the North Wellington advisory group and a member of the committee against Bill C-69.

Mr Bidgood: I am sure the question might reasonably be asked why this committee, the Bill C-69 committee, group which is devoted to co-ordinating an opposition campaign against a piece of federal legislation, is appearing before this provincial standing committee today. It may be more timely for me to answer the question with clear statements regarding why we are not here.

First, we do not appear before this standing committee with any illusions that we are fiscal or economic experts, providing directions on how much and where the provincial government should direct its revenues. We leave this to the economists.

Second, we are not here to propose models for the complex of issues which is the relationship between the federal and provincial governments. We do not have any special clairvoyance in this area, and we leave this to the constitutionalists.

The Wellington Ad Hoc Committee Against Bill C-69 is appearing before the standing committee today to formally voice our opposition to the federal government's practice of unilaterally withdrawing its fiscal support of key human service programs within Ontario, a gradual erosion of the precise programs, both the Canada assistance plan and the established programs financing, which make up the very fabric of our Canadian social heritage. This practice, as we are sure the members of the standing committee will agree, has far-reaching implications for the current 1991 Ontario budget and for the provincial budgets for many years to come.

I am sure, given the events of the last couple of weeks, that most of the members of the standing committee are aware of this particular piece of legislation, Bill C-69, formally known as the Government Expenditures Restraint Act. It was part of Michael Wilson's 1990 federal budget, the first budget, from what I have been able to understand, that was drafted completely behind closed doors.

The bill, first of all, proposes to freeze federal funding for established programs financing, and this is a major source of funding for post-secondary education and Medicare. Prior to 1977, two senior levels of government shared the cost of these programs on a 50-50 basis. Under the EPF, there was a gradual erosion of federal cash payments for these programs in favour of tax points transferred to the provinces. If that were not enough, in 1986, the federal government put further limits on the EPF so that—and Bill C-69 in and of itself proposes to freeze all payments to this program from 1990 to 1992, and when you think about it, represents a severe cutback in funding given the rise in both the costs for post-secondary education and Medicare anticipated for the same period of time.

The net result of these federal initiatives has been the steady erosion of federal contributions for these essential programs, with the net result being that the amount of federal cash dollars for post-secondary education and Medicare will be reduced to zero by the year 2004. Knowledgeable informants have expressed deep concern regarding this particular course of action. They say that it will limit the federal government's ability to enforce national health standards. If you do not pay the piper, you do not call the tune. Also, there has been extreme concern expressed by representatives of the college and university communities, as we could expect, who feel that the legislation will make post-secondary education completely out of the reach of low-income and middle-income Canadians.

Beyond that, Bill C-69 proposed to put a cap on federal spending for the Canada assistance plan in Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta, the three "rich provinces," provinces where almost 50% of Canada's poor live. The CAP is our country's primary program to fight poverty, and it stood for a quarter of a century as an important cornerstone of our Canadian social heritage. The spirit of CAP holds that every Canadian has a right to assistance as a last resort to prevent destitution, and in 1988 to 1989, over 2.3 million people, 40% of them children, benefited from this program. Under CAP, the senior levels of government share 50-50 the cost of the welfare services and social service programs. Bill C-69 proposed to put a 5% ceiling on federal increases to the provinces for CAP. Given that CAP funding, on average, has increased 11.5% per year, this represents a substantial reduction in federal dollars. Estimates—I believe by the former Ontario Treasurer—suggested that Bill C-69 will cut approximately $440 million from the Ontario welfare and social service programs between 1990 and 1992.

The disposition of Bill C-69: There has been a continuous campaign of resistance against this particular piece of legislation since it was first passed by the House of Commons on June 12. The province of British Columbia took the federal government to court, stating that they had a legitimate expectation that the federal government would not unilaterally change the conditions of the CAP program, and indeed did win, and this ruling was upheld by the federal Justice minister.

The federal government continued, though, to push it through the Senate, and we know Michael Wilson's 1991 budget, even before the legality of the document had been established, extended the terms of Bill C-69 for a three-year duration. August 22, which was last Thursday, saw the Supreme Court rule in favour of the federal government, stating that they have the right to cut back transfer payments to the province.

Our group got together because of concerns expressed to us by welfare clients and human service providers within Wellington country. To date, it consists of over 20 organizations which are listed in the back of the document which I have handed out to you. Why have they gotten together? Essentially, the people within our community felt strongly enough that they wanted a co-ordinated campaign to let their opposition be known.

To date, the ad hoc committee has pursued a number of different activities to try to let our opposition to Bill C-69 be known to the federal government. Most specifically, there has been a public education campaign through the local print media. We have met with local MPs, urging them to put this issue on the agenda of the provincial government and to advocate strongly against Bill C-69. We met local MPs, including the Minister of Health and Welfare and the Minister of Science and Technology. We have had a sponsored press conference with a formal statement by the Ontario government on where they stand on this particular legislation. We have done outreach to general welfare clients, and we have also made submissions to the Spicer Commission and the select committee on Ontario in Confederation.

There is inherently a dilemma in Bill C-69 and what it represents for the provincial government and for this committee. Our advocacy effort around this particular legislation has made our members keenly aware of a no-win scenario facing the provincial government in drafting the 1991 budget. During our meetings with the members of federal caucus—as I said, the Minister of Health and Welfare and the Minister of Science and Technology—it was clearly stated that the federal government believed that the provinces were in a more favourable economic position to absorb the increasing costs of EPF and CAP programs. I quote: "Every province of Canada is in significantly better financial shape than the government of Canada, and we believe that the provinces must begin to live up to their own responsibilities. It is up to the provincial government to decide on its priorities, including whether it chooses to delay welfare reform. Ontario is better placed than the federal government to pay for any increases beyond 5%." That is Bill Winegard, January 9, 1991.

The dilemma then arises that when the provincial government increased its budget to absorb the shortfall incurred by the withdrawal of federal moneys, it was widely criticized as being fiscally irresponsible. Little or no attention was being paid to the role of the federal government in creating a substantially larger provincial deficit. To make matters worse, the Prime Minister went on to publicly criticize the government of Ontario for its financial policies, while four months earlier, members of the caucus were suggesting and yes, indeed, actually encouraging Ontario to increase its spending on social programs. The federal government cannot advocate greater provincial spending on social programs while criticizing them at the same time for running a deficit. There is something fundamentally hypocritical in this.

In addition, the original provisions of Bill C-69 stipulated that the limits on transfer of payments would be for a two-year period only. During our meetings with local MPs, we were given the impression that Bill C-69 was a necessary but temporary evil. "The CAP ceiling is not a permanent structural change. It is a temporary but necessary expenditure restraint measure for a two-year period." Again, the federal government demonstrated an interesting reversal in its thinking when, in the 1991 federal budget, the provisions of Bill C-69 were extended for three more years.

The government of Ontario does not draft its economic policies and budgets in a vacuum. It is our committee's belief there has been little public attention paid to the fact that the province has been put in a catch-22 position with respect to funding their social programs. There is increasing demand all over the place due to the recession. There is steady withdrawal of federal support, and everybody is criticizing increased spending.

Our members are, in no way, proponents of large governmental deficits. We would like to encourage fiscal responsibility at each and every level of government. To date, the theme that we used as the vanguard for our committee has been that we do not want to see the federal budget bounce on the backs of those who can least afford. The sick, those reliant on the health care system, students, those reliant on post-secondary education and families living in poverty, those who benefit from the Canada assistance plan. The federal government would appear to have no ear for those groups across the country have essentially gone unanswered.

What we are here today to do is to respectfully impart the same message to the standing committee and hopefully indirectly, to the government. We do not believe that the provincial government should, at any point, attempt to cure its deficit by withdrawing funds from those programs which benefit the most vulnerable people in our society. While recognizing that there is negative public attention associated with increased spending on social programs, we are here to ask the government of Ontario to persist in its Agenda for People and to make a commitment to guarantee that our most vulnerable citizens will not be unjustly penalized by the dwindling support of their federal government.

This can only be done by ensuring that the adequate funding for EPF and CAP programs are maintained. We would also encourage the government of Ontario to advocate for reinstatement of the pre-1990 conditions of CAP and the extended programs financing, and towards this end we strongly applaud the Premier for his stand to make social assistance transfer payments an item on the agenda for the upcoming constitutional discussions with the federal government. Because that is exactly what it is, it is a constitutional issue.

We have heard frequently from the proponents of the federal government that the budget must be balanced to preserve a future for our children. Our question is: What about those kids today who are living in poverty? Who are experiencing family violence? Failure to address the needs of Ontario's most vulnerable citizens today, particularly during a time of recession, will only lead to a future generation of disfranchised and marginalized citizens who will be perpetually reliant upon government assistance.

We do not believe that the citizens of Ontario and Canada want to see any level of government balance its books by virtually taking away the food and shelter of those who are already living far below the poverty line. It is our conviction to this point, which makes a federal policy such as Bill C-69, extremely unconscionable even if the Supreme Court says it is legal.

Ms Brownell: I would like to draw your attention to some of the more practical issues around budgetary implications and recession in Bill C-69. Mr Bidgood and I are also on a committee of service providers in Wellington county. There are some 20 to 25 service providers represented on this committee and we attempt to do joint planning and co-ordinate our services as best we can. We attempt to be fiscally responsible in ensuring that we keep within our budgets while still providing services to the families and children in Wellington county.

However, the implications of Bill C-69, and certainly the recession, make it more and more difficult for these agencies to cope with long waiting lists. An example of that would be the mental health services. It is a very clear fact that in times of recession people are under more stress and therefore the essential services which we are attempting to provide need expansion.

One of our fears, at this particular point, is that because of the budgetary implications and the recession, there will be no expansions of services. I will use day care as an example. While the budget makes mention about prevention of violence against women, I think it is important that the support services that would go along with that philosophy, which I applaud, need to be in place and need to be expanded. Day care is an example of that. If we are to encourage people who are living below poverty to get out and find work or go back to school so they can improve their lifestyles and add some quality to their lives, then we have to provide day care. It is very practical.

In my own particular area, we have a community committee that wants to put in place a day care in the rural village of Arthur. We have the people, we have the children, we have a location, and we are told there is no money. So those children who currently could be accessing controlled day care that we know is a safe environment and a productive environment for these children will have to go to in-home day care providers who cannot be supervised in the same way. People's choices in terms of care, people's choices in terms of accessing a variety of services are limited. Unless budgets are expanded in services, they will continue to be limited.

I would like to speak for a moment about the rural areas. It is easier to provide dollars and to provide services in urban areas. For the same number of dollars you can serve more people, and often the fiscal decision is to put the dollars into the large urban areas. In rural areas, services are very spread out. It is expensive to provide services. In North Wellington alone, we have 500 square miles and a population of 30,000 people. In order to serve those people, we must provide services in rural locations. We cannot have service providers being parachuted in from Guelph or from larger areas in the rural areas of the province.

Mr Bidgood and I would be happy to answer any questions and expand on some of the themes that we have discussed at this point.

Mr Phillips: Just a quick question: I am curious how people arrive here to present. Were you one of the groups that received a phone call from the Premier's office to appear?

Mr Bidgood: No, we did not receive a call from the Premier's office. Our invitation to come to this committee today was a direct consequence of our involvement with the local MPP on this particular issue.

Mr Phillips: The challenge, I guess, for the federal government, and I do not want to be an apologist for it, but I think it is broke—bankrupt. Maybe there are ways to solve that, but they did not find them over the last few years. I am just trying to get from your presentation what your issue is. Is it that more money should be spent on these services, or is it that the money should be coming more from the federal government rather than the provincial government?

Mr Bidgood: We are not suggesting that there should be drastic increases in funding for any specific programs. However, we do believe that the principle of shared responsibility between federal and provincial governments is too important a quality to be compromised by saying, "I'm sorry, at this particular time we're having deficit difficulties." We would not expect the federal government to increase substantially or unrealistically its contribution for Ontario's social service programs. However, we had hoped that they would fulfil their obligations as specified in EPF and CAP prior to the changing of it with Bill C-69.

Mr Phillips: I am not advocating this in any way, but if you were a totally selfish Ontario taxpayer and you said, "Listen, I'm totally selfish," what is in the Ontario taxpayer's interest? As I say, there are a lot of national unity issues at stake here, but would it be best that all of this be transferred to the provinces and the provinces managed the welfare, the education area and the health area themselves?

Ms Brownell: I think one of the things we need to keep in mind is that we want some national standards for health, welfare and education. I do not think it is good enough for the federal government to dump the responsibility for the standards and for the services and programs on to the provinces. It is a little bit like a province expecting municipalities to determine the standard and level of services within their own municipalities. What happens then is you get a variety of standards. In Wellington county we get X standard; in Waterloo county we get X standard. I think that we should be very clear that as a country, Canada at one time made a commitment to its people and we created a social safety net, and now we see big holes in that safety net. I do not think we can allow the federal government just to back off and say, "Let the provinces get on with it."

Mr Phillips: Have you done the analysis, as I said, if you were looking at it purely selfishly, in terms of what would be in Ontario taxpayers' best interest?

Mr Bidgood: I do not know if you can look purely self-interested. However, from my perspective, I would even take a stronger stand in suggesting that I do not think that morally the federal government can back out of providing basic social service programs. I mean, that was part of the promise when this country came together, and since the period of approximately 1970 or so, we have seen a slow and gradual erosion of the federal contributions to a number of these programs. So if you were talking about the perspective of a purely selfish Ontario ratepayer, I would say that there is something more dear at stake here for the Ontario ratepayer, and that is the commitment from both levels of government to take care of you if you should fall upon hard times, and that would transcend for me any sort of self-interest you might have as a ratepayer. It is the cornerstone of our social policy, the cornerstone of our social heritage. It is what binds us together, and at this time it is coming very loose.

Mr Carr: Thank you very much for a fine presentation. As you know, what we are really talking about here is not the compassion of government, because, as you well know, the social programs do not depend on the compassion of government; they really depend on the ability to pay for these programs.

One of the things that has been suggested is that there was no money anywhere else to be cut. I will give you an example of where I see some money could have been. I do not know if you are aware of it, but in 1985, 80% of the rental units produced in this province were built by the private sector. As we sit here today, it is closer to 20%. The 80-20 has been flipped.

Interjection: Good word.

Mr Carr: "Good word" is right.

The amount of money that we are talking about is not millions of dollars. Over the course of this government, we are talking billions with a "b" that is going to be put into building rental houses because, as you know, people need them. The private sector will not do it; the people need housing; the government jumps in. That is one area where a lot of people have said that if we had not had Bill 4, the rent bill, and some of the other initiatives during the Liberals, the private sector money could have built those rental units.

Just so you know, the cost per unit when the government builds them is twice. The non-profit cost is $1,800, versus about $800 when the private sector does it. So that is an area where we are talking about billions of dollars—with a "b"—that could be used to help the folks behind you who want some more money. It could be used to pay down the deficit. It could be done in a variety of ways.

What is your feeling about something like that, of allowing the private sector to stay in the rental part of the economy so that we do not need to put public sector dollars that could and should be used for other things? What is your feeling about that? Maybe you could comment about the billions that would be saved in that area.

Mr Bidgood: Your basic premise began with a statement about looking beyond compassion from government. Is that correct?

Mr Carr: I said social programs do not depend on the compassion of government, they depend on money to pay for them.

Mr Bidgood: Actually, in some degree I agree with you, in some degree I do not. I think that to date the discussion has been almost completely on how do we pay for it and the question of compassion of government has essentially gone out the door. People have forgotten to ask questions about both federal and provincial governments' commitment to their peoples.

I would never presume to suggest what is the equitable relationship between private sector and public sector interests with regard to stimulating the economy or things of that nature. However, I think it is a very valid stance for us to sit back and reflect, as you had mentioned, about issues about compassion; to forget—and I should not say this in front of a finance committee—but to put finance aside or at least consider for a moment social cost and the very principles, the values at stake here, which I think are tantamount or equally as important as the fiscal considerations, and I think it has been completely obscured with this particular budget.

Mr Christopherson: I thank you both for the presentation. I have had a chance to meet and talk with you both before, of course, at public sessions in Guelph where we talked about this very issue, and I would like to again applaud your efforts in doing everything you can to heighten the awareness of this important issue.

Just before I ask a question of you, I think maybe it is important to put on the record that I find it curious that one of the previous members was asking a question about how you got on the speaker's list and where the invitation came from when we know full well that at least one of the groups we have met with, the chamber of commerce from one of the communities, had its invitation faxed from the Liberal Party headquarters. Nobody is making any bones about that; it is part of the process and that is the way it works. I find it curious that there is an attempt to try and suggest that there would be something wrong in anybody being encouraged to come forward and speak out.

If you recall when we spoke before, prior to the case being made public on the cap on CAP, it was a low-profile. There were very few people who really were paying much attention to the issue of transfer payments between one level of government and another. My question to you is this: In light of the attention that it has gotten recently and the fact that the Premier of Ontario has said that this issue is so important to Ontarians that he now considers it to be on the constitutional talks agenda, do you think that we are succeeding in getting this issue on the agenda of the people of Ontario, or is it your opinion that over a short period of time it will fall away and again it will get lost in the dust of all the issues that come forward? I would just like your opinion on that, please.

Ms Brownell: I think it is a constitutional issue. I think people have a right to quality of life, and if the provinces who are being most seriously affected by the cap just lie down and play dead, then we are really in trouble. I think that this particular province has to keep up the song and dance. We have to keep up the publicity around some of the major issues regarding Bill C-69.

Mr Bidgood: Actually, I think that the entire issue regarding Bill C-69 has been one of the most interesting campaigns of selective inattention probably in history. There are a number of people who have alluded to what this may be so. I will not bother the committee with that here today. However, when the provincial government gets hit with a $400-million cutback, it receives fifth-page media attention. When one person representing, let's say, business interests or something of that nature wants to do some welfare-bashing, it gets a full page on the front page of one of the Toronto papers.

I do not understand why people have not been more concerned regarding this issue, because for me it is one that speaks to the very social fabric of our society. However, I can only hope that with the provincial government taking this as part of the agenda for constitutional talks, it will not become part of the back bench again and it will continue to be an issue that will burn in the minds of the citizens of Ontario for quite some time to come.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for appearing before this committee.

BRANTFORD AND DISTRICT LABOUR COUNCIL

The Chair: The next group is the Brantford and District Labour Council, Mr Garry MacDonald, president. Would you come forward, please? I would like to welcome you here to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs and the budget review. You have 30 minutes for your presentation. In that period of 30 minutes, you can leave someone near the end of your presentation for question and answer from the three political parties of the government here. You may begin.

Mr MacDonald: My name is Garry MacDonald and I am here today representing the Brantford and District Labour Council. As president of the labour council I am very much aware of how provincial economic policy affects Brantford. In my brief before this committee today I am going to focus on the particular concerns of Brant county and our relationship to the provincial economy.

The Brantford economy is dependent on our manufacturing base. Here, 33% of the workforce is in manufacturing compared to the provincial average of 22%. The workforce here is also younger and less educated than the provincial average, which makes manufacturing employment essential to the local economy. As we know, in a recession, manufacturing is the first sector to suffer and the last to recover. Brantford's experience in the last recession 1981-82 can be submitted as proof of this statement.

In fact many people believe, including myself, that Brantford still has not recovered from the 1981-82 recession. The closure of Massey Combines and White farm equipment was directly related to the previous recession. The economic downturn 10 years ago crippled agriculture in North America along with the federal Liberal government's high-interest-rate policies and the Conservatives who followed with the same policies. Farmers no longer had resources to purchase agricultural implements which had been Brantford's most famous and most profitable industry. Massey and White together employed 8,000 to 9,000 workers. These were high-wage jobs that supported the local economy.

Recent reports from Kitchener estimate that with the loss of 2,000 Uniroyal Goodrich jobs, 2,000 to 3,000 support jobs would be lost. Using the same formula, the closure of Massey and White affected from 15,000 to 20,000 families in Brant county, which is almost half of the entire population of the county. As the high-wage jobs Massey and White supplied left Brantford, the jobs that came in their place were fewer and lower paying. While most people speak of the 1980s as a period of unrestrained growth, that did not happen in Brantford.

Following close behind the closures of Massey and White was the present recession. In this recession the manufacturing sector was even harder hit—the loss of 76,000 jobs in Ontario's manufacturing sector. This recession caused the loss of 102,000 jobs. In percentage terms, the loss is 9.9% of Ontario's manufacturing jobs this time as opposed to 7.2% last time. As 43% of all jobs lost in this recession were manufacturing jobs, I want to emphasize what this means to a community as dependent on manufacturing as Brantford.

In Brantford, this has meant the closure of Galtaco Redlaw, Fruehauf, Solaray, Chicago Rawhide, Sprout-Bauer and Penmans. This has resulted in an increase of people collecting unemployment insurance and families collecting welfare. UI recipients increased by 54% from June 1990 to June 1991. The economic devastation that has visited Brantford is better reflected in the welfare case load. With the uncaring and hard-hearted reduction in weeks for UI eligibility, Brant county social services' case loads have gone through the roof. From July 1990 to July 1991 the case load has increased 115%.

With no new large manufacturing plants moving into the area, the scenario over the past years for many Brant county workers has been the loss of their jobs, reduced weeks of UI, and after that runs out there are few options but to rely on the overburdened welfare system. Even as we see UI recipients decline by 503 from June to July, we see the welfare case loads increase. This indicates that many people are seeing their UI benefits run out and must seek social assistance before they find employment.

Some estimates indicate that 10% of the population of Brantford is collecting welfare. This does not include those people collecting UI or family benefits. At the Brantford food bank the total number of people using food bank services in the first seven months of this year is roughly the same number of people whom the food bank served in all of 1990.

I am pleased to see that the province has seen fit to fund the unemployment help centre so it can continue to house the Brantford food bank. The $75,000 the province has provided will also allow for the much-needed expansion of services to include training and retraining programs, but this does not address the fundamental needs of the Brantford economy.

If no new manufacturing jobs arrive in our community, a community which is already growing slower than the provincial average, what will become of Brantford? As Brantford has been so hard hit by this recession, the attitude of the federal government with respect to transfer payments has been deplorable.

The federal Tories cut $1.6 billion from federal transfers in health, education and social assistance. To cover these shortfalls in Brantford, health spending would have to be cut by $26 million. This would throw even more people out of work as those cuts would probably be made in nursing and support staff.

Education spending would have to be cut by $14 million, throwing numbers of teachers out of work. This would put an even greater burden on the welfare system as more capable, hardworking people would be on welfare just so the Tories could prove some political point.

Our estimates conclude that for social service spending alone, Brantford would have to come up with another $11 million. Where would our city find this money? In a city where close to 10% of the population collect general welfare assistance already, where nearly half the families in the county have been affected by a layoff of some type, would the federal government prefer that the residents of Brantford lose their homes as well? The property tax increases that would have to make up the shortfall in transfer payments would have to go through the roof to maintain a welfare case load that has gone up 115%.

Many Brant county residents would lose their homes, particularly seniors on fixed incomes or workers who have already been laid off and are waiting for this made-in-Canada recession to end.

The alternative to raising taxes is to allow people to go hungry, without shelter. Perhaps this is what the federal government had in mind when they cut the transfer payments. As 40% of people receiving social assistance are children, the only possible conclusion is that the federal Tories are in favour of child starvation—

Mr Stockwell: That's dumb, Mr Chairman. That is just the dumbest thing I've ever heard.

The Chair: It is a presentation—

Mr Stockwell: It is a presentation. I can question it, but I am going to speak out on this to go on the record—

The Chair: Yes, you have that right.

Mr Stockwell: That has got to be the dumbest thing I have ever heard anyone say.

The Chair: This is a witness before this committee.

Mr Stockwell: It may be a witness, but the statement is that the federal Tories are in favour of child starvation.

The Chair: You can make your statement after.

Mr MacDonald: Can I continue?

The Chair: Carry on, sir.

Mr MacDonald: Thank you.

Mr Christopherson: It is still a free province.

Interjections.

Mr Stockwell: That is what makes it free.

Mr Christopherson: Wait your turn.

The Chair: Carry on, sir.

Mr Stockwell: Sometimes you speak out when statements like that are made.

The Chair: Mr Stockwell, everybody has his opinion.

Mr MacDonald: Maybe he could come to the food bank in Brantford and see them.

Mr Stockwell: I have been to a food bank before—

The Chair: Mr Stockwell, let the gentleman finish his presentation. You may question him after.

Mr MacDonald: Okay, thank you. Provincial Conservative leader Mike Harris spoke only a few days ago about welfare recipients when he stated that he was not in favour of paying people to stay home and do nothing. Does Mr Harris suggest that the 40% of social assistance recipients who are children take to begging in the streets?

I can assure all members of this committee that the people of Brantford are hardworking people who would rather work than collect welfare. But without jobs, without a place to work, what other alternative is there? None of Mr Harris's wealthy friends have been kind enough to locate any of their plants here in recent years. What Brantford needs is industry, not political hot air.

I realize that the money for assistance must come from somewhere. However, working people currently have more of a tax burden than they can endure. I cannot speak in favour of tax increases. I also realize that the provincial tax revenue decreased this year over last year. As consumer spending decreased, revenue from provincial sales tax did as well. I also cannot speak in favour of government deficits that may end up being financed on the backs of working people. However, in fairness, the provincial government had some difficult decisions to make.

I am glad the province has recognized that in Brantford we cannot just give up and close the doors. We cannot allow children to go hungry. We cannot allow workers down on their luck to lose their homes. The provincial budget that has been criticized by every blue suit on Bank Street means that in Brantford children do not have to go hungry and workers do not have to lose their homes.

In this budget that has been so essential to the Brantford economy, just maintaining the spending levels affected by the Conservative cut in transfers pushes the deficit to $8.2 billion. However, this still does not address the primary problem affecting the Brantford economy, the lack of jobs. Our estimates indicate that the anti-recession projects included in this budget have created over 500 jobs for Brantford. Many of these projects, such as the relocation of the Brantford Public Library and the boiler conversion project at St Joseph's Hospital, may have had to wait years before the city had the funds to see them carried through. It is true that these projects are make-work projects, but at least they employ considerable numbers of workers who would otherwise be unemployed or on welfare. Over $5.15 million has been allocated to Brantford county anti-recession projects. Without these funds and jobs they have created and maintained, the social safety net in our city would have an even greater burden. This city has fallen on tough times, but without this provincial assistance, times would have been even tougher.

I mentioned the Massey Combines Corp closure earlier in this brief and I want to speak of that closure again to indicate perhaps the most necessary feature of the provincial budget. The wage protection fund established in this budget is long overdue. Many former Massey workers have not received their severance pay from the closure of Massey Combines over three years ago. The hourly workers have been forced to settle for less than what they were legally entitled to receive under the Employment Standards Act. Varsity Corp, the parent company of the former Massey Combines, has fought every dollar in compensation to these laid-off workers. Many reached the social assistance system earlier than they would have, had Varsity Corp acted with the responsibility that an employer should.

As of March 11, 1991, in the region that includes Brantford, over $6.4 million in severance pay and over $3.6 million in termination pay did not get to the workers who were legally entitled to receive these funds. These totals are from only six months after the fund was announced. Workers should not have to suffer from the mismanagement of employers. Employers should not be able to hide behind the federal Bankruptcy Act to avoid their al obligation to laid-off employees. I am glad a government finally recognizes that workers in a plant closure do not have the golden parachutes executives have. My only regret is that the wage protection fund comes too late to help those involved in the Massey closure.

I do not want to give the impression that Brantford and the strict Labour Council is 100% satisfied with the provincial budget. What this city needs is jobs, not handouts. Fortunately, with the existing free trade agreement, industry is choosing to locate in the southern United States near Brantford. Soon, with the attitude of the federal Tories, industry will probably be choosing Mexico over Brantford. This city was once the third largest manufacturing centre in Canada; we are now in an emergency situation. We have been in this situation for some time and are tired of governments ignoring our local problems, but we are grateful that at least the provincial NDP has chosen to fight the recession and help Brantford get through these difficult times. No government is perfect and if not controlled this deficit could become unmanageable. But I understand that the per capita debt in Ontario is less than the per capita debt in Canada as a whole and less than many other provinces.

Many so-called economic experts are stating that the recovery is under way. I agree that without the initiative of the provincial government, this apparent recovery would not be taking place. However, for many of the reasons I have outlined in this brief, Brantford may not feel this recovery for some time. We will need help until we can get our people to work. Economic recovery here will not be complete until the high-wage jobs like those the farm implement industry supplied return to Brantford.

Considering the pressures the NDP government is under, I am satisfied that this budget is the best they could do. This is, after all, a government made up of working people who at least understand the pressures that working people are under. As for the critics of this budget, I think I have outlined the economic devastation they would have brought to this city if they had blindly followed Brian Mulroney's plan. I feel proud that Ontario has stood up to Mulroney and taken a different approach. Perhaps with a different government in Ottawa such extraordinary measures that the NDP has had to take would not have been necessary. Thank you.

The Chair: We have about four minutes for each one of the parties, starting off with the official opposition. Mr. Stockwell, you—

Mr Stockwell: Official opposition?

The Chair: Third party, I should say. I just promoted you.

Mr Stockwell: No, no questions.

The Chair: Mr Carr.

Mr Carr: I have in front of me a poll that was commissioned and it talked about how in the 1991 budget the federal government introduced a new law to limit increases in government spending. "Do you strongly agree, somewhat agree, somewhat disagree or strongly disagree the Ontario government should pass a similar law?" It was interesting to note that 77% of the people who said they voted for the NDP supported that; for your record, 90% that were Conservative and 79% that were Liberal. Basically, the people of this province are saying there should be some controls on government spending and yet you come here and say there should not. Why the discrepancy among people who said they voted NDP, when 77% say we should have some type of controls?

Mr MacDonald: I am not saying there should not be some controls and I am not saying that we want a deficit that is going to become unmanageable or get out of hand. I think I mentioned that.

Mr Carr: Will become unmanageable?

Mr MacDonald: I said "could" become unmanageable.

Mr Carr: I think it will.

Mr MacDonald: I think you should maybe look at Brantford—I do not know where that poll came from, if it was all over Ontario—

Mr Carr: It was Ontario.

Mr MacDonald: I think anybody who lives in Brantford and has seen the plant closures in this town and the loss of jobs since 1981 would say they have to do something. Something has to be done in Brantford. If that is what it takes to get the economy going, if that is what it takes to get our people back working, which is going to help reduce the deficit once they get working, I would agree in Brantford something has to be done. Brantford itself, I think, has been one of the hardest-hit communities, next to Kitchener which is going through some tough times right now. But if you go through the number of plant closures that we have had: big plants, not just little plants, 8,000 people; Fruehauf, a couple of years before they closed, had close to 600 people and I think when they closed they were down to 260 to 270 people; Solaray, places like that. It is a disaster.

Mr Stockwell: You spoke of Varsity. Were you in favour of this government's position of holding the door open while they left the country?

Mr MacDonald: I do not think they held the door open. If that is your opinion, it surely is not mine. I think they did the best they could with the situation. It was getting to a point where the people had been sitting there for so long, something needed to be done. I do not think I would say they just let them walk out.

Mr Stockwell: You did not support their position previous to the election? Their policy previous to the election was quite different than what they in fact adopted after they were elected.

Mr MacDonald: I am not aware of what their actual policy was prior to the election, so I could not really comment on that.

Mr Stockwell: Obviously it did not matter. Thanks.

Mr MacDonald: Well, yes, it did.

Mr B. Ward: We would all like to thank you for taking the time to come out and present your views on behalf of the labour council. Some of the statements made in your brief perhaps upset some people on the committee, but here in Brantford we speak our mind and I do not think we should be ashamed of that or apologize for it. I think we are a tough community here of hard-working people and other people may not be used to that. Brantford has experienced tough times and I agree with you that those tough times have existed since the early 1980s.

Our government attempted to cushion the economic blow working people have faced not only in this community but throughout Ontario. I think it is no surprise that tough times are experienced in Windsor, experienced in the Niagara Peninsula, experienced in the east, experienced in the north. In fact, I do not think the north has ever had economic prosperity. What are your feelings on the direction our government is taking in Durham-Brantford? Should we have cut back and made things worse? Should we be continuing on the direction that we are heading?

Mr MacDonald: In my opinion, being close to Brantford and seeing the number of jobs that we have lost, if they would not have gone in the direction that they are going—which I would commend them for doing; something had to be done to get a jump start out of this recession. I think they did that. I am not saying they went far enough, but I think under such difficult times they did an adequate job. Brantford, and I would like to state it again, is one of the communities that are really hard-pressed. I may use a few strong words but I do not regret them because we have many families that have lost their homes. I have people I know that used to have jobs. They are coming in to the food bank now, they are in such a bad situation. The number of lost jobs in Brantford has just been a disaster.

Mr B. Ward: I think for this province to continue to prosper and head towards recovery in the future, greater co-operation is needed among labour, business and government. I think an example of that occurring successfully is the Harding Carpet plant where there is give and take by all three groups—private sector investment, government financial assistance and employee commitment—to lead to success. Do you think that could be built on both locally and provincially if not nationally? Do you think that is something we can do?

Mr MacDonald: I think it needs to be done. I think it is something that should be done. Harding Carpets is a good example of it. This community needed that. If it had not happened, if all parties had not got together and worked at keeping that place there, you were talking about losing another 200 or 300-odd jobs. I think it was done in the best interests of everybody concerned.

Mr B. Ward: The one last question, and perhaps my colleagues may have one, is the relationship between the labour council and the chamber of commerce. Do you think the willingness to work together has been improving over the years, as well as with local government? I would like to think that Brantford is a first in many areas. Do you think that perhaps we could show the rest of the province how co-operation can benefit a community?

Mr MacDonald: Definitely. I think there is a great need for it. I think it was started a little bit prior to my time. There have been some ongoing things that were started a few years ago with the chamber. We do have some things that are ongoing with them. We involve them. We involved them last year, or I think it was the year before, when labour themselves approached them about being part of the United Way with us and stuff like that. You have to have some kind of working relationship. You can make your community grow and Brantford does need some growth, definitely.

Mr Kwinter: Mr MacDonald, I heard your comment about Brantford as if Brantford is something special. Should you tell me that there are many communities in Ontario that are suffering as badly as, or worse than Brantford. I can tell you of places like Collingwood, Cornwall, Windsor, where they have far higher unemployment rates than they do in Brantford. I am not saying that to make you feel any better. What I am saying is that it is not a problem that is peculiar to Brantford, it is a problem that is peculiar to Canada, to Ontario and our manufacturing sector.

What you are saying is we need jobs. That is number one. Those jobs can only be created by people investing and deciding they are going to put some manufacturing capability into Brantford or any other community. How do you think an investor feels, whether he be—a Canadian investor we will discount, because they are here—but foreign investors, when they hear representations that have been made, particularly to this committee, by some labour councils who are condemning American investors, multinational companies who are coming in here, condemning business, condemning their attitude towards profits, so that on the one hand there is this anti-business feeling and on the other hand there is the feeling we need jobs? Who is going to create those jobs and how do you expect to entice them into a jurisdiction where the feeling is they are not terribly welcome other than, "We do need your jobs." There seems to be a kind of a conflict; you want the jobs but you do not want them. How do you deal with that?

Mr MacDonald: You said "other labour councils." I do not think in my brief here today I mentioned that "profits" was a dirty word or anything like that. I understand that to have a secure job you have to have profits. Companies invest to make money; "money" and "profits" are not dirty words, at least not in my line of thinking. The more profitable the company is, the more secure your job is going to be. As you said, you stated "other labour councils." I am not saying their views are wrong, but I am not sitting here today either saying that "profits" is a dirty word. I understand to create jobs, to create a base for jobs, you have to have companies willing to invest in your community. I understand that. I am not here today suggesting that "profits" is a dirty word. I work for an American company. It is totally owned by an American company. We have a good working relationship with that company and it is unionized; it is Rubber Inc and they are based out of Denver.

Mr Phillips: Thank you. I appreciate your presentation. I said to the other labour councils, "I never thought I would see the day when a labour council would come in and congratulate a budget that calls for unemployment this year of 10% and next year of 10% which, had that happened in any previous governments, a Conservative or Liberal vernment, I think you would be up and down the back the government because those levels of unemployment clearly unacceptable."

My question to the labour council really is—I am not sure at your relationship is with the NDP; certainly many of unions directly support the NDP; I am not sure the our council does. I am just curious about how the lab-council will resolve the possible conflict if in fact you sitting here a year from now, or your successor is, and are looking at what they call for, unemployment rates 10%. Will you feel kind of at odds, because on one hand ganized labour officially supports the NDP government ancially and in other ways it is a government that has a possibility for creating jobs. How will you and your our council reconcile the challenges of that?

Mr MacDonald: Addressing that question, I understand what you are saying. As a labour council president representing different unions and organizations that belong the labour council, I understand their problem with the mber of people laid off because this recession has been t as bad on some other communities as ours. But because of the recession and the number of jobs lost—I am t saying that we would say 10% is acceptable. I do not nk it is. I wish we could get it down more quickly.

You are talking about a government here that has just me in in very bad times. Just prior to that, taking Brant-d as an example, I think we had over 10% even prior to t. As I have stated, our economy, in my opinion and ne other people's opinion, has not really come back ce 1981-82 when we had the big plant closures. Those cices I mentioned have been steadily going down over the t few years. Our numbers here have stayed high since out 1981-82. I am hoping the NDP can turn it around d create more jobs.

The Chair: Thank you, sir, for your presentation.

ONTARIO FLUE-CURED TOBACCO GROWERS' MARKETING BOARD

The Chair: The next group is the Ontario Flue-Cured tobacco Growers' Marketing Board, Mr Albert Bouw. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget review. You will have one lf-hour in your presentation and if you can save some e at the end of your presentation, the three parties ould like to ask questions.

Mr Bouw: Thank you, Mr Chair. I probably will not e that much time and I will gladly answer some questions. do not have a formal presentation. However, I do have e or six issues that I wish to bring forward to this sitting.

Being a tobacco farmer and representing the tobacco oducers, we were obviously very disappointed in a bud-t—the first budget by this government, by the way. It ose to take the easy target—tobacco—as an easy way to ise funds. We had hoped that this new government aybe would take a different view or different approach as how it was going to deal with this particular issue. To s point, it has not chosen to do that.

I might add that this year when the federal vernment's budget came out, being much worse than the vvincial one, we were in the midst of crop negotiations.

We had to recess for 10 days for the domestic manufactur-ers to go back and re-evaluate their needs. We could not wait for a provincial budget to come out because we have to allot quota to our producers by a certain time because of cultural practices and farming procedures. Due to the federal budget we lost 23 million pounds in 10 days—multiply that times $2.48 a pound and that is a lot of dollars. That is just in one fell swoop. Then, as I say, the provincial budget came after that. Probably what will happen and what normally happens, they make adjustments for that the following year.

Just to raise once again, and I am sure you have heard it many times before, what the value of taxation is as far as this province and this country, the numbers are pretty staggering. For the federal tax it is $2.31 for a package of cigarettes, which since 1986 has increased by 178%. The Ontario tax is $2.05 per pack of 25, which is up 144% since 1986. In that same time period consumer price indexing went up 21%. We have always said many, many times to former governments, and we say it to you now, that we can live with taxation as well as anybody else. We want to pay our fair share. We would probably even be willing to pay a little bit more than our fair share, but certainly we do not want to try to carry the whole country on our backs.

To give you another example, the total tax for a package of cigarettes in this province is $4.38. I can go to Detroit or go to Buffalo—and a lot of people are doing it—and buy those same cigarettes for 74 cents. So the difference is $3.64. We are talking only tax here, we are not talking about the product. The product is really insignificant in this little story.

I, as a grower, receive 11 cents a pack. Governments receive $4.38 for that same pack. The package itself costs as much as we, the growers, receive. That is fine, we can also live with that to a point.

The tobacco-producing area does not encompass that many ridings—three mainly, and some surrounding ridings. I could relate to you that when governments started these taxation issues back in 1981-82, when they started with them in earnest, we were producing 215 million pounds of tobacco. Today we are producing 130 million. That is a loss per annum of $170 million to the growers—$170 million per year taken out of our communities, out of our local economy. That is why so many of our local businesses have gone out of business today. That is why if you drive through Delhi, if you drive through the Tillsonburgs, the Simcoes and the Aylmers and some of the smaller places—the Langtons and the Stratfordvilles and so on and so forth—these businesses are not there any more because $170 million a year is directly taken out of the farmers' pockets.

The numbers are actually very scary. One tobacco farmer producing 100,000 pounds of tobacco, and that is about average today, contributes through that 100,000 pounds of tobacco that he grows each year, through taxes that governments collect, $4.9 million. That is what a little, 100-acre tobacco farm growing 100,000 pounds of tobacco generates every year: $4.9 million. A staggering number. What it has done—it is no secret, we hear about it every day—is encourage smuggling. We heard about Oka last year and there were a lot of things said about Oka. I dare suggest one of the underlying issues in Oka was a $500-million business in a little community like Oka where there were 76 outlets to buy cigarettes. That is what Oka was about, one of the underlying issues that never really came to the surface: smuggling.

What is happening in all our local little communities, the Delhis and so on, is happening all over the country. The Mac's milk stores and the Becker's are getting robbed left and centre every other day. People are afraid. They are not taking the money, they are taking cigarettes. I mean, the stuff is like gold. Why is it like gold? Because there is a $4.38 tax on it in the province of Ontario.

Smuggling costs us as growers. We grow tobacco in what we refer to as domestic export pounds. This year we are growing some six million pounds of that. That tobacco is for duty-free export stores, for ships, for airlines, and so on. I think we all know that a heck of a pile of those cigarettes—and I do not think anybody knows the real number—are being smoked in Ontario. We sell that tobacco at roughly $1.40 or $1.45 a pound. We receive $1 a pound more for our domestic tobacco. Of the six million pounds, let us assume that half of that is legitimate and not coming back in. There is $3 million that, because of smuggling, we as growers are directly losing.

Then there is the issue of the 6.4 million smokers. Where are their rights in this particular country? I think all of you should read the 100-and-some page judgement not too long ago by Judge Chabot, which I guess is now being appealed. He makes very critical comments about what governments are doing or trying to do with this industry. The federal government was told by its advisers and lawyers before Bill C-51 was ever put in place that it would not stand up under scrutiny. Social engineering, I believe is how Judge Chabot refers to it. I would not like to see that happen in the province of Ontario any further than it has.

Back to the point of the farmer: I am a farmer. There are about 1,200 of us and we have about 1,600 farms. In other words, some people have more than one, so they have what we call share-growers. So there are 1,600 units being produced. We employ about 20,000 seasonal people—not a small amount. You add to that the distributors, the manufacturers, and in total the industry probably supplies some 60,000 jobs. I might add, if you do not know—and I am sure you do know—that in 1981-82 there were 2,600 of us. Now there are 1,200. As I said earlier, we have lost some 85 million pounds of production annually over those years and $170 million of direct revenue to farmers.

Nobody I am aware of has said that tobacco production is illegal in this country, or that tobacco smoking is illegal. Nobody has yet said that. And who are the smokers, really? I think we all know who they are. They are farmers like myself, people who work in factories, lower-income people for the most part—that excludes MPs, of course—and people who are on fixed incomes. Do you know there is only one group where there is an increase in consumption, and by whom or what sector?

Mr Kwinter: Young women.

Mr Bouw: No sir, senior citizens is the only sector smokers where actually there is an increase in consumption. You have these old folks homes and all of a sudden they are going to that extreme. The other day I saw a person who had his leg cut off, he is 83 years old. He is sitting outside, for crying out loud, like a criminal. That man is 83 years old and you are going to say to him, "You can't smoke"? Ridiculous. I could go on about this subject for hours and hours because we have had to talk about many times for quite a few years already.

One further thing: the budget itself. One of the comments in the budget which bothers us—the same type of comment was left in the federal budget—is that the provincial government is putting together what is called tobacco control strategy. I have unsuccessfully made some inquiries about what this legislation may be. My simple question has been: can we have some input? Is there room for that? The first time I asked this question they said "Well, it hasn't passed yet so you don't have to say anything yet." I said to the gentleman I was talking to, "Well, it's after the fact." We would like some prior input if there is going to be such a policy. Like I say, I have no idea what that is going to be.

For this industry to survive, we as an organization have had a conscious decision that we now have to seek more export markets, because the domestic market does keep continuing to decline. We have to compete more against the Brazils and the Zimbabwes. That is our competition. It is not the United States. So we have to compete against 60-cent-a-day labour. We pay $65 a day plus provide accommodations and housing and God knows what else. We feel we probably can do that in the long term. We are prepared to pick up that challenge, but we need some help. We need help because governments have not left us alone.

We put our five-year strategic plan together like we have done for the last eight years—this year starting a new one. The governments come along and do this to us overnight and we have absolutely no control over that. They tax the hell out of a product that, as I said before, is legal and collects some $8 billion a year for this country. They owe our industry more than what it has received in return up to now.

We need support in finding new export markets. Anyway, governments have been to a degree supportive of that in the past. We need more people in other countries. I am talking Asia specifically now, where the province should be putting people in place so they can deal with the Asian type person. I do not mean that in a derogatory way at all. They do business in a different way and we feel in order to be successful in those countries you have to have people on site regularly.

For the longest time we produced to a ratio of 65-35—65% of our crop was domestic and 35% was export. This particular organization, this board, has been in existence since 1957. Before that there was an association. So we have been around a while and have been exporting a long time. We do it to a lot of countries. We no longer can take the load alone. We need support through the transition, the sition of going from that 65-35 ratio to almost a 50-50 ratio this year. I expect next year, for the first time ever, a switch to where our production will probably be more export than domestic.

As I said earlier, we need to compete against these Asian countries. We are prepared to meet that challenge. We need some help in the interim. World prices on tobacco, believe it or not—and there is a lot of pressure on the world tobacco right now—are going up because there is a shortage everywhere, except of course in Canada. For that transition period we need some support from government. When I am talking support of government, I am talking dollars. I am not talking in terms of an airplane ticket—because we will take that too. I am talking in terms of hard dollars to meet the competition. Because things are changing there too. For example, in Zimbabwe their labour increased by 18%, which obviously we like to see, because maybe those fellows will be able to buy a TV set some day when they get hydro. Of course when people get accustomed to better things, they want more things. That is the way human nature works.

So we feel that the world price will continue to move, in the interim, until we can become competitive with these people—and I will give you a further example. We go to the United Kingdom. Tobacco coming into the United Kingdom has 22% duty on it. Tobacco coming from Zimbabwe into the United Kingdom has zero duty. Even if our tobacco were exactly the same price, we have a 22% competitive disadvantage. Coming from Brazil it is 7%. Some of that is offset through transportation, because it is a longer way. We have asked the federal government in that particular case through the GATT to give us some support there, but we all know that is not there yet either.

Once again we will pick up the challenge. We have asked up the challenge. We will continue to lose production, so the REDOX program—and Mr Jamison full well knows what the REDOX program is all about although none of the other members may not. We need continuation of that particular program, which has been supported by both governments for the past five years, but more than that, we need government approval.

I believe at this point we have a nod from the federal government that it is prepared to move in this direction to help with our plight, because I think, I hope, that it recognizes the damage that it has done. We have asked for this program to be put in place until the year 2000, because that is when we are supposed to have a smoke-free society and by the year 2000 we do have a smoke-free society and 1,200 tobacco farmers in the communities of Delhi, Isonburg and Simcoe are gone, then we will be asking for full compensation for an industry that was eliminated by governments. I think I have rattled on long enough and could answer some questions now.

Mr Jamison: It is nice to see you here. You are the second constituent from Norfolk we have heard from today.

I am very interested in your presentation and I have got a few questions, so I will ask the first one and hopefully I will get the second one in. The first question is, when you are talking about support programs and help from government, when do you feel that should be in place to be most helpful to you?

Mr Bouw: When we put our crop agreements together this year through what we call a Tobacco Assistance Committee process with governments—both governments are involved in that, by the way, as well as manufacturers, dealers and ourselves, and that is what we call the TAC—part of the consideration at that time was that we receive support from governments on this export issue.

We will be opening our markets October 21. Last year, our growers received on average $1.98 for their tobacco. This year our contract is less than the previous year, because of this export issue. In order to communicate with our producers their support from the governments, we need—and at the early point it does not have to be publicly—by October, November, a positive signal from government that it is supportive of our request as to how it will treat this transition period as far as helping export markets.

That is imperative, that by October, November, whether it is direct communication to myself or to our board, at that particular time when our growers receive their final cheques, they can count on the support of the government. I might add, our market is completed in February. Realizing budget constraints and so on that governments are under, and probably the fiscal year is March-April, but we need the communication—as I say, it does not have to be done openly, as long as it is communicated to us directly—that we can have some confidence that when we are dealing with the following year, because we start those talks right before Christmas, that when we are forming these negotiations and putting in our pounds for export—because export pounds are risky, there is no commitment from the exporter. We grow those at our own risk. The domestic stuff is guaranteed, but the export pounds, other than 40% of it, is at our own risk.

So before we start the talks for the following year, we have got to be able to communicate with our growers and say, "This is what the government is doing to support us with exports."

Mr Jamison: One point that I would like you to just verify is about land values. With the pressures that are on tobacco and tobacco farms and the growers—of course growers have no pensions, they have invested everything in their farms. At one time when tobacco was good, certainly there were farms that sold for $1 million. Of course when times are not so good or the outlook is not as good in tobacco, and I am not saying that probably will not change, but what is the effect on the grower and especially the grower that bought in the 1970s, and so forth?

Mr Bouw: It is like any other industry. You are correct that maybe at one time they were a little bit overvalued. Certainly there were $1-million farms, but a lot of people bought $600,000 and $700,000 farms in the late 1970s because the industry was just rolling along like it always had. So farms that were purchased for $600,000, $700,000, all of a sudden were worth the value of a house. So a 100-acre tobacco farm at one point—I could cite you more than one case where the farm was for sale and the person interested in buying it was not a farmer. He went to the bank and he said, "I'd like to buy this property," and gave them the details. He said the banker said: "No, it's got 100 acres of land with it. Get rid of the land and you can buy the house for that price." So it got to that degree.

Mr Kwinter: I really welcome the chance to talk to you, because the tobacco industry is one that has been a conundrum for me in all the years I have been in politics and I think it is for every politician. I just want to outline the situation that most politicians find themselves in.

You have an industry—and it is in dispute, I know, by the industry—but there is a report in the paper today that 35,000 people in Canada lost their lives as a result of tobacco. The figure that is used in Ontario is 10,000 people a year die as a direct result of smoking of tobacco. You have a situation where there is not a government that has got the guts to take a stand and finally say, "Look, we don't want this product grown," but if it does that, it gives up a lot of tax revenue, which is a problem.

So they sort of leave you hanging in the wind, really, because they will not put you out of your misery because they want the tax revenue. They have got this other problem at the other end where they have got these health costs and they have a product that you cannot advertise properly. You have got to put warnings on it that it is bad for your health. They do everything to put you out of business but keep you just going well enough so that you can continue to pay your taxes.

How do you deal with that as an industry? I mean, how do you come to terms with that?

Mr Bouw: I was on an airplane the other day and reading in a magazine how a gentleman comes to his usual restaurant and sits down and says to the waiter, "I'll have the usual." The waiter says, "Sorry, sir, I'm new here, so I don't know what your usual is." "Well," he says, "I'll have soup, a salad and I'm going to have the pork chops today and I'll have coffee and dessert." "Excuse me, sir, the soup you're referring to, do you want base stock or do you want soup stock with just water?" He says, "I want the good stock." The waiter says, "Sir, that has got a lot of fat in it, it's not good for you." "Oh, okay. Well, forget the soup. I'll have the salad." "Well, sir," he says, "maybe you should think about that. That salad's been washed in water and it's washed all the nutrients out and, God, I don't know if it's really all that good for you." So he says, "Well, forget the salad." He goes on to the pork chops and so on, and I will not go through it all, but he got to the end and of course he had eaten nothing. There was a glass of water and, "Gee, sir, you know, there's chlorine in it," and it does this, and so on and so forth. So the guy gets up and says, "Well, I guess I'm not hungry today," and he leaves and the waiter follows him. "Sir?" "Yes?" He says, "It's not good that you don't eat. You should eat three times a day." By that, the gentleman grabs his head, starts screaming and runs out the door and a truck runs over him.

That is in a roundabout way coming around to your question, Mr Kwinter. How far do we take all these issues today, as people, never mind as governments? I heard what you said about the 35,000 deaths. I have yet to see any place where somebody can prove that to me and I am not going to get into that argument.

As a matter of fact, you talk about health costs. The government of the past did a study of its own which actually showed that the money taken from the tobacco industry by far exceeds the health costs, and that was in 1986. I suggest with my numbers, the tax-take has gone up 144% since then, so I imagine there are lots of dollars there.

I do not want to belabour that particular issue, because the problem—and I agree with you in a sense, saying that governments like the tax dollars and, yes, there is a perceived health issue, and I dare say how far or how real the health issue is, some day, I would like to get the answer to.

Basically, all we have so far is comments by Dr So-and-so and another comment by Dr So-and-so. There is all kind of documentation that can be provided on both sides. I do not know where that argument is going to end, but I agree with you 100%, it is a hell of a good way to raise money and so it is 90% dollars and 10% health. That is my opinion.

The Chair: I have to go on to the third party here. As you know, most of us here are divided on the issue of smoking.

Mr Bouw: It does not surprise me.

Mr Carr: Ron is not divided; he is an avid smoker and healthier every day.

The question I have and I think you are right, all of us coming from an urban riding, growing up, we are all coming to appreciate the problems that the agricultural community is facing. In fact, I think one of our members said in the last week when we were together for a little bit. Of course he is a farmer and he said, "There is something wrong in this province when we get more per ton for garbage than we do for my crops." Unfortunately, in the greater Toronto area, he is not far off with that. We are paying more for garbage to be trucked away and dumped than we are for crops and so it is a sad situation.

But I was interested in a couple of things you touched on. In the Southeast Asia areas, Japan, where cigarette smoking is fairly heavy in terms of population, I was wondering—you commented a little bit on the different tariffs and so on—what the market is for something like that. Is it tariffs that are keeping out, transportation costs? This may be just a naïve question, but are there any potential markets in the Far East.

Mr Bouw: We do sell tobacco, by the way, to Hong Kong and to China. We have not for a long time to Japan. We sell tobacco to Taiwan. So we do have some markets there.

But the real problem, in my opinion, with those markets—sure, the cost of transportation—is the Americans do a better job of selling themselves in those countries. I am only familiar with tobacco. When I refer to having more onsite people—the province of Ontario has good people there, I am not knocking them at all; Michael Loh who is in Japan, is an excellent person and there are other excellent people. There are just not enough of them. The Michael Lohs or the Tony Stamfords or whomever they happen to be who work for the province just cannot spread themselves that thin to really have a grasp of—I mean, how any commodities or how many issues can you really deal with as one person, and do it well.

I think the province should have more onsite people to deal specifically with tobacco. I am not suggesting that, but do not expect the people who are over there to deal with every issue or every commodity product that the province has to sell over there. They cannot do it, so we need more people like that onsite.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for your submission to the standing committee on finance and economics on the budget review.

Mr Bouw: Thank you very much for giving me the opportunity.

The Chair: Thank you for travelling a little bit farther.

ONTARIO PSYCHIATRIC SURVIVORS' ALLIANCE

The Chair: The next group is the Ontario Psychiatric Survivors' Alliance. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economics on the budget review. You have a half-hour for your presentation. In that half-hour, you could possibly leave some time at the end of your presentation for questions and answers from the three parties present. If you would not mind identifying yourself for the purpose of Hansard, you may begin your presentation.

Mr Miller: I am James Miller and I am here today to speak on behalf of OPSA, the Ontario Psychiatric Survivors' Alliance, in favour of the provincial budget.

What is OPSA? The Ontario Psychiatric Survivors' Alliance is a self-help network for psychiatric survivors. OPSA has individual and group members all over Ontario.

What is a survivor? A survivor is anyone who has had serious psychiatric treatment.

Why self-help? By sharing our experiences both in and out of the mental health system, we can learn that we are not alone and not to blame for what has happened to us. In learning new ways to look at ourselves, we can begin to take control of our lives. Through OPSA you can get together with people who talk with you rather than at you; people who can really listen; people who have been where you are and got through it and can help you get through it.

What can OPSA do for you?

Support: OPSA can help you start or join a group in your area, and we can show you how to get organized and ask for funding. You can contact OPSA if you want to find out about peer support.

Self-respect: OPSA can help you feel better about yourself by providing opportunities to get involved, to make things happen and to help other survivors.

Advocacy: OPSA can help you find resources to deal with specific problems, as well as advocating for necessary changes in the mental health system.

Education: OPSA can let the public know that we are not just dangerous people. We can educate service providers and family members about what is important to us. OPSA members are available to do public speaking and media interviews and can show others how to do these things.

Alternatives: OPSA can help you create effective alternatives to current mental health services.

Communication: OPSA can help you find out how other survivors all over Ontario are dealing with personal and mental health issues. As an OPSA member, you will receive and can contribute to our newsletter.

Rights: OPSA can make sure your rights under the Ontario Mental Health Act and other laws are respected.

The funding that the government has given to us thus far has made a major difference in all psychiatric survivors' lives, because many jobs have come out of the funding for consumer-survivors. The funding has brought psychiatric survivors together to begin new lives for themselves by sending them to conferences, workshops, leadership training courses and providing consumer-survivor positions. Positions have become available with OPSA chapters across Ontario and consumer-run businesses, such as Quick-Bite Catering and Take-out downtown here in Brantford. For the first time in our lives, we feel our opinions really count regarding the many needed changes within the mental health system, and, boy, does this feel wonderful.

We believe and feel the need for continued funding is necessary to keep the psychiatric survivors' movement going. We still have a long way to go regarding the many changes that are necessary within the mental health system. By continuing your funding, we can assure you there will no longer be a need for psychiatric institutions.

We are having our annual conference in Toronto in September, called Rising Tide, and your financial assistance has made this possible for our members across Ontario to attend by providing funding. A lot of our members would not be attending because of financial reasons above and beyond their control. We will forever be indebted for your generous assistance, so on behalf of OPSA, I take this opportunity to say thank you. Your government is putting control back where it belongs, which is with the psychiatric survivors. If you need further information, please feel free to contact me at 1-519-752-4120. If I am not there, please leave a message and I will return your call.

The Acting Chair (Mr Christopherson): Thank you very much for your presentation.

Mr Miller: These are my two colleagues for support.

Mr Johns: My name is Eric Johns and I am a psychiatric survivor.

Ms McLeod: I am Margaret McLeod and I am also a psychiatric survivor.

Mr Phillips: I really appreciate your being here today. One of the things that interests me is self-help groups, and I appreciate your advice to us. I am led to believe that one of the first self-help groups was Alcoholics Anonymous. It has been enormously successful, and many other self-help groups have formed, not directly as a result of that, but it is perhaps one of the most effective forms of dealing with issues.

I am intrigued by your organization. Maybe you could just give us a little more information about whether there are chapters across the province, how many there are, how the thing works, because I have a feeling that for governments of the future, regardless of political stripe, organizations like this may offer one of the keys to dealing with issues in a very cost-effective but efficient manner.

Mr Miller: There are several chapters located across Ontario. I do not know the exact numbers right now. Head office unfortunately did not give me that information, but right now there are several, from way up north to Windsor and that surrounding area. I am representing a southwestern region today when I speak, as well as the entire organization. Funding has come down at various levels of funding, and it has really and truly made a difference with all survivors, the fact that we are getting together, banding together, setting up self-help groups with local offices within our own cities and communities.

Mr Phillips: Where would there be an office right now that helps you? Is it here in Brantford, is it in London; where would it be?

Mr Miller: Right now I am in the middle of putting a proposal in for next week. Our proposal is basically done. All that has to be done is it has to be typed. I will be heading up our local office here in Brantford as the co-ordinator, so therefore it will come on to me as the responsibility to put this proposal in. We are hoping to be located in the downtown area for accessibility for all survivors to attend.

Mr Kwinter: Could you just clarify, is a survivor anyone who has been treated by a psychiatrist or is it a special kind of person who has been treated?

Mr Miller: Our definition is, and I will quote it again, a survivor is anyone who has had or is having psychiatric treatment. It could be ongoing or it could be a two- or three-time visit. So there are a lot of people included in that definition.

Mr Kwinter: I know lots of people who have had treatment because they have had a problem and they have been treated by a psychiatrist. Some of these people I know quite well. There has to be some raison d'être for your organization where they feel that as a result of that treatment they have to do something else, as opposed to someone who, once they have been treated—I am just trying to satisfy myself as to exactly what it is that you do and what kind of people come to your organization.

Mr Miller: A lot of people, unfortunately, have had many bad experiences with the system. There have been many questions arise because of different diagnoses, etc. For me, as an example, I was misdiagnosed as a manic depressive disorder and it turned out to be sexual abuse. They were so far off the money it was incredible. For me, I am very left-wing, and I do not mind stating that, because as far as I am concerned, and this is my position, we should tear down the system and rebuild it. Too many people are falling through the cracks and they are not getting the help they need at this point in time. If we can come together to help them, why not?

Mr Kwinter: That answers in part what I was trying to find out. In other words, the people who are survivors would be people who identify among themselves that they have been through the system and they were not totally satisfied with what happened to them. I would assume if they were totally satisfied you would never hear from them because they had been cured or had the treatment that satisfied their needs and that would be the end of it.

Mr Miller: I do not believe that is true, due to the fact that we have people who are right-wing and very much in favour of the medical model and we have people who are middle-of-the-road and left-wing such as myself. So we have it represented way across the spectrum.

1540

Mr Kwinter: I am not talking politics, I am talking about people who are treated.

Mr Miller: We do have people who have never had a bad experience come out and join us, and those are the people who are the right wing in our organization. They do believe there are changes. Even though they did not have a bad experience, they are also working towards changes with us.

Mr Stockwell: I am having a difficult time understanding whether you are a self-help group or an advocacy group. The advocacy portion, as you said, would be to tear down the existing structure and rebuild it.

Mr Miller: What I have outlined there, what OPSA can do for you, we do self-help as well as advocacy.

Mr Stockwell: Then you are not receiving funding for your self-help? Alcoholics Anonymous is another self-help group that does not receive—maybe it does, but I do not think it receives government funding, does it?

Mr Phillips: No, it does not.

Mr Stockwell: So in essence, you are not receiving funding for your self-help work. That is just something you do.

Mr Miller: That is correct.

Mr Stockwell: Is the government funding then to fund your advocacy role?

Mr Miller: It is funding to help with all of those things that OPSA can do for you. By going out there and teaching per se, as myself, already a survivor, by going out there and sharing my knowledge with other survivors who are coming to us asking for help, that way in turn we are showing them how to do it and giving them alternatives to make proper choices instead of the constant medical model role.

Mr Stockwell: Would a policy of your group be to tear down the system?

Mr Miller: Not outright, no.

Mr Stockwell: That is your personal policy.

Mr Miller: That is my personal opinion.

Mr Stockwell: Do you find it difficult to receive government money from the very source that you are suggesting is operating less efficiently or improperly? There is a bit of a conflict there to me. If I were up against a project or a program opposing something, it would seem contradictory to me to take grants from them to fight with them. Do you find a bit of a conflict or contradiction there?

Mr Miller: No. As I said, I was speaking in favour.

Mr Johns: There are mental health issues in this world that we do not often recognize. For instance, I think we all have a moral imperative sort of thing, and that ans working with other people who help you follow ugh on what you start. For my money, everything that n the outside comes from the inside. That is a moral erative, mental health issue for me. There are real peoout there who have gone through political wranglings, ink is a good word to say, in their own lives, family itics, hospital politics, without the situation being made t of to the powers that be, or politicians, if you will.

ere are real mental health issues that reflect a social ironment. Politics, in a sense, has its own share of in-ting and back-biting and back-stabbing.

Mr Stockwell: It is marginal, though.

Mr Johns: Marginal. I do not speak from a lot of erience; I am not really that politically active.

Mr Stockwell: This is in fact how the group then ne together.

Mr Johns: We were trying to seek alternative health ctices that give us—

Mr Stockwell: More control.

Mr Johns: More control over our own lives.

Mr Stockwell: I see. That is a good explanation.

Mr B. Ward: I would like to thank you for coming ward and presenting your views. I think it is important t as many people as possible have the opportunity.
oking at Brantford, I think the local chapter is fairly v, is it not?

Mr Johns: It is fairly new. Just this summer we have
ne together.

Mr B. Ward: How many people would be participat-

Mr Johns: Right now, there are perhaps seven of us.

Mr Miller: That number has actually gone up over the ummer. It is now nine actual registered members here in ntford.

Mr B. Ward: That is just Brantford?

Mr Miller: Just Brantford alone. As Eric just said, we re formed back in July.

Mr B. Ward: I wish you good luck in the future.

Mr Johns: It is lots of luck we are going to need, too, ause we are all trying to gain control over our own es again. Hopefully there is life without psychiatry and hout psychiatric medication. We like to think that we live our lives responsible for our own actions instead other people masking and taking care of us. God save us
m people who have nothing better to do than help us inst our own will.

Mr Stockwell: How much money do you get in grants?

Mr Miller: I do not have actual numbers before me, our local chapter is putting a proposal in and it is for t a little over $189,000 at this point.

Mr Stockwell: Is this the one that has nine members?

Mr Miller: We will be accessing the entire commu-
y. The numbers are there to support these kinds of dols, these kinds of figures, because we will be doing a jor educational component of this program that is being it in and that will be included in our proposal going in.

Mr Stockwell: Okay. But right now you have nine members and you are applying for $189,000 in funding.

Mr Miller: That is correct.

Mr Stockwell: You are hoping to get more members.

Mr Miller: We will be having more members in the near future but right now we are going to have to be doing major education. That is the key.

Mr Stockwell: Has the funding been approved?

Mr Miller: Not yet, because I am in the middle of submitting it next week.

Mr Stockwell: Thank you.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for coming before this committee.

ONTARIO WOMEN'S ACTION COALITION

The Chair: The next group to come forward is the Ontario Women's Action Coalition. I would like to welcome you here to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the budget review. You will have one half-hour for your presentation and perhaps you can leave some time at the end for a question and answer period. If you would not mind identifying yourself for the purposes of Hansard, and you may begin.

Ms Maher: Good afternoon. My name is Janet Maher, and with me is Miriam Edelson. We are from the Ontario Women's Action Coalition. That is a group relatively newly formed which co-ordinates the activity of equality-seeking groups here in Ontario, which includes women's centres, women's groups across the province and women's committees of other groups like unions and professional associations. It also includes a number of other provincial organizations that work on single or narrower issues like violence against women, health care, and so on.

What I would like to do is speak very briefly, because in fact we are more interested in responding to questions from the committee. I would like to begin by referring to the notes we have prepared for you and then Miriam will add a few comments at the end of my presentation.

1550

Thank you for your invitation to appear before the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. What we have here and we want to refer to are some of the representations we made to the Treasurer of Ontario in February as he was doing his pre-budget consultations for this budget we are speaking of now.

At that time we raised four main issues with him, as follows:

First of all, the current spending priorities, which I think was the main issue we wanted to raise with him.
Without dwelling on that issue, I think we pointed out that women recognize the constraints imposed by the recession. None the less, we urged the government to act immediately and resolutely on a few, what we thought were very critical, money issues, as follows: (1) raising social assistance rates over the next two years to the minimum guidelines of adequacy recommended by the Metropolitan Toronto Social Planning Council; (2) meeting, as a minimum, the NDP election promises on child care, housing and community support programs to eliminate violence against women; and (3) implementing public funding for the interim pay equity adjustments that had been spoken about to workers in the chronically exploited voluntary social service sector, with a planning mechanism for achieving and funding full pay equity in that sector by 1995, which we understand is the present mandate of the Pay Equity Act.

With regard to other areas of chronic underfunding—post-secondary education, training and employment development, and health care—we urged the Treasurer to formulate and implement a strategy for restoring 1980 levels of service, and funding to maintain them, by the year 2000. We think that was a fairly modest proposal and we would like to speak to you again about that.

Second, we asked him to think about planning for the future. Even last February we thought there were some signs already apparent to suggest that the current recession would not always be with us. We were already witnessing social and economic projections produced by the government of Ontario indicating that we would be facing significant labour shortages in as little as five years, notwithstanding the free trade agreement, notwithstanding all sorts of other federal and provincial actions. In that situation, we encouraged the minister and his staff to begin to take a long view in its program planning.

We think that, in particular, the government needs to ensure that measures are put in place now, even in the midst of the recession, to ensure that women do not continue to bear an undue burden in times of economic slump. We think there are a number of measures, not all of them costly in terms of government expenditure, like employment equity, progressive and flexible family leave policies, pay equity and child care, which are central to the equal participation of women in the labour force and, in a situation of scarce labour such as we may be looking at as soon as 1995, could be the competitive edge that Ontario can offer employers.

In our view, available funds should be allocated to be more women-friendly and sensitive to the broader equality objectives of the government. In particular, we emphasized the need for the government and its respective partners to ensure that the structure of transfer programs continues to advance equality objectives, as noted above. I think there are particular kinds of things. I understand the new government is also looking at implementing a wide range of training programs, but these programs we support need also to take into account, for instance, employment equity objectives that the government talks about in some of its other departments.

Third—and I think this is the point that we probably agree primarily with the members of the government on—accommodating regressive federal fiscal and social measures. The recent federal Bill C-21 amendments in unemployment insurance to reduce benefits and the benefit period for most categories of claimant will not only discriminate against the most vulnerable of our population, a lot of those being women; it will also add pressure to strained municipal and provincial social assistance rolls just as those municipalities and provincial entities are coming to grips with the worst casualties of the recession and accommodating the labour adjustments resulting from the implementation of the free trade agreement.

Similarly, the erosion of federal responsibility for transfers supporting health care, education and social services spending in the name of federal deficit reduction is small consolation to ordinary taxpayers or probably to provincial and municipal governments, which must deal more directly with the real needs for services. The ruling last week of the Supreme Court of Canada on the legality of federal Bill C-69 was particularly dismaying to us since it legitimates unilaterally the devolution of funding responsibility without any room for consultation or co-ordination to minimize the impacts of such devolution to the lower levels of government.

We think Ontario will need to make some serious decisions, not only in representing adequately the constitutional aspirations of its residents in Canada but also in coming up with short- and long-term revenue strategies to maintain the standards of health care, education, and social services Ontarians have come to expect and we think they should continue to have.

While we were dismayed that the government chose not to move significantly on any of its major tax reform proposals in the Agenda for People, we were encouraged by the Treasurer's appointment of a Fair Tax Commission. We think it is critical, particularly in the context of current constitutional discussions as well as a decade of successive and incremental funding freezes at the federal level, to review policies and strategies for revenue generation that will ensure equality for all Ontarians in the year 2000.

We think the proposed structure of representative working groups on the Fair Tax Commission on most of the major tax issues has the potential for public consensus building and we think it will be essential that those avenues are used if we are to meet the challenges of the next decade and into the next century.

The final point we want to speak to today relates to consultation. I think we, like a number of other community groups and popular groups, were in agreement with the new government in its objectives to involve all sectors of the community fully in public consultation on the future of Ontario. At the same time we think it is quite important for the new government to develop and implement a strategy for the support of voluntary-sector advocacy.

We indicated to the Treasurer and we have also indicated to a number of members of the new government our willingness to consult on a plan to make available resources for constituencies traditionally underrepresented in political life to facilitate the research and communication which would actually allow their participation in the democratic processes, for example, through funding for advocacy groups on the plan of the federal women's program for fairness in funding.

We take seriously the commitment of the government to consult broadly with all groups in Ontario. We thank you for hearing us today. I think we want particularly to encourage the committee, as it thinks about having public hearings at other times and places, how short notice and short preparation time have the effect of limiting most of icipation in the democratic process of volunteer-driven organizations like our own.

Ms Edelson: I just want to speak briefly to two points mentioned in our brief. The first is when we are talking about measures which would allow for greater participation of women in the labour force. We underline, I think, in our presentation that these are not necessarily high-cost measures. I am thinking of things like more flexibility for employers for family responsibilities, be it child care problems, where there is a child sick, or where we are talking about elder care, which more and more is a concern for people, certainly of our generation and probably most of ours as well, in terms of the responsibilities we increasingly have with parents who become ill and so on.

It is our view that, certainly in the case of a recession, those services are not available for women, more and more women are kept outside the workforce. That is not only to anybody's advantage in terms of trying to build the economy. None of these things have to be very costly, I think the government can play a very strong role in terms of encouraging employers, for their own good, really, to provide these kind of flexibilities to the workforce.

A number of these things were discussed in some depth recently at a conference which I guess the women's—

Ms Maher: Work and family life.

Ms Edelson: The work and family life conference. It is sharing the caring work and family responsibility—

Ms Maher: Yes.

Ms Edelson: —which the women's directorate was involved in. So we would be quite interested in talking about one of those initiatives with you if you are interested.

The final point I wanted to stress as well is this issue of consultation. Certainly there are traditionally many groups in society who have not been involved in any kind of detailed consultation with government. In our own sector, dealing with women's issues, the advisory council dealing with women's issues is now beginning to conduct quite an extensive consultation, which we look forward to participating in. Part of the mandate they have been given is to fully examine over the next five or six months whether or not there should be such a council existing at this time, a kind of buffer that has existed over the last several years between groups like our own and a whole number of men's groups and government itself.

I do not think we have a fixed and fast position on this. It is something that really has to be looked at. There is no question as to whether there should be a group like this doing research or whether it should be replaced with something that is quite explicitly an advocacy group for women that is doing more than simply buffering but really speaking out and arguing on behalf of women's groups, whether it is for funding or for legislation and social policy reform. But again, that is an issue that I wanted to underline and we would be happy to discuss with you.

Mr B. Ward: I would like to thank you for your presentation and coming to Brantford. We have had some presentations from business people that talk about competitiveness and the cost of doing business in Ontario. They most always mention the cost of pay equity and employment equity as a concern to their operations. What answer would you have to business people or organizations when they discuss competitiveness and the fact that pay equity and employment equity may be adding an economic burden to their overall operation?

Ms Edelson: First of all, we should make a distinction. I do not think employment equity has to cost an employer any more money if you are going to bring in people of colour and aboriginal people and disabled. Certainly there are some costs related to making a workplace accessible to a person who is in a wheelchair or providing equipment that allows a blind or deaf person to do the same job you or I might do, but I do not think those are excessive costs when you look at the whole range of costs facing employers. I think we should make a distinction between that, which is an issue of basic fairness in our society, one of equity right across the board for people, regardless of whether they have different abilities than we might.

Pay equity is that this is an issue whose time has come. You have certainly seen all the reports in the Toronto Star that a zookeeper was making the same or actually making more than a person who is raising our children in a child care centre. I think our society has finally taken the position that the work that has been traditionally undervalued, typically done by women, has to be valued more. If Ontario is leading the way to some extent and saying to employers, "You've got to pay up; you've got to make sure these people have the same ability to pay for the gas for their car and the rent for their home as anybody else," then I think that is quite valid and Ontario should be proud that it is pushing that.

Most forward-thinking employers know that if you pay people a good wage, and in particular, if you pay traditionally undervalued employees a good wage, you are going to get a lot back. I think we have to look at it in terms of improving our competitive advantage.

Ms Maher: Particularly with regard to pay equity, I think our information is already beginning to come out that the women who are being benefited by pay equity are the same women who a year or two ago were going to be family benefits recipients or welfare recipients and so on and so forth. What we are doing is implementing a strategy which will, in the long term, do us a great deal of good because it will give these women a bit of self-esteem, as well as a bit of money that will assist them to raise their children and keep them off the welfare rolls.

Ms M. Ward: Your brief presents us with your recommendations to the Treasurer, basically, and some of the issues you are raising with him—social assistance rates, and you are talking about housing and child care and pay equity, which you were just speaking of. I would like to ask you what your feeling is about the measures in the budget on some of these things, such as the social assistance, $215 million towards that, the allocations for the prevention of violence against women and the shelters and so on, and the housing, the 10,000 additional units there. What do you feel? Is this at least a start in the right direction? You might feel that it is not enough, but do you think it is a good start?

Ms Maher: I guess our position is that probably most women and most men in our society would rather have a job than have social assistance. I think, though, that we have come to the point in Ontario, and I hope in the rest of Canada, that where jobs are not available we are not consigning people to the junk heap. We think the social assistance measures that were announced by the minister, Ms Akande, on 1 May were important first steps. They go nowhere near reaching the kinds of recommendations we have made yet, but I think we have to kind of recognize that in this current situation it is not the worst thing in the world. As I say, I think that some of the other measures, like moving on pay equity and moving in the direction of severance and so on, provide other kinds of support. In the long term that will have been demonstrated to be the most important step that could have been made at this time.

Ms Edelson: Just briefly about the measures with respect to violence against women and children, certainly the initiatives that have been taken are important and they are important first steps. I think I have an answer in a similar vein. I was recently part of a conference on violence against women put on by the Canadian Auto Workers union. Anne Swarbrick, Minister without Portfolio responsible for women's issues, spoke there and received quite a warm reception, as you might expect. But specifically, we were pleased to see the money that is there now for shelters that was not there before, and for education and for materials and so on. I think that is quite exciting.

If we are looking at statistics that show that, there are not that many of us in the room, but probably as many as one of the women who are in this room will be or has been affected by violence in some fashion. It suggests the extent of this problem and that we are really just beginning to take it seriously and deal with it. I hope we will see some further measures and funding and that it is more important over the next couple of years.

Mr Phillips: I really do appreciate your being here today. Did you fly out from Toronto or are you from here?

Ms Edelson: We came on Highway 403, from Toronto.

Mr Phillips: Oh, good—not that you are from Toronto, but it is a long distance.

Ms Maher: It had been our intention to have the member of our committee from Cambridge with us today, but she was not able to be.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the advocacy work you are doing. As a Liberal, I know our government was moving on many of the issues, I thought, on pay equity and what not. The Agenda for People is a kind of blueprint I carry around because that was the basis on which the government got elected. I think some people are prepared to accept that the recession may have been even deeper than they thought when they issued this. They said, "Ontario is now in a recession."

My question to your organization is, what should be the timetable for them to implement the program they laid out for pay equity, which they said they would pass legislation on to cover all women for the child care, the social assistance rates, the co-op housing and the various programs they outlined in here?

Ms Edelson: I guess I am prepared to give them until the end of this mandate. I would prefer, and would have preferred, for it all to be in that first budget, but I have been around political life long enough to know that it does not work that way. Also, we are in the deepest recession and period of economic restructuring, with quite serious permanent job loss of our manufacturing sector, but I do not think we can expect all of it all at once. If it is two years from now and there has not been a hell of a lot of improvement, there is going to be a different point of view coming from organizations like ours.

Mr Phillips: The present Premier called our Premier a liar when he did not implement one of the probably 60 election promises, so we as Liberals are always just mildly sensitive in that area. I have never called the Premier a liar but he called Mr Peterson a liar.

My other question relates to something you mentioned about whether advocacy groups should be part of government or independent of government. I did not quite understand that. I think you were alluding to something there. Maybe you can just elaborate a little on what you were driving at.

Ms Edelson: I was speaking about the advisory council on women's issues which now has a mandate to examine what its role has been historically and what it should be. The question comes up, is it appropriate now to have an organization like that which typically has done research—that has been their main role, which is useful; it has a role—or should it be replaced by the group that is quite clearly an advocacy group for women's issues and women's affairs? That would make one think about what the make-up of that group would be. Do you elect such a group from a constituency like ours, not just our organization but women who are active on these issues? Across the board, do you continue to have appointees, and what do you not want?

I guess what we were very clear on is that you do not want a duplication of services. If you have an Ontario women's directorate that does good research, you have it already so why are we funding another organization. Maybe that other organization should play a different role. If you look at what some of the shortcomings are currently—and I guess one of them would be the extent to which we are able to reach into the communities across Ontario, not just Toronto, and meet the needs of women who are at home who have specific needs, women who are disabled, women who are part of aboriginal reserves or whatever—are we really reaching those people? If not, then I think we have to look at how we go about doing that. If we are talking about democratizing structures, I would like to see us thinking about it in those terms and specifically with the notion of advocacy in mind. It is hard to be as specific as you would like me to be, perhaps, but they are really just starting their deliberations now.

The Chair: Thank you for coming before this committee with your presentation.

The committee adjourned at 1610.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Monday 26 August 1991

The committee met at 0914 in the Holiday Inn, Kingston.

1991-92 BUDGET

Resuming consideration of the 1991-92 provincial budget.

The Chair: I call this committee to order, being August 26 here in the beautiful city of Kingston. We have the new members with the committee. I would like to introduce them.

I would like to welcome John Cleary and Noble Bénéneuve, Mr Sterling, Mr Wilson from Kingston and Mr MacKinnon. Welcome to the committee.

JOHN YOUNG

The Chair: The first presenter is Mr John Young. You have 15 minutes for your total presentation. Try to save the time at the end for questions from the three parties.

Dr Young: How long should I allow for questions?

The Chair: If you run the whole 15 minutes, then no one has a chance to ask any questions of you.

Mr Villeneuve: That is a mixed blessing.

Dr Young: You have a written document from me, but I may condense that just slightly in the interests of time. I want to say simply that I am speaking as a private citizen and in that capacity I want to comment on the recent Ontario budget. I did an introductory course in economics when I was an undergraduate, but I am certainly not an economist and I am going to leave discussion of that kind of data to others.

I want simply to comment on the budget in terms of its effect upon people. First I need to say that I do not like deficits. I do not think any of us do. I do not think that Mr Laughren likes them. I believe that he too would prefer to present a budget that showed a surplus. I know—I think all of us know—that government debt eventually has to be paid. All of us eventually have to cover our liabilities.

That being said, I do think that there are times when a government needs to run a deficit. It does not run a deficit that puts the province in such a financial straitjacket that it can never repay its debt. But any government, including the present one, has to consider three things when it strikes a budget. First, what ought it to do, given the platform upon which it has been elected? Second, what kind of society do we as the citizens of Ontario want? Third, what can we afford as a province?

I want to say again that while I do not like deficits, I do think that this was just the time for a budget of the kind Mr Laughren presented. If we had the per capita debt of the federal government or of some other provinces in this country, Mr Laughren could not have brought down that kind of budget and we in this province would have had to suffer more in the current recession or depression—you can choose which of those terms you like—than we have.

Because of this province's financial situation, Mr Laughren had the opportunity to shield us from some of the worst effects of the current economic situation in our country. He chose to do so. In making that choice, I believe Mr Laughren was faithful to his convictions and to the platform from upon which he and other members of Mr Rae's government ran.

I still remember hearing the details of Mr Laughren's budget late in the evening of budget day and two things struck me that day. The first was the size of the deficit—that struck us all. The second thing was that it was the most honest budget that I had heard in a long time. As I note here, I was grateful for his honesty that night, and I still am. I want to applaud him for it.

All of you on the committee are politicians and you know better than I that we live in a time when politicians are not much respected. Indeed, the public esteem for politicians is very low. I believe one reason for that lack of support is the feeling many of us have that politicians rarely level with us and tell us just how things are. They try to paint a rosy picture that puts them in the best possible light. They also seem to believe that we, the members of the general public, will be too dense to see what they are doing. What struck me about Mr Laughren's budget, as I read it and read about its details and listened to commentary about it during the several days that followed its presentation, was its candour.

I recognize that a government's budget, like an individual's budget, is composed of the best estimates that you can make. In a government's budget, like in an individual's budget, events can conspire to reduce revenue or to increase expenditures in unexpected ways, but even as I try to be realistic in my estimating, I expect a government in its budget to do the same.

One of the things that much impressed me about Mr Laughren's budget was his honesty. His estimates about revenue, both in the current fiscal year and in future years, seemed to be realistic. His honesty and his realism contrasted sharply for me with the last several federal government budgets. While I disagreed with Mr Wilson's approach, I was less troubled by his taxation and spending policies than by what seems to me at least to be the basic dishonesty of much of that budget. It presented estimates for the future, guesstimates about inflation, about interest rates, that were simply unrealistic to a plain, ordinary citizen. When I looked at that budget and looked at the figures upon which he was making his estimates and listened not only to economists but also to persons of widely differing positions on the political spectrum, all of them were saying the figures would not wash, and Mr Wilson had to know that. It makes you wonder why one would do that kind of budget. Does he think all of us do not understand?

I use that as an illustration not to rail against the current federal government but simply to make a point about Mr Laughren's budget. In my estimation at least, he has tried to be realistic in his estimates not only about this year's deficit but also about the deficit over the next few years. I would much rather have a provincial Treasurer who gives us those kinds of projections—projections that show a higher deficit than any of us, including Mr Laughren, would want—than a Treasurer or a Finance minister who will not deliver the straight goods.

I think that Mr Laughren and the other members of his government, all of you, will have a difficult time over the next few years. The Canadian economy is not in good shape. I hope it will improve—we all do—but that improvement almost certainly will not be great. This government has promised to work, will have to work, to bring the deficit level down as it has promised. Mr Laughren and his colleagues, by the way they have handled this budget, have restored some of my faith in politicians as persons you actually can trust to treat you as an intelligent human being and to tell you the truth.

I want to speak about this budget from another perspective as well. Up until now I have simply talked about my own reaction to its honesty, but along with comments about its realism, I might have added that it was also honest in trying to put into practice, so far as possible, the platform upon which this government was elected. That too is a sign of honesty. But at the end of the day, budgets are not just figures or numbers about which you and I and all the rest of us can argue and score political points. Budgets impact human beings very directly, because the figures on the page are translated into very human services that are or are not delivered to those of us who are residents of the province. Those figures are not remote or abstract. They have very real effects. They shape the kind of society we will have and the kind of Ontario in which you and I will live.

At least as I see it, Mr Laughren that day had two choices. He could continue to deliver roughly the same level of services that existed under the previous Liberal government, knowing that to do simply that in the current economic situation would greatly increase the deficit. After all, with unemployment greatly increased and welfare rolls greatly expanded, fewer people were working, paying taxes, and more people had need. One choice was to do exactly what he did, namely, to do what he could in a limited way to respond to the needs of people during this time of recession or depression. Just to maintain existing services in the area of medical care, education and social services would have required expenditures close to what this budget has projected; that is, just to maintain services at existing levels. For as I have said, the present economic situation has put far more people on the welfare rolls. There has been some new spending in this budget, but not very much.

Mr Laughren had one other choice. It has been taken by some other governments in this country. It would have been to balance the budget during this time of recession or depression, to balance it by cutting expenditures at the very time when the citizens of this province have the greatest need for those services, at a time when more and more people have lost their jobs. He could have cut back on social services. He could have cut back on education funding and thereby forced municipalities to raise property taxes in order to simply maintain services. He could have told hospitals to do with much less and thereby forced hospital closures, maybe even hospital closures.

Budgets, at the end of the day, are more than numbers. We can say, and I think all of us do, "We'd like a balanced budget." We can say, "Forget the current economic situation, just balance it." But are we prepared for the cost of that, for the kind of society that measure would produce? Do we, for instance, want to see about a quarter of the hospitals shut down or a quarter of the beds? Do we want to see schools closed or classes with 40 to 50 students per teacher? When I was in high school I grew up in a different province and I had that situation, 45 kids in a class, and it is not a good educational model. Do we want to drastically lower the delivery of social services and welfare funding for those families who are genuinely needy? That is almost all of them who receive welfare.

I, at least, do not want to see those steps taken and I do not think most of us do. But also, at least, I see no way that Mr Laughren could have balanced his budget in the present economic circumstance without making those kinds of decisions. Those who advocate a balanced budget at this point in time will also have to tell us what kind of cuts they would make and where they would make them to bring that about.

I am just going to speak personally. You can read greater detail later about something that was very much shaping for me. In the late 1970s and early 1980s, I spent five years living in Dallas studying. It was a wonderful program, but those five years certainly changed me and how I looked at society. They made me think about the kind of society in which I wanted to live and the kind of society which I had grown up in Canada. That society is one like the one we have now.

There was something that used to happen in Dallas about once a year that, to a Canadian, is simply inconceivable. A poor couple—and they would usually, though not always, be Mexican-American because there would be the language component as well—would have a baby or a very young child become critically ill during the night. The family couple would go to the nearest hospital and it would be private, and the hospital, of course, without their having private health insurance, would not treat their baby. The state would be helpful in the sense of giving them directions to the nearest public hospital, because that would usually be across the city somewhere. The couple would try another close hospital and they would try four or five before they finally reached a public hospital, by which time their child would be too ill and the child's life could not be saved.

Inevitably, as these things would be written up in the paper, there would be a lot of outcry. It was always the case that if that nearest hospital could have treated the child, the child would have lived or at least would probably have lived. That situation, as I say, if you are a Canadian, is simply incredible. In the literal sense of that word it is unbelievable.

One reason why I am here today is that I do not want to see us move to becoming that kind of society—not wanting to suggest that any of you want that either. But if Mr. Laughren had balanced this budget, as some people have advocated, then we would be there. I think a balanced budget in the current economic time would have required a way of cutbacks, moving a ways down that road. Frankly, I do not want to see that. It is not the kind of Canada in which I grew up, in another province. It is not the kind of Ontario that I have had the pleasure to be part of for the last six years.

I want to thank you very much for your time and your attention.

Mr Cleary: I will be very brief. You told us a little bit about your background and where you have been. I want to know what you are doing now.

Dr Young: As of a month ago, I joined the faculty of Queen's Theological College. Prior to that I was in parish ministry.

Mr Sterling: I am somewhat concerned that I think you are misled to some degree, because no political party in the Ontario Legislature has advocated a balanced budget.

Dr Young: Certainly. Okay. I may be mistaken in that, but it has been my understanding that Mr Harris, the leader of the Progressive Conservative Party, has put forward a proposal recently in speeches saying that we need to have a balanced budget at least once every three years. Further, there have been many presentations which have been made in the public press which have been very critical of the level of the Ontario deficit, suggesting that it should have been, though not balanced, you are correct, very close to zero in a way that would talk about the kinds of cuts that I think would quite devastate social services.

Mr G. Wilson: This is my first time on this committee, and if all the presentations are at your level, it is going to be an impressive undertaking. I like especially your points about the honesty. You say here the Canadian economy is in great shape and hopefully it will improve, but you are sure that it will. I was wondering if you have some ideas about the best way of proceeding in this uncertain time.

Dr Young: I am not an economist and in that one I am uncertain. I think there are going to be some very difficult decisions ahead. With the kinds of budgets Mr Laughren is talking about, his projections of revenue, as I say, seem realistic. I think we have to try, as best we can with resources we have, to maintain the level of services we have.

KINGSTON INSURANCE BROKERS ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Mr Bickerton, from the Kingston Insurance Brokers Association, would you come forward, please. I have a total of one half-hour.

Mr Bickerton: I appreciate the opportunity to appear before you today. I am standing in for Mr John Vogelzang, who is the current president of the Kingston Insurance Brokers Association. Unfortunately he is ill and unable to attend, but I have been asked, as past-president, to do his presentation.

The circulations that are going around are a copy of the text which I will read to you, as well as a copy of the survey, which was commissioned by the Kingston Insurance Brokers Association, by Queen's University school of business specifically to address the insurance-related aspects of what my presentation will consist of. First I will address a couple of points towards the end of my submission. I got the call on Friday afternoon to do this and I was not exactly sure what you wanted to hear, but I made a few notes specifically about the budget.

Every business person with whom I have spoken since the budget was announced has come out absolutely, totally against such colossal deficits. I and the fellow business people with whom I have spoken, and a lot of regular, down-home folk in my small town, are just completely revolted by the kind of debt that we are going to be inheriting at the end of the current mandate. We just cannot in any circumstance conceive of such a colossal loading on our kids. We have heard it from the federal level and now we are getting it straight in the ear by the provincial level, and everybody to whom I have spoken is really fed up. That is point 10 in my submission. We really feel—I feel personally—very strongly that the government should be run like a business, where losses are simply unacceptable. I am, by my own admission, a little bit right of almost anybody you can imagine, but I really feel strongly about that.

I will address more specifically the auto-insurance-related situation, about which I have spoken with Mr Wilson on a couple of occasions, and we have another meeting shortly. This does not appear to have been given a great deal of credence in the budget preparations. The cost to the consumer of taking over this industry has been estimated to be at least in the hundreds of millions, if not billions of dollars, depending on how many court actions the government is faced with.

I will press ahead, though, and just go through this in logical order.

The Queen's University school of business survey sets forth a very high rejection level of public involvement in the auto insurance business. I guess you have to step back and ask why Premier Rae is attempting to take the business over. It was meant to be in the interests of the consumers of insurance. You will have to bear with me a moment. I think it is page 4, table 1. If you look at the number of people who expect lower prices, it is in the centre category of table 1; 28% of the population that we surveyed indicate they expect to see lower prices. The next box down, right immediately below that, says that the people who expect improved service constitute 15% of the polled people. Well, 28% and 15% do not look to me to be a public reaction that they are going to be better served by a government program.

I will not bore you with the rest of the details. I will leave you to look through that on your own, but there appears to be an overwhelming rejection of public ownership by the people we polled in Kingston. That was done, by the way, as you will see in the preface to the report, only of automobile drivers. We did not poll people on the street who might not have anything to do with automobile insurance.

Item 2 in my report talks about the job losses that you might have already read about. We have a potential of 8,000 net jobs lost in the province, 4,000 from insurance companies and 4,000 from brokers and agents. In Kingston alone, by a rather accurate headcount among the various offices, we have 100 female jobs, highly trained jobs, many single-parents earners, but highly trained people who have been in the industry an average of almost 10 years, which is a significant tenure, and those 100 jobs are going to be sacrificed. There is absolutely, unequivocally no question about that. I would dare say that if another industry in Kingston with 100 of the female population was being terminated, it would definitely get someone's attention.

Equity in business: We as brokers and agents develop over many years an equity value in our business, some of which heretofore had been placed on the automobile insurance component of our particular businesses. I have set out in item 3 some of the variations that have occurred since the September election. That has netted out to an erosion of the equity value of our brokerages to the tune of about 30%, depending on the size and mixture of business within that brokerage office. It is anywhere from 30% to 60%, in fact, but in the city of Kingston I have been reasonably conservative in estimating that value loss to be something between $8 million and $10 million. That is just as though the government expropriated and stole 35% or 40% of your RRSP fund, because we as brokers rely on that equity value eventually to sell and fund our pensions. I do not imagine there are a lot of people in this room who would appreciate having 30% or 40% of their RRSP fund stolen.

The local chambers of commerce have come out strongly on the side of leaving the thing in private hands. Mayors of local cities have definitely come out strongly opposed to public takeover. Of 21 mayors interviewed by brokers across the province, only 6% favour public ownership, while 88% prefer private ownership.

Consumers basically are largely content with the Ontario motorist protection plan, which has some foibles in it, there is no question, but it has been a learning curve over the last 12 months since it has been implemented. There are some changes that should be implemented in that program, but consumers are much more content—and I see them every day; some of them have had very serious claims—with the situation of the OMPP than they had been under the old tort system where litigation goes on ad nauseam and no one benefits, basically.

The Ontario Insurance Commission now, I am sure many of you realize, controls all the pricing and the product wording of all the automobile insurers in the province. That is a government-run commission which must approve rate increases, decreases and any policy wording changes. Within the mandate of the current government it has total control over the automobile insurance industry now from the standpoint of wording and price. By wording, I mean whether it is fault or no-fault and what the individual endorsements and things on policies say. There is absolutely no question that the government currently, without spending one farthing and without costing one job, can change anything in that auto insurance commission. It can affect the price, it can affect the coverage, and it does not cost any jobs and it does not cost any money. I would ask the your committee record the fact that there does not have to be a ballooning of what is already a nauseous amount budget deficit to accommodate this situation.

Item 7 is a bit of speculation on my part, but I have in fact heard it from one insurance company executive, and there are obviously two sides to the issue, but if the trade lobby by the US insurers does not work and is rejected at some hearing, some US insurers are contemplating lobbying their own political people to reject at the border the reciprocity that now exists between US insurers and Canadian insurers in recognizing each other's jurisdiction. When you cross the border now, you do not have to buy any insurance; your Ontario slip is perfectly valid in New York state or wherever. It may be idle speculation but if an awful lot of insurers get shot square in the ear and lose their value of business in Canada, there is a lot of speculation that the reciprocity may come to a quick end and you would be crossing the border as though going into Mexico, where you have to buy Mexican insurance. I do not know if that will ever come to pass, but it is certainly a threat that is there.

On the next page, Insight Canada research shows that 21% of Ontarians feel prices will be lower under a public system and 16% say service will improve. Those numbers are not terribly different from the Kingston numbers that I read out a few moments ago. Certainly neither one is an overwhelming recognition that government plans are going to be better. If Premier Rae is suggesting that a program will be for the benefit of consumers, I am not sure which consumers he means. If he is talking about 16% then that is certainly not a majority.

Again, last week I heard within the industry that there is already work going on to procure public office space for the new public corporation. I do not know if that is true, but I am sure those in the places of power must be aware of those things, but there is a lot of rumour going around that it is already under way.

Item 9 you may look at as a bit controversial, but in the early stages of the development of eastern Europe it was thought that a multidistribution outlet system was terribly inefficient, and I would submit that Premier Rae is looking at the automobile insurance industry as being inefficient because there are 100-and-some-odd carriers in Ontario all representing executive salaries that could quickly be eliminated and so on. That same thought process went through eastern Europe in thinking about bread, bakeries and what have you where there were so many on the street that it was inefficient: "Let's make one." I think in the past week we have seen the ultimate conclusion of that wisdom would ask that this be looked upon carefully.

I have not heard anyone speak positively about the budget deficit financing. The accumulation of debt is just total beyond belief. One year you may look at a $9-billion or $10-billion deficit as being something that, if we were going to war, may be necessary. But let's not do it for five running years. It is just beyond any concept of reasonableness.

Premier Rae, in a recent interview by Maclean's magazine, and it is also in your enclosures, stated in answer to clean's question: "In making policy, do you ever have say no to the activist groups that helped elect you?" e's reply was: "That's a reality. We are elected to represent the broadest public interest. Even if there is something has been in your program for a long time, if you reach conclusion that it's not in the public interest to do it, then have a responsibility to say, 'I've changed my mind.' at is the sole test, not what was in your program 10 rs ago or what you said in a speech in 1985. You end up appointing some people who worked for you. And you re to say, 'I'm sorry.'"

I would submit, ladies and gentlemen, that this is a ation where the insurance industry is coming to you l saying, "We don't have any question telling you that 're an activist group and we're a lobbyist group and 're a self-interest group. All we're doing is saying leave alone. We don't want your money. We don't want you spend public money. We don't want to lose all these s. We want you to save money and save jobs and leave alone."

Surely that is better than having an activist group com-along and saying, "We're desperately out of money. need umpteen jillion dollars, and we're going to create jobs out of it." Surely Premier Rae's own quotation ould come to mind that says: "I'm sorry. I've changed mind. It might have been valid 10 years ago, but it isn't y more. We can't afford it. We have $10 billion on our ck now, and we don't need any more."

Thank you for the opportunity to come and see you ay. I would like to entertain any questions that come up.

Mr Sterling: I will ask the first one. Thank you very ch for making your presentation. In my talk with my stituents in Carleton and eastern Ontario, their reaction he budget is the same as yours.

With regard to the auto insurance issue, my party does t disagree, of course, and you know that. We are on ord as such. We think it should be left in private hands. o not think government needs to go into anything more n it already is. Perhaps we are already into too many ngs that we cannot run properly. But this government s, for two elections at least, maybe three, made the auto urance issue a cornerstone of its election, perhaps in 87 more than in 1990. Given the political constraints t they have, what would you recommend to Premier e? When I heard Peter Kormos carry the can, so to eak, when OMPP came in—the Ontario motorists pro- tion plan—he stood for 24 hours and said that his party, w the governing party, would restore the right to sue. emier Rae has to find some kind of compromise, and in onstructive manner. What would you suggest he do?

Mr Bickerton: That is an excellent question, and I nk there are a couple of things he could do. Bringing ck—and this was Mr Kormos's lobby—the entitlement tort and the ability to sue is a very expensive procedure. is well-documented that it could cost up to 30% more emium if the insurers were to bring back the ability to e. You say, "Why didn't the rates go up 30% before?" ey did not go up 30% because nobody would allow it. The mpetition would not allow it and the political lobbying would not allow it, but companies were bleeding to death because of the tort thing.

I believe the best situation would be some movement in the level of what is called the threshold, and I think maybe you are all familiar with this threshold that is a bit of a nebulous thing right now. There are not a lot of cases that we know of yet that are going to penetrate the thresh- old. It is possible that some movement in the threshold would accommodate a lot of the perceived inequities of the no-fault system.

It has been argued that the level of compensation on a weekly basis is inadequate. I would submit that the level of Ontario compensation is vastly greater than any other juris- diction in Canada, despite what a lot of people have said. There is no other jurisdiction, British Columbia, Manitoba and Saskatchewan included, where the benefits are any- thing like in Ontario. If you want to bump them up, bump them up, or index them. Do whatever you want, but leave it so there is some profit motive. Profit is not a four-letter word. Even the way I spell profit, it is not a four-letter word, and it should never be considered a four-letter word. If profit is bad, then run out and take over all the bakeries and take over all the steel mills and wipe out profit.

Mr Kwinter: They are doing it.

Mr Bickerton: And see what comes down the pike. It ain't pretty. So mess around with the coverages, if you wish. Be seen to be fairer to people by indexing them or whatever, but having done that, be prepared to accept higher premiums, because there is no free lunch. Nothing comes for nothing.

Mr Jamison: It is an interesting document that you read today, Mr Bickerton.

I would like to have you expand, if you will, on point 11. Point 11 reads, "I feel that the government should run more like a business where losses are unacceptable and not tolerated." Knowing that the budget has been out since April 29, that the document has been well looked at by various organizations, including your own, I would like you to expand on that to give this committee an idea about where your thoughts are on the budget and how we could accomplish budget levels that are either balanced or greatly reduced at this point in time, understanding that this government, by standing still, would have incurred a tremendous deficit in the first place. I glean from your document that there would have had to have been many cuts, and I wonder where, in your mind, those cuts should have taken place.

Mr Bickerton: I am not a politician and I do not know the absolute details of the budget spendings, but if you are faced with the situation where the expenditures are grow- ing—let's just nail one, which is public welfare. I would have a very difficult time voting for anything but some reduction in the ability for people to get welfare. I know in our small town, there are an awful lot of welfare recipients who really are not entitled to it. They are welfare recipients because it is convenient, and frankly, that violates me.

I prefaced my comments earlier indicating that I was a little bit right wing, and I do not apologize for that. All I am saying is that if you are faced with revenues less than your expenditures, you have to chop them off. And you may have to be seen to be unacceptably brutal about it, but the fact of life is that if it is not there, do not spend it.

I think that you have to realize, as politicians, that you are public trustees. You are not elected to throw money up against the wall. You are elected to spend my money and your money in a prudent manner. Now, if I, as a trustee of a public purse, or a trustee of your insurance premiums, which I am on a daily basis, overspend my trust money, do you know what happens to me? The government puts me out of business. In one stroke of a pen, I am out of business. I think that is great. I think that is a super idea. Just as we have seen the colossal debacles in the banks where they, as trustees of people's moneys, have gone into things that have gotten them in big trouble, I think those people should be hung out to dry. I think you, as politicians, have to appreciate that you are public trustees of our tax money, which includes your own, and to waste it in this manner is ridiculous.

Mr Kwinter: I want to make an observation and ask you just one question. In 1987, I think the one issue the NDP campaigned on was public car insurance. It was synonymous with the NDP campaign. Their popular support went up one point in the 1987 election.

During the hearings that Coulter Osborne had and all of the things that went on with public car insurance, the NDP kept putting forward its plan. When Peter Kormos filibustered, he had a plan. It would seem to me that if they really had a plan and if I were leading the NDP, the first day back in the Legislature of this new government I would have put it on the table and said, "Here's our auto plan." They obviously have not done that, and they have delayed it and delayed it, and now they are saying maybe in October.

So obviously now that they have had a chance to come to grips with reality—and I am not saying that in a negative way, but that happens to a lot of people when they are not in government; they suddenly come in and see what the numbers are—they are having some problems.

As someone who is in the business, what savings do you see effected by the government taking over the business?

Mr Bickerton: I have not been able to hear anyone tell me, with repeated, pointed questions, where the savings will be. If you look at the expenditures that insurance companies make for non-claim-related things—and I do not have the numbers with me, unfortunately, but I am pulling on memory here—I think it is less than 20% of the premium dollar that goes towards administration. That includes sales commissions, that includes head office administration. It does not include claims and claim-related costs. Claim-related costs account for over 80% of every claim dollar. So if you take the 80% and the 20%, it would come out somewhere around 100%, plus or minus a few loss years.

If you take the sales commissions out, which are between 10% and 12%, 11% and change, on average on auto insurance, you are left with about 9% or 10%, give or take a bit of room for slippage, to administer the insurance companies' moneys.

If a government program could save 10% of that, I would say it has done very well. Chop out all the big executive perks, chop out a few extra office rents, but brutal about it, which governments tend not to be, and think I just commented on that earlier. If they could save 10% of the 10%, they are saving one percentage point of your premium and mine. But if you pay $800 a year premium and you are saving $8 or $10, or say $20, I do not think that would make me in favour of public ownership. I have never, ever seen a government take something over and do something more efficiently and less expensively than private enterprise.

One of the things that would occur immediately is that all of the staff would be unionized, and all of the staff would be centralized in one location, probably Toronto or somewhere like Toronto, where you would be paying a lot higher-based salaries than we are out in the various diverse areas we are located in now, together with the fact that you would have this complicated and expensive union structure to go through. We do not underpay our staff now. We are very competitive, but we are not paying Toronto salaries in Kingston and Gananoque, I can assure you of that nor should we be. If we were paying those salaries in metropolitan areas, we would be paying a pile more than we are now, and I do not think in anybody's wisdom that the government could go into this program expecting to save 10% of the 10% administration cost. But given that they could, they would save 1% of premiums.

I would say that is a total waste of time. Unless someone else can come up with a better idea on the specifics of where they are going to save money, then I do not believe they will.

VINCE MALONEY

The Chair: The next presenter is Mr Vince Maloney. Welcome. You have 15 minutes for your presentation as an individual. You may proceed.

Mr Maloney: Thank you. Maybe I can qualify this: I am representing nobody but myself. I am a retired industrial worker and over the years have been involved a bit in politics, municipally and provincially, but I welcome this opportunity to speak on the first budget of the NDP government.

I am here specifically to address the members on the government side, because what time I have I wish to devote to people I trust, who will listen and who will decide if my suggestions merit consultation and action. If I were Conrad Black or any of the thousands of corporate welfare bums who pay no tax, but under this budget will pay something for the first time, I would do the same as they did, namely, contact my Tory or Liberal servant in the Legislature and tell him or her to kill the budget.

During my working career I had occasion to participate in many protests in Queen's Park and on Parliament Hill. These demonstrations were also economic in nature, against high interest rates, in support of prices for farmers, help for the poor when they marched to Queen's Park, plus many others when the real Tories or the ones who wore ties were in power.

We all know how fruitless these journeys were, so finally the people of Ontario spoke on September 6, 1990. They had been completely ignored except on the way into voting booth. I wish to state proudly that I am one of many thousands who have donated, through my membership, 92% of the operating budget for the NDP in the 1980s, 92% of the federal party, and I believe roughly the same for the provincial party. I have heard accusations of opposition parties of dominance of the NDP by the labour movement, but the election expenses authority has announced that for 1990, the unions' contribution to the NDP was 7.5%, a total of $111,862.10.

You have lived up to my expectations, and this is the first of many budgets to come, I am sure. The Tory party would have heaped the cost on the backs of those least able to afford it; witness the Tories in Ottawa. Single parents, or farmers, almost broken by free trade and the GST, municipalities trying to cope with exploding welfare rolls imposed by Michael Wilson and Brian Mulroney, all of these realized the need for an expansionary budget to stimulate the economy.

Mr James Frank, chief economist and vice-president of the Conference Board of Canada, praised the budget as a confidence builder that will help Canada emerge from the recession. Mr Frank argues that only $640 million of the $7 billion is new programs. Most of the balance results from normal increases in education, health and the recession's effects on revenue and welfare spending. He says, "Had measures been taken to hold the line on operating expenditures, which rose by $5.2 billion, or on capital expenditures, which increased by $1 billion, not to mention the $3-billion deficit you received as a gift from the previous government, we would have had a much deeper prolonged recession." John Kenneth Galbraith likewise praised the NDP budget as being the best in North America. By the way, he was the architect of the New Deal in the United States under Franklin D. Roosevelt in the Great Depression.

As a retired union member, as a farmer for the first 42 years of my life now enjoying monthly pensions first obtained for Canadians by the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation in 1926 and by the CCF-NDP since then, I congratulate you on this, your first budget. Pay no heed to the wailing of the fat cats. All you have done is to step on their tails, and the wail is a natural reaction. For the first time, a measure of fairness was introduced. It is unfortunate that it is being delayed by conservative elements who wish to maintain their special status. However, a conservative is a conservative; whether wearing a Mao tie in Tiananmen Square or the Kremlin, they oppose progressive thinking and action.

Stay the course and be able to demonstrate by your governing that Ontario under the NDP cares for all the people and that taxes will be based on the ability to pay. Your task will be much easier when we elect a federal NDP government in two or three years, but in the meantime keep up the good work.

Mr B. Ward: I think these hearings offer an opportunity for individuals or organizations to express their opinions on whether they feel we are heading in the right direction. For this area, what impact do you feel the budget has had, if any?

Mr Maloney: I was nine years in local government and, as everybody knows or should know, the welfare spending is split three ways and 20% is put up by the local municipality. It cannot be refused, even if people wanted to refuse it.

I feel that when we consider municipalities and boards of education, library boards and hospital boards, had this budget not been brought in, it would have resulted either in many drastic cuts in programs or in vastly increased taxes.

Mr B. Ward: Property taxes.

Mr Maloney: Yes, and property taxes. I think the province has a better rating to borrow money than a municipality or hospital board. It probably gets it a little bit cheaper than they could. It went out on a limb for it and I think it is about time people started giving it credit for what it did.

Mr Villeneuve: I wonder, would there be any political aspirations, or do you belong to a political party?

Mr Maloney: I have run for the NDP three times. I have been a card-carrying member of the NDP since it was formed and I was a CCF voter before that.

Mr Villeneuve: You mentioned that for 40-some years you were in agriculture, a farmer, and you are a retired industrial worker. Are you aware of the increase to agriculture in the last provincial budget?

Mr Maloney: I believe it is somewhere around $100 million, from all aspects. There is assistance from high interest rates and some others that I have read about.

Mr Villeneuve: Would you know what that is and was as a percentage of the previous budget?

Mr Maloney: No, I would not.

Mr Villeneuve: Would you be disappointed if I told you it was 3.5%, less than inflation? And yet you are happy with that?

Mr Maloney: I look at it as probably $100 million more than the last government or the last three governments gave.

Mr Villeneuve: You see, it is not quite $100 million. A question to Mr Laughren in the Legislature, which he was not able to answer for me the day I asked it—he answered it the following day—was that almost half of that $100-million increase—and it is not quite $100 million—$50 million of that was federal money that is being administered by the province for agriculture. The only new program, and it is an old, recycled program of the Liberals, is $50 million in interest support. The total increase for agriculture year over year was 3.5% and it is less than inflation, so I am kind of pleased to hear that you are happy with that. I am not.

Mr Maloney: I think probably you are not including the increase in the farmer's property tax that would have taken place had this budget not been brought in with the grant system to the hospitals and all these others.

Mr Villeneuve: It is all-inclusive. Those are all figured in—3.5%.

Mr Cleary: Just to follow up on what my colleague said, the agriculture people did not get a big increase this year in the budget. Now that you have retired, are you going to be a candidate again in the municipal election this fall?

Mr Maloney: No, I do not expect to. I am 71 years old and it is about time I folded up my tent.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation. The committee will recess for five minutes, until 10:15.

The committee recessed at 1010.

JOHN SPRAGGE

The Chair: The next presenter is Mr Spragge. You have 15 minutes for your presentation.

Mr Spragge: I will start by reading what I have here and possibly go on with a couple of remarks and then leave you lots of time for questions. No budget, least of all a government budget, is ever simply a matter of numbers. A budget is a statement of values and priorities, a list of the things we want and the things we are willing to give up. Budgets are descriptions of the future we want for ourselves, not only the future we want to build for ourselves, but the people we want to be.

A government budget must be something more than this. The virtues of a good government budget are prudence, justice and fortitude. The justice of this budget is evident, as is the fortitude of this government in sticking to it against the slings and arrows of outraged opposition. Whether or not a budget is prudent depends on whether it encourages the economic development that will sustain the community. The most common charge against this budget is that it fails to do that. Indeed it has been said that the budget will drive business out of the province and that by attempting to justly distribute the wealth of this province the government is reducing the wealth we have to distribute.

The first and easiest answer to this charge is that it is absurd. The businessmen who say they are going to take their toys and go home if we do not play by their rules may be able to pack up and leave the province themselves, but they can scarcely hope to move Ontario's natural resources or educated workforce. Beneath this surface absurdity there is a deeper area: the assumption that productive capital which business leaders can move around is the essential source of economic development. To understand why this is no longer so, a short sketch of the history of capital and business may be in order.

If there was a golden age of capital, the Middle Ages must surely have been it. The principal form of productive capital was land, and land was revered. A block of land was described in the same words we use to refer to virtue, as an honour or benefice. Those who were entrusted with land on behalf of the community were referred to as the nobility. On the productivity of this land the entire community depended and the result of crop failure could be catastrophic: mass starvation, political collapse and epidemic disease.

Yet this capital was so important to the community that those who held it and worked on it were accorded little freedom. The lord of a manor could no more turn the land into a housing estate than the villeins who worked it could leave. Lord and serf alike were woven into a complex web of obligations to the land and the larger community.

The golden age of the capitalist was the age of industry. Blake's "dark, satanic mills" on which the power and wealth of Europe depended. The mill owner was not caught up in obligations to his workers. Indeed, the new owning class did not need to involve itself in the production process at all. They could profit from the operation of machines they owned without ever having to know what those machines were.

But as the productive machinery of society grew more complex, the knowledge required to operate the machines and efficiently distribute the goods grew steadily more important. The new value of information was emphasized by the need to end the waste of raw material and pollution which is the result of inefficient production. These needs stimulated the development of complex tools to capture the process and use information efficiently. We have seen the beginning of the information age and we need to understand the meaning of this change.

Information is not only a vital part of the production process, it is also the most important measure of the finished product. As Paul Hawken, a business writer in the United States has written: "When a product reaches us, we do not call the information in it, in the production process and in the product itself 'information.' We simply call it 'quality.'" In all ways, from reducing the cost of raw materials put in or increasing the value of the finished good it is information that determines the ability of a company to compete effectively.

In economic terms, the coming of the information age means that the most realistic measure of wealth is not possessions, but knowledge. Today the most advanced production equipment is less important than the information required to operate it properly. Sometimes this information comes in the form of what we call software, electronic impulses recorded in magnetic oxide on a mylar disc. In other cases the information is contained in an organization, its policies, in procedures and even in individual people's habits.

Whatever form it takes, this information has a number of characteristics which separate it from the old measures of wealth. First and most important, information is far less permanent than the old measures of wealth. Agricultural land will last for ever if it is properly farmed. Heavy industrial machinery will last for decades. Information fits the description given by Peter Brook to the theatre, that it is "written on the wind."

Computer programs are typically replaced by a new version after two years or less of use. Policies and procedures are under constant review. Even the machines that process the information become obsolete very quickly. The personal computer has gone through three major phases of evolution since it was introduced only 10 years ago. The only measure of wealth in the information age that remains constant over time is the ability to learn and to adapt.

But since information is not static, it cannot be simply acquired like a capital good. Information can only be included in the production process by an educated workforce. Thus, the only reliable measure of the wealth of a nation or province is the educational level of its people. Consider the relative illiteracy rates of the United States

Japan. That one difference explains much of the trade deficit that has plagued the United States for the past decade. This means the most important investment in economic productivity that any government can make is to improve quality of the educational system. The new emphasis is more efficient production in industry as part of the movement towards a less wasteful society. This means the market for the raw materials our society has been in the business of providing is likely to go on shrinking. To take one example, the move in American cities towards cycling has already sharply reduced the demand for Canadian newsprint. We can only adapt to this drop in the demand for our natural resources by strengthening our information infrastructure, and the first and most important step in this process is to improve the quality of education in our public schools.

The harsh reality is that in the future people who are not educated are likely to be shut out of society almost completely. The word "McJobs" is often used for low-paying, unskilled jobs in the service industries, but those industries, including the fast food industry, are now experimenting seriously with automation. If the children entering school now are not given a good and effective education, they may face a lifetime without meaningful work at the end of their schooling.

Our children will not be educated by a budget, which is only a list of numbers on paper. But as a statement of fiscal priorities, this budget at least reflects an understanding of the economy of the future. The monetary deficit we cannot pay off. If we put off providing the education and other services our children need, we will produce a society that is unable to compete in the international marketplace. No society can never pay its debts.

Mr Kwinter: Thank you very much for your presentation. I found a couple of contradictions. When you first started out you talked about the fact that businesses can spend their money and move but they cannot move the natural resources which give us our strength. Then later on you talked about the fact that the use of our natural resources is declining and that what we really have to do is invest in people and in our education. I do not think there is any question that education is absolutely critical, but when we talk about comparative advantage, education is important but it is not exclusive. In other words, anybody can educate anybody if he puts the resources into educating him. I can tell you the stories of PhDs driving taxicabs in Toronto because they cannot get any work. They have the education, but unless there is some facility to take that education and harness it and turn it to some economic use, it is really no value. There has to be that balance, I agree with you.

One of the things we have to do is get our people better trained and better educated. But just to do that, without giving the ability to utilize that education, without having that technology transferred, is an exercise in futility, because as I say, you are going to wind up with a lot of cab drivers who have PhDs and MAs and all sorts of other academic degrees but cannot utilize them because there is no economic use for their knowledge. How do you address that?

Mr Spragge: Obviously the issue is not simply a matter of providing education in a vacuum. You have to be sure that the education you provide is more or less appropriate and you have to do some guessing as to what the economy of the future is going to need. But there are two points here. One is that the economic issue that is paramount in education is not about PhDs driving taxicabs. That has been made very clear by writers on economics. The problem is that approximately 25% of our population is illiterate. If that does not make everybody in this room hang their heads in shame, it certainly makes me ashamed, that a province this rich has an illiteracy rate that appalling. We cannot take much comfort from the fact that the Americans are in even worse shape.

James Follows from the Atlantic Monthly has written extensively on the economic lessons we can derive from Japan. The Japanese do not have PhDs who are better educated than our PhDs. They do not have business leaders who are more brilliant. What they have is that the so-called bottom half of their society, the ordinary people on the assembly line, are all better educated than the people we educate now in our public schools and the result is that they are slaughtering us on the economic playing field.

Basically what James Follows wrote—he was writing of the United States and I am afraid that to a great extent this goes for Canadian society too—is that the Americans have the best top half in the world and the Japanese have the best bottom half in the world, in the sense that the Japanese have the best people coming out of high school. The Americans claim to have the best people coming out of university, and I think we come very close to matching that. The Japanese high school grads are knocking the stuffing out of our university grads, because including information on products and production processes is not a matter of having the PhD in the office who hands down directives being the best there is; it is a matter of having the assembly line worker having the best education possible that we can give him.

Mr Sterling: What is your occupation?

Mr Spragge: I am a computer programmer.

Mr Sterling: Do you work in private industry?

Mr Spragge: Yes.

Mr Sterling: You are not with the university here, are you?

Mr Spragge: No. I have acted as consultant to it fairly extensively, but I run my own business.

Mr Sterling: I do not disagree with some of the directions you are taking, but one of the concerns I have, particularly with the extended deficit financing that is proposed in the Ontario budget this year, is the ability of future Ontario governments to pay for proper education facilities and institutions. I think it now takes about 12% or 13% of our budget to service the debt and I estimate that after Mr Laughren is finished, if we go according to his statistics or his projected deficits, then in about four years it is going to take something like 20% of the budget to service the debt. While you may say we can pay it off, nobody seems to have done that for the last 20 years. You do not express any concern over that part of it. I am more concerned about providing the necessary services—education, etc—to the public in four or five or 10 years than I am today.

Mr Spragge: I am not a great fan of deficits either. Basically, because I had 15 minutes, I addressed the thrust of the budget, which goes towards providing services, particularly education, to ordinary people, because I think that is very important. If I had another hour, I would say that reducing the deficit is important. It has to be done basically in a way that tends towards developing a more egalitarian society, because that is what the information age also demands. The social and political effect of the information age, I think, is going to distribute power and wealth rather than allow it to concentrate as it has in the past, and the result is that government has to go along with this. If we are going to be dependent on an enormous body of information in millions of people for what is going to be the working capital of the future of this society—it is going to be what we depend on—instead of a certain amount of concentrated wealth, we have to adjust the tax structure to deal with that. Otherwise we are just not going to be a productive society.

Mr G. Wilson: You emphasize spending money now for educating our children. What about training? Do you see that as being a constant feature as well in the new economy you are outlining?

Mr Spragge: Training is very important, but if we fail to educate, we will not have much to build training on. Education basically means, as I understand it, giving people the tools to grasp concepts they have not encountered before. That is going to be a feature, more and more, of the process of technological change in the future. They are both important, but if we do not educate, we will find ourselves crippled when it comes time to train.

ONTARIO FEDERATION OF ANGLERS AND HUNTERS

The Chair: The next group is the Ontario Federation of Anglers and Hunters. You have one half-hour for your presentation.

Mr Morgan: Thank you and good morning. My name is Rick Morgan and my title is executive vice-president of the Ontario Federation of Anglers and Hunters. I particularly want to thank you for the opportunity to appear before you and let you know the feelings of Ontario's largest provincial conservation association.

As you review the information that we provide, please bear in mind that we are expressing the collective views of 74,000 individual members and 470 clubs which actually pay fees to belong to our coalition. I think, in a broader sense, we are probably expressing the views of the roughly three million people who hunt and fish in this province, as well as many others who do neither but who care deeply about the natural world around us.

OFAH is not here today to talk to you about the total Ontario budget, the total tax burden on individual citizens or businesses or the record-high annual deficit. Others are far more qualified to address those matters. Rather, we are here to tell you about what we do know—the way fish and wildlife management is being underfunded in this province and the way anglers and hunters are being shortchanged.

The disbursement budget for the fisheries program of the Ministry of Natural Resources is a maximum of $55 million, and likely less than that after in-year budget cuts are made. These dollars must cover all MNR fisheries fronts; ie sport, commercial, native, conservation, etc.

However, in direct revenue alone, and I emphasize direct, the Ontario government receives over $105 million in cash payments from just anglers. This $105 million comes directly from fishing licences and the sales taxes on purchases that we have made directly for sport fishing. The $105-million figure does not include all of the indirect revenues that the province receives from sport fishing, nor does it include a revenue from the commercial fishing industry. However, even without those major other revenues, the government is making a net profit of over $45 million on sport fishing alone. OFAH contends that such a profit is obscene and unfair and that the province's fisheries budget should be at least as large as its direct revenue, particularly considering all the indirect revenues and benefits which also accrue.

While the underfunding of fisheries management is new in Ontario, it does appear more acute today, in the 1990s, when more benefits are needed, not fewer. A few examples come to mind, but please remember that these are examples only, and certainly far from a complete list.

Fish hatcheries: This year, 1991, sees the closure of three provincial fish hatcheries, including the province's only muskellunge-rearing facility. These facilities should be upgraded and/or replaced, not closed. In fact, Ontario's hatchery program needs expansion, not reduction. More localized hatcheries are required so that specific strains of fish can be used for better results.

Please bear in mind that when the government surveyed anglers about a proposed resident angling licence, anglers agreed, provided that there would be more fish stocking and more enforcement. They were very clear about that. But now they are getting less of both and they have to buy the licence to get less of what they asked for.

Enforcement: In this fiscal year, fish and wildlife law enforcement is being reduced by at least 10% from a level that was already inadequate, at a time when citizens are demanding more enforcement. Despite the high calibre of Ontario's conservation officers, poachers virtually have a free reign. There are nowhere near enough officers, and they have such severe budget limitations placed on them that it is a wonder they can catch or deter the few poachers that they do. Please bear in mind that in 1989 the Provincial Auditor actually recognized shortcomings in MNR level of enforcement, and in 1991 it will be even worse.

Coho salmon: All of the province's coho salmon program is to be stopped and replaced with nothing—not another coho strain; not more chinook salmon, which is actually more cost-effective; nothing. Combined with the elimination of muskie stocking, Ontario is sending a clear message to Americans to stay home and to Ontarians to travel out of province to fish for the fish they enjoy.

Experimental management: The developing and testing of new, more contemporary management techniques is stopped. Lack of proper funding will therefore ensure that ario has locked into the status quo while other jurisdictions advance. Ontario can look on from even further behind while others prosper from the results of their experimental management.

Remedial action plans: In keeping with its election promises to do more about the environment, the current government is shifting an additional $1.5 million into Great Lakes remedial action plans, but that money is being taken directly out of the fisheries budget. It is, in appearance, a shell game shifting funds from one environmental program to another, and it was particularly devastating when the fisheries program was already underfunded.

Casual staff: Arbitrary reductions are being made in the full-time or contract staff which fish and wildlife managers may need. But in such labour-intensive fields as these, such a reduction can have very serious consequences. Some programs will not be delivered, others will suffer. Conservation officers and other higher priced full-time staff will need to pick up some of the slack, at both a higher financial cost and at the expense of their normal important duties.

Native issues: Likely because the Minister of Natural Resources is also the minister responsible for native affairs, a major amount of MNR staff time at all levels is being devoted to matters more appropriately funded by the Ontario Native Affairs Secretariat. Both time and financial resources are being taken away from fish and wildlife matters. Major financial and manpower allocation should be devoted to MNR fish and wildlife programs to offset these drains on their resources.

The minister's own advisory council has on several occasions requested that a needs list be developed at the local, regional and provincial levels. So far, presumably because of insufficient staff time, such a list has not been prepared. Therefore neither the minister and his staff nor the public can benefit from this exercise and the work done. Cost-benefit analysis and budgets that might flow from it. Some anglers believe that is intentional.

Ontario's wildlife and the habitats on which it depends are impressive natural assets worthy of protecting and enhancing. Their dramatic returns to the economy make their wise use and management excellent applications of the concept of sustainable development.

A recent federal-provincial survey entitled Importance of Wildlife to Canadians clearly shows the intelligence and importance of investment spending on wildlife. It proved that for every dollar spent on wildlife conservation programs, more than $4.50 is returned to the provincial and federal treasuries in tax returns alone, never mind the other spinoff benefits. The annual gross domestic product related to wildlife in Ontario is approximately $2.2 billion. Per capita, the average annual and daily values of hunting trips are more than twice those of non-hunting wildlife related trips.

Despite these facts, it is worth noting that, considering inflation, the Ontario wildlife budget has actually declined in recent years. It is more than incongruous that although more people enjoy wildlife than enjoy provincial parks, Ontario's parks budget is well over double that for wildlife. Things are backwards. Wildlife is very much an important part of the environmental priority agenda for Canadians. It must be reflected in substantially increased wildlife budgets. Just as with fisheries, there are a multitude of wildlife programs which are underfunded and do not even exist due to lack of funds.

Enforcement: Of course the 1991 10% cut in enforcement also affects wildlife. In some areas of this province poaching is at market levels. The Ontario Federation of Anglers and Hunters has asked MNR to put in place a report-a-poacher hotline, perhaps a 1-800-POACHER number, but we are told MNR cannot afford it due to the size of its budget. We have requested an $800,000 grant to help us establish a province-wide reward system, but nothing has been forthcoming.

MNR's wildlife population assessment programs are abysmal and therefore the best management and benefits are not available to the people and the government of Ontario. Using moose as an example, even as important as that wildlife population is to the province and as important as moose hunting is to the economies and lifestyles of central and northern Ontario, MNR cannot make regular annual aerial surveys of the moose populations. Therefore, to a large degree, it must practise retroactive management rather than proactive management.

Although the wild turkey reintroduction program, designed to bring a native species back to Ontario, has been successful on a localized basis, it has been slow going due to lack of funds. Our federation has had to supply the bulk of the funding for the program, approximately $300,000. Now, presumably in frustration with their lack of a budget, some MNR wildlife staff are encouraging a United States organization to move into Canada so they can also try to get some funds from it.

Sensitive northern wetlands have not been evaluated and many southern wetlands are in need of reevaluation and protection. MNR has been unable to move to more integrated resource management. That is a system, like habitat supply analysis, which would permit establishing wildlife and recreational targets for crown lands while at the same time establishing predictable long-term wood product harvest levels.

As with fisheries, these are but a few examples. Many more exist. The bottom line is that an inadequate number of employees are trying to do an important job with insufficient funds.

The result of all this is that neither the government nor the people of Ontario receive the optimum benefit from Ontario's fisheries or wildlife. People do not fish as often as they would if fish stocks were more plentiful. Tourism seasons are shortened when fishing and hunting seasons are shortened due to insufficient management. Hunting camps and lodges suffer. Employees are laid off. Local, regional and national equipment suppliers suffer. Camps and resorts have vacancies when they would not if fishing or hunting were better. Poachers operate with relative impunity. Ontario residents continue to go elsewhere to fish and to hunt. Our employment levels and our quality of life suffer needlessly.

Fish and wildlife budgets not only preserve our quality of life, they are investments in industry and in tourism, with a far more secure return than promotional dollars or make-work or welfare programs. Spending on fish and wildlife programs is the guarantee of sustainable development, an assurance of a healthy, prosperous future for millions of Ontarians. The fish and wildlife budgets of MNR must be increased. We ask that this important committee give such advice to the Legislature, the Management Board of Cabinet, the Treasurer, the Premier and the Minister of Natural Resources.

It seems ironic that during the very time when all three political parties have professed to care more about the environment, MNR's share of the provincial budget has declined substantially. From the 1986-87 to the 1991-92 fiscal year, the total provincial budget has grown by almost 60%. During the same time, the Ministry of Natural Resources budget has only increased by 18%, less than the cost of inflation, and it has had to take on new tasks and new costs related to the government's native agenda. We are counting on this committee to help correct the situation and to ensure that fish and wildlife budgets receive the priority they deserve.

I would, in closing, draw your attention to the first appendix, which is a bar graph showing you what has happened with the MNR budget versus the total provincial budget over the last period of time, from the 1986-87 to the 1991-92 fiscal year. I think it is a graphic illustration of how things have shifted in this province and perhaps of why you need to pay some attention to this particular portion of the provincial budget.

Mr Villeneuve: Thank you very much for a very good presentation and for being with us to express the concerns of the Ontario Federation of Anglers and Hunters. You state that Ontario residents continue to go elsewhere to fish and hunt. Would you have statistics on that? We are all concerned about cross-border shopping and a number of things. Are we actually sending our hunters and our fishermen elsewhere than Ontario to do their sports hunting and fishing?

Mr Morgan: There is no question of that. As a matter of fact, as we sit here in Kingston and we see some of the province's best fishing, we still see people from other parts of Ontario and even this community crossing the border to fish for other strains of fish. The coho was one that I cited. Of course, people are going to the United States and elsewhere for other strains of fish as well. We have great natural resources and wide-open spaces in this province, but we do not capitalize on them by managing them properly.

Mr Villeneuve: These statistics you show financial-wise are not dissimilar to those of agriculture, where we have had a $19-million increase in the budget last year, or 3.5%. You now show slightly more than $100 million in moneys received by the government pertaining to sales of licences and sales tax on sports equipment, yet less than $60 million spent in restocking. That does not address the problem of security; our game wardens not being sufficient in number to enforce the laws and poaching running rampant.

Could you comment, first of all, on the reduction in stocking? I think that is of utmost importance, because we do not stock now. We may not feel it this year or next year, but it certainly will be felt in the not-too-distant future. If you could just comment on maybe what kind of money would be needed to address that problem.

Mr Morgan: In the paper we cite the example of coho and muskie, because they are very obvious, very dramatic. They have happened recently. We are getting completely out of the stocking of those species. There are, of course, people who come from all over North American and believe, Europe, who wish to fish in particular for muskie in this great province of ours. What is not so obvious is that our stocking program on the other species in this province is askew.

What we really need to do, instead of having large hatcheries at great expense in various areas of the province, is to have smaller, localized hatcheries using a species like lake trout, for example. There are many strains of lake trout in this province, but we tend to look at them as lake trout, so we have some large hatcheries at Harwood and elsewhere dealing with those species. But what we need to be doing is looking at areas like the big sound at Parry Sound, where there is a unique strain of fish that is in great jeopardy. We need to be taking the stocks, the eggs, those lake trout, raising them in a relatively small and inexpensive facility on the shores of that water body and then stocking the fingerlings back into that water body to preserve the integrity of that species. That particular strain is on the verge of disappearing from this province. It is a very special large strain of fish.

That is one example. It happens all over the province. We need to have small, localized hatcheries putting local strains of fish back into local bodies of water. The other thing that happens then is that people in various communities see the government in action right there putting something back into their local fishery and their local economy. They do not have to look elsewhere for something to be happening.

Mr Villeneuve: One final question: What is happening to the hatcheries that have traditionally been operated by the Ministry of Natural Resources? Are they going to be let idle? Will they be leased to someone? What, in your opinion, will happen to those?

Mr Morgan: Three of them are scheduled to be closed this year, including, as I have already said, the only muskie hatchery. Municipalities have been chasing the provincial government, the Minister of Natural Resources, on that one. God bless it, Sir Sandford Fleming College in Peterborough has gotten involved in that one and is doing everything it can to try to get a muskie-rearing program going again, but as we sit here today, that facility, instead of being upgraded, renovated or replaced, is due to be closed. 1050

Mr G. Wilson: That was a fascinating overview of the state of the wildlife and other areas of our natural resources. As you are suggesting, if things are bad now, the possibility that they are going to get even worse without the funding you are talking about here. In particular, the wetlands are not something everybody thinks about. I am glad you mentioned them. But even there, as you say, they have not been evaluated. Many southern wetlands are in need of re-evaluation and protection.

Actually, you reminded me a lot of the speaker just before you, who mentioned the need for funding in education; otherwise we are going to be left behind in the world economy. Here too we are going to be left behind, put at a disadvantage, if we do not keep the funding. We are already falling behind. If we do not get the funding in there, we are going to be even that much further behind.

In fact, the speaker earlier this morning said we have to be ruthless if the money is not there. So we are faced with this divergence of views here, and I was just wondering what your comment on that is. It seems to us that if we do not find the money now, these things are going to get even worse. As in the case of education, in this case as well we are going to have to pay even more in the future, even if a part of the stuff will be beyond repair. I am thinking again of the wetlands, where they have even disappeared. What is your view then of the funding and how we meet those needs now?

Mr Morgan: I said earlier that I am not going to comment on the total provincial budget because that is not my area of expertise. This is. One of the great things about fish and wildlife is that investment does bring return. We often look at the natural world and the environment as something that takes money from us, that we spend money on to protect. I commented on the federal-provincial survey that shows that for every dollar spent, $4.50 comes back in direct return to the government, never mind all the jobs it creates, all the quality of life we gain out of it, the people do not have to pay welfare or unemployment benefits to.

Indirectly, of course, if you wish to talk about education, that is the area of youth employment. As you know, when young people in this province cannot afford the full cost of their college or university education, they can apply for supplementary funding under the OSAP program. But one of the nice things about fisheries and wildlife is that when fish camps and hunt camps and lodges operate, they are employing a great many of our young people, our university students and our college students. The money I spend when I go to that camp goes partially into the pocket of the student, and he or she no longer requires the OSAP grant from the government. It is another financial benefit, as it were, to the province. So we would argue most strenuously—and I think the facts prove—that when you spend money on fish and wildlife, you reap a financial reward as well as a quality-of-life reward.

Mr Conway: Mr Morgan, it is very good to see you here and to say that I really enjoyed your presentation. I would like to know a little more about the direct revenues from the fishing licence alone. I am sure we do not have the numbers for 1991. Do you know what they were for 1990? Do you know what the actual revenues to the province were from the sale of the resident angling licence?

Mr Morgan: They work out to roughly $11 million. Of course, that is an amount that originally was to be added to the base fisheries budget to cover the cost of new initiatives, things that could not happen without that money.

Mr Conway: So we could expect that in fiscal 1991-92, we are probably looking, on that account alone, at about $10 million to $12 million. Is that correct?

Mr Morgan: Yes.

Mr Conway: It is your expectation then that the money this year, like last year, is being in part diverted to other government activities?

Mr Morgan: There is no question that when the fisheries budget or the total MNR budget does not keep up with the rising cost of doing business, it has to look elsewhere to pay for things that it has paid for out of base budget in the past. There is no question that if one examines carefully the expenditures attributed to the resident angling licence, many of those are activities which were formerly funded out of the base fisheries budget.

Mr Conway: Those of us who are advocates of that licence advocated it on the basis that it would be a way to generate dollars to do, as I recall, a couple of things: to restock and to work on fish habitats. You are telling me what I think your membership in my own constituency has been telling me, that in the last couple of years those activities are in relative decline.

Mr Morgan: There is no question that out of both the base budget and the increased budget due to the resident sport fishing licence we are not able to do in this province what we should be doing or what we have done. Yes, fish stocking, habitat work and enforcement were the principle directions demanded by the public and agreed to, as I recall, by the government at the time of the introduction of the resident sport fishing licence.

Some of that is being done. I do not want to suggest that there is no benefit to the licence; there certainly is. We are not capitalizing to the fullest extent on some of the spinoff benefits, the non-financial benefits of the licence, but indeed we certainly are not realizing the benefit that we should have by adding on those funds to a base budget that is adequate. The base budget is not adequate, so the add-on does not create the benefit it should.

Mr Conway: I think you and your membership well understand the pressures on any government to meet all the expenditure pressures that are out there, but I certainly get the impression from your brief that your argument is as much now with the way in which MNR is spending the allocated resource, of whatever amount, as it is with anything else.

Mr Morgan: There is no question that we could analyze, I suppose, the total MNR budget and we would come up with our own priority list on how it should be spent. One of the things that is worth noting, however, as I mentioned in my comments, is that the minister's own advisory council has suggested that staff of MNR develop a needs list for fisheries, something started at the grass-roots level within the ministry rather than at the top, something that is based not on, "Here's how many dollars there will be; now what can you do with it?" but rather, "What needs to be done and how much will it take to do that?" Then the government can consider how much of that it can really afford to do and what the loss is if it cannot provide those things. There is no question that needs to be done.

Mr Conway: But it seems to me, by virtue of your own brief, that you have lost out in some of that. Clearly this government, and I think earlier governments, decided that greater investments in parks were merited in relative terms compared to some of the things that might be on your priority list.

Mr Morgan: There is no question that, as I said, again drawing back to the brief, far fewer people enjoy provincial parks than enjoy wildlife in this province and yet the parks budget is over twice that of wildlife. That is not to suggest that the parks budget should not be where it is, but it is to suggest that the wildlife budget is ridiculously low.

Is there a person in this room who does not in one way or another enjoy wildlife and who would not be prepared to have a greater amount of his tax dollars go to take care of the enhancement and the protection of wildlife? That should be part of any government's environmental agenda.

Mr Conway: But given the finite resources of any government, I am interested to draw you out as to what you think explains the relative treatment of parks versus the sport fishery.

Mr Morgan: I think it is safe to say that people see parks as a very simple thing to look at as a means of protecting ecosystems and wildlife for the future, but unfortunately they are a very small part of the total picture that needs to be protected and enhanced.

Mr Conway: Finally, my impression—not so much from your brief but from reading many of your weekly and monthly commentaries—is that MNR is a boiling pot at the present time and we should keep an eye on it very carefully.

Mr Morgan: I do not think there is any question that there is a great deal of unrest out there, and you will be hearing far more about natural resources problems in the future if something is not done about it.

The Acting Chair (Mr B. Ward): I would like to thank you for your presentation, and very good questions from all parties.

LIN GOOD

The Acting Chair: Lin Good, you have 15 minutes.

Mrs Good: First, I am delighted to be here. I should explain that I represent no one but myself. I am a member of far too many groups, organizations and associations, but I am also an individual with strong political views, as my member, Gary Wilson, knows. I am also a person who feels very, very passionately both Canadian and Ontarian. I feel that occasionally it is important for individual citizens and taxpayers to record their views, because I also believe that an aggregate of all our special-interest groups is not necessarily the sum of Ontario. I think it is your job as a committee now and the job of the government, with the opposition, to represent the whole of Ontario, regardless of the special-interest groups which may have pleaded their case, including mine, to you.

It is in that context, therefore, that I chose to come as an individual rather than as a spokesman for any of the various groups that I serve with. I would also like to point out that I have not suffered unduly nor have I benefited from the budget, so I have no particular case to plead about the government budget. In fact, the only thing I think I have suffered from in the budgets recently are the annual increases in my federal income tax, and this is not the forum for that, is it? Otherwise I could give you a very impassioned plea for doing that better.

But I do support the budget. I support it in a general way as being the right approach to the financial, business, social and economic management of this province at this time, while nevertheless being heartened by the fact that the Treasurer has pointed out that it is right at this time that you plan a longer-term strategy to cope with some of the underlying problems, particularly if we manage to get into slightly better, more prosperous economic times.

I would like to mention very briefly the points I especially like about the budget before I get to my suggestions.

I like the fact that you aim to protect and help the vulnerable: the young, the disabled, the weak, the elderly who are not able to look after themselves. I like the fact that you acknowledge that there is a recession and do not pretend it will go away on its own and that we can all just suddenly survive if only we look into the future—that it does in fact need a different management at the moment.

I would like to record too, though, that I am not happy about any deficit and it is no use pretending that I am. I doubt if you are. I am sure you are just as unhappy with it as any taxpayers, but you have the job of somehow trying to cope with it, get rid of it and run the province meanwhile.

I am particularly worried, and I want to put this note in for those of you who may be in the higher reaches of the economy of this province, about foreign debt. I am much more comfortable with debt owed in Canadian dollars than I am with debt owed in foreign currency, because foreign currency debt means that we are subject to either pressure or sudden change which affects all of us by forces beyond our control altogether. I believe, though on this I have not yet had time to check, that this is more important in the federal budget, where the last time I looked more than 50% of our federal debt was in fact owed to foreign countries.

That is the background, because I wanted to comment that I was therefore heartened this morning to hear that Premier Rae, who has now arrived at the conference in British Columbia, was also approaching things in the same way. It seems to me that what you are coping with, what I am coping with, to a very large extent is really beyond our province's control.

I like to know that all parties of Ontario are going to help solve the difficulty we have gotten into, because I do believe that the whole picture is what needs to be attacked. Again Mr Laughren, in one of the speeches I read, also recognized it: that unless we come to grips with co-operative measures among the provinces and between the provinces and the federal government, unless we recognize the appalling impact of the high dollar and the high interest rates on our exports, we are not likely to solve anything.

I mention this because I get rather tired of everybody—and you have not done that, so this does not include you—but it does sometimes include speakers—assuming that only economists can understand what is going on. I do not believe that. I believe a lot of us do understand and that we are ready to have the truth about something for a change and not comfortable reassurances, which is another reason I liked the provincial budget. It gave me some truthfu ta, it seemed. I am a librarian by training. I checked it all Statistics Canada when you presented it. You gave me the data and you told me what you were doing now and what you intended in the long term.

I just want to draw to your attention, then, the points in the budget package, not just in the actual dollars and cents. I am not going to talk to you about how to spend the budget, what to do, what to take from Peter to give to Paul, because I believe that is your job. I would like to tell you something about it, but in those details I will write.

I want to target the principles which I as a very heavy payer, as a matter of fact, feel are hopeful and which I hope will be worked on, not only by the government but by the other parties as well.

1. I thoroughly support the comprehensive review of the taxation system which, it was stated in one of the many papers I have read, is scheduled to begin soon. The number of taxation methods, direct and indirect, by now defies description. Not only does it bother me that I have to pay them all, but it also bothers me that the complexity of them must take far too much time. Although I agree that public service jobs are important, I would rather they be devoted to something other than calculating taxes.

2. I would like to emphasize that I was delighted to see that the Ontario government of Premier Rae intended to develop a partnership in commerce. One of the things which—if I may refer to Gary; he will remember—I believe most strongly in, both in labour relations and in politics, is that it really does not work well to be confrontational, competitive and adversarial all the time. Occasionally it may be necessary, but I believe it is much better to be co-operative, to be straightforward with each other, sometimes to make compromises. Sometimes one person has to give in.

I am delighted to see that Premier Rae and Floyd Laughren both said that they intended to develop this partnership, because I believe very strongly that private enterprise brings in the money, and I am very fond of small business. Everybody who runs a small business in Kingston I am sure would vouch for the fact that I shop in Ontario, and especially in Kingston.

I like private enterprise to bring the money and I like you, as my elected representatives, to decide how to spread it around fairly so that we do not have people—in the language my grandfather once used; he was an MP in England—starving in the gutter. That is not my view of democracy, to have such an enormous gap between rich and poor that we do not all benefit to some extent.

Last, I congratulate whoever came up with the idea that you would look at sound fiscal management. I believe you inherited some good things and some poor things from the previous governments, with both of which I worked quite happily, because I believe always in working with the government in power, taking it that it represents the majority view, even if not necessarily mine.

Sound fiscal management seems to me to be essential in times of shortage of money. No longer is it possible to solve a problem by throwing money at it, the wonderful solution that if you have enough money you can solve it.

Maybe you can, though it may not necessarily be the best use of money. Certainly I would like to ask in closing that you apply that sound fiscal management first of all to one of the main bases of our society, to one of the cornerstones of our democracy: the health care system.

This, I think, needs your attention more than any other. This is an area in which I have worked as a volunteer for about the last 20 years in various capacities on various bodies. In the report of the Premier's Council on Health Care Strategy, these volumes on health care strategy, you have a very sound working document.

I am sure you all know, but I draw to your attention if you do not, the very good summary that Ted Ball gave in his address to the McGill Club in Toronto some time ago. I know this is not a popular approach. I know that in health care it is much more popular to think that if only you can find enough money, if only you can not close any beds, if only you can add to the system instead of tackling it, that you will win in the end win out. I do not believe so.

I am mentioning this because increasingly I note—there was one in the Sunday Star yesterday—a plea to consider user fees. I urge you not to consider user fees until there has been a thorough review of this. I am not happy with user fees when I am supporting something with a tax base. That is becoming the method of getting extra money, both at the municipal level and at other levels, but in this there are so many suggestions for a thorough review of the system and perhaps a better use of the money than we now have.

I am delighted with the long-term care proposal, which shows the shift to community and prevention. I would just urge you, however unpopular it may seem and whatever passionate articles denying that you should be doing it may be printed, to start this before it is too late, to echo Ted Ball's words.

I would like to close by saying that I agree with this phrase from his speech, and I acknowledge that I get it from him, though he gets it from Herman Khan, formerly of the Hudson Institute. He says: "The message is simple. People aren't stupid. When you present them with choices, real wisdom will prevail." I like to think that is especially so in Ontario and I would like you to present us with some choices for coping with the deficit, not pretending it will go away, and beginning with something like health care.

CATARAQUI CO-OPERATIVE HOMES

Ms Chan: My name is Rose Chan. I am vice-president of a co-op housing project named Cataraqui. Around eastern Ontario we have some really bizarre names, like Gananoque.

Thank you for the opportunity to speak before the committee. Since I am speaking on behalf of Cataraqui Co-operative Homes, a non-profit housing provider, I will concentrate my remarks on the area of non-profit housing.

I would like to begin by applauding the Ontario government for its forthright pledge to affordable housing in this budget. As an advocate for affordable non-profit housing in Kingston, I have great anticipations from a government that states in its first budget that affordable housing is a key priority of this government. Such statements are, of course, meaningless unless they are backed up with additional budgetary allocations or specific policy initiatives. I am happy to see that this budget has both. The budget makes a commitment to provide an additional 10,000 non-profit units for Ontarians and to increase the Ministry of Housing's funding by 39%.

I would like to address these specifics with respect to the experiences of Cataraqui Co-operative Homes and also to the question of effective fiscal management that is raised in the government's budget.

In September of this year Cataraqui Co-op completed the construction of 26 European-style town houses in the north end of Kingston. The board of directors is currently looking at the possibility of increasing this number through the acquisition and renovation of an existing CMHC development and the construction of new homes in Pittsburgh township, a neighbouring municipality.

As a housing co-operative, we strongly believe that a housing community requires a mixture of income levels and housing styles that are appropriate for the local community. We feel that this is a healthier living environment because it encourages resident participation and the development of a supportive community. In addition, it minimizes the stigma that is attached to residents of concentrated low-income areas. I would like the Ontario government to encourage this type of community by earmarking a number of the 10,000 units as co-operative housing.

Since the creation of non-profit homes is publicly funded, we recognize that there is a limited pool of money available with which to build as many homes as possible. We are, however, concerned that an overemphasis on cost-effectiveness will translate into lower building standards and therefore a lower living standard for residents. We must not forget that people must live in the homes we design and build.

An example of this with our project is that we were not able to use cement block walls between the units because we did not have enough money in our budget. Although the walls were constructed to building code standards without the use of cement blocks, they do not provide a sufficient level of sound insulation. Since these conditions negatively affect the sense of privacy the residents have in their own units, this contributes to a more stressful community. This means that the residents will have to put up with a lower quality of living until the funds can be found at a later date to pay for an expensive retrofit.

Cataraqui Homes believes that it is more fiscally responsible to build quality housing from the start than to build and maintain a lowered-standards home. To ensure that the minimum building standards are enforced, we would like to see all future non-profit and co-operative homes built covered under the extended home warranty program. This is essentially no cost to the government, yet it will ensure that a consistent high standard is maintained by builders and contractors.

The Ontario government also needs to review the mechanism used to determine the cost of building an affordable home. The current system of using the maximum unit price, more commonly known as MUPs, is intended to represent the total cost of developing a particular type of home in a particular geographic location. One problem with this method is that the MUPs, which are calculated the beginning of the year, may not reflect the actual cost during inflationary times. This means that quality of paint, tiles, wood, insulation methods, etc., are shortchanged in order to meet the MUP requirements. This in turn leads to early deterioration, which in turn leads to higher maintenance costs.

A second problem with the MUP system is that it does not take into consideration local anomalies. For example, the cost of land is actually cheaper in the city of Kingston than in the neighbouring municipality of Pittsburgh township. We would like to see that the MUPs only reflect the cost of building a quality modest home and that the cost of acquiring land be a separate item.

The Ontario government can help non-profit housing providers by releasing or making available underutilized government-owned lands. In Kingston, affordable housing could be built on the old Ministry of Transportation site or on the outer portions of the Kingston Psychiatric Hospital. Another location where land may be available is the St Lawrence College site. Land originally granted to St Lawrence College for educational purposes and now surplus to the college should be returned to a provincial land bank to meet general housing needs rather than be sold directly by St Lawrence College to the private sector.

Besides the previous examples, the Ontario government should consider purchasing suitable urban land and providing it to non-profit housing groups at a reasonable cost. We wish to note the oversight that left Kingston off the list of communities targeted for land banking for non-profit housing purposes. This list is found in the Ministry of Housing's consultation paper entitled Government Land for Housing. The Kingston urban district faces a growing shortage of land available for development, especially in the core of the city, which makes non-profit housing difficult to implement. In Kingston, Queen's University students are competing for the existing stock of low-cost rental accommodation, thus putting modest-income families at a disadvantage. We would like to see a review process which will allow communities such as Kingston to be considered for inclusion.

Another problem with the MUP system is that it does not allow for progressive environmental initiatives. Cataraqui Co-op is heated using electricity. If it were possible within our budget, we would have preferred to heat with gas since gas is cheaper and would serve to reduce our reliance on the nuclear generation of electricity. The MUP system needs to be modified to provide extra funds for developments with innovative environmental ideas and designs that serve the broader goals of this government and of this province. As for existing developments wanting to be included in more environmentally friendly systems, such as a composting program or a wet-dry system, the Ontario government could guarantee loans with private lending institutions. Implementing these ideas would be in keeping with the government's stated goal of environmental integrity.

The budget states that effective fiscal management will be achieved through comprehensive review and evaluation of existing programs. While we agree that the re-evaluation any system is important and valuable, the Ontario government must not allow the re-evaluation process to take an inordinate amount of time or to prohibit the funding of more affordable homes. We need an approval and allocation process that is flexible, accessible and simple. It is especially critical in times of a recession, when construction jobs are a much-needed boost to the local economy and more house can be built for the dollar.

We wish to reiterate that a high standard of quality is cost-effective. The government can assist us by ensuring adequate funding to our efforts and assistance in ensuring quality construction and design while also allowing flexibility in innovative design methods. The local community is the best source of expertise on what it needs to meet local conditions and local community standards. It is our goal in design to ensure that social-assisted housing integrates well with the rest of the community.

We also wish to emphasize our strong commitment to mixed-income communities. We note that the analysis in the Ministry of Housing consultation paper entitled A Housing Framework for Ontario demonstrates that the economic rent is much higher than the market rent. We are sensitive to the fact that the government is subsidizing those who are paying full rents in non-profit and co-operative housing. There are those who would say that government investment should be restricted to the neediest. We think this view is self-defeating. It creates jealousies among those left out and stigmatization of those admitted. It also leads to the ghettoization of people in need.

The housing we build tends to be of moderate value, not at all luxurious. Full market rent payers sacrifice luxury for the values of co-operative living and for lower rental costs. Their presence in the co-operative is an asset. The long-term benefits to the community outweigh the costs to the government.

It should also be noted that governments subsidize not-for-profit developments through various programs. Residents in such developments benefit from the housing support resources of the province of Ontario. Therefore, the government need not apologize for a similar policy in the case of non-profit housing.

Finally, the members of Cataraqui Co-operative Homes wish to report that we have dedicated ourselves to the development of quality, affordable housing based on co-operative living arrangements. Therefore, we find we are in full accord with the first principle outlined in the Housing Framework for Ontario consultation paper, which states that access to safe, secure and affordable housing suitable to people's needs is a basic human right. We intend to continue to work towards that end, and thus we wish to enforce the government's commitment to providing affordable housing as a key priority. I hope that some of the ideas and suggestions are incorporated in the NDP's vision for the future of Ontario.

Mr Cleary: Thank you very much for your presentation. How many months did it take you to complete your first project?

Ms Chan: From what stage? From the stage of getting location?

Mr Cleary: Yes, from when you started, from when you put your committee together.

Ms Chan: We started in the fall of 1987.

Mr Cleary: And when did you open?

Ms Chan: September of last year.

Mr Cleary: I understand that you have applied for another project now.

Ms Chan: Yes. There are 10 town houses that are funded through CMHC right now that we are interested in purchasing and renovating. The program that falls under will be terminated soon and we are afraid that the housing that is affordable now will be turned over to the rental market at a much higher price, leaving out 10 more units of affordable housing in Kingston.

Mr Villeneuve: How many people percentage-wise in your co-operative homes would you say do not have support for their rent?

Ms Chan: How many people are not subsidized?

Mr Villeneuve: Yes.

Ms Chan: I cannot recall the figures offhand. I think one third of them are not.

Mr Villeneuve: So basically two thirds of your residents are receiving support from the provincial government to cover their rent.

Ms Chan: To some degree. Some of those are very needy and get a fair percentage, and others do not get that much.

Mr Villeneuve: I noticed in your presentation you are quite happy to see a number of people who are not receiving support. Do you feel that the mix you now have, one third-two thirds, is sufficient to prevent ghettos and to prevent some of the negatives that you touched on?

Ms Chan: Yes.

Mr Villeneuve: Would you like to see it slightly different?

Ms Chan: No. I strongly believe that we need mixed-income communities and that we cannot concentrate all the low-income people in one area; nor can we concentrate all the high-income people in a separate area and make them exclusive.

Mr G. Wilson: Thanks for your presentation. I would like to hear what you think are some of the major factors in the growth of co-operative housing in this area. For instance, are you finding that there is a lot of interest and do you have a waiting list of people to get in? What are some of the things you could do and the government could help you with to promote the growth in this area?

Ms Chan: Right now in Kingston we are one of three co-operative developments. I am not sure of the total numbers, but I think there are maybe a little less than 300 units right now. Because we are fairly new, we do not have a waiting list yet, but I do know Lois Miller and Kingston Co-operative Homes. There are waiting lists there, and I know there are people who are interested in living in a co-operative development because the residents do some of the maintenance work. Therefore we are not putting in a lot of money towards maintenance, so we can keep our housing charges low, and I think that makes it attractive for a lot of people. One of the problems we are finding, as I mentioned in my presentation, is that we cannot find enough land to develop more co-operative housing. It just costs us too much, and it also costs us quite a bit to build a quality home that is suitable for modest-income people.

CLAIRE LESAGE

The Chair: The next person to appear before the committee is Ms LeSage, of the Paper Circuit.

Ms LeSage: My name is Claire LeSage and I have been a resident of Kingston for approximately 12 years. I am a single parent. Two years ago my mother and I embarked on a business venture together. Our business is a recycling firm. It is a new, emerging business. When we started, there was no other business in Kingston that was operating this kind of business. It is an emerging industry, and so it is wide open for all kinds of people to take part in it and it is also wide open for us to gain experience as we go. In other words, it has been a difficult process.

To give you a brief synopsis of how it works, what we do is we go out to businesses, the industrial, commercial and institutional sector in Kingston and Kingston township and as well in the Napanee and the Belleville areas, and we collect from businesses and schools. When we first started, we were collecting the paper free of charge. We would take it to our warehouse, and there we have to sort through it and pack it and then we sell it to a broker, who in turn sells it to a local mill. We were not able to sell directly to a mill because we did not have the major equipment necessary for sales of that scale.

I decided to come in front of the committee, though, because I have become aware that the tax structure that is set up for corporations is, in my opinion, unfair. It is very difficult for a small business to compete effectively with large corporations that can absorb some loss in certain areas of their business.

We would like to purchase new equipment, for which we have applied for funding, a loan. When we started the business, we did get a business loan. We had to put in a certain amount on our own, so we have been paying off the business loan while at the same time working in the community.

In the past two years of our operation we have diverted 800 tons of paper from local landfill. At a cost of $140 a ton to be hauled to landfill in the Ottawa area, that is a saving of $112,000 to the municipal government. This is what our business does. I am not looking for recognition for that sort of thing, but what I am here to say is that due to the tax structure, if our net profits are 98% of our gross profits, which is what they are, we cannot work effectively. We cannot do the business we need to do; we cannot compete against the larger companies.

We have a concern not only for hiring locally but also maintaining our service for local business. I am a graduate of Queen's University, and that was one of our first major contracts. We collect a ton and a half of paper a week from Queen's.

Now there is a larger firm that has come into town that would be able to move in on any one of our businesses simply because it can afford to offer more service, and think it can cover its taxes more easily than somebody who is making less money for what he does. The large conglomerate that comes into town with US ties has the ability to absorb loss, but as well it can funnel its profits into the United States—this is a possible scenario, this is not fact, where the tax structure may be less structured.

So my major complaint that I would like to present to the committee is that the tax structure should be fair for small businesses so that we can operate effectively in the community. It is a brand-new business, and if there was some sort of method by which our business either could pay less taxes or somehow have some benefit for what we do for the community—the large businesses in many ways are subsidized because they can get contracts for all across the country. They can work in every major city in the country, whereas a small business just starting out and having to pay the same tax structure does not reflect adequately, I do not think, the way our business is set up. By allowing the monopolies of these large companies of the emerging industry, small businesses and the local economy will suffer. Furthermore, the ethics and dignity of working, operating and starting a business account for a lot. We are concerned with employing local people. As I said, we take pride in maintaining the service we have been providing for local business.

That is the total of my presentation, very brief, but thank you for taking the time. I know it is a tough business.

Mr Jamison: Thank you, Ms LeSage, for a very interesting presentation. I commend you for the initiative of opening a small business. What we have heard today, especially in the area in which you operate, presents some problems in the area of recycling, and of course you find yourself in competition. I wonder if you could expand at all on your presentation by giving some suggestion of what you feel could be done beyond what you have already said.

Ms LeSage: One possible means that would make fair for small businesses starting out is that perhaps profit or our revenue could somehow be a base for what we would pay in taxes, similar to the way the taxing is set up now, so that people of higher income pay a higher tax. The same for large corporations: If your revenue is over a certain dollar figure, perhaps you fit into one tax structure, and if your revenue is below a dollar figure, then your tax structure would be different in that you would not have to pay the same percentage or as frequently; set it up somehow.

To give you a brief idea of what we had to pay just before the end of the month of August, our provincial business tax was over $500, our federal business tax was over $500 and our GST was $600. That is a total of $1,690 or thereabouts. That in one month presents a considerable hardship to a small firm where, as I said, our net income is perhaps 98% of our gross. Somehow somebody has to suffer. Also, starting out in a small business, for the first year I worked without wages at all and I lived on family benefits while raising my son. It was all very difficult because I had to balance the different working styles, but I think because tax structure is as it is, we have to pay as much, considering how much we make, as large corporations.

Mr Kwinter: I assume when you started out you got a venture loan.

Ms LeSage: Yes. We put up a certain amount of money and then the bank in turn gave us the—

Mr Kwinter: How long ago was that?

Ms LeSage: Two years ago.

Mr Kwinter: I cannot really comment, because I have not seen your operation, but it would seem to me that with a good accountant, and the fact that you borrowed money and you did not pay yourself wages for a year, you should not be paying any tax for some time because all of those expenses are tax deductible. Notwithstanding that they may have occurred in your first year, that should be carry-forward so that when you start making some money you can pay that down.

Ms LeSage: It is, yes. I understand. We had a loss in our first year of $2,000. We carried it forward to the second year. We do have an accountant, but again this is another benefit of large corporations. They can afford reams of expensive accountants who are experts in their field. We have a very good accountant, but according to our books we made $6,000 in our second year of operation including depreciation, etc. We did not see a whole lot of that. Because it said on paper that is what we made, we had to pay corporate taxes. So even if we have an accountant who can claim all of the expenses and balance things out so we do not have to pay taxes, it is still, in my opinion, a benefit of large corporations. I cannot look around for different accountants to figure out the best way to do this. Our accountant's bill alone was difficult in one month.

Mr Villeneuve: As you are well aware, small business will certainly have some difficulty whenever the total deficit, the total debt of the province, has doubled. Quite obviously someone will have to pay both the carrying charges and the reduction, if ever that occurs, of that provincial debt. Are you competing with American recycled newsprint when you are selling?

Ms LeSage: No, we do not deal in newsprint at all at this time. We are strictly in fine white paper. A fact that you may be interested to know is that of all the mills in Canada, two thirds of the paper they use to produce newspaper product is purchased from the United States.

Mr Villeneuve: Yes, I realize that.

Ms LeSage: So what we are doing is good for the local economy and the federal economy.

Mr Villeneuve: Do you do the de-inking yourself?

Ms LeSage: No, we do not. That is done at the mill.

Mr Villeneuve: So you are preparing the paper from the Kingston area here, bundling it and passing it on.

Ms LeSage: And shipping it out. We load it on to a tractor-trailer and then it goes to a mill.

Mr Villeneuve: You said 98% of your gross was profit. I believe you are talking about 2% to 3% of your gross being profit, as opposed to 98%.

Ms LeSage: Yes, thank you. It sounds too good.

Mr Villeneuve: I would like that business as well. Thank you.

AGAPE ASSOCIATION

The Chair: The next group we have is the Agape Association, Ms Diane Strong.

Ms Strong: My company is Agape Association. It is a Greek word meaning unconditional love. I counsel from a Christian perspective in my counselling practice. I am here today because I wanted to speak about social programs.

The first thing you have to know is I have never spoken out publicly about any political party in my life. I grew up in a very conservative county where you did not talk about politics; you just did it. I felt it was important that I speak today because I believe in Ontario we are seeing the dawn of a new era and I just wanted to reaffirm what I felt about that. I believe that the NDP government has spoken out and said that people are more important than profit. To me that is a tremendously important fact and the message is very important to abused women.

The perspective I speak from is as a Christian feminist. I have a four-year degree from Queen's University. I went back to school after being out 28 years and graduated in women's studies, and I have a year of theology in Toronto as well. I have been also doing private counselling for the last three and a half years, and I deal mostly with abused women or children who have been sexually abused.

I would like to begin this talk with a quote I found that I think really speaks on behalf of abused women. It is rather lengthy but I do believe it really fits our cause. It is called Women Waiting by Linda J. Bailey:

"Life will begin tomorrow, we tell ourselves. To many women, life is a game in which we are only pretending to participate. Somewhere underneath it all, we still hope we will wake up and find it was all a bad dream and then we will begin our 'real life'. In this 'real life' we will be happy, productive, protected, loved, creative and, of course, financially carefree. But in the meanwhile, we wait.

"We wait for Mom to do it for us. We wait for our breasts to grow. We wait for boys to get old enough to notice us. We wait to be asked to the prom. We wait to be accepted by a college. We wait for a prospective employer to call. We wait for our lover to call. We wait to be asked to be married. We wait for a raise or promotion. We wait for our baby to be born. We wait for our partners to come home. We wait for our partners to fix the washer. We wait for our children to begin school. We wait for our children to grow and leave home.

We wait for our periods to end. We wait for the hot flashes to be over.

We wait for some sign of recognition. We wait for our partners to retire.

We wait to die.

"Women are often protected from the real world and sold a bill of goods, a sugarplum-fairy, soft, safe world that has no relation to the real world at all. We have been trained to wait, to support others at the expense of ourselves, to negate our own needs, feelings and creative energy. We have been taught to distrust ourselves, our bodies and our personal power. We have been taught to not live our lives at all, but rather, submissively to serve others. We are sleeping beauties waiting frozen in a trance, for the kiss of the prince that will magically transform our lives and transform reality into the fairy tale we were weaned on. It is as if we are for ever waiting for our lives to begin."

Some women are still waiting, but others are choosing to take control of their lives and they need a helping hand from our government. To make genuine choices, abused women need three things: They need knowledge, they need freedom from coercion and they need access to alternatives. Without these three criteria we do not have genuine choice.

Due to the influence of the mass media, most women have knowledge of abuse. With shelters, housing and financial assistance comes access to alternatives. Abused women are able to make choices with freedom from coercion.

In times of restraint in the past, governments have cut social programs. Women and children, who are the major consumer of these services, get the message that they are unimportant, expendable, helpless. The NDP government in Ontario today is publicly committed to funding social programs in this budget.

A powerful message has been sent to abused women. This message is that people are more important than profit. Our government has shown integrity. The NDP government cares about the people of this province. Women will be able to survive apart from abusive relationships. Women will continue to have access to alternatives in the future. Due to the commitment of the NDP government, women will continue to have genuine choice and women in Ontario will not have to wait for Prince Charming.

That is all I would like to say right now, and if there are any questions I would be glad to answer them.

Mr G. Wilson: Thank you very much for your presentation. It certainly has put into perspective some of the constituencies in the community that have to be served by this budget, because it was suggested by an earlier speaker that in fact a lot of the people who are receiving this kind of benefit are undeserving. I was wondering, from your perspective, not necessarily whether these people are undeserving but what that does to them when they are considered to be undeserving. Is that an added burden that they have to bear?

Ms Strong: Most definitely. I was an abused wife for 18 years and I also was a victim of incest as a child and grew up believing that I did not deserve to be happy and did not deserve a good life. The turning point came for me in 1984 when a government program allowed me to go to Algonquin College and take a business refresher. During that time I learned to do algebra, and I had never been allowed to do algebra. I said if I can do that, then I can do anything with God's help. The programs were in place that allowed me to go to Queen's University and to speak to others, and I now train ministers to recognize symptoms of child sexual abuse in their churches and youth leaders. Most definitely, the biggest hurdle to get over with women is that they deserve a good life and we are not responsible for what happened to us when we were children.

Mr G. Wilson: This seems to me it is an advance, that this knowledge was not available—it might have been available but it was not, say, accepted or not so widely accepted. I was wondering whether you see networking forming that will then promote this in the community.

Ms Strong: Many of the networks that are in place right now are reaching out. One of the most important ones, I feel, is in the courts with the mediation, and we have a pilot project in Kingston. What happens in mediation cases is each person in the case is empowered to speak. They are allowed to take control of their own lives and say what is good for them. I think that is a trend that is happening across the province. I am seeing more of it and it is very rewarding in counselling to see women stand on their feet and say: "I am not going to take it any more. I am going to do something with my life."

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation. It was quite refreshing.

The committee recessed at 1153.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1304.

JUSTICE AND PEACE COMMISSION OF THE ROMAN CATHOLIC ARCHDIOCESE OF KINGSTON

The Chair: We have the Justice and Peace Commission of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Kingston. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs for the budget review. If you could identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard, you may begin your presentation.

Mr Matthews: My colleague and I are here this afternoon as representatives of the Justice and Peace Commission of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Kingston. My name is Geoff Matthews; my colleague is John Gomes. I am chairman of the commission; Mr Gomes is the co-ordinator.

Our commission is made up of 12 members representing the different regions of the Kingston archdiocese. Members have come from as different places as Kingston, Belleville, Brockville, Westport, Stella on Amherst Island, Wolfe Island, Perth and Thomasburg. Our role as a commission is to promote understanding of Catholic social teaching within the Catholic population and to represent a Catholic perspective on social issues as we understand them to the wider community. It is in this latter role that we appear before you today.

The perspective from which we draw our point of view is a living tradition of Catholic social teaching that celebrates its 100th anniversary this year. A hundred years ago Pope XIII put out the papal encyclical Rerum Novarum, and that began 100 years of social teaching; it is 100 years old this year and it continues. The written documents and statements on social issues made by Catholic Church leaders over the past 100 years represent a dialogue between the modern social reality and the Christian gospel. As such, we believe this teaching has relevance far beyond the denominational limits of the Catholic Church and we hope this will be the case throughout our presentation today.

What concerns us regarding the budget: Many commentators have reacted very strongly to the Ontario budget deficit of $9.7 billion. While we recognize that this deficit is large, it in itself does not represent our major concern. We believe that Canada as a whole and Ontario in particular are facing something far more serious than a predictable economic downturn in the business cycle. Rather a major restructuring of the economy as a whole is taking place and extraordinary means have to be taken to minimize the devastating effects of such change on ordinary people.

We reject the idea that market forces alone will sort everything out to the benefit of all. This is patently false. As Pope John Paul II points out in his latest social encyclical, Centesimus Annus, which was released at the beginning of May of this year, "There are many human needs which find no place on the market, yet it is a strict duty of justice and truth not to allow fundamental human needs to remain unsatisfied and not to allow those burdened by such needs to perish."

We do, however, recognize that the size of this budget deficit does place a major responsibility on the government to spend the public's money wisely and in the best interests of all Ontario citizens. We have three concerns to raise regarding the manner in which the budget is spent. These concerns are in the area of health care, employment and social assistance to the economically disadvantaged.

We are all aware of the enormous pressures on the health care system in Ontario. Our region is no exception. By way of example, provincial care to the handicapped has been cut back in the Kingston area. Hospitals like the Great War Memorial Hospital in Perth and the Carleton Place and District Memorial Hospital in Carleton Place are both caught in monetary negotiations with the ministry which are affecting their ability to deliver adequate health care to their communities. This is by no means a complete list, simply a few examples to illustrate the effects on people's lives when the government is strapped for money and hard decisions have to be made.

Yet in spite of these and similar situations across the province, the government has decided, according to press reports of June 20 last, to launch what we see as the promotion of abortion throughout the province. Health care money is now available to finance the operating expenses of abortion clinics and the training of doctors in abortion procedures.

We find it incredible that the government of Ontario would make such a decision given the fact that a large number of Ontario citizens regard abortion as the unlawful taking of a human life. This action implicates the government itself in the eyes of these citizens in activities contrary to the moral principle that the right to life itself is the first and most important of all human rights.

I would like to make some addresses regarding structural changes within the economy. In our opening remarks we stated that the changes taking place in the Ontario economy today are, in our opinion, of a fundamental nature. Technological and political developments driven largely by the corporate sector have been transforming the ways of people earning their living. First of all, there has been an enormous loss of full-time, permanent jobs in meaningful work in Ontario. Second, the nature of work itself is changing to part-time, insecure patterns of employment. We believe these are the two most negative results to date of the economic restructuring that has been taking place for some time.

Unemployment and underemployment represent for us grave social evils, social sin as we prefer to call them, particularly when planned and premeditated, as seems to be the case. Pope John Paul II recently reminded us that "in the developed countries too, there are still pockets of people who are marginalized especially because of unemployment and underemployment. For these people the principle of 'justice for the weakest' retains all of its timeliness." The source of that quotation is Osservatore Romano of February of this year.

Our position then is one of support for all initiatives in this budget that protect permanent jobs and increase permanent employment and encourage meaningful work. The protection of Ontario public servants' jobs, the creation of 70,000 jobs mainly in construction, the $57 million to small manufacturing companies; these are examples in the budget we commend.

However, there is one concern we would like to raise. Our reading of the budget indicates little in the way of structural changes that are needed to counter the negative impact of the economic restructuring now taking place. We would like to have seen items in the budget encouraging the formation of worker co-operatives, worker takeovers of companies that are closing viable operations and other forms of community-based enterprises. In this regard, we applaud the government's efforts to save the Spruce Falls paper mill, as well as other such initiatives it may be undertaking along these lines.

In the housing sector, we welcome the 10,000 non-profit units slated to be built, but we would urge maximum use of co-operative ventures to accomplish this task. It is our conviction that the broad sweep of economic policies in this budget should promote more democratization of enterprise involving worker, community and neighbourhood participation. The 1986 statement of the United States conference of Catholic bishops on the American economy seems to us to be particularly relevant to our own situation, and this is a direct quotation from that document:

"If increased participation and collaboration can help a firm avoid collapse, why should it not give added strength to healthy businesses? Co-operative ownership is particularly worthy of consideration in new entrepreneurial enterprises.

"In the principle of subsidiarity, Catholic social teaching has long stressed the importance of small- and intermediate-sized communities or institutions in exercising moral responsibility. These mediating structures link the individual to society as a whole in a way that gives people greater freedom and power to act"—and a very real sense of belonging and participation. Excuse me, that is my comment away from the quotation. Going back to the quotation: "Such groups include families, neighbourhoods, church congregations, community organizations, civic and business associations, public interest and advocacy groups, community development corporations, and many other bodies...."

"New co-operative structures of local ownership will give the community or region an added stake in businesses and even more importantly give these businesses a greater stake in the community. Government on the local, state and national levels must play a significant role, especially through tax structures that encourage investment in hard-hit areas and through funding aimed at conservation and basic infrastructure needs."

On the matter of social assistance to the economically disadvantaged, this budget calls for a $215 million expenditure for social assistance reform. These reforms were outlined by the minister on Tuesday, August 20. Our position has been to support the recommendations of the Back on Track report, released earlier this year. We wrote to Mr Rae on that matter and we got an excellent reply from him. In so far as the announcements made by the minister coincide with those of Back on Track, we welcome them.

However, we have a deeper and more long-term concern about social assistance in general. Our concern arises from the fact that one of the possible outcomes of the current changes in Ontario's economic restructuring is the number of people who will be left permanently unemployed. As the Canadian bishops warned in their 1983 statement on the economy, we could be left with a new class of people—the so-called techno-peasants.

For this reason we believe that moneys spent on social assistance reform in the province should move toward creating a more just system that respects the dignity of recipients of aid. The concrete proposal we would like to promote is the replacement of our current welfare program by a form of guaranteed annual income. Such a program was recommended by the Macdonald commission—originally put forward by the federal Liberal government—the same commission that recommended the free trade agreement with the United States. While the free trade agreement has in fact been implemented, the guaranteed annual income has until recently been put aside.

We are encouraged in our efforts to promote a form of guaranteed annual income to replace social welfare programs by the release last month, on July 3, of a favourable study on the subject by the Economic Council of Canada. We realize that study and discussion in the past has concerned itself with a federal program. What we are saying here is that Ontario should push ahead with its own reforms with a view to the ultimate setting up of a guaranteed annual income within the province.

Thank you for your kind attention to our presentation.

The Chair: Thank you. We have two minutes for three parties to split up.

Mr G. Wilson: Thanks a lot for your very thoughtful and provoking presentation. You covered a lot of areas, and of course we are hearing other views of this as well. One question in response might be, what do the bishops in particular, but say the Catholic Church in general, know about economics? Why should you be able to talk about economics in the way you have?

Mr Matthews: The Catholic Church has always brought a moral perspective to our economic views, and it is interesting that a number of economic proposals throughout history have been put forward. A recent one that is now becoming passé was communism, but it was popular there for a while. The Catholic Church spoke out against that. It historically pointed out the flaws which I suggest we are seeing today coming true. Similarly, in the very recent encyclical of Pope John Paul II, Centesimus Annus, which was released at the beginning of May this year, he pointed out that he was not suggesting an argument based on a certain economic technique but that the Western capitalist system must not be allowed to run roughshod over the poor without moral responsibility, because it will be just as great an error as totalitarian communism has obviously been.

Mr G. Wilson: I just wanted to—

The Chair: I am sorry, Mr Wilson, your time has run out.

Mr G. Wilson: That was not two minutes.

The Chair: Yes, but divided among the three parties and the answer was longer. I would like to thank you for your presentation here before this committee.

The first presenters, the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, did not appear at 1 o'clock. The committee is had a half-hour and a lot of the presenters say it is unfair that some of them walk in the room and have to present right away and some of them are not here as yet, so we will take a recess until 1:45.

The committee recessed at 1324.

PAUL GERVAN

The Chair: The next presenter is Paul Gervan of the St. Asia Co. You have 15 minutes for your presentation.

Mr Gervan: I appreciate the opportunity to make my views known on the current budget. I am a small business person from Seeley's Bay, which is just north of here. I am also an active environmentalist in this area and have been for some years. I am a member of the NDP, to be frank with you. I support the party and this budget initiative. Beyond all that, I am someone who cares deeply about the future of this province and the future of the planet.

My reason for speaking to you this afternoon is to counter what I perceive to be very one-dimensional, shallow and predictable reporting of the budget by the media. I think that reflects itself in the public opinion we have seen, on a superficial basis, of the budget. This shallow and predictable reporting of the budget I think is understandable given the ownership of the media, whether it be the Cutham group, Thomson, Baton Broadcasting or whatever. The interests of the media show themselves in the coverage of this attempt to do something different with our economic system.

The media coverage most of us have been subjected to is characterized by several myths. One of them is that small business and indeed most informed opinion are unilaterally opposed to the budget. I contend that is not so. The second myth would be that the budget is fiscally irresponsible. I believe it is not. When I went to university we were taught about Keynesian economics and the simplified theory, of course, was that governments should act to counteract countercyclically by building deficits during hard times to stimulate economic activity. I believe that is in part what this budget is attempting to do.

Another myth that I think is prevalent is that the budget is bad for the province; the rather alarmist headlines that the socialist hordes were going to spend us out of existence and bankrupt the province. I think this is a gross simplification and largely inaccurate. With regard to its impact on the province, one perhaps novel approach I will have is to deal with its impact on the environment.

First of all, dealing with myth one, that business and informed opinion are in fact opposed to the budget: I had been feeling the media coverage I was subjected to, and I am sure you were during the release of the budget, could have been scripted well before the release of the budget. It is as very predictable in that it quoted chairmen of banks, manufacturers' associations, chambers of commerce and so on as being of course opposed to the budget. We even got extensive third-hand coverage through Brian Mulroney of the views of Hong Kong taxi drivers on the budget. Those looking for more balanced and objective opinions had to scour the inner pages of newspapers days after the budget was released to find more objective coverage of the budget.

One thing that caught my eye was a piece in the New York Times by Professor John Kenneth Galbraith, who most of us are familiar with as the pre-eminent Harvard economist. I am going to quote briefly from a piece that he wrote for the New York Times. Some people may be familiar with it, but I think it bears repeating. He says in part:

"It is truly remarkable to encounter an issue of major popular concern and discover that most everyone agrees on how to respond to it. That issue is the recession and what to do about it. The response by all levels of government is an array of measures designed to make it worse. With the notable exception of the province of Ontario, governments everywhere are tightening budgets, curtailing services, reducing payrolls, furloughing workers or promising to do so. Individuals immediately affected, needless to say, have their spending and resulting support to the economy promptly reduced.

"Many under threat of unemployment are impelled to retrench. So are those receiving welfare and other payments now being threatened with curtailment. It is in this regard that the Ontario government is leading the way. It has decided to cut taxes for people with low incomes, to provide more money for social assistance, affordable housing and capital projects, to offer loans for business hurt by the recession and to look seriously at creating its own pool of investment capital to help invigorate the provincial economy."

Others who have supported the budget are James Frank, the chief economist of the Conference Board of Canada, who called the budget "a confidence-builder that will help Canada emerge from the recession." I would cite also Mike McCracken, president of Informetrica, who called the budget "a move in the right direction." A move in the right direction might indeed characterize the general opinion of an interesting panel, the panel on national issues that the CBC puts on the Morningside program in which Dalton Camp, Eric Kierans and Stephen Lewis had a rare moment of agreement in that all three of those people from diverse political outlooks and economic views, I think it would be fair to say, summarized the budget as a move in the right direction.

I would further cite myself as a local business person in support of this budget. As you no doubt know, it is small business that has been the engine of economic activity in the past decade and it is small business that will lead us out of this recession. It is small business that is hurting now, that is obviously in distress. A year ago I was looking for office space in the downtown area of Kingston and was distressed to see how much vacant space there was in shop fronts and so on in the Kingston area. This morning I had an opportunity to be walking in that same area and found that almost all the places I was looking at a year ago are still vacant and in fact many more have become vacant since that time.

It is no surprise, I am sure, that small business and certainly the retail sector, which reflect the sort of lack of spending power and so on, are in very real dire straits. The economy needs stimulation. That is obvious. When I look around at my colleagues in the small business sphere that I am familiar with, everyone is complaining about low sales at low margins producing low profits and of course resulting in low taxes, low revenues being remitted to the government.

The question is, how much of this spending deficit is due to the recession and how much is uncontrolled spending by the government? The majority of the $9.7-billion deficit is due to the recession. Lower revenues, the impact of federal government cutbacks in transfer payments and higher welfare costs account for about $5 billion of this amount. Only a small portion, $1.5 billion, of the deficit is for new programs or services put in place by this government, such as the social assistance reforms and the wage protection fund. The remaining $3.2 billion is accounted for primarily by expenditures needed to maintain levels of service in existing programs, which of course begs the question of which programs we would then cut in our service sector and education and health care and so on. I do not think too many of us would be prepared to see a decrease in services in those regards.

So I welcome this budget. I have hopes that it will act to in part stimulate the economy and get us out of this unprecedented recession that we are in. I welcome the $700-million anti-recession spending and the 18,000 jobs that will generate. I welcome the construction of 10,000 non-profit housing units and the 20,000 jobs that will hopefully create. I wish it could be more.

I welcome $57 million in support payments to small and medium-sized manufacturers. I welcome $40 million in farm income stabilization and $50 million in interest relief for farmers. I welcome funding increases at greater than the rate of inflation for hospitals, school boards, colleges and municipalities. These measures will stimulate this moribund economy.

The last area I choose to deal with is the effect of the budget on the environment. This is an area which I think has been overlooked. Almost all economic decisions we make have impacts on the environment and we must come to terms with that sooner or later. Let's be clear that money spent on the environment is not an expenditure but rather an investment, not only an intangible investment in the future and the quality of life for our children, but in most cases a financial investment with very real financial returns. I would cite some examples of this.

The $28 million which is committed to expand the blue box recycling and, I would say more important, the waste reduction campaign by the Ministry of the Environment will save us in landfill costs in the future; it will stimulate an indigenous recycling industry and it will reduce waste. Our society, our economy, our industry is one of the more wasteful in the western industrial world and anything that can be done to move it towards a more efficient and competitive position will aid the economy and those industries. The reduction of waste will move our businesses and industry towards a leaner, more efficient and economically competitive way to do business.

I welcome the Ministry of Energy's 75% increase in spending, bringing it up to $10 million for new and expanded energy-efficiency initiatives. The initiatives will save consumers money by lowering the demand for energy and will enhance our competitive position in a world moving increasingly to more energy-efficient homes, vehicles, machinery and industry.

Here is an analysis that I have not heard in the media coverage. It falls under the category of money not spent. A moratorium on the construction of new nuclear generating stations and the new commitment of Ontario Hydro to the most aggressive energy conservation program ever undertaken in North America will save the taxpayers of this province huge amounts of money in saved energy and avoided costs of constructing hugely expensive nuclear plants.

I have no doubts that, had the Liberals or Conservatives been elected in September of last year, we would be facing right now the construction of the twin to the Darlington nuclear station, part B, the additional four units to make eight units. What many of us have lost track of is the fact that the Darlington nuclear station started out with projected costs of $2 billion, which is a huge sum of money. The station is still not completed, it is still not without problems, and the cost now is $13.5 billion. These sums of money dwarf many of the cuts in social expenditures that more conservative people would have us undertake.

The fact is that we do not need these nuclear stations if we implement energy conservation programs. The fact is that there are still very real safety concerns. I would cite the example of the Nine Mile Point reactor. There was an accident right across the lake from us here just last week that reflects the concerns of many people about nuclear safety. The fact is that the first four reactors of the Darlington station are proving to be a huge economic white elephant.

This is something I would cite in this budget which is not necessarily an item in the budget but it is money not spent, which is just as important as money spent. Conservation is an investment, not an expenditure, so money spent by the Ministry of Energy on Ontario Hydro on energy conservation should be treated as an investment in the future with very real payback in both economic and environmental terms.

Another laudable feature of the budget is its fuel conservation initiatives. Fuel conservation will be encouraged by increasing provincial taxes on diesel fuel and gasoline. To reinforce the energy efficiency message, the current rate of gas guzzler tax on new vehicles will be doubled and two new rate thresholds added to capture more fuel-efficient vehicles. Further, in the area of public transit, to provide an alternative to the private car, $48 million will be provided in 1991-92 for the Let's Move transit expansion program; $11 million dollars of this funding will be used for environmental assessments to ensure sound environmental planning.

The more I learn about the environment and about the fate of the earth that we all face, the more I become convinced that the single most important thing that any of us can do to alleviate environmental degradation is the conservation of energy. Its impact on global warming, on pollutants in our local areas—

The Chair: Mr Gervan, I am sorry, I have got to go, you off.

Mr Gervan: I am just finishing here.

The Chair: I am sorry, but we have only 15 minutes. We have eight presenters, so if I run over about two or three minutes on each one—

Mr Gervan: I have three sentences left. I would have appreciated a warning of 30 seconds or something.

Mr B. Ward: Be quick.

Mr Gervan: Okay. Fine. From the standpoint of a small business person, I am hopeful that this budget will stimulate and kickstart the economy. From the standpoint of an environmentalist, I applaud its measures to move us towards energy efficiency and conservation. From the standpoint of a parent, I applaud the willingness of the government of Ontario to invest in the future.

The Chair: Okay. Thank you for your presentation.

ED AGARAND

The Chair: The next presenter is Ed Agarand. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. You have 15 minutes for your presentation.

Mr Agarand: Good afternoon. My main concerns today are, one, Ryandale House for the homeless and, two, the actual Ontario budget. First of all, I would like to discuss Ryandale House.

Ryandale House is a place for people who have no money. People who are destitute eventually end up in the downtown area. They eventually muster up enough courage to approach a church and ask for assistance. This means that it is mostly the downtown area churches that end up supporting homeless people.

Approximately five years ago, 21 area churches decided to form an organization where these people could be referred to. This organization would provide overnight lodgings and meals. Depending on the situation of the person, referrals would be made to other organizations that specialize in that person's situation.

Only 20% of these churches now support our organization in a financial manner. We therefore find ourselves approaching different community agencies and organizations for support. We have approached the provincial government for support, but since we do not currently provide long-term housing, we are not eligible for funding.

At Ryandale we receive approximately 600 clients per year. Although the intention is overnight accommodation, one of our clients stay two or three nights. In very extreme circumstances, our house manager has the authority to extend a stay up to 10 days. We are the only facility which takes in men or women and even families.

We have five single beds and a room reserved for families at our facility. We charge $15 a night for people who are able to pay. Normally, approximately $900 to $1,000 per month is generated in this manner. We also receive $40 monthly from local churches. It can therefore be assumed that in any given month Ryandale will generate approximately $1,600.

The problem is that to function adequately it will cost $40 per bed-night. Since we generate 150 bed-nights per month at approximately 85% to 90% capacity, we require $6,000 per month to operate adequately. We are therefore short $4,400 monthly.

People who are no longer eligible for unemployment insurance benefits and who are passing through Kingston looking for work also stay at Ryandale.

I would suggest that the provincial government review our situation and seriously consider assisting our organization in a financial manner. That is presented by myself as the board chairman of Ryandale House.

The next situation I would like to address is the actual Ontario budget, reference page 90 of the 1991 Ontario Budget. While going over the actual budget here, I see that most of the money generated in Ontario comes from personal income tax. In looking at the amount of corporation income tax, as opposed to personal income tax, I see that in the 1989-90 tax year, personal income tax was almost 300% of corporate income tax. I find that a little bit hard to take. In the 1990-91 taxation year, the personal income tax is over 400% of the corporate income tax generated in Ontario. In 1991-92, the personal income tax is over 500% of that generated by the corporations in Ontario. I really find this hard to take.

In the Ontario budget the projection is that we are going to increase the personal income tax in Ontario by approximately 20%, from $13.5 billion to almost $16 billion. Problem: How are we going to generate that income tax if people do not have jobs?

I would like to tell you that I am unemployed right now. I cannot generate any income tax for this province. I was working at a government facility. I came here faithfully from Thunder Bay to a government facility. I am now unemployed. I cannot give this government any help to run this province because I do not have any money. I have no way to pay income tax to this province. You do not necessarily have to feel sorry for me. I would suggest that this government has to get me back working somehow so that I can sponsor this government to keep working itself, because one day, what are you going to do if you have no more money left? We are going to have to go somewhere and we cannot go to Ryandale. I know that.

Anyway, those are my concerns. While the personal income tax revenues are expected to increase by approximately 20%—that means that people like me, theoretically, who are working are going to increase their personal income tax in Ontario by 20%—for corporations, between 1989 and 1992, the corporate tax level will decrease by almost 30%.

I know these guys have more money than I do. I know they have more money than you people do and the people behind me. I honestly think that we should look at where we are generating our income from in this province. Thank you. If you have any questions I can answer, I will try.

Mr Villeneuve: Thank you for your presentation. You did not make the statement, but I think you insinuated that Ontario is the most heavily taxed jurisdiction in Canada and indeed in North America. I think tax freedom day in Ontario is August 2 this year, the latest of anyone.

You came here with a job with the government of Ontario. You no longer have a job. You have been speaking to people in businesses. What, in your opinion, is the reaction to people who look at the very large deficit? Mr Laughren, by his own admission, is telling us that it will cost $15 million of additional dollars because of our credit rating having gone down, just on what we already owe, and he is planning to double the total debt of the province by 1994. Could you just comment on those things, as someone who came here with a job and no longer has a job, and from your perspective?

Mr Agarand: My perspective is—I cannot really give you one. All I can do is look at this budget, what I see here. For example, we are paying $403 million out in UTDC loan guarantees. This is the company that I came here with. So this government today is getting stuck with $403 million of something that a government initiated back in 1982 that is no longer here. Again, I am sorry that it is our government today that has to pay this off, but I cannot do anything about it. As for your question, I do not think I really answered it.

Ms M. Ward: Thank you for your presentation. I appreciate your comments about the tax system. I am sure you are aware of the Fair Tax Commission that has been established and that is studying the tax system in Ontario. Overall, I wonder if you have any comments on that. I think if we look at the tax system in Ontario and in Canada, it is an unfair system. If we had services such as you are providing—you are not receiving any funding, but if we look at social services as a whole, the municipalities are paying a share of those now and it is generating a lot of difficulty for some of the municipalities. If we had a taxation system where such services were funded through income taxes at a provincial and federal level rather than municipal, and all forms of income were taxable, meaning that you could not have all the tax breaks which higher-income people have access to—do you have any comments on the Fair Tax Commission?

Mr Agarand: Fair taxation I would like to comment on, in that there are ways to beat the income tax system. Poor me, I'm destitute. Let's say I am destitute. I owe Revenue Canada $1,400, which I did last year, because I could not pay my 1990 income tax. I was unemployed that year too. So Revenue Canada is haunting me. "Mr Agarand, we want you to pay your income tax that you owe us." How am I going to do it? "I've got an idea. I'll rent out my house." So that is what I did. I rented out my house, and do you know what? I made money renting out my house and I put it in my right-hand pocket, and then I looked at my income tax and it said: "Mr Agarand, you can deduct this now, you can deduct this now and you can deduct this now. You can deduct the interest that you paid on your mortgage. That is applicable to the area of your house that you rented out."

So although I made, let's assume, $5,000 and put it in my right-hand income tax, I was able to tell Revenue Canada, "Here, Mr Revenue Canada, I lost $10,000, and therefore I now have a tax loss." But I put that $5,000 in this pocket. I walked away with it, and I lost $10,000 out of this pocket.

Ms M. Ward: On paper.

Mr Agarand: On paper. Now we know where the money is going. People are just taking it and running away with it. In 1986, I had an idea. I even went and started my own corporation, and it was a good idea at the time. It was too bad Via Rail is not running any more the way it used to or I would be making a lot of money. At that time, reading over how corporations operate, etc, and all the deductions that you can get, do you realize I would have been able to retire now, and I just turned 40?

The Chair: Your time is up, sir, and I appreciate your comments here today. Thank you.

KEN OHTAKE

The Chair: We have Mr Ken Ohtake. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. For your presentation on the budget review, you have 15 minutes.

Mr Ohtake: Thank you. I think we will have lots of time.

Good afternoon and welcome to Kingston. I am grateful for the opportunity that this committee provides for ordinary people to have their opinions heard on the subject of the government's budget.

My name is Ken Ohtake. I am a Canadian of Japanese origin whose family roots in Canada extend four generations. I grew up in the Regent Park-Cabbagetown area of Toronto and settled in Kingston 14 years ago. I have worked for 20 years with Ontarians who have been considered at the margins of our society and economy: people with physical disabilities, people with developmental handicaps, people who have needed the protection of human rights legislation. I am pleased to be currently employed by a social service organization providing support to people who are re-entering our community often following extended stays in psychiatric hospitals. However, while I know the remarks I am about to make are wide held, I speak for myself.

One of the most eminent social commentators of the past decade, Father Guido Sarducci, in an essay entitled The Ninety Minute University, observes that five years after graduation—I think it is five years; I may have the numbers wrong—from longer academic programs, physics graduates remember $E=mc^2$, historians remember that in 1492 Columbus sailed the ocean blue and English majors remember that it is "i" before "e" except after "c." He says nothing about political scientists, which may reflect what he thinks they recall. Regarding economists, Father Guido Sarducci states that they remember supply and demand.

From my four years of economics, I remember another homily: The solution to any economic problem is a political question.

I am overjoyed that the economic problems of this recession—I am not overjoyed with the problems—including unemployment, plant closures, loss of employment, increased need for social support are at long last being addressed by a government whose political answers take into account the basic reason for the existence of all of our society's economic and social institutions, which I believe to be to make things better. Those political beliefs include the notion that investment in the social and physical health of ordinary people blossoms upward throughout the economy.

opposed to the discredited notion that investment in healthy corporations will trickle down. I think it blossoms and I am glad we are now seeing policies that reflect that belief.

Many of the people whom I work with consider themselves survivors, survivors of a system of psychiatric care in which they believe cares more for the caring institution at the expense of intended recipients of care. Others are satisfied that they have been served well by the medical care system and can resume lives in our community.

Both groups remain concerned about the decency of our lives, decency which is hard to attain at less than $600 per month on disability pension; decency which results from being able to contribute back into our society and have a sense that they are part of the society, and a society that accepts them; decency which is enhanced by economic optimism whereby people who are able to work can work and where others are embraced without condescension; decency which uplifts the society at large.

I receive with great enthusiasm and hope this budget, a budget which views a significant yet politically comparable deficit as both a social and economic investment. I am convinced that the payback will be a healthier society and a healthier economy for both our children and ourselves. I think the payback is not going to be that far off.

Mr Christopherson: I thank you very much for an excellent presentation. I think you provide a number of thought-provoking ideas. I particularly liked what you said about blossoming up as opposed to trickling down. I would say to you that your observations are very accurate in terms of what we are attempting to do with the budget and what we are attempting to achieve for the future of the province.

You talked a little bit towards the end of your presentation about payback and that we would have healthier people and a healthier economy. Again, we do see the money that we have spent and maintained in certain areas of the economy to be an investment, an investment in the people of this province, an investment in our future, quite frankly.

Could you give a little more detail, be a little more specific in terms of—I will put it to you this way—how could you argue to someone who said to you that money spent on the education system, on the health care system, is not an investment, that those are non-returnable monies? How would you argue that indeed it is an investment that will pay a return?

Mr Ohtake: I think we are living in a world society, a global society. First of all, I would like to address the question in terms of investment in education. Increasingly, it is a knowledge-based society. Knowledge is not something that we can yet just plug into at night and have by morning. It is a longer-term process and it is a process which is going to require significant investment. We have to make it. I think that nations that have perhaps neglected that side have done so at their peril, with perhaps an imbalance of funds going to areas such as defence. I think of the situation the Soviet Union finds itself in now. Even with the liberalization and the freedoms it now has, it is going to take a long time to catch up in terms of providing the basic needs for that society. I think we need to keep our vision on education and our children's needs as well as our own.

With regard to social services and health services, I think a healthy society is a healthy society and you cannot overinvest. I work in community mental health as opposed to institutional mental health. I think there is an edge that I would grind, in that perhaps money could be better spent. However, I think it cannot be simply pulled out and not reinvested. The notion, for example, that deinstitutionalization from psychiatric hospitals and other institutions was going to save us money is a fallacy because the money simply has to be reinvested in other forms of services.

Finally, in terms of one comment I would make with regard to disability pensions and the money that the people I am in daily contact with are receiving—and I guess it might be considered a bit of cheap shot—I do not know any of them who shop across the border. The money they get is spent on this side, in this community, for basic necessities. Hopefully, that kind of investment, that blossoming up is what is going to continue to keep our economy strong and strengthen it through these very difficult times and to a brighter time in the future.

The Chair: I have to cut you off.

Mr Sterling: I have a great concern for the people you represent and my concern is that if we spend 20% of our budget servicing debt, that means any future government only has 80% left to take care of or help people who need the care of the government. Now we are spending about 12% or 13% of our budget to service that debt. The federal government spends about 25% to 26% of what it spends to service its debt. They spend about 35% of what they collect. There is a difference, because they operate with a deficit as well.

My concern is that the Treasurer has brought in a budget which not only incurs a huge deficit this year but also a huge deficit in the next four years. What happens to the next government that comes in and says: "We want to take care and we have to take care of these people. We want to improve their lives"? If we do not have any fiscal responsibility or any attempt to reprioritize how we are spending, or there is no attempt to hold down the lid on the expenditure side, which is what has happened here, then how is any government going to take care of the people in the future?

Mr Ohtake: I return to the comment that the solution to any economic problem is a political question. The political question seems to me to hinge on one's belief. I believe that a deficit which is comparable to other jurisdictions and one which is, I suppose, wisely invested is going to make what is currently 12% or your feared 20% perhaps smaller by virtue of making the pie bigger. If we can have a more vigorous economy as a result of people feeling better, then surely part of being effective as a worker is how you feel about what you are doing. If you are feeling positively, I think—well, it may not be money in the bank, but I think it helps to make the pie bigger, and by making the pie bigger, the percentage that deficit or the debt service represents is going to be smaller.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Ohtake, for your presentation.

KINGSTON WASTE NOT

The Chair: The next group is Kingston Waste Not, Mr Jim Martin. Welcome. You have 15 minutes for your presentation.

Mr Martin: Thank you very much. I own and operate a small company in Kingston, as you mentioned, Kingston Waste Not. It is a commercial services recycler. We largely recycle corrugated cardboard. It was for us a market created only when the city and the township council of Kingston earlier this year decided they were not going to allow corrugated to go to the landfill sites any more. Having not much to do and having watched another of my businesses fail at the beginning of the recession, I thought it was a good opportunity to start a business that might end off with a bang as the recession ended with a whimper.

However, I do not believe the recession has ended with a whimper. I also do not believe we are going to be out of the woods for a long while because we see that high unemployment is going to continue for many years, if the recovery following the recession of the early 1980s is any benchmark. For this reason, I believe the spring 1991 budget that was introduced by the Ontario government is a laudable step, a step in the right direction. I have always believed that if people pay their taxes all their lives there should be a reasonable expectation that those of us who are not well off or those of us who are not well taken care of should be taken care of to some extent. I think the budget shows a degree of conviction that is not readily apparent in other budgets tabled throughout provincial legislatures and in the federal Parliament this year.

If there is one beef or one disagreement I have with the provincial budget, it is the same disagreement I have with every budget I can remember seeing throughout my lifetime, and that is that there is always a quick reflex to tax fuel to a greater and greater extent. Since my business is dependent on the operation of vehicles, it becomes ever more expensive as taxes on fuel go up. So I would like, modestly, to suggest an alternative which is used in some states in the United States, and that is that when you buy your licence plate you buy a licence sticker that allows you to buy fuel at a rate that will be rebated at some point in the future or is rebated at the pump.

For those of us who operate vehicles, for those of us who are contributing to the economy of this province, we have no alternative but to drive our vehicles. If we are going to pay a higher licence tax at the beginning of the year and can look forward to a somewhat discounted fuel price through the rest of the year, then it may certainly help some marginal operators. Since I am sure that no one wants to antagonize the independent owner-operators association any more in this province, it might be an idea whose time can finally come to Ontario. If a licence sticker is granted to vehicles that are part of the operations of an Ontario registered corporation or partnership, then it should be able to see that this complies with article 1402 of the free trade agreement, if in fact you care about complying with the free trade agreement.

I would like to spend the rest of my time here talking about something that was popular during the last recession has been popular with some of us for a long, long time, but does not seem to be getting much attention as we are supposed to be leaving this recession, that is, a comprehensive industrial policy.

Canada and the United States are alone in the world as the only notable industrial countries without a comprehensive industrial strategy. Even such a very conservative country as South Africa has an industrial strategy, which targets key players in the economy, key sectors. They discount the tax rates, they provide grants, they provide startup funding.

I think what would make me even happier than seeing the spring budget in 1991 is to see a spring budget in 1992 that addresses concerns for industrial policy. We have seen in Canada always experienced the benefits of a mixed economy: small and large corporations, domestic and foreign-owned corporations, as well as a mix of private and public enterprise in the economy.

Even a basic step such as setting tariff rates shows that the government has a place in the industrial economy and ought to continue that. By targeting certain emerging technologies, certain emerging industries, we may be able to replace the horrendous loss that we as a province have suffered as a result of the recession and the free trade agreement. I think many people are being less than honest when they look at the devastation of the industrial economy in Ontario and do not recognize that we are seeing essentially the decline and the destruction of our industrial economy; that we can no longer take for granted that we are going to have a high value added economy in 10 years or 20 years and so on. It is only by encouraging the government to be an active player in the economy through an industrial strategy that we can help to offset the devastation that has been caused over the past few years.

I think one of the keys to an industrial strategy is a comprehensive Ontario business development bank, somewhat along the lines of the Federal Business Development Bank but by no means hampered as that tool is. I think the Ontario business development bank should not only be a lender of last resort to Ontario-based businesses, but also ought to be able to provide knowhow, ought to be able to provide suggestions and, most important, ought to be able to pull together the many strands of economic assistance that are available in this province.

As a recycler, for instance, I can go to MITT or to the Ministry of the Environment, industrial waste diversion program, to seek funds if I believe I have a worthy project. I think there is far too much duplication there. I think there should be a comprehensive structure that will administer programs from all departments or pull together the programs so there are fewer programs that we need to conceal ourselves with.

Recognizing that small business is largely responsible for job creation in this country and has been for many, many years, I also think it is time that the government recognize that there have to be special policies for small business. A development bank addresses some of those concerns.

In conclusion, I have suggested a business development bank as part of a larger industrial strategy to help pay some of the devastating effects of job loss in this province. I think if we are to halt the deindustrialization of Ontario, we have to allow the government and encourage government to take an active role.

A recent study by some University of Maine economists has suggested that if the United States were to enter into the same kind of free trade agreement with Mexico which Canada did with the United States, they would suffer a million jobs lost in the first year, and those would be permanent job losses. We do not expect the Americans to come there and let a million jobs go down the drain, nor can we afford that. So I immodestly suggest an idea that has been around for a while, and maybe its time has come.

Mr Kwinter: I am curious regarding the last statement that you made. I would like to get your comment on the Mexico-Canada-US free trade agreement. At the present time, negotiations are taking place. We do not know what the outcome is going to be, but given the past history, there is a very strong reason to believe that the United States and Mexico will make a deal. What the terms of that deal will be I do not know, but everybody assumes they will make the deal.

As a small businessman, do you think it would be to our advantage to have the United States making an independent free trade deal with Mexico, and the United States giving the Canada-US free trade agreement, without Canada being a participant in both ways?

Mr Martin: I am going to answer that somewhat indirectly. I think that while the intention of a free trade agreement with the United States was to secure our market, we have seen that market become further harassed through the economic pressures of the recession. If there are any benefits to be realized through the FTA, the recession has just about taken them away and just about made sure that we are not going to get those benefits for a long, long time.

If we are going to sign a three-way agreement, I think we can break it down pretty easily into Canada supplying many of the raw materials, the United States supplying a large market and Mexico supplying a relatively cheap labour force. In my kind of business, I do not really have to worry about that too much, except that as companies continue to close in Kingston and area, I will lose clients, and I lose clients and I lose the ability to collect recyclable materials, then I lose my access to my market. I believe that any agreement with Mexico is devastating because of the low wage of labour.

Mr Villeneuve: Thank you very much, Mr Martin, for your presentation. You fear duplication, and yet you are suggesting a new lending agency comparable to FBDB. Have you looked at or investigated and inquired about the ODC, the Eastern Ontario Development Corp?

Mr Martin: I think that with all the programs that are available, with all the knowledge that is available through the government, there ought to be an umbrella organization. I can fill out grant applications and loan applications for the provincial government till I am blue in the face. I think that the easiest thing to do and something I suggest is an Ontario business development bank with branches throughout the province, that not only is responsible for being a lender of last resort but also offers the expertise and can act as an agent in joint ventures. I think there are just too many programs and too many departments.

Mr Villeneuve: But are you not creating a duplicate to FBDB?

Mr Martin: No, I do not think so. The FBDB has largely gotten out of the lending business because its budget has been clamped down for many, many years. The types of controls on the money they have been lending have been relatively lax, so that they have made many questionable loans. Also, for small industrial ventures, their starting dollar amount is $100,000. Many companies do not need that much. Many companies need more than they can get through the new ventures program or, if you are younger, through the youth ventures program. I think there ought to be a program that takes into account all of these different strands of participation.

Mr G. Wilson: Thanks a lot for your presentation. I commend you for your survivability in this recessionary period.

Having worked in two different areas here, you have pointed out the federal government's policies and the provincial. I was wondering whether you think there is enough co-ordination between the two jurisdictions. Somebody in your position, I would say, needs all the help he can get. Do you feel you are getting a co-ordinated effort there to give you the most help you can get?

Mr Martin: No. One of the things, in a larger sense, that disturbs me about federal-provincial relations, whether it is getting money from one or the other or whether it is getting assistance or knowledge from one or the other, is that there are too many people knocking up against each other.

To go along with the question about the FBDB, I think it would be wonderful if Ottawa would say, "Okay, you now have jurisdiction over the FBDB in your province." I think it would be a wonderful opportunity for the provinces to really shine if there was more co-ordination, if the feds would say, "Okay, this really isn't an area that we can afford to be in, in a wealthy province like Ontario."

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation.

NATIONAL FARMERS UNION

The Chair: Mr Rick Munroe from the National Farmers Union. Welcome. You have 15 minutes for your presentation and question period at the end if you wish so.

Mr Munroe: Good afternoon. Before I get going on the budget itself, I probably should tell you a little bit about myself and the people I represent. My wife and I have a commercial sheep flock of about 140 ewes on Howe Island, which is one of the Thousand Islands just down the river from here. Our farm is not large—it is only 115 acres—but it is worth noting that it is a farm which had one of those "Century Farm" signs on it when we bought it 10 years ago. In other words, it was at one time, and for a considerable period of time, a viable farm operation. But my family and I would have starved to death long ago, I think, if we had to rely solely on the income from that farm. Today I am like the majority of Canadian farmers—the great majority, by the way—I have another job. In my case it is teaching, and we use my income to subsidize the farm operation. My wife is home and farms full-time, as do three of her brothers and another sister.

My wife and I are members of the National Farmers Union, which, as some of you will know, is a national organization which represents the interests of family farmers exclusively. In other words, it is unconnected with other sectors of agribusiness, which we think is an important distinction. Within the NFU I serve as a director at both the local and the district levels.

I will begin by saying here today that we appreciate being asked for our opinion. We believe that democracy works best when the public is actively involved in it. Also, the NFU has a wide range of well-thought-out policies which we believe can help this government and this country, and we welcome the opportunity to share these ideas.

In terms of the budget itself, I am here today to speak in defence of the government's budget. We recognize that the budget is not perfect. We would have liked to see more financial support for farmers, of course, among other things, but the budget is a very reasonable compromise between the needs of the present situation, which for Ontario farmers borders on an emergency, and the need to be responsible as far as running a deficit is concerned.

Speaking of the deficit, which is clearly the chief complaint which has been levelled at this government, I get rather annoyed when I hear critics trying to portray this government as suddenly having landed us with a $10-billion deficit, as if it was entirely its creation and was something it could have easily avoided. One would hope that critics of the budget would have at least been honest enough to concede that $3 billion of the $9.7 was inherited from the previous administration, so the NDP really has to answer for about $6.5 billion of that. When we subtract the money which was used to cover federal contributions which Mulroney suddenly decided Ottawa would not pay any more, another $1.6 billion, we are down to about an even $5 billion, or about half the figure that we continually hear being tossed at Mr Laughren. Then there is another $1.4 billion for various forms of social assistance which the government had very little control over because of legal or statutory obligations. There are explanations for the other $3.5 billion, which I am sure you have heard hundreds of times already from people who understand things a lot better than I do.

I would like to move on to the flip side of the deficit coin, which has to do with taxation. In other words, you get a deficit if either you spend too much or you tax too little—or both, of course. I believe there is a bit of both in this present deficit.

Ontario has been in something of an economic emergency during the past year. We have all heard the stats about our unemployment rate being the highest since the Depression and how we have lost 170,000 manufacturing jobs, two thirds of them because of permanent plant closures. The point is, I guess, that emergencies warrant extraordinary measures, so we see this government putting forward an increased effort to keep people working. For this the NDP deserves a pat on the back.

We would not have as much of a deficit if we could get a little more in the way of tax revenue from those who are most able to afford it. Canada is almost unique among western countries in that we do not have a minimum wealth tax. It is beyond Mr Laughren's abilities to impose one, I guess. But my point simply is that we ought not to cry too loudly about our deficits if we are unwilling to adopt measures which seem to be pretty widely accepted everywhere else in the world.

On this issue of fair taxation, we are pleased to see that the NDP has done a couple of things: first, to create a Fair Tax Commission, and we expect to see some progressive changes from that; and second, to make some reforms to our provincial tax laws to help out 120,000 low-income Ontarians, and at the same time demand a little more from people earning over $84,000.

On the environment front, the government has killed two birds with one stone; that is, gaining revenue and hopefully reducing pollution by taxing both fuel and gas-guzzling vehicles. That is just fine with us.

In terms of infrastructure spending, we also want to give the government our support for the $4.3 billion that it is spending on the province's infrastructure. You probably saw some of that money at work up on highway 401 as you came in. I have seen a couple of American TV documentaries on the precarious state of American bridges and overpasses. New York City's water supply hangs by a thread until 1998, when they can get a third water main in, and that kind of thing. I am glad to see that this government is a little more farsighted than that and is prepared to put people to work on things like roads and bridges and sewer and transit systems in a systematic, preventive sort of way. The general public should realize the folly of neglecting these things and be prepared to support these initiatives.

If we can look at the agriculture budget specifically for a moment, we are pleased to see that the total budget was increased. This was certainly in order. The food production system is the second-largest industry in this province, and it certainly has been under the gun for some time now. The new increases are entirely in two areas: $50 million for interest rate relief, which we regard as an effective short-term response to the farm debt crisis; and second, $40 million for the province's contribution to the gross revenue insurance plan, which we regard as ill conceived for a number of reasons, although it is better than nothing, which is what we were told we would get if we did not accept it. The only other good thing you can say about it is that farmers knew where they stood prior to the budget, so it gave them a chance to do a bit of planning prior to spring planting.

We would have liked to see more money for some of the more established Ministry of Agriculture and Food programs which are effective. One of the better ones, in our opinion, is the land stewardship program, which is now in its second phase. My brother-in-law is on the committee for Frontenac county and he told me that the entire three-year allocation of $133,000 was gone in the first round. When you hear of farmers having to spend something like $85,000 just for a manure-handling facility, the u can see how $133,000 for the whole county for three ars is not going to go very far. In other words, it would ly reach a small percentage of the farmers and help them th only a small percentage of these capital costs.

We would like to see more emphasis on on-farm research, particularly in the area of land stewardship and biological agriculture. In fact, we would like to see a major redirection of agriculture towards what is commonly called sustainable agriculture and towards the concept of food security. All of this has to do not just with the environment—people should know that agriculture is the nearest interface between human activity and the environment—but it also has to do a lot with farm income. We certainly will not have any sort of agriculture unless farmers can stay in business.

While we are on this point, I would like to say a few words about free trade. Food security has a lot to do with food self-sufficiency, and food self-sufficiency is not at all compatible with free trade and open borders. Free trade may be fine for something like children's toys or maybe tea towels, but it is not a very intelligent way of approaching a country's food supply. Every country leaves itself very vulnerable if it is not able to provide its citizens with essential food items. The next time we get a major blight or some fungal infestation or something like that someplace in the world, we will find out how fast, I think, this sort of new global free market system will grind to a halt and how important it is for each area to be able to more or less feed itself.

Here in Ontario we have about one third of the best farm land in all of Canada, when you take into consideration climate. We are going to lose our farmers and we are going to lose that land—a lot of it has already been paved over—unless we can ensure that farmers can make enough to stay in business. The point here is that the best any provincial government can probably do is just to apply Band-Aids until we can get some controls at the border.

The new model, this sort of global free market model, is wrong. Family farmers in Canada should not be out, or tending, to undercut small farmers in other areas of the world. I do not think we should take any particular pride in that. Canadians should not stand for cheap foreign produce, diverting our own food system. Niagara fruit growers, for example, should have to compete, but they should have to compete against others locally. They should not have to compete against the entire world.

So there we have it. We believe that this Ontario government has struck a reasonable and humane balance in the budget. We also believe that a good deal of our immediate problems are due to the recession and to the folly of free trade.

The best that we can hope for is that in the next two years people will wake up and rethink the entire concept of free trade, particularly when it comes to the food system. In the meantime, we thank this government for making the best out of a very bad situation. I thank you for allowing our voice to be heard here today.

Mr Villeneuve: Thank you very much for your very good presentation. You mentioned $50 million to agriculture, and that is my area of concern, as it is yours: $50 million to support interest and $40 million to GRIP. Were you aware that the absolute and total increase in the budget for agriculture was $21 million?

Mr Munroe: I thought it was $70 million.

Mr Villeneuve: It is $21 million.

Mr Munroe: I thought it had gone from $535 million to $602 million.

Mr Villeneuve: We have it right here, and it is $21 million; 3.5%. You have to remember that in that 3.5% increase, civil servants who work at 801 Bay Street and other places got a 6.8% increase. How much do you think that leaves for the farmer out there earning a living?

Mr Munroe: If your question is, did agriculture get enough or is the agriculture budget sufficient, our answer certainly would be no. It is also our understanding that about a quarter—is that right?—of OMAF's budget goes to the farm tax rebate.

Mr Villeneuve: Some $150 million.

Mr Munroe: Yes, out of $500 million and some odd.

Mr Villeneuve: That is in there for a long time.

Mr Munroe: That is correct. To us, that is sort of a misleading arrangement. What you are really doing is taking from a budget that should properly belong to agriculture and using it to fund public education.

Mr Villeneuve: Really it is levelling the playing field on a tax basis for agriculture, but it is considered as support.

Mr Jamison: I notice that a certain portion of your presentation dealt with free trade, although you did not really mention GATT and the effects of the GATT negotiations on the potential wellbeing of agriculture in general. I wonder if you would like to expand on your views there.

Mr Munroe: I think this intention to move to reduce tariffs, to move to a global free market system, is just as wrongheaded in GATT as it is in the free trade agreement, if that is what you mean. I think the problem, as far as the food system is concerned, is not really just the specifics of this Canada-US free trade agreement. It has to do with the model itself. I think it is very easy, in the absence of things like fungal infections and in the absence of a shortage of oil and that sort of thing, to say, "Oh, yes, let's move in that direction and may the cheapest producer win out."

I think those who have thought about the system for some time recognize it is not that simple. It is not that simple at all. One serious fungal infection—we see what is happening this summer in PEI and how difficult it is to eradicate what began as a fairly small problem there. We will see how fast borders and ports shut down and how important it is for people to be able to feed themselves. If your question was, is GATT in the wrong direction, I would say yes, it is.

Mr Conway: One of the interesting aspects of cross-border shopping for me is that a lot of people I know along the front here in southeastern Ontario report that among the most popular items that Canadians going across into New York state are buying are dairy products. To me, it is quite surprising. What would explain that?

Mr Munroe: Probably the record bankruptcies of dairy farmers in upstate New York. I am just guessing. I have some friends in Syracuse. Other than that, I rarely go to the US. I certainly would purchase as little as possible on a trip like that. I sure do not do my dairy shopping in the United States, so I could not tell you about the price difference or an explanation for it. But I do know that the Americans are having record bankruptcies. Just last week four American dairy organizations had lobbied Congress—no, the group of them had put forward four different proposals to the House committee, all of which were rejected, asking for some sort of supply management system like we have here in Canada.

SHAHEEN HIRANI

The Chair: The next presenter is Ms Hirani. Welcome. You have 15 minutes for your presentation.

Ms Hirani: My name is Shaheen Hirani, and I am a student at Queen's University here in Kingston. I come before this committee as a representative of whom the members on this committee may have heard very little in their travels. I do not claim to represent all of youth, but I do believe that the concerns I wish to address today are prevalent among the overwhelming majority of youth. As a student of economics and politics, please allow me to present a general commentary on the budget first, and then outline specific impacts this budget has on youth.

There are several economic realities which must be realized. First and foremost of these is that Ontario is in the midst of a recession. Ontario has felt the current recession more severely than the rest of Canada. Job losses have been dramatic, and appear to be permanent due to a variety of factors, including the free trade agreement, as many people have pointed out today. Sixty-seven per cent of job losses in 1990 were due to closures and only 33% were due to reduced operations.

Not only free trade but a number of federal economic policies have led to a substantial impact on the Ontario economy. The 1991 federal government budget extended the expenditure control plan introduced in 1990. It capped federal transfers to Ontario to 5% and this hit Ontario much harder than it hit other provinces. It had the effect also of transferring some of these costs to the Ontario government. It increased pressure to provide services. The Ministry of Treasury and Economics has estimated that the new federal constraints will cost Ontario $1.6 billion in 1991 and 1992. So even if this government had decided not to turn its back on the workers and help out those who are hurt most by this recession, there would be a deficit. That, I think, is a point to be taken.

When the media and the opposition parties have looked to the deficit, they have rarely examined what the spending has been targeted to. They also often condemn all spending altogether. I just want to point out some examples of this anti-recession spending, and some of the specific impacts on youth.

The initiatives included an employee wage protection fund of $175 million to guarantee wages for workers whose employers go out of business. Another long-overdue measure that has been undertaken is assistance to municipalities, school boards, hospitals, colleges and universities for per equity. Twenty million dollars in additional funding has been allotted for victims of sexual and domestic violence and for emergency shelters, and a 7% increase in social assistance benefits. I could go on and list a dozen more examples but I think the point is quite clear: the budget designed to help people during the difficult economic period. Deficit spending during a recession is a time-proven effective strategy, and I believe the government has taken the right strategy in targeting spending to those who need it most.

Moving on to specific impacts on youth, this budget has proven to be not only immediate in its help to youth but seems to have some long-term strategy for the development of this province in terms of job training and education.

Also, immediately effective measures will have a definite positive impact on youth in the long term. Starting November 1 1991, the minimum wage will be increased $5.55 an hour. Now this is one thing that we really commend the government on because youth poverty is a huge problem affecting thousands of youth across the province. Also they will be eliminating the differential between the adult and the youth minimum wage by 1992 and we think this is a very positive step for working youth across the province.

Another initiative particularly important to me and other students in the Kingston area is the rent control legislation that restricts rent increases to a level that will not force me to drop out this year because now I can afford my rent. This is something that will affect many students across the province, so this is also a youth issue.

Educational spending, which is the most important factor to affect youth, has also been bolstered. In addition the $36 million committed to OSAP, a fundamental restructuring of the program has been promised. This will be dramatically felt by thousands of students across the province, especially during this hard summer where many youth have found it difficult to find jobs.

There is one area in which the government failed, I think, and that is in tuition increases, which were promised by the government to be frozen but were not. We are hoping this will change in the next budget, where tuition can be frozen and another barrier to education can be lifted. This is just a sampling of the good impacts this budget will have on young people. I hope I have been able to enlighten the committee members about some of the less publicized aspects of the budget and their effects on youth. That is all.

Mr G. Wilson: Thanks a lot for your presentation. I was thinking that part of the strategy of the federal government here is to open up Canada to competition. You are the beginning of your career and you are going to a university that is, I think, acknowledged to provide an education that puts you in good standing to compete with the best. What is your view though on, say, what the proper role of the government should be? Do you think that is what a government should be doing to clear the path for competition or should it be providing other things for people, students in particular, but more generally for the people at large?

Ms Hirani: I think what the government has been doing so far, putting more money and more resources into its development and job training programs and education, is a step forward. I do not think we will be able to give the economic climate of the 1990s without a definite investment in the youth of today and in what skills we will have to manage the economy of the future. In terms of competition, as much as the government can do to alleviate or help people to compete on a more level playing field, good.

Mr Cleary: Thanks for your presentation. You touched on a number of good things. I know you are a student and you are looking to the future. How did you feel about the cancellation of the interest-free loan for east- and south- Ontario, for businesses here, which has happened in the last six or seven months?

Ms Hirani: For businesses?

Mr Cleary: Yes, the interest-free loan. They used to be able to get an interest-free loan to start a business. How do you feel about this government cancelling that program?

Ms Hirani: I was not aware of that actual thing, but obviously it is a bad thing if they are cancelling things that will help out young people or businesses. Many governments have done things in the past that have hurt people. I do not think that was their intent, if that was what they did.

Mr Villeneuve: As a young person getting near the end of your studying—I guess we never do stop studying—as someone who is still in university, does it concern you, as one who is going to be paying taxes, that the total debt of this province will be literally doubled in the next four years?

Ms Hirani: Obviously debt is a problem, and I do not think that can be put down as something that should just be dismissed. But I also think that in a recession the government has an obligation to the citizens of this province to respond and to alleviate the difficulties that are faced by people. I am quite willing to pay my taxes and deal with whatever will come in the future, but I think the government is right in spending during a recession and I do not think deficits in their entirety are all bad.

Mr Villeneuve: In spite of the fact that Ontario is probably the most heavily taxed jurisdiction in North America?

Ms Hirani: In return for our taxes I think we get a lot of which we take for granted—our health care system, our educational system is one of the best—and I think people would be willing to pay taxes for the level of services they receive in this province.

Mr Villeneuve: Cross-border shopping is a major problem in the area I come from, and it is primarily stemming from very high taxes on fuel. There are many areas of concern but that is the catalyst that is bringing people over to the US to do some shopping, high taxes, and with the doubling of the total debt of the province, inevitably we will be paying even higher taxes. I would like a solution to this and it is not an easy one.

Ms Hirani: I do not propose to have all the answers. You mentioned fuel taxes and I do not think that is something that should be compromised at all. The taxes on fuel are intended to promote a more energy-conscious environment and I think that is a good thing.

Mr Villeneuve: There are many ways we can be environmentally conscious, by the production of ethanol, which is a renewable resource which would be a renewable octane enhancer. I am a little disappointed that the National Farmers Union gentleman did not talk about it. As you said in your presentation, we must be competitive while attempting to preserve and not deteriorate our environment further, and that is quite a trick in itself. Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you for coming before this committee. This committee will recess until a quarter after three.

The committee recessed at 1506.

KATHEE HUTCHEON

The Chair: The next person to make a presentation is Ms Hutcheon. Welcome to the committee. You have 15 minutes for your presentation.

Ms Hutcheon: I would like to thank the government of Ontario and members of this committee for providing this opportunity for me to share my views on the 1991 Ontario budget. I am here to speak in favour of that budget from a couple of different perspectives: first, as the owner of a small business in rural Ontario and second, as a fairly average citizen of Canada and Ontario. I operate a small variety store in a hamlet just north of Kingston. My clientele ranges from local people year-round to an infusion of tourists and summer residents from southern Ontario and from several states south of the border.

Had anyone asked two or three years ago, many small businesses in small-town Ontario could have told the government of the day that the warning signs of an economic slowdown were beginning to show. Fewer American dollars were appearing in my till, there were increased numbers of advertising flyers coming out to rural areas from the larger urban centres and orders to my salespeople were declining in size. Some of the reasons behind this downturn are obvious. We have all heard them: the frustration and confusion surrounding the Canada-United States free trade agreement and its failure to stimulate the Canadian economy except in very specific areas; constantly increasing interest rates; an overvalued Canadian dollar, and most definitely the goods and services tax. I hear about that on a daily and regular basis.

None of the political or economic rhetoric of the past few years has given me, a small business person, much reason to expect anything other than the recession in which we currently find ourselves, that is, until the 1990 election and the subsequent budget of April 1991. This budget, I believe, is based on a philosophy of economic fairness and the preservation of social programs that are an integral part of the Canadian way of life. It is a budget designed to do what I believe is the economic purpose of government, that is, to act countercyclically, to build up deficits in order to give economic support and stimulation when other sectors of society cannot or will not, and then to pay down the deficit as the economy improves.

How does this budget help my small business in a time of recession? Any initiative that puts money into the consumer's pocket or does not remove it through unfair taxation makes it possible for businesses to do better. Economic initiatives that do just that are evident in this budget. To cite a few: not piggybacking the retail sales tax on top of the GST, a policy that is leaving $470 million in the consumers' pocket in this year alone; more favourable Ontario income tax for low-income Ontarians, again leaving money with the consumer; providing new funding for small and medium-sized manufacturing firms, thereby forestalling more bankruptcies and permanent plant closures; a clearly stated commitment to fighting the recession instead of the deficit, a move which indicated to many people in business that we had reason to be confident in the economic future in Ontario; infusion of money into the gross revenue insurance plan and the farm interest assistance program—a farming industry that is alive and well is a strong supporter of small businesses in small-town rural Ontario; increasing and improving on the affordable housing program—jobs are created in the construction industry, and a variety of businesses benefit from the subsequent spinoff effects of people buying homes.

The list does not stop here, but I believe the points I have mentioned clearly illustrate the reasons for my support of this budget as an owner of a small business.

I would like to continue my presentation by addressing the issue of maintaining our social support systems. It is clear that slow economic times not only erode government revenues but also increase demands on money from many of our social programs. This current recession, it has been noted, is the worst recession in Ontario in 50 years.

In Ottawa we have a federal government that has increased taxes and cut funding. In Ontario we have a government that is prepared to reverse those trends by giving people help and support now when it is needed, prepared to review and improve service delivery with an eye to the future needs of our society and prepared to invest in research and development, job retraining and manufacturing recovery.

The province of Ontario is noted for the high quality of its health care and educational systems. With the appropriate handling of expenditures and allocations of health care resources, we can maintain this high standard. People who need cancer operations, dialysis machines or open-heart surgery will still receive treatment because they need it, not because they can afford it. Several of my daily customers have undergone bypass surgery in the last two years. Without our principles of universality and accessibility, not one could have afforded that operation without serious financial burden.

Ontario spends about $10 billion a year on education. To cut spending would reduce the number of positions available for students in colleges and universities, and at the current level of unemployment there would be few jobs available for those who were not able to attend post-secondary education.

Futurists are predicting that the current generation of young people will be changing jobs at least 10 times in their employment history. Training and retraining in an educational institution or at the workplace must be appropriate and timely for those changes to be successful.

Social assistance has become a vital support to the ability and security of people who lose their jobs. More assistance, not less, is needed in times of high unemployment. More people, not fewer people, need food, shelter and job retraining.

Again, it should be obvious why this budget is receiving increasing support among average people and why his will prove it is the only sensible and defensible way to go.

The third aspect I would like to deal with is the fact of the deficit itself. Most of us are familiar with the components of the deficit: a reduction in government revenues caused by the recession; federal funding cutbacks in health care, education and social services, accumulated over the last few years to well over $3 billion; new program and anti-recession program spending; maintenance of already existing programs, and the deficit inherited from the previous government.

From my perspective, the only acceptable place for budget reductions was in the area of new programs and anti-recession spending, but this would have a small effect on the overall picture and would not have provided the boost the province needs right now.

It all adds up to a somewhat frightening total, and it would be even more so if we saw no light at the end of the tunnel. But a budget is more than a statement of where we are; it is a document that must deal with the past, the present and the future. So let us look at the future as the budget sees it.

The money put into the educational system in training programs today ensures that our workforce will be better equipped to handle the challenges of tomorrow.

Dollars put into strong environmental programs deal with waste reduction and management, coupled with high priority given to energy efficiency and conservation, will help to provide us with a cleaner, healthier environment in which to live and work.

There is probably no system in the country or the province that needs an overhaul more than the taxation system. The setting up of a Fair Tax Commission to undergo a comprehensive review of taxation in Ontario has to be one of the most important decisions made by this government. It is essential that changes be made to the tax system so that people's attitude towards taxes can change. Do not expect us necessarily to welcome taxation, but if it is seen as fair and equitable we will accept it as a necessary part of our way of life. As it stands, many people are convinced that the taxation system is an unfair pile of gobbledegook designed by lawyers for lawyers and the people who employ them.

Another commission created by this government that will have an impact on the future is a three-person commission of inquiry to examine all aspects of land use planning and regulation. The agricultural paradise of the Golden Horseshoe has been virtually destroyed by residential, commercial and industrial development made possible by shortsighted people who focused too narrowly on immediate financial gain. This region had the best agricultural land in the country, bar none, and yet we see more and more imported food items on the shelves of our grocery es. I sincerely hope that the members of this committee take their job seriously and recommend appropriate measures to preserve our farm land.

There are many other items in the budget to which I would offer support, such as initiatives to counter violence against women, stronger pay equity legislation and greater funding for the cultural industry in Ontario. But I think I've made the point that the Ontario budget presented in April 1991 is a fiscally and socially responsible plan for the future of our province.

Mr Kwinter: Ms Hutcheon, one of the things you said was that you support the budget and you feel that in times of need a deficit is fine and you would pay down the deficit when the economy improves and that you see light at the end of the tunnel.

I would like to get your response to these figures. In 1990-91 the government brought in a deficit of a little over $1 billion. In the coming year, the year that we are in right now, they are anticipating that there will be less revenue than there was last year but they are going to be spending 4% more than they did last year. So there is a 13.4% increase in expenditure but the revenues are going to be less and that is why we have this $9.7-billion deficit.

Next year they are projecting that revenue will go up 10% and they claim that their expenditures are only going to be up 6%. That happens for the next four years. Every year it will go up 10% in revenue and expenditures will be up 6%, which is at the rate of inflation.

One of the things we have heard from virtually every single social agency that has appeared before this committee is that they applaud the government for what it is doing, realizing that they need more money but, because times are tough, they are prepared to take what they are getting because they understand there is a recession.

If you take a look at the projections of this budget, according to the government there will be no more expenditures because all that is happening is that the expenditures are going up by the rate of inflation. How are you going to tell people, when times are good: "Sorry, we can't give you any more money, because times are good. You're going to have to wait until times are bad, because when times are bad, we'll give you some extra money. But when times are good, we can't give it to you?"

Yet for every one of the next years until the end of 1995, there is a deficit. The smallest deficit is $7.8 billion in 1995, which means there is no money to pay down any of the debt. So all of these people are praising Keynesian economics, saying, "We support it and everybody knows that's great, that when times are bad you spend the money and when times are good you pay it down," but there is no provision to do that. How do you respond to that?

Ms Hutcheon: I am not an economist and I do not know if I am supporting Keynesian economics or John Kenneth Galbraith economics or whatever, but I think there are a lot of people out there who believe, and I am one of them, that as times improve, the demands for those demands will also go down, and that could well have a positive effect on the deficit.

Mr Villeneuve: Cross-border shopping is a problem to everyone across Ontario. It quite obviously is affecting you as one operating just north of town here. What are the comments you get from Americans when you set out the price and then the taxes, or what are the general comments from the Americans as they come here? With this very drastic increase in the deficit we are going to have additional taxes; it is inevitable.

Ms Hutcheon: The most frequent and virtually the only comment I hear from my American customers concerning taxes is the GST. I have never, in this season particularly when we are all listening for negative and positive comments on a variety of issues, heard anyone reflect negatively against the retail sales tax, perhaps because we are all familiar with it. They are all used to it. I have a lot of return American customers, but it is constantly about the GST.

Mr Villeneuve: They are quite obviously not aware that the 13.5% manufacturers' tax was removed and replaced by 7%, but that is beside the point. You say, and this is my final question, that a farming industry that is alive and well is a strong supporter of small business in rural Ontario. Do you feel the agricultural business right now is buoyant?

Ms Hutcheon: I see that it has probably declined over the last two or three years since I have been in business, but in eastern Ontario it is not very vibrant and buoyant anyway. My real rural agricultural concerns are in southern Ontario, where I grew up.

Mr Villeneuve: But you are in deeper trouble than we are.

Ms Hutcheon: It is an agricultural and economic disaster as far as I am concerned.

Mr Villeneuve: But the comment here that everything is alive and well and supporting small business—

Ms Hutcheon: When they are alive and well.

Mr G. Wilson: Thanks a lot, Kathee, for your presentation. I found it quite wide-ranging and certainly thought-provoking. I like your comments about the Fair Tax Commission, that people are willing to pay taxes when they are seen to be fair. Just to pick up on what Mr Villeneuve is saying about the situation of farming and the protection of farming lands, you say they are wasted in the Golden Horseshoe area. I was wondering what our position then should be on future use of farming land. Are you hopeful about the future of protecting our farm lands? I am thinking about this area, southeastern Ontario.

Ms Hutcheon: In southeastern Ontario? I would hope there would be strong measures put forward to stop the rezoning of agricultural land into residential and commercial and industrial development. There are lots more appropriate places to live in the great Canadian Shield than in the Golden Horseshoe and in the Hay Bay region, etc. It is wonderful farm land down there. But where I am from we grow stones and farmers continue to farm that land, but because it does not produce the way one needs it to produce and have a good quality of life, they have to take outside jobs. There are very few good, top-quality, sole-income farming operations as far north as I am from, which is not that far north of Kingston really.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation.

CECILIA BROOKS

The Chair: Our next presenter is Ms Brooks. Welcome. You have 15 minutes for your presentation.

Ms Brooks: My name is Cecilia Brooks. I work at the library at Queen's University, but for the last four years I have been working with my co-workers, teaching them English as a second language and literacy. It is a program that was set up by the Ontario Federation of Labour and it is funded by the Ministry of Skills Development. Most recently, I have been working with the Ontario Federation of Labour to develop approaches and materials for literacy and second-language programs that will better meet the needs of workers in Ontario who are facing layoffs and closures.

Workers facing unemployment due to layoffs or closures react in much the same way as to any major loss. They face denial, anger and fear. They repeatedly experience rejection as they search for jobs and their self-esteem is shattered.

To make matters worse, the federal government has passed Bill C-21, which has increased the eligibility requirements and shortened duration periods. More and more workers are being told that they have been disentitled or disqualified. In the first 11 months of 1990, close to 500,000 people in Ontario were affected. Of those, about 75,000 were disqualified for incomplete documentation.

Although the federal UIC does have an appeal system, the procedure is complicated and confusing. There have been over 15,000 umpire decisions. If an unemployed person fails to successfully appeal or gives up in frustration, he or she then turns to the province or municipality for financial assistance. Locally in Kingston, our social planning council is now assisting 36% more people than last year. This has increased the dollar amount by 50%.

Bill C-21 has freed the federal government's financial responsibility for the unemployed of Ontario, but how has the province's new budget responded to the unemployed of Ontario?

We have $215 million for social assistance reforms, which will allow people to earn 25% above their welfare before deductions, which will help people to get into the labour force and help overburdened municipalities; and $32 million has been given to adult literacy programs. This money will help so many more people take control of their lives, and as a provider of literacy in my workplace, I can certainly tell you what the money will mean to those people.

There is $32.5 million for new training and assistance programs for laid-off workers; $50 million in tax cuts for low-income families, and I understand that this means that the number of low-income earners whose Ontario income tax would be eliminated or reduced will increase to 700,000 for the 1991 year; $700 million for the anti-recession program to create 18,000 jobs, and most important, the budget will create or maintain approximately 70,000 jobs.

Other incentives that I would like to mention are the wage protection fund, $175 million; the development of another 10,000 non-profit housing units; $131 million for business research and development, and $57 million in loans and guarantees for small and medium businesses.

This recession has hit Ontario very hard. The number of unemployed in this province is now over 530,000. Since December 1988, we have lost 3,269 jobs in the Kingston area alone. Ontario's unemployment help centres are a lifeline for the unemployed. These centres provide program services and assistance to enable workers to access meaningful employment and/or retraining.

It is my belief that the province of Ontario must find a way to police the federal government's unemployment insurance system. We must address the criteria which were established by the Peterson Liberal government which do not allow these centres to assist unemployed workers with their appeals for UI. The province must act on the flow of unemployed from UIC to provincial assistance.

It is also extremely important for dislocated workers to be well informed of their rights under section 26 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, not only for the protection of their UI rights, but as a way of lengthening the period that they qualify for benefits while at the same time upgrading to meet the required qualifications for entry to a retraining course. Workers forced into this situation need assistance to find their way through the training bureaucracy, and these centres can provide that help.

The community industrial training committees are given huge amounts of federal funds as well as provincial funds to sponsor training initiatives and to promote skill occupations. However, this organization seems to have extremely high administrative costs, and it appears to me that the provincial funds are spent only on administration and not on training per se. This is extremely frustrating for people who are unemployed and want to upgrade their skills.

I would like to stress that the present problem is that there are not enough jobs available. It is not that our workers lack the skills to work. There are many workers in Ontario who are underemployed, working at jobs which demand very few skills and pay very low wages. It is also vital that we set up bridging programs to assist underemployed workers to access training programs, as well as literacy and English as a second language, so that we can all contribute to society in a more effective way. Having these services available to the community in the form of help centres helps keep workers, both employed and unemployed, together.

In closing, I would like to make the point that I support the provincial government's choice of putting the wellbeing of people before the deficit. I am not an economist, and although I have read much about the causes and effects of the deficit, I do not really understand it. But I do know that you cannot walk away from the members of our community when they are down and out, at a time when they need it the most. I think this budget is a major step in the right direction, and I would like to thank the government of Ontario for holding public hearings to allow people the opportunity to share our views.

Mr G. Wilson: Thanks very much for your presentation. I find it is based on a lot of experience. I see you had worked the adult literacy program. I guess that was the basic education for skills training program at the workplace.

Ms Brooks: That is right.

Mr G. Wilson: The thing that I want to centre on, though, is your section on the unemployment help centres. I guess the sense that I get is that these workers need more than a job posting on a wall, that there is some kind of support that they need over and above that.

Ms Brooks: That is right.

Mr G. Wilson: I just wonder if you could elaborate on that. I suppose it has partly to do with the morale problem of being either unemployed or underemployed. Anyway, I do not prejudge what you are going to say.

Ms Brooks: Do not take my speech, Gary.

Mr G. Wilson: Yes, right, go ahead.

Ms Brooks: The plight of the unemployed really is a very desperate one. The stigma that is attached to being unemployed leads a lot of people to stay at home and wait for the phone to ring: read the paper, write résumés, send them in and expect that a call is going to come. Rejection is in, self-esteem is shattered, they start spending less time with friends because they are embarrassed, ashamed, whatever, and do not have the money to go out and do the things that they used to do before.

The unemployment help centres, where they are running in the province, are a very good way to get people to come together for workshops, for job search clubs, as they help them, where they help one another. They strike up a friendship with other unemployed people and they help one another get jobs, they help one another upgrade their skills. We have cases where they go together in groups to community colleges because it is less frightening to go together in a group, but we have the unemployment help centre which brings them together and gives them a new sense of community that they lost when they lost a workplace.

Mr Kwinter: Ms Brooks, I was interested in your comment about the people who were underemployed and that there was a greater need for jobs. This morning we had a presenter who claimed that in fact it was just the opposite, that one of the problems we have is that we have not got enough skilled people around and that the literacy rates were 25% in Ontario. How do you reconcile the two points of view?

Ms Brooks: Literacy is very wide-ranging. There are many degrees of literacy or illiteracy. There are people—probably very few people in Ontario—who cannot read and write at all, but we have quite a number of people who are probably reading at about grade 9 level who still qualify for and need literacy programs to upgrade their skills, to build their self-esteem to get back into community college programs and so on, who have had jobs. Some of these workers went and found a job immediately out of school, were trained in that job and were skilled in how to do that job, but when they go out and apply for a new job when their plant closes, they find that they are not necessarily trained, nor do they have the skills to do the job in the new plant with the new technology and so on.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation.

WILFRED DAY

The Chair: Mr Day, welcome. You have 15 minutes.

Mr Day: Thank you very much. My presentation will take eight or nine minutes and I will then be pleased to answer questions. I am speaking, as my brief notes, as an individual. I am a school trustee representing the town of Port Hope and the township of Hope on the Northumberland and Newcastle Board of Education, but I am not here officially on behalf of the board.

The main reason I am here is to tell you how furious I was when the Conservatives, criticizing the provincial budget, said that grants to municipalities and school boards should have been frozen. If the press and the public had fully understood that the Tories were calling for property tax increases of around 15%, they might have been less likely to climb on the bandwagon of looking at nothing but the size of the deficit.

To prove what I am saying, I will have to give you some figures about the Northumberland and Newcastle Board of Education, on which I have served for the past nine years.

I should tell you first that our board serves 22,000 students in the county of Northumberland and the town of Newcastle, which is part of Durham East riding. This makes us the largest board between Oshawa and Ottawa. Our 1991 budget was about $132 million. We are a growth board. Right now we are building two new elementary schools and one major addition. About 28% of our elementary students are in portables, so we need to build a lot more. Our size allows us to be leaders in many ways. For example, the percentage of our secondary students in co-op placements is the highest of any board in Ontario. As our official slogan, we are proud to call ourselves "Leaders in Learning." Despite all this, our costs per student are several hundred dollars lower than the average county board in Ontario—about 6% below the average.

Under Ontario's 1991 budget, our board's operating grants are up 8.8%, including enrolment growth. Provincially, the budget put school board operating grants up 7.9%. If our board's operating grants had been frozen, we would have lost $4,935,562. Our mill rate this year increased 6.98%. Losing those grants would have caused a further 8.92% increase, for a total mill rate increase of 15.9%.

Of course the public in Northumberland and Newcastle would never have bought that in the middle of a recession. We would have had to make more cuts. But because of the recession, we had already cut practically everything. The only major new initiative in our budget was an extra $618,000 for building maintenance. If we had chopped that item right out in response to a grant freeze, our mill rate increase would still have been 14.78%. If we had chopped all other new initiatives, the mill rate increase would still have been 14.52%.

This is because our base budget, our uncontrollable costs, had a built-in increase of 7.16%: inflation, GST, UIC rate increase, pay equity and enrolment growth. Provincial grants made up about 46% of our budget last year, so if provincial grants had been frozen, you can see why local ratepayers would have been hit with a mill rate increase of over 14%.

Why are there so few cuts we could have made? Because we long ago made all the cuts we could. Our provincial funding has been dropping since 1974. Please look at the graph at the back of my brief. You will see that it has been dropping. Last year it was 46.1%; this year it is 47.6%. Before anyone gets too excited about the fact that our provincial share in 1991 is up, I should tell you that was due to capital grants for new schools. The ministry's share of the board's operating costs this year was 46.09%.

Over the past 17 years, as a result of declining funding, we cut everything we could find. We closed the last of our small, inefficient schools around seven years ago. We streamlined our administration. We did everything else possible, and then we started cutting building maintenance as a short-term expedient until provincial funding would, as all three parties promised, improve. We have been doing that for seven years and it has not improved yet.

Since 1984, our plant department reports that we have built a maintenance deficit of $13.6 million. So last year we passed an eight-year plan to wipe this out, needing each year an annual increase in our maintenance budget of $618,000. If we had cancelled this year's increase, not only would we have added to unemployment in the construction industry, but we would have been indulging in false economies. Even some of the more conservative trustees on our board who said they wanted to get our mill rate increase down to 5% still voted for this $618,000 maintenance budget increase.

We could not have coped with a grant freeze by dipping into our reserves, because we did that already. To keep the mill rate down in this recession year, we budgeted for everything we could legitimately call a onetime cost, $817,000 worth, to be paid out of reserves. I do not expect we will be able to do that again in 1992. And of course, the local share of everything we can legitimately call capital, even new portables, is debentured.

I have told you all this to show that a grant freeze would have left us no alternative to a mill rate increase of almost 15%, even though that would have been totally unacceptable to our ratepayers.

I am not the only school trustee in Ontario who gets really amused when the private sector and Conservative politicians tell us it is time we started to cut back, as they have had to do in recent years. They obviously have no idea that school boards all over Ontario have been living with cutbacks for 17 years. After all that time, we really tend to feel we are the experts in how to live with it and what it really means.

From our narrow point of view, some of us probably thought the biggest news about the provincial budget was that the government had postponed bringing back succession duties and had therefore postponed moving towards a return to 60% provincial funding.

One of our board's top priorities in the next few years is women and technology. We already have very good numbers of female students choosing math and science options in their senior high school years, but our problem is technology. Our enrolment in old-style tech courses is still declining and we have had mixed results trying to get more girls to take those courses. Over the next few years we are going to spend a lot of money introducing design and technology courses geared to the computer and appealing equally to male and female students. If grants had been frozen, we would have been trying to do all that at the same time as playing catch-up after a grant freeze. It is such an absurd proposition, I do not know whether to laugh or cry.

I get even more angry when people say we have to clamp down on welfare payments. Most welfare payments cannot be controlled. The easiest people to clamp down on, the most powerless, are the potential high school dropouts who have left home in conflict with their parents and are looking for student welfare. They are easy to cut from the welfare rolls—you tell them to go home or get a job. They get a deadend job, drop out of school and all we have to offer them is speeches by Brian Mulroney urging them to lower the dropout rate.

It really makes me sad to see suggestions of freezing education grants coming from the party of Bill Davis, a man who proved that it was indeed possible to raise the provincial share of education funding, when he raised it from 47% in 1969 to 60% in 1972. They should be thoroughly ashamed of themselves.

When you look at that graph and see that our provincial funding dropped from 57.6% in 1985 to 46.1% in 1990, I have to say I do not really see how the Liberals have any credibility on education finance either.

In conclusion, I say, thank God we had a Treasurer who did not use the recession as an excuse to take another kick at the school boards.

Becoming a school trustee was never one of my career objectives. Sometimes it is a pretty thankless job, constantly having to maintain some kind of balance between the needs of children in the classroom and the ability of the taxpayer to pay. Despite the fact that I have children in school, which is obviously why I ran, I have to keep their interests in balance. So does every other school trustee. But as the Supreme Court of Canada said in the Meiorin decision dealing with the question of what numbers are sufficient to warrant separate French language schools, I am paraphrasing, if the proper balance between financial and children's education is in doubt, the best interests of the children should be given the benefit of the doubt.

That is what I like about Ontario's 1991 budget: I am proud to say that it puts people first.

Mr Jamison: Thank you very much for your presentation, Mr Day. I understand what you are saying about education in general, about transfer payments to boards and to municipalities and so forth. I wonder if you could enlighten us as to basically what a freeze on those payments would have meant to class sizes and numbers of teachers. Would it have caused layoffs within the board itself?

Mr Day: The administration of our board did a calculation on what would have been necessary to hold the budget-to-budget increase to 5%. That is not the same as holding the mill rate. To hold the budget-to-budget increase to 5% we would have had to lay off 40 teachers, which is completely out of the question. What uld have done to class sizes is unimaginable. What it uld have done to our collective agreements which con-lass size provisions is it would have violated them. It impossible to even contemplate. However, they did ce the calculation at the request of one of our trustees.

Mr Cleary: I just wondered. You said that our mill increase this year was 6.98%. How did that compare n the previous two or three years?

Mr Day: A little lower. We squeezed it as tight as we ld this year.

Mr Cleary: How much was it in the last two or three rs?

Mr Day: I do not have the figures with me at the ment.

Mr Cleary: Was it in double digits?

Mr Day: I think the 1989 budget was probably a double it, yes.

Mr Villeneuve: I see you have taken a few strips off my ty. That is quite all right. We are fair game. Would you sider your board to be one of the have or have-not rds? It is rapidly expanding. We seem to have two breeds oards: those that do very well, thank you very much, l those in rural parts of Ontario that struggle at best, and ill always be a struggle. Where do you sit on that scale?

Mr Day: We are definitely one of the assessment-poor rds. We are around about the 75th percentile in that egory. We are right in the middle of the bottom half of assessment-poor boards, which is because we have rely little commercial and industrial assessment. Our wth tends to be the bedroom variety of growth.

Mr Villeneuve: But rapidly expanding growth, ough, in the residential area.

Mr Day: We start at the eastern boundary of Oshawa. e whole area, Courtice, Bowmanville and so on, is owing like mad as a commuter community. There is no mmercial and industrial out of that, though.

Mr Villeneuve: Having sat on the select committee on ucation a few years ago, I was always intrigued by the her novel ways that some of the have boards have of ending money. Then of course it comes to us who say, ell, we cannot be discriminated against and therefore we ve to provide some of the services the downtown To- to boards have," and we wind up in very difficult situa- ns. Your particular case would probably be an example that because you are one of the have-not boards and yet u are within pretty easy earshot of some of the big down- wn Toronto boards that have money to burn, literally.

Mr Day: Quite so.

Mr Villeneuve: That makes your position even more ficult possibly than some of the other assessment-poor ards.

Mr Day: It makes it difficult in two ways. First of all, e are trying to provide as good a service as they do in ronto with about 75% as much money per student. Sec- d, we run into voters who know about school boards ly what they read in the Toronto Sun. They assume I am earning $50,000 a year as a school trustee rather than $8,000 and they assume we have money to burn.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation.

KINGSTON AND DISTRICT LABOUR COUNCIL

The Chair: The last group to appear is the Kingston and District Labour Council. You have one half-hour for your presentation.

Mr McPhail: Essentially, I do not think I will be using the half-hour, so we will let everybody out early.

Mr Villeneuve: No overtime, shucks.

Mr McPhail: Yes, right.

The main thrust of the arguments presented by the labour council is fairly normal across the province in a lot of respects. Essentially, they are based around the aspects of the budget proposals being fairly evenhanded in a lot of different areas, whether it is health care, education, social-service-based organizations or whether it is in the neighbourhood of local municipalities receiving the ongoing type of transfer payments or the onetime type payments that are being received through the anti-recessionary program. That also extends into the education field and other types of institutions within the province.

You might ask, in a sense, why is it an element of interest to the labour groups in that they are normally out for contractual obligations? We have developed this social service network throughout the province that is really second to very few in the world. In a lot of respects, the people who are out there who work every day have relied on that and have been part of it and want and will maintain, in terms of paying taxes, that type of health care system.

The real point of the argument in a lot of things is that when you take away those types of moneys, if it was that type of situation, we would end up with considerable economic deficits in the Kingston area that we would have to consider. Being not necessarily a unique community, we have representations from large, different areas in here. We are a large centre for health care, education being represented through the colleges and obviously the public and secondary school boards and the university itself, which contribute largely to the economy of the community.

Again, obviously, and not to leave out the other aspect, because it is a very large group, you would have to talk about the business community itself, whether it is Alcan or the different Millhaven transit groups or things of that nature.

The only difference between them is that the provincial government budget itself—we are not talking necessarily about free trade or anything else, but relating to the provincial budget—does not necessary address the concerns of industry. A lot of the cases or arguments that are being used today are outside that budget, so I have tended to step away from that to a certain extent.

The other area we all recognize is the social service agencies. Particularly, we have to find that the provincial government, in two aspects, has come across reasonably well. We all recognize that through the provinces of the country there have been a lot of cutbacks in terms of the provincial governments that provide the services, whether it is employment or not. We do not see that within the Ontario government, which is quite unique and is also very pleasing to the labour community obviously.

The other thing is the need for social services. I am involved presently with the United Way of Kingston and also involved in other aspects, employee assistance programs and that in the workplace, and coming out of an education area such as the university where we keep getting this great feedback from people saying: "Look, you're the educated people of the world. You're part of a large organization that has lots of education. Why are you concerned about the employee assistance program? There are no problems in those places."

Dealing with average individuals and the concerns they have on a day-to-day basis, I find it very interesting if they repudiate that type of situation, because there is a need. The average person out there, whether he has a PhD or a grade 12 education, working within that structure has the same concerns and the same problems. It is maybe only elevated whether you have dollars or not. I always say that is more of a whimsical type of comment than anything.

The root point is that I think what we come down to in the long run is that the budget delivered basic across-the-board maintenance and that, at the minimum in this time of recession, is important. We cannot as a community, and that is largely what we are, whether it is province-wide or local, turn our backs on people. This is where I draw an interesting analogy. It is not to slight business in a respect. We have a considerable argument out there that we must reduce the budget for the sake of reducing it. I will use the analogy that when in business, the economic factors are there. Whether or not you are losing money and you decide to make economic decisions, they are usually based on the aspect that you know you are there to create a profit for the corporation itself or maintain a certain level of profitability.

Whether or not you can do that is usually a relatively easy decision, but when you come into the aspects of government and the aspects of the social community, you cannot treat the organization, whether it is government or local groups, as a business. They are an individual person or an individual group of people and it has to be recognized that they are not labelled with dollars and cents on them or they are not labelled with numbers on their heads. I think that is very important. As a person or as a member of the labour movement, that is where I find it can support a budget of this nature.

To step aside from those four main areas, the other thing I see—to get away from the more global arguments of labour itself in dealing with the pay equity question or whatever, which really the labour movement in Kingston supports—is that there is another real problem this budget helps address in this area in particular, although it is going to become a greater problem over time and maybe will require more assistance, and that is what I will call the Toronto syndrome.

Coming from that area, we have all recognized in the last 20 years that the city has grown in great leaps and bounds, Toronto, that is, and the economic and growth effect it had in the rural communities around the area. Since coming to Kingston in the last 10 years, I am starting to see that essentially Kingston has a very wide-ranging community for employment, not necessarily social agencies whatever, but people come to Kingston for employment. Ever greater numbers from Belleville on the west side, the 401 to Brockville at the other end and as far as West to the north. You draw a nice arch there. You can see a large area where there are a lot of local municipalities; this is where my argument comes in, the aspect of one-time transfer payments, if you want to call them that, to municipalities and the onetime annual inflationary program.

We have a large number of people in there who essentially are in small municipalities. They are in the order of 5,000 or 6,000 people who essentially rely on the Kingston area as an economic benefit and provide the economic infusion, whether it is through taxes or through providing buying power to local businesses in those regions. That is where you can start seeing and then tying together the whole aspect of how the budget for this region has provided a fairly balanced economic condition. It is as likely more by a fluke, but in a global sense it has recognized and provided a certain element of stability here by providing the maintaining of the health care education and social services and things of that nature, the only things in the region that really have changed substantially. Whether it has gone from larger to more moderate-sized businesses is arguable. But essentially, in terms of large businesses in the area, we have seen a distinct decrease in the number of people who are employed. We have gone to a greater number of moderate businesses or smaller, and whether we have filled a gap I have no figures to prove or disprove.

This brings you back to the whole argument of local municipalities. If you are going to provide a quality of service which is generally what the labour movement in a rural area about way is trying to get at, if we get into one of the local municipalities, as always the society today is demanding an ever-increasing number of services. This relates to the aspects of the planning that were talked about earlier and things of that nature. The local municipality has a designated amount of cash on hand or the ability to raise taxes through whatever way. What we are seeing in the area and what I suspect will heavily increase is the inability of these municipalities to provide these services. It is based on the aspect of planning in a lot of respects, but in other aspects too.

Of course we have to provide the increased elements of education in our public schools and our high schools, but when you get into the rural areas of the north, you always run into the inevitable problem of how far to draw them. Once you draw them in from great distances and you have large numbers, how do the actual schools themselves affect the community through the aspects of pollution or whatever, in terms of their septic beds and stuff of that nature? It provides a very mixed and problematic situation for an average individual to live in.

To cut it short, once you have developed these problems whether it is through the school problems or whether it is through having a rural road with one-acre lots strung down the side where everybody is living more or less in a piecemeal division and the municipality cannot provide the service use obviously it does not have the tax base, whether service is lighting or garbage collection or, in the future, could be the demand through such instances as the transport instance where a large number of people lost the ability to obtain water through that type of thing—could occur in the rural areas through pollution or the quarry—once you get to that point you have real problems and there is no way those municipalities can provide those services.

I will always use this line: Coming out of the area north of Toronto, as I said, I remember getting a phone call one evening for my father. He happened to be a mayor of that area. A lady gets on the phone, or a person—I will not identify the gender—and says, “I have a problem with my sewers.” I say, “Where do you live?” The person says, “I am in concession road such-and-such, lot whatever.” I say, “Oh, sorry, but there are no sewers out there,” and the person says, “I bought out here and it is in this municipality and I am sure I have sewers.”

It is an exaggeration, but you can see the type of problems we are running into in this area. To make a long and short of that type of thing, I see economic infusions such as the $100 million to provide jobs, first of all, because the labour movement is there, but second, to provide those essential services that provide an element of quality of life for people who are living in the region. I would just like to conclude more or less on that note and show our support in general for the budget. I am sure you have heard everyone in this world who had always wanted or expected more, this time I am not so certain it is there. I would just like to end on that point. Thank you.

Mr G. Wilson: Thanks for your presentation. Coming out of the labour council, I think it shows that the labour councils are interested in more than just the jobs in the area at the wage levels, but also the quality of life the working people in this area experience and what is needed to ensure the people here have a good standard of living.

I would like to follow up on your last comment about the uncertainty of the future. I took it to mean the basis that we have come to expect, the manufacturing sector in this area—I know it is eroding to some extent. What do you think is the future here about that? Did we establish if that is possible, or do we need something that I think a couple of other presenters touched on, the information sector or some kind of clearinghouse like an unemployment help centre, to make sure the workers are moving from the manufacturing sector, which has been strong in this area but is slipping, to other areas in the economic sphere?

Mr McPhail: Essentially, in respect of the business aspect slipping, the whole question bases it around the local municipalities and how they have handled themselves and the labour movement to a certain extent, but the real point is that Kingston is always seen as Kingston. I think what you have to get across is that there is much more than the city of Kingston in this area. There are greater services around here than in the old city of Kingston. It extends along the 401 quite nicely. Argumentatively, to my perspective, it should start extending north because we are getting this great, big, long stretch.

That is the real crux of it. There are a large number of industries that have come into this general area—Belleville to the east, because of the low cost of land—but when you get to that point and you have a large infusion of businesses or government agencies, you come back to the fact that you have to find a place to put the people. That is the real dilemma in this area at the moment. You have to get that planning.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation. Before closing here, I thank the constituents of Kingston and The Islands area for their presentations before this committee. It has been very helpful.

This committee now will recess until 9 am tomorrow in Cornwall. We are adjourned. It is a long recess.

The committee adjourned at 1616.
